First, the TSP falls well within President Bush's constitutional authority, recognized and supplemented by Congress in the aftermath of Sept. 11, 2001, to protect Americans by intercepting the international communications of a lethal enemy.

Second, the Justice Department began exploring options for FISC approval of the collection of international al Qaeda communications into and out of the United States in the spring of 2005, well before the first media accounts disclosing the existence of the TSP.

It took considerable time and effort, however, for the government to develop this new approach, which has the speed and agility offered by the TSP, and for a judge of the FISC to consider and approve these orders. The new FISC orders are innovative and complex, but the result is that any electronic surveillance that may have occurred previously under the TSP will now be subject to FISC approval.

Accordingly, under these circumstances, the president has determined not to reauthorize the TSP when the current authorization expires.

Third, the attorney general directed department officials to brief the Senate and House Intelligence committees, as well as other key members of Congress, on the new orders. Although the existence of these orders has been made public, their contents remain highly classified. The disclosure of such information could reveal to our enemies aspects of our intelligence capabilities and allow them to evade detection.

The intelligence community has confirmed the value of the TSP in providing us with information that we would not otherwise have had and has confirmed that these new orders will fulfill that crucial function. The attorney general and the Justice Department are committed to fighting terrorism and using all lawful tools to protect our nation in a manner that respects and preserves the civil liberties of all Americans.

Tasia Scolinos, director of public affairs, Department of Justice, Washington

U.S. To Try Dutch Citizen On Iraq Terror Charges (CNN)

CNN, January 29, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- The United States on Sunday was detaining an Iraqi-born Dutch citizen, extradited by the Netherlands' government, for allegedly conspiring to kill U.S. citizens in Iraq, the Dutch Justice Ministry said.

Iraqi native Wesam al-Delaema, 33, arrived on a Dutch plane Saturday and is the first suspect to face criminal charges in a U.S. court for alleged terrorist involvement in the violent Iraqi insurgency, Justice Ministry spokesman Ivo Hommes said.

The U.S. government charged him with possession of explosives and conspiracy to kill U.S. citizens in an attack. The Justice Ministry said intelligence revealed that al-Delaema traveled to Iraq and met up with "Mujahedeen from Falluja" in 2003 and conspired with the group to conduct terrorist activities.

He was arrested by Dutch officials in May 2005 on terrorism-related charges. The Justice Department said the Netherlands placed al-Delaema in extradition custody in response to a preliminary U.S. request.

Before releasing him into U.S. custody, Hommes said Dutch officials negotiated certain terms with U.S. officials.

Both sides agreed that al-Delaema would not be tried for charges outside the current six-count indictment, and that he would be tried in a federal court, not by a military commission, where he might have fewer civil rights.

In the past, Guantanamo Bay terror suspects have been subject to trial by military commission.

If convicted, al-Delaema would be returned to the Netherlands for incarceration in a Dutch prison. The Dutch do not have the death penalty, so the maximum sentence he could receive is life in prison.

If convicted in the United States, al-Delaema would not be re-tried for the same charges in a Dutch courtroom, under the agreement between the U.S. and the Netherlands.

The Dutch government did not make specific requests as to where al-Delaema would be held during his trial, Hommes added.

DOJ_NMG_0123036

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Advocates Hopeful Congress Will Ban Racial Profiling (AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

AP, January 29, 2007

WASHINGTON - The repercussions of an airline's decision to remove a group of imams from a commercial flight in Minneapolis could be heard in Congress this year, where newly dominant Democrats are ready to consider a national ban on racial profiling.

The incident happened in November, made national news and reinvigorated an old proposal that got little attention from the GOP. But now a champion of the legislation, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., is chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, which has jurisdiction on the issue. Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., who sponsored legislation to ban racial profiling in the last Congress, now chairs the Judiciary subcommittee on the Constitution.

"I'm convinced that once the body of evidence of racial profiling occurring in our nation is presented before the U.S. Congress and the American people, that indeed they'll be compelled to do something about it," said Hilary Shelton, director of the NAACP's Washington Bureau.

Shelton said that the issue lost traction after the Sept. 11 attacks, when the nation was focused on security.

"Many would argue that it's been exacerbated since 9/11, and we thought it was a tremendous problem before that," Shelton said. He said he's spoken about the issue with Conyers and is hopeful for action on legislation soon - perhaps as early as next month. Conyers declined to comment for this story.

Civil rights groups renewed their push for the legislation after last November's incident, in which US Airways barred six imams from a Minneapolis to Phoenix flight. The imams, returning from a religious conference, had prayed on their prayer rugs in the airport before the flight. After boarding, a passenger, who said she overheard anti-U.S. statements, passed a note to a flight attendant. The men were taken off the airplane, handcuffed and questioned. They were later released.

Muslims now have representation in Congress for the first time, with the election last November of Democrat Keith Ellison. Ellison, also the first black member of Congress from Minnesota, has called for an end to racial profiling.

"We should have an equal right to use the highways and byways and the airlines without regard to color, race, religion, or anything like that," said Ellison, who serves on the Judiciary Committee.

Feingold's bill, the End Racial Profiling Act, didn't come up for a vote in the GOP-controlled Congress in the last session, and there was no House version. The bill would have banned racial profiling by federal, state and local law enforcement, defining profiling as "the practice of a law enforcement agent or agency relying, to any degree, on race, ethnicity, national origin, or religion" during investigatory activities.

It included an exemption when specific information "links a person of a particular race, ethnicity, national origin, or religion to an identified incident or scheme."

No bill has been introduced yet this session, as Congress has been focused on other issues such as Iraq and the minimum wage, but Feingold, who is Jewish, made it clear the issue will be a priority for him.

"Many law-abiding African Americans, Arab Americans, Latino Americans and others live with the fear of being racially profiled as they go about their everyday lives," said Feingold. Although the vast majority of law enforcement officers don't engage in the practice, Feingold said, some do and it must be addressed.

"I look forward to working with Chairman Conyers in the House as well as others to ensure that no one is judged by how they look or where they worship," he said.

Some security-oriented groups are gearing up to fight the bill.

"It would have the effect of estranging police officers from the community that they serve," said Jim Pasco, executive director of the Fraternal Order of Police. "It would make them more hesitant to stop people who might well be in violation of the law for fear that they're going to get written up because of some racial protocol."

Peter Gadiel, of Kent, Conn., president of 9/11 Families for a Secure America, mocked the legislation.

"The 9/11 atrocity was committed by 19 young single men from Arab nations. If you want to hand this country over to terrorists, why don't you say it right out front?" said Gadiel, whose son, James, died in the attacks on the World Trade Center. "We don't have to worry about 80-year-old ladies with bleach-blonde hair and southern accents."

Norm Ornstein, a congressional scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, said that the legislation could get extra attention because several Democrats on the House Judiciary Committee - including Conyers - are black, and may be more sensitive to the racial profiling issue.

DOJ_NMG_0123037

"You do have some highly motivated people, and a willingness to push a little bit on this," Ornstein said.

Steve Mustapha Elturk, an imam in Troy, Mich., said a ban on racial profiling would be a welcome development. He said that four times since Sept. 11 he's been detained by U.S. authorities - twice at the Canadian border and twice while traveling by air - while doing nothing wrong.

Elturk, 52, a Lebanese-born U.S. citizen, is imam and president of the Islamic Organization of North America, a mosque and learning center in Warren, Mich.

"It is pathetic for an American citizen who has spent more than half his life in this country to have to fly fearing that I will be stopped and interrogated," he said. "This is not the country I came to know. I chose this place. To go through with what I'm going through now is plain unacceptable."

Eric Blum, a Customs and Border Protection spokesman, said that while he couldn't comment on specific cases, the agency does not use racial profiling.

"However, we will scrutinize cargo and individuals coming from high-risk countries - no matter what your nationality," he said, adding that people can also be detained if their name matches one on a watch list.

Justice Department spokesman Cynthia Magnuson declined to comment specifically on the bill, but did say: "In 2003, the department issued policy guidance to ban federal law enforcement officials from engaging in racial profiling in response to the president's directive that racial profiling is 'wrong and we will end it in America.' We continue to work toward this goal."

A Public Memorial (NYT)

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

For a while, it seemed as if the emotional issue of how to place the names of the dead at the 9/11 memorial had finally been resolved. And for nearly everyone, including most of the 9/11 families, it has, thanks to a compromise engineered last month by Mayor Michael Bloomberg. But a small group of victims' families has regrettably decided to mount a public campaign against the compromise.

They are trying to discourage contributions to the memorial until the victims' names appear exactly the way they want them, listing the age, corporate affiliation and floor on which each person worked. We fear that this effort will only add to the distress of other families who have been waiting for years for what is, after all, a public memorial.

It's hard to imagine a group of people who have been listened to more intently than this group of family members. Their views have helped to shape or reshape nearly every aspect of the redevelopment of ground zero — and especially the memorial. They had George Pataki's ear when he was governor, and they succeeded in shaping the debate about ground zero in ways that were sometimes polarizing. Out of respect for their loss, everyone has listened to them and tried to address their concerns.

But ground zero cannot be turned into a private memorial. If Cantor Fitzgerald, for example, feels it is important to create its own separate memorial to its terrible loss on that day, it should certainly do so. But the public memorial must be more expansive than that. There is a stark beauty and essential simplicity to the proposed listing of names as it now stands. It honors the nature of public memory, as well as the role the 9/11 museum will play in telling a fuller history of that day.

As painful as the private loss of this small group of mourners is, it must be accommodated as part of the larger public loss.

146 U.S. Levees May Fail In Flood (USAT)

By Peter Eisler, Usa Today

USA Today, January 29, 2007

Bad maintenance heightens danger

WASHINGTON — The Army Corps of Engineers has identified 146 levees nationwide that it says pose an unacceptable risk of failing in a major flood.

The deficiencies, mostly due to poor maintenance, are forcing communities from Connecticut to California to invest millions of dollars in repairs. If the levees aren't fixed, the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) could determine that they are no longer adequate flood controls. If that happens, property owners behind the levees would have to buy flood insurance costing hundreds of dollars a year or more.

The substandard levees are being identified under a corps inspection program that has grown more aggressive since Hurricane Katrina overwhelmed levees across the Gulf Coast in August 2005. Thousands of residents who lost property did not have flood insurance because those levees were considered adequate; later reviews found many were not well maintained.

"The corps and FEMA are saying, 'We've been lax as a nation in our operation and maintenance of these levees, and it's time to tighten up,' " says Larry Larson, director of the Association of State Floodplain Managers, an organization for officials who run flood-control systems. "You're talking about risking a lot of lives if one of these fails."

DOJ_NMG_0123038

After Katrina, Congress directed the corps and FEMA, which administers federal flood insurance, to identify at-risk levees. The corps inspects about 2,000 levees nationwide, mostly larger ones. The corps provided USA TODAY only with a list of how many faulty levees have been found in each state.

Spokesman Pete Pierce says the corps does not want to release the list of the 146 places where levees have been identified as inadequate until all levees are inspected and all communities with faulty levees are notified. USA TODAY has filed a request for that list under the Freedom of Information Act.

Thousands of levees are spread across every state. They range from miles-long levees protecting major cities to small berms shielding crops. Many were built by the corps and turned over to local authorities, which are responsible for maintaining them.

Local officials fear that some cities cannot afford upgrades. Hartford, Conn., spent $5 million last year to meet the corps' demands for repairs. Otherwise, thousands of properties worth almost $2 billion would have needed flood insurance, City Engineer John McGrane says. "It's a tremendous burden," he says.

The corps is allowing a one-time, one-year grace period to do the work, says Maj. Gen. Don Riley, the corps' director of civil works. "We want communities to clearly understand the risks of not maintaining these levees and take responsibility," he says.

Louisiana Officials Criticize Delays On The 'Road Home' (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, January 29, 2007

ICF International's largest contract is turning into its biggest headache.

In June, the Fairfax company was picked by Louisiana's Office of Community Development to run a program worth more than $7 billion that will distribute thousands of federal grants to homeowners whose houses were damaged by hurricanes Katrina and Rita in 2005.

Since then, residents and state and federal officials have accused ICF of moving too slowly, paying its lawyers too much and valuing homes too low. The company's performance has been criticized by Donald Powell, federal coordinator of Gulf Coast rebuilding, and the Louisiana House and Senate have called for the contract to be canceled and for an audit of the company's $19 million in travel expenses.

"Every part of this recovery process has been challenging. They understood that when they came in," Louisiana Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D) said of ICF in an interview.

"There has been a bottleneck," Blanco said. "I simply want them to clear out the bottleneck."

ICF defends its performance, saying that it has changed how it calculates the value of homes in urban areas and that it is ahead of schedule in parts of the program, which analysts expect to constitute 40 percent of its 2007 revenue. Some of the complaints lobbed at the firm reflect the way the program was designed by the state, including provisions to prevent fraud, not the way ICF is implementing it, company officials say.

"We're making progress, but we're constantly looking to improve," said Michael F. Byrne, ICF's program director. "We want to get the money to them fast, that's the number one priority, but we want it to be a fair and equitable progress."

Fairfax-based ICF is a mid-size contractor that provides consulting and technology services for government agencies, including the Department of Housing and Urban Development and the Defense Department, as well as some large companies. The firm has more than 2,000 employees worldwide, including about 1,200 in the Washington area.

The program, known as Road Home, is among the most high-profile for Louisiana residents affected by the storms. The state expects to dole out grants of up to $150,000 each to about 100,000 homeowners. An additional $869 million has been set aside for owners of small rental properties, a pool of about 80,000 potential applicants. The contract is worth up to $756 million to ICF.

"It's critical to the long-term rebuilding effort," Powell said in an interview. "If you're a homeowner in New Orleans, this is your source of rebuilding; it puts certainty into your life."

But complaints about the company and the contract have piled up. Under the contract, the company's lawyers make $375 an hour, significantly higher than private attorneys working on a state contract earn, said state Rep. J.P. Morrell (D-New Orleans). The contract also allocates $19 million for travel expenses without any requirement that the firm account for how it is spent, he said.

"You're giving this company a blank check to travel on the public dime," he said. "They are getting paid out of money that could be going to people's homes."

But the most significant complaints about the ICF have centered on the pace of the program. So far, 331 homeowners have received their grants, valued at an average of $80,000. Some received less than $10,000.

DOJ_NMG_0123039

That is too slow, say skeptics, who want the program wrapped up before homeowners begin registering their children for school in the fall. "It's the pace," Powell said. "I think it's too slow. It's not meeting the needs of the people."

Blanco said she has given ICF "a lot of leeway" and will meet with company officials soon to gauge when the bottleneck will be relieved and to ensure that ICF's 22 subcontractors also have a sense of urgency.

Compounding the frustration was an expectation that ICF would issue 500 awards a day starting this month. That was a misunderstanding, said ICF spokesman Douglas Beck. It does not expect to issue awards at that rate until May, he said.

ICF will launch the next phase of the program today as it takes applications from owners of small rental units, and it is applying the lessons from the homeowners program, Bryne said. "We're going to provide information to the people on a more routine basis, we're going to be available to answer questions," he said, so that "they never feel like they're disconnected."

Bringing Health Care To Katrina's Uninsured (WP/AP)

By Janet Mcconnaughey

The Washington Post, January 29, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 28 -- Hundreds of people still without health insurance in areas hit hard by Hurricane Katrina lined up before dawn Sunday for the start of a week-long event offering free medical care.

Bundled up against the chilly wind, people began arriving at 2 a.m. outside the tents and doublewide trailers offering free care in eastern New Orleans. By the time the first 50 had been called into the registration tent, the crowd numbered in the hundreds.

Penny Anderson, her daughter, and three small grandchildren came to see a dentist. "My daughter went online to try to get health insurance for me and my husband," she said. "It was $799 a month! That's a house note!"

The health fair is open to anyone from the New Orleans area but is specifically aimed at those who no longer have insurance, are unemployed or otherwise cannot pay for regular health care. By the end of the week, 10,000 patients are expected to be seen.

The project is a collaboration by Pat Robertson's Operation Blessing International and Remote Area Medical, which organizes volunteer medical treatment in remote parts of the United States and the world.

While most people wouldn't consider New Orleans remote, the city is, "since Hurricane Katrina, extremely remote from a medical and health-care infrastructure," said Karen Wilson, executive director of the Remote Area Medical Foundation.

More than 400 health-care workers have volunteered for the health fair, including doctors, dentists and specialists. Services include free prescriptions; dental fillings and teeth cleanings; eye exams and glasses; and specialized care, including pediatrics, obstetrics and gynecology, diabetic care and cardiology.

Claudette Stone, 52, of Chalmette was first in line for most of the morning. She had tried several times to see doctors brought by the same groups about a year ago for her diabetes, high blood pressure and other problems. But she arrived after 8 a.m. and couldn't get in.

Though daily clinics are available, she's had trouble getting into those, too, even though she arrived at 4 a.m.

"Some days they'll see 15 people, some days 10. There would already be that many people lined up," she said.

Farther back in line, Zachary Jackson, 54, and Ray Stringer, 60, said they had come to New Orleans for demolition and rebuilding jobs. Neither had insurance through his employer.

"You can't put a price on this," Jackson said.

"There's no way," Stringer agreed.

WAR NEWS:

G.O.P. Senators Criticize Iraq Plan (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 28 — Republican allies of the White House argued on the Sunday news programs that resolutions critical of President Bush's new Iraq plan being considered by the Senate would embolden insurgents and demoralize American troops.

But they were faced with counterpoint arguments not only from Democrats but also from other Republicans. "What I'll be doing is trying to appeal to my Republican colleagues to not pass a nonbinding resolution that basically says to the troops who are going there this is a mission that doesn't have a chance of succeeding," Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Republican leader, said on "Face the Nation" on CBS.

DOJ_NMG_0123040

But on the same program, Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, said, “I cannot support sending additional troops to Iraq.<object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="173274">”

On “</object.title>This Week” on ABC, Senator Richard G. Lugar, Republican of Indiana, said the resolutions were “not helpful” to the new American commander, Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, or “to the troops, to the Iraqis.”

On “Fox News Sunday,” Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas, a Republican presidential contender, said he was considering voting for a resolution criticizing the plan. That resolution also lays out benchmarks for the Iraqis to achieve and states that the Senate’s intention is not to countermand the president’s authority as commander in chief.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee has passed a more harshly worded resolution criticizing the plan. Its backers include Senator Chuck Hagel, Republican of Nebraska.

Sen. Biden: Most Senators Oppose U.S. Troop Buildup (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, January 29, 2007

WASHINGTON — The head of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on Sunday defended a resolution that opposes sending more U.S. troops to Iraq and said the majority of his colleagues do not support President Bush on Iraq.

"It's not the American people or the United States Congress who are emboldening the enemy," said Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., responding to criticism that a resolution adopted by his panel last week would bolster Iraqi insurgents. "It's the failed policy of this president, going to war without a strategy, going to war prematurely, going to war without enough troops, going to war without enough equipment."

Biden's remarks on ABC's This Week came one day after tens of thousands of protesters, ranging from military families to Hollywood actors such as Jane Fonda, gathered on the National Mall to urge an end to the war.

The Senate begins debate this week on the non-binding resolution opposing Bush's plan to boost U.S. troop levels in Iraq by 21,500.

"You will not find 20% of the Senate standing up and saying the president is headed in the right direction," Biden said of the upcoming floor debate.

Top Republicans oppose the resolution. Indiana Sen. Richard Lugar, the panel's ranking Republican, said Sunday on ABC that the measure is not helpful to the troops or Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, the new commander of U.S. forces in Iraq. Virginia Sen. John Warner and other Republicans are working on alternative measures that would signal their concern about the war's direction. Some would set benchmarks for the Iraqi government.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said such benchmarks would send a strong signal to Iraqis. "If someone like me, who has been the strongest supporter of the president you could find in the Senate on this effort, is saying this is the last chance for the Iraqis, I think that ought to help them get the message (that) this is the last chance," he said Sunday on CBS' Face the Nation.

US Senators Reject Iraq Troop ‘surge’ (FT)

By Krishna Guha

Financial Times, January 29, 2007

Support for President George W. Bush’s strategy to inject more troops into Iraq frayed further on Sunday, ahead of a week in which Congress is expected to distance itself formally from the plan.

Arlen Specter, the senior Republican on the Senate judiciary committee, became the latest Republican senator to voice opposition to the “surge”, telling CBS News: “I cannot support sending additional troops to Iraq.”

Senators are expected to vote on Wednesday on non-binding resolutions criticising the strategy, which would see an extra 21,500 US troops committed to Iraq – mainly in Baghdad – combined with a tougher security approach from the Iraqi government.

Joseph Biden, the Democratic chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, who will announce his presidential bid on the day of the vote, told ABC News: “You will not find 20 per cent of the Senate standing up and saying the president is heading in the right direction.”

Mr Biden, who accused Mr Bush of ignoring “95 per cent of the advice” that was given to him by the Iraq Study Group and members of Congress, said “the ground has moved beneath the president’s feet”.

Vice President Dick Cheney has stepped back out into the media spotlight to defend the administration’s Iraq strategy. On Sunday, the White House released the transcript of an interview with Mr Cheney in Newsweek magazine, in which he admitted that pre-war intelligence was “flawed” but warned of the global consequences of failure in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0123041

At the start of the week it appeared likely that a majority of senators would support one or more of the competing draft resolutions critical of the planned surge.

One, sponsored by Mr Biden and Chuck Hagel, the number two Republican on the foreign relations committee, is firmly critical of the Bush plan. Another, drafted by John Warner, the senior Republican on the Senate armed services committee, is milder but still expresses disagreement with the troop surge.

Analysts expect intense political manoeuvring ahead of any vote, with critics of the White House expected to seek to combine the Biden and Warner bills, and supporters anxious to split the doubters' vote between competing resolutions.

Underlining the continuing security problems, US and Iraqi security forces clashed with Sunni militants near the southern Iraqi city of Najaf on Sunday, as violence in the capital killed at least a dozen people on the eve of the Shia holy day of Ashura. There were unconfirmed reports late on Sunday night that as many as 250 militants may have been killed in the fighting.

Earlier on Saturday tens of thousands of anti-war demonstrators gathered in Washington to protest the planned surge. Only a handful of Democratic members of Congress attended the demonstration, which starred Vietnam war critic Jane Fonda and other celebrity activists.

Senators Swipe Back Over Iraq (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 29, 2007

Opponents of a troop buildup say Bush's 'failed' war strategy has emboldened the enemy, not their resolutions.

WASHINGTON — Prominent Democratic senators who are against the troop buildup in Iraq took issue Sunday with criticism from Bush administration officials who have charged that opposition to the president's new strategy could embolden the enemy.

"It's not the American people or the United States Congress who are emboldening the enemy," said Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. "It's the failed policy of this president — going to war without a strategy, going to war prematurely."

On Friday, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said a congressional resolution against the buildup could demonstrate "flagging will" by the nation and potentially "emboldens the enemy and our adversaries."

His comments echoed those made earlier in the week by Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the new top commander in Iraq. Vice President Dick Cheney has also spoken critically of the resolution.

Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.), a former Marine and Navy secretary who is a leading critic of the war, appeared Sunday on CBS' "Face the Nation" and said Gates was wrong.

"First of all, who's the enemy?" Webb asked, "Who are they talking about? Are they talking about Iran? Are they talking about the insurgents? Are they talking about Al Qaeda?"

Biden, speaking on ABC's "This Week," said he believed as few as 20 senators thought President Bush's plan to add 21,500 troops in Baghdad and Al Anbar province was the "right direction" for U.S. strategy.

The foreign relations committee last week voted to support a resolution sponsored by Biden and Sen. Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.), opposing the troop increase. Hagel was the only Republican on the committee to support the resolution, although many spoke against the buildup.

A second, more gently worded measure opposing the troop increase, drafted by Virginia Republican Sen. John W. Warner, has drawn support from five other GOP senators. Warner is a former Navy secretary and past chairman of the Armed Services Committee whose views on military issues are widely respected.

Debate on the resolutions could begin as soon as this week.

Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.), the ranking Republican on the foreign relations committee, said rather than taking a "show of hands" Congress should try to work constructively with Bush.

Lugar, who appeared with Biden on "This Week," said the resolutions "are not helpful to Gen. Petraeus, to the troops, to the Iraqis but we do need some policies that will be helpful, and hopefully our committee can be constructive in forging those."

The resolutions are becoming something of a test issue for the growing number of presidential candidates.

Biden is set to announce his run for the presidency this week and joked Sunday that he would be the "800th candidate."

Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.), who last week came out for Warner's measure, said on "Fox News Sunday" that the enemy was already emboldened and resolutions would hardly change that.

But Mike Huckabee, the Republican former governor of Arkansas who said he would announce his candidacy today, opposed the resolutions on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"I think it's one thing to have a debate and a discussion about this strategy," he said, "but to openly oppose, in essence, the strategy, I think that can be a very risky thing for our troops."

DOJ_NMG_0123042

On "Face the Nation," Senate Republican leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky said he was appealing to members of his party not to support the Biden or Warner resolutions.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), one of the strongest supporters of the troop buildup, is also crafting an alternative measure that would call for benchmarks against which to measure the Iraqi government.

McConnell said if there had to be a resolution, he would push for one like McCain's. Establishing benchmarks for the Iraqi government, he said, could be helpful to Petraeus. But McConnell said any Senate resolution would have to have a filibuster-proof majority of 60 votes to pass. As a result, he predicted that it would be hard for any of the resolutions to pass.

"I am not certain any of these will get 60 votes," he said. "We'll find out in the coming week or two."

julian.barnes@latimes.com

Huckabee Announces Presidential Bid (WP)

By Lois Romano

The Washington Post, January 29, 2007

Former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee yesterday announced plans to form a presidential exploratory committee, hoping to carve out a conservative niche in an increasingly crowded field of Republican candidates.

The onetime Southern Baptist minister, perhaps best known for losing 100 pounds in two years, said he will file papers with the Federal Election Commission today, which will enable him to start raising money.

"I think America needs positive optimistic leadership to kind of turn this country around, to see a revival of our national soul," Huckabee said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

Huckabee enters the race as a long shot, boasting little national name recognition and up against such high-profile and well-funded Republican candidates as Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney and former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani. But, like Sen. Sam Brownback (Kan.) and Rep. Duncan Hunter (Calif.), Huckabee is trusting that the GOP's traditional base is not content with the current leaders in the race and that there might be room for a staunch conservative who is antiabortion and opposed to same-sex marriage.

Huckabee, 51, said yesterday that he supports President Bush's position on the Iraq war, and he discussed his record in Arkansas, which was not always predictable. He was an advocate for providing state services for illegal immigrants, opened up insurance benefits for 70,000 children from low-income homes and was criticized by fiscal conservatives for raising taxes several times.

He also publicly supported creationism, a philosophy advocated by fervent Christians, arguing that students should be exposed to the study of the doctrine as well as evolution.

When moderator Tim Russert pressed Huckabee on whether he would lead the United States to be a more Christian nation, he replied: "We are a nation of faith. It doesn't necessarily have to be mine."

"I make no apology for my faith," he said. "My faith explains me."

Huckabee was Arkansas lieutenant governor in 1996 when Democratic Gov. Jim Guy Tucker was convicted of conspiracy and mail fraud relating to the Whitewater scandal. He rose to governor when Tucker resigned and was subsequently elected by large margins for two more terms in the historically Democratic state.

The former governor shares his birthplace with another governor of Arkansas who ran for president, Bill Clinton. Both men were born in the small town of Hope.

Huckabee started his professional life as an ordained minister. He served at several churches in Arkansas and once presided over the Arkansas Baptist State Convention, launching his political career shortly thereafter.

As Arkansas governor, Huckabee admitted to weighing 300 pounds. After being diagnosed with diabetes in 2003, he went on a public diet and started competing in marathons. He lost more than 100 pounds and penned a diet book about the experience, "Quit Digging Your Grave With a Knife and Fork."

Huckabee, who also spoke yesterday at the Conservative Summit in Washington, said he planned to be in Iowa, home of the first 2008 caucuses, on Tuesday and Wednesday.

"America loves an underdog," Huckabee said. "America loves people who have had to struggle and for whom every rung of the ladder has been sometimes three rungs up and two back down."

Ex-Arkansas Governor Joins Race For G.O.P. Nomination (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123043

WASHINGTON, Jan. 28 — Former Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas announced Sunday that he was forming a presidential exploratory committee, mounting an underdog campaign for the Republican nomination with “a message of hope and optimism for restoring America.”

Mr. Huckabee, 51, is a Baptist minister who served more than 10 years as governor of Arkansas and has close ties with many Christian conservatives. He enters a race largely dominated, so far, by heavyweights like Senator John McCain of Arizona, former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts and former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York. Also, Mr. Huckabee faces stiff competition for the social conservative vote, his natural base, from Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas.

Still, in an interview, Mr. Huckabee was bullish.

“It’s about getting the message to connect with Republican activists and voters, who may not see their guy on the field yet,” Mr. Huckabee said. He also criticized the emphasis on fund-raising prowess as a measure of political viability. “It makes me wonder if we should just put the presidency up on eBay,” he said.

On Sunday, Mr. Huckabee affirmed his support for President Bush’s call for an increase in American troops in Iraq. “He’s got to be given the opportunity to do his job,” Mr. Huckabee said.

In an interview on the NBC news program “Meet the Press,” where Mr. Huckabee announced his candidacy, he said that “to oppose a sitting commander in chief while we’ve got people being shot at on the ground” could be “a very risky thing to our troops.”

He also spoke about his staunch opposition to abortion rights, saying, “I always am going to err on the side of life.” But the anti-abortion movement, he said, has to do “some growing and expanding.”

“We have to remind people that life, where we believe it begins at conception, it doesn’t end at birth,” Mr. Huckabee added. “And if we’re really pro-life, we have to be concerned about more than the gestation period.”

When asked during the television program if he had “a problem with gay people,” Mr. Huckabee replied, “No, I have a problem with changing institutions that have served us,” notably marriage. “Before we change the definition of marriage to mean something different, I think our real focus ought to be on strengthening heterosexual marriages because half of them are ending in divorce,” he said.

Asked about a recent Democratic entrant to the 2008 field, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Mr. Huckabee said that she would “absolutely” be a formidable candidate, and added, “I think people underestimate her at their own peril.”

Cheney Responds To Hagel's Criticism (AP)

AP, January 29, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney shot back at Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, who has accused the Bush administration of playing "a pingpong game with American lives" by sending more U.S. troops into Iraq.

"Let's say I believe firmly in Ronald Reagan's 11th commandment: Thou shalt not speak ill of a fellow Republican," Cheney said. "But it's very hard sometimes to adhere to that where Chuck Hagel is involved."

Cheney's comments came in a Newsweek interview released Sunday.

Hagel, a potential presidential candidate, has been outspoken in his criticism that the Republican White House lacks a coherent strategy in Iraq.

His "pingpong" remark came Wednesday as the Senate Foreign Relations Committee debated a nonbinding resolution that condemned Bush's troop buildup in Iraq. Hagel co-sponsored the measure, which the committee approved in a 12-9 vote.

He was the only Republican to vote for it.

In the interview, Cheney also said he doesn't spend any time worrying about how the public or the media view him. When pressed to react to personal criticism from people with whom he has worked before, Cheney said: "Well, I'm vice president and they're not."

The Senate Cooler (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, January 29, 2007

The Democratic plan was for Sen. Joseph Biden, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, to sit down over the weekend with his longtime Republican colleague Sen. John Warner and hammer out a consensus, bipartisan resolution opposing President Bush's troop surge in Iraq. But Warner, who has been making backroom deals for 28 years in the Senate, informed Biden late on Thursday: No deal.

Warner wrote that the "will of the Senate" should be determined in "open" session, not closeted negotiations. That killed the Democratic leadership's dream of passing a Biden-crafted anti-surge resolution by 70 votes or more. Such a proposal now cannot get the 60 votes needed for cloture to end a filibuster (and could fall short of the 50 needed for a simple majority). Conceivably, the Senate might pass no resolution at all.

DOJ_NMG_0123044

Despite new Democratic control, the Senate remains sluggish, quirky and madly frustrating for anyone with an agenda. George Washington is reputed to have told Thomas Jefferson, skeptical about a bicameral Congress, that the Senate would be the saucer to cool hot tea from the House. More than two centuries later, the Senate saucer is cooling the beverage boiled up by Speaker Nancy Pelosi's House -- even the widely popular increase in the minimum wage. To everybody's surprise, Pelosi has held back quick House passage of an anti-surge resolution, awaiting action in the cooler Senate.

Biden wanted to force through his sharply worded (though nonbinding) resolution. But advisers prevailed on him to meld his proposal with Warner's milder language. Biden and his principal Republican co-sponsor, Sen. Chuck Hagel (the second-ranking Republican on Foreign Relations), said Wednesday that they were ready to begin negotiating with Warner, the former Armed Services Committee chairman.

One of Biden's advisers told me then that the negotiations should prove to be no problem because they were willing to accept "about 90 percent" of Warner's resolution. Democrats complained that his wording left the door open to further troop increases, and some questioned its first paragraph affirming the president's constitutional role as commander in chief. Such language was supposed to have been massaged over the weekend.

But Biden was surprised late Wednesday afternoon to receive a blunt letter from Warner and Ben Nelson of Nebraska, the most conservative Democrat in the Senate. They asserted that they and other co-sponsors of the resolution "believe that issues set forth in [the resolution] should occur as a consequence of the will of the Senate, working in 'open' session, during floor debate and consideration." In other words, no private negotiations.

That stand poses a dilemma for Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid because of bipartisan support for Warner's resolution. Besides Ben Nelson, its co-sponsors include Democrats Mary Landrieu (La.), Claire McCaskill (Mo.), Bill Nelson (Fla.) and Ken Salazar (Colo.), and Republicans Norm Coleman (Minn.), Susan Collins (Maine) and Gordon Smith (Ore.). If they stick together, Biden cannot change the Warner resolution.

With Sen. Olympia Snowe (Maine) the only Republican other than Hagel backing Biden's version, it may lack even enough votes for a majority. Reid faces a difficult choice. He could crack the whip on Democrats to pass the Biden resolution (though falling short of enough votes for cloture). Or he could swallow an unamended Warner resolution to win a bipartisan vote on the record against additional troops.

Bush aides hope that pressure from Cabinet members and the president himself have diminished GOP support for anti-war resolutions. The fact remains that almost no enthusiasm for the surge can be found in the Senate. Even John McCain, an early advocate of more troops, complains that a reinforcement of 21,500 is insufficient.

While many Republicans want to give their president "one last shot" at a military solution, there is pervasive pessimism about the new strategy. Republicans think withdrawal of troops must begin in the next six months for their party to have any chance at retaining the presidency in 2008, and a Bush Cabinet member -- not associated with national security -- told me the same thing last week. The Senate is a tough place for even somebody as assertive as Joe Biden to get his way, but that hardly connotes an expression of approval for sending more troops to Iraq.

Â© 2007 Creators Syndicate Inc.

Biden: 'Failed Policy' Emboldens Enemy (AP)

By Hope Yen

AP, January 29, 2007

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee chairman on Sunday dismissed criticism that a resolution opposing a troop buildup in Iraq would embolden the enemy and estimated no more than 20 senators believe President Bush "is headed in the right direction."

"It's not the American people or the U.S. Congress who are emboldening the enemy," said Joe Biden, a White House hopeful in 2008. "It's the failed policy of this president — going to war without a strategy, going to war prematurely, going to war without enough troops."

The Senate's top Republican, Mitch McConnell, cast doubt that a clear majority would be able to coalesce behind one of the many competing resolutions on Iraq. "I'm not certain any" will get the necessary votes, he said.

The Democratic-controlled Senate plans to begin debate this week on a nonbinding resolution declaring that Bush's proposal to send 21,500 more troops to Baghdad and Anbar province is "not in the national interest."

Last week, Biden's committee approved the measure on a near party-line vote of 12-9.

In reaction, Bush challenged lawmakers not to prematurely condemn his buildup and Vice President Dick Cheney said the administration would proceed even if a nonbinding resolution won Senate approval.

With the Senate having just confirmed a new top U.S. commander for Iraq, Defense Secretary Robert Gates said it was "pretty clear that a resolution that in effect says that the general going out to take command of the arena shouldn't have the resources he thinks he needs to be successful certainly emboldens the enemy."

Senate Republicans mostly oppose the committee-passed measure. They are lining up alternatives that express concern about a buildup or in some cases set performance benchmarks for the Iraqi government. Other GOP proposals being drafted would express unqualified support for Bush.

McConnell said Republican leaders would not seek to block a vote on the nonbinding resolution opposing a troop buildup with a filibuster. He called a proposed resolution that focuses on benchmarks "the best way to go."

"I think I can pretty well speak for virtually all Republican senators when I say this is the last chance for the Iraqis to step up and do their part," said McConnell, R-Ky.

Biden, D-Del., acknowledged that votes in Congress could splinter among several competing proposals but contended that senators' opposition to the buildup was widespread.

"We will have a full throated debate on this policy," Biden said. "I will make you a bet, you will not find 20 percent of the Senate standing up and saying the president is headed in the right direction."

Cheney said most Republicans "recognize that what's ultimately going to count here isn't sort of all the hurrah that surrounds these proposals so much as it's what happens on the ground on Iraq. And we're not going to know that for a while yet," according to a Newsweek interview released Sunday.

Cheney again cited "significant progress" in Iraq and said the war is part of a long-term fight against extreme elements of Islam.

"It's not something that's going to end decisively, and there's not going to be a day when we can, say, 'There, now we have a treaty, problem solved,'" Cheney said. "It's a problem that I think will occupy our successors maybe for two or three or four administrations to come."

Sen. Richard Lugar, the top Republican on the Foreign Relations committee, said the public's concern against the war was evident by the tens of thousands of demonstrators who turned out for a protest rally Saturday in Washington.

But he said a congressional resolution would not be constructive, expressing optimism that Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, the new U.S. commander in Iraq, can do a capable job.

"I don't believe that it's helpful right now to show there's disarray around the world as well as in our body at home," said Lugar, R-Ind. "We really need, at this point, to get on the same page."

Biden and Lugar appeared on ABC's "This Week" and McConnell spoke on "Face the Nation" on CBS.

Bush Policy, Not Resolutions, Called Enemy Boost (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, January 29, 2007

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee chairman said yesterday that President Bush's Iraq policy is "emboldening the enemy," rebutting critics who insist that resolutions denouncing the president's troop surge hurt the morale of U.S. forces.

"It's not the American people or the United States Congress who are emboldening the enemy. It's the failed policy of this president," said Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat.

"Going to war without a strategy, going to war prematurely, going to war without enough troops, going to war without enough equipment and lastly now sending 17,500 people in the middle of a city of 6.5 million people with bull's-eyes on their back with no plan. There is no plan," Mr. Biden said during an appearance on ABC's "This Week."

Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican, echoed Mr. Biden.

"I don't see this enemy as needing any more emboldening or getting it from any resolution. They're emboldened now," he told "Fox News Sunday."

Both men are seeking their parties' 2008 presidential nominations.

When the conservative Mr. Brownback was asked how he would handle the situation as president, he said, "I think if the president would reach out to the Democratic leadership and ask them not what are you opposed to, but what are you for, we can start coming together. I thought that was the whole purpose of [the Iraq Study Group]."

Other Republicans on the Sunday talk shows expressed support for a troop surge and opposition to the nonbinding resolutions, one of which was co-authored by Mr. Biden and passed last week by his committee.

Mr. Bush and Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the incoming U.S. military commander in Iraq, have said that passing such a resolution would demoralize U.S. troops. Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent, and several other senators agreed.

Sen. Richard G. Lugar of Indiana, the ranking Republican on the Foreign Relations Committee, said the nonbinding resolution is the wrong idea.

"Essentially, this resolution, others that are being offered, are an opportunity for people to vent their emotions, their thoughts, get it on record," he said during an appearance on "This Week." "Some Republicans want to do that. Some Democrats want to do that. I don't believe that it's helpful right now to show there's disarray around the world as well as in our body at home."

Sen. James H. Webb Jr., the Virginian who delivered the Democratic response to Mr. Bush's State of the Union address last week, rejected the notion that his party is trying to block the president's Iraq strategy.

"We're not opposed to the president's plan. What I object to is the fact that there isn't a plan," he said during an appearance on CBS' "Face the Nation." "This is almost just like a tipping point for a lot of people who are basically saying you cannot continue to give the administration a free hand in the manipulation of troop numbers without a clear endpoint to a strategy."

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, said he would try to persuade his Republican colleagues to vote against a resolution opposing the troop surge.

"I think I can pretty well speak for virtually all Republican senators when I say this is the last chance for the Iraqis to step up and do their part," Mr. McConnell said on "Face the Nation." "If you don't have a relatively calm capital city, there's no chance the government can function properly. So this is their last chance."

Sunday Wrap-Up: Fighting Over War Funding Looms (POL)

By Patrick O'Connor

Politico.com, January 29, 2007

As Congress girds for a contentious debate over President Bush's planned troop surge in Iraq, Senate leaders are drawing battle lines over an even more pressing question: Whether to meet the new White House funding request for the war.

"Our first step will be this sense of the Senate resolution, but it's only the first step," Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., said Sunday on NBC's Meet the Press. Both Schumer, who chairs the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, and Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said the larger battle is likely to rage over the funding issue.

Republicans have tried to position the non-binding resolution as a purely political vote that will have no effect on the additional 21,500 U.S. troops the president wants to send to Iraq, setting up a major showdown over the supplemental spending request from the White House.

"That's the money," McConnell said on CBS's Face the Nation. "That's the real thing."

Senate leaders are expected to decide this week the number of resolutions that members will consider during the debate. And McConnell and other Republicans are plotting parliamentary maneuvers to force multiple votes in a bid to dilute the political importance of a single measure.

"Forty-one senators will insist on a fair process," McConnell said, vowing: "We will have several votes."

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., meanwhile, has been working with Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr., D-Del., and Sen. John Warner, R-Va., on a single resolution aimed at enticing Republicans to criticize Bush's planned surge.

And the White House has stepped up its pressure to prevent Republican defections. Bush told House Republicans at their Eastern Shore retreat Friday that he understands how difficult the vote will be, but asked them to discuss their concerns with the White House before opposing him.

Additionally, Vice President Dick Cheney and Defense Secretary Robert Gates have suggested a vote against the president's plan would discourage U.S. troops in Iraq, bolster insurgents there and impede the efforts of Army Gen. David Petraeus, the new commander in Iraq.

Despite the administration's efforts, Schumer suggested even a "majority" of Republicans could rebuff the White House and support a resolution opposing the president's planned surge. And he said he believes such a mass defection would "send a shockwave through the White House and through the country."

One of those Republicans who could buck the president, Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, said on CBS that he currently intends to vote against him. "I can't support sending additional troops to Iraq," Specter said.

The senator, who sits on the appropriations committee, also said Congress would begin tougher scrutiny of the money for the war and reconstruction efforts in Iraq. "We have a duty to take a look at whether the funding is being wisely spent," he said.

Specter, McConnell and freshman Sen. Jim Webb, D-Va., predicted Congress would put restrictions on whatever money they appropriate for the war. Webb also said he plans to start inspecting reconstruction funds for potential waste and fraud by American and Iraqi contractors.

"I can pretty well speak for virtually all Republican senators when I say this is the last chance for the Iraqis to step up and do their part," McConnell said. "This is the last chance."

Schumer went a step further, suggesting Bush could be forced to start withdrawing troops by this summer or fall.

DOJ_NMG_0123047

And as pressure mounts for withdrawal, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, an independent Democrat who is supporting Bush's plan, is urging his colleagues to "give this plan time to work."

"The legislative trains seem to be heading down the tracks on these resolutions, and I believe they will have a collision that will hurt our country," Lieberman said on Fox News Sunday. "The resolution doesn't do anything but express an opinion."

Polls show Republican support for the war is waning. And former White House speechwriter Michael Gerson, a close confidante of the president who helped lay the rhetorical groundwork for the war, told on NBC that Bush has acknowledged some mistakes.

However unpopular the war, though, McConnell and other ranking Republicans are opposed to the resolution approved by the foreign relations panel.

"What I'll be doing is trying to appeal to my Republican colleagues to not pass a non-binding resolution that basically says to the troops who are going there this is a mission that doesn't have a chance of succeeding," McConnell said.

Last week, Reid said the Senate might not begin debate on the war until the second week in February because of other pending business on the Senate floor.

But whenever the vote, Democrats said it was time for Congress to begin looking for an endgame.

"It's the first time we've had full-throated debate on this policy," Biden said on ABC's This Week. "I respectfully suggest that the earth has moved beneath the president's feet."

US Congress Weighs Its Role On Iraq (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 29, 2007

As the Senate begins a debate this week on whether to oppose President Bush's "new way forward" in Iraq, many lawmakers are balancing what they see as competing constitutional responsibilities – and stepped up pressure from voters long weary of a war that most Americans no longer think can be won.

A first step is the debate over a nonbinding resolution to oppose the escalation of the war in Iraq. But should that vote succeed, Demo-crats expect to move next to curb defense funding.

"We are convinced there must be a political solution to the problems in Iraq," said a Congressional delegation led by Speaker Nancy Pelosi in a statement after a trip to Iraq last week.

In the run-up to this week's debate, newly empowered Democrats have been conducting daily hearings on the war in both houses of Congress, aimed especially at clarifying Congress's role vis-à-vis a wartime president.

At issue is how to balance powers inherent in two parts of the Constitution: Article 1, which gives the power to declare and fund wars to the Congress, and Article 2, which designates the president as commander in chief.

When the Founding Fathers began working on the outlines of a new nation, a key element of their research was how absolute monarchs waged war – which is to say, badly.

"That's one reason why they developed the idea of balance of powers," says Louis Fisher of the Library of Congress, who will testify before a Senate panel Tuesday on Congress's "Constitutional Power to End a War."

On the House side, Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania, who chairs the Defense subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee, has been conducting closed hearings on defense readiness. Congress could use that issue to block war funding and force changes in troop deployments, all in the interest of supporting the troops, Representative Murtha says.

House Republicans propose, instead, requiring the Bush administration to report to Congress every 30 days on progress in meeting "strategic benchmarks carefully tailored to the president's new strategy," including measuring the Iraqi government's cooperation on counterterrorism efforts.

While only 24 percent of likely voters nationwide approve of Mr. Bush's handling of the war, slightly more voters say it has been worth the loss of American lives, according to a Zogby poll released Friday. "It's now clearly a Republican war," says pollster John Zogby, noting that 59 percent of Republicans agree that the war has been worth the loss of life, compared with 20 percent of Democrats and 33 percent of independents.

"But Democrats also have this internal debate over just how far they can go. They are still afraid of being perceived by the American people as being antitroops or antipatriotic," he adds. A strong showing from antiwar voters – expressed in e-mails, phone calls, or turnout at protests – "could provide an extra prod for Democrats to go that step further," Mr. Zogby adds.

In response, some defense analysts say that polling data can be misleading. "Because only 30 percent say they still support the war doesn't mean that 70 percent are prepared to pack up and leave, no matter what happens to the region as a result," says Michael O'Hanlon at the Brookings Institution.

DOJ_NMG_0123048

"It's the position of a third to half the Congress that we can still salvage something in Iraq," says Mr. O'Hanlon, noting that most of the Democratic leadership is not in that camp. "We haven't had a sophisticated development of Plan B in Iraq. Congress is in a good position to flesh out some options."

For their part, antiwar protesters in Washington are adding intensity to the debate.

Few members of Congress were in town Saturday as tens of thousands rallied on the Mall near the Capitol, but activists say lawmakers can expect 1 million e-mails and phone calls this week and intense scrutiny of member votes on the war on new blog sites.

"Symbolic actions are not enough. Congress has to stop the president. Our Founders gave the Congress Article 1. Our message was: You got elected with a mandate to get us out of Iraq. Figure it out," says Tom Matzzie, Washington director of MoveOn.org Political Action.

In the next few days, antiwar protesters are launching television ads in three states targeting Republican Sens. Richard Lugar of Indiana, John Warner of Virginia, and Judd Gregg and John Sununu of New Hampshire. MoveOn.org is gearing up to raise $7 million to $9 million to influence the war debate, says Mr. Matzzie.

Others in the antiwar movement agree with his assessment.

"The president is irrelevant at this point. We are not going to change his mind. Thank goodness we have a Congress that is a co-equal branch of government," says Tom Andrews, national director of Win Without War and a former Democratic representative from Maine.

"We're going to use the Internet to make it absolutely clear who is doing what. Members of Congress need to know that we have their back when they're attacked, and if they are against us, they will feel the heat."

Congress, The Constitution And War: The Limits On Presidential Power (NYT)

By Adam Cohen

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

President Bush doesn't seem to care that Congress wants a bigger role in guiding the Iraq war. Talking about his plan to send in 20,000 additional troops, he said on "60 Minutes" that he knows Congress can vote against it, "but I've made my decision and we're going forward."

It is hardly the first time this president has insisted that he is "the decider," or even the first time he's used the Constitution to justify it, as Vice President Dick Cheney did when he told Fox News: "The Constitution is very clear that the president is, in fact, under Article 2, the commander in chief."

But Mr. Cheney told only half the story. Congress has war powers, too, and with 70 percent of Americans now opposed to President Bush's handling of the war, according to an ABC News/Washington Post poll, it is becoming more assertive about them. Congress is poised to pass a resolution denouncing the troop increase. Down the line, Congress may well consider mandatory caps on the number of troops in Iraq, or setting a date for withdrawal.

If it does, we may be headed toward a constitutional clash, with the administration trying to read powers into the Constitution — as it has with its "enemy combatant" doctrine and presidential "signing statements" — that the Founders did not put there. The Constitution's drafters were intent on balancing power so no one branch could drift toward despotism. The system of checks and balances that runs through the document divides the war power between the president and Congress.

The Constitution's provision that the president is the commander in chief clearly puts him at the top of the military chain of command. Congress would be overstepping if, for example, it passed a law requiring generals in the field to report directly to the speaker of the House.

But the Constitution also gives Congress an array of war powers, including the power to "declare war," "raise and support armies" and "make rules concerning captures on land and water." By "declare war," the Constitution's framers did not mean merely firing off a starting gun. In the 18th century, war declarations were often limited in scope — European powers might fight a naval battle in the Americas, for example, but not battle on their own continent. In giving Congress the power to declare war, the Constitution gives it authority to make decisions about a war's scope and duration.

The Founders, including James Madison, who is often called "the father of the Constitution," fully expected Congress to use these powers to rein in the commander in chief. "The constitution supposes, what the History of all Governments demonstrates, that the Executive is the branch of power most interested in war, and most prone to it," Madison cautioned. "It has accordingly with studied care, vested the question of war in the Legislature."

In the early days of the republic, the Supreme Court made clear that Congress could limit the president's war powers — notably in the Flying Fish case. In 1799, during the "Quasi War," the undeclared sea war between the United States and France, Congress authorized President John Adams to clamp down on trade between the two nations by stopping ships headed to French ports. But Adams went further, ordering commanders to stop ships that were sailing to or from a French port.

DOJ_NMG_0123049

When the Flying Fish was seized while sailing from a French port — something Congress had not authorized — the ship's owner sued. The Supreme Court decided in his favor, ruling that the president had no right to issue the order he did. John Marshall, the nation's greatest chief justice, declared that even in a time of hostilities, a president's decision to act militarily beyond what Congress had authorized was "unlawful."

The court has repeatedly reinforced this principle. In 1952, in the steel seizure case, it ruled that President Harry Truman could not seize steel mills to avert a strike — even though steel was needed for the Korean War — because Congress had set out a different way of handling the labor unrest. More recently, in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, it held that President Bush must follow Congressional guidelines when he sets up military tribunals for detainees.

Past Congresses have enacted just the sort of restrictions the Bush administration is trying to foreclose today. During the Vietnam War, the Foreign Assistance Act of 1974 capped the number of American military personnel in South Vietnam at 4,000 within six months. The Lebanon Emergency Assistance Act of 1983 required the president to get Congress's approval for any substantial increase in the number or role of armed forces in Lebanon.

There is little question that Congress could use its power of the purse to end a war. But cutting off financing is a drastic step, and one that members of Congress are understandably reluctant to take, because it can look like a refusal to support the troops. The Constitution's text, Supreme Court cases and history show, however, that Congress can instead pass laws that set the terms of military engagement. Whether it would be wise for Congress to adopt such limits is debatable; whether it has the authority to do so should not be.

The Bush administration insists that if Congress tries to manage the Iraq war, it will leave the commander in chief with too little authority. But the greater danger is the one Madison recognized at the nation's founding — that all the power will be left with the person "most interested in war, and most prone to it."

House Panel To Examine Iraq Contracts (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, January 29, 2007

With a Democrat now in the driver's seat, the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee is set to hold Congress's first in-depth hearings into charges of waste and fraud involving money spent on reconstruction in Iraq.

Three days of hearings -- the first of what Rep. Henry Waxman (D., Calif.) says will be a series unfolding in coming months -- are set to begin Feb. 6. They will mark the opening of what promises to be one of the most significant inquiries by the new Congress into actions by the Bush administration while Republicans controlled the House and Senate.

Any new disclosures about lax oversight or misspent funds could prove embarrassing to the Bush White House just as it is pressing for an additional $1.2 billion to spend on reconstruction and economic stimulus in Iraq. The new funds are a central part of the president's plan to stabilize the country.

Moreover, the committee's Iraq reconstruction review will be among the first of a range of hearings the Democratic majority is expected to launch in both the House and Senate on topics on which Democrats long have been eager to grill the Bush administration. Hearings also are expected on domestic spying, the conduct of the war in Iraq and legal procedures for Guantanamo detainees.

Scheduled witnesses at the Waxman hearings include Paul Bremer, who was head of the Coalition Provisional Authority that temporarily ran Iraq; Stuart Bowen, the special inspector general whose audits have uncovered widespread overpayments, and wasted or missing reconstruction money in Iraq, and Timothy Carney, appointed earlier this month to a newly created post overseeing U.S. reconstruction and development projects in Iraq.

In more than 70 audit reports, Mr. Bowen has reported finding that billions of dollars were misspent or disappeared. The committee is expected to press Mr. Bremer on a January 2005 audit report by Mr. Bowen, which found that during Mr. Bremer's tenure, the CPA doled out more than $8.8 billion in cash without adequate financial controls. The money was meant to keep Iraqi interim government ministries operating. But much of it was siphoned off, including salaries paid to thousands of "ghost employees."

In recent years when Democrats were in the minority in Congress, Mr. Waxman was a gadfly to the Bush administration. He wrote numerous letters demanding executive-branch information on contracting fraud and other subjects. But the Republican majority with a few exceptions declined to hold hearings on the topics.

"The truth of the matter is that Congress overall under Republican leadership decided that they did not want to do their job of oversight," Mr. Waxman said in an interview. But he said the current Republican members of his committee didn't oppose the coming hearings and added "We're working together closely with the Republicans" on them.

Mr. Waxman confirmed that a focus of his Iraq hearings will be Halliburton Co. The Houston oilfield-services company and a provider of engineering and construction services, where Vice President Cheney once served as chief executive, has received government contracts valued at more than $15 billion for work in Iraq, more than any other contractor. But Mr. Bowen's audits found inadequate cost-accounting and widespread overcharges on billing by the company. Halliburton has denied any improprieties and said it did conscientious work under challenging security conditions in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0123050

The review also will focus on federal agencies, including the defense, homeland security and justice departments, to see whether they lapsed in responsibility to oversee contractors and act to recoup misspent funds.

Some elements of the military, such as the Army Corps of Engineers, have defended contractors' practices in Iraq, citing the chaos of wartime.

Mr. Waxman said the initial hearing also will touch on questions not related to Iraq, but with how some homeland-security funds have been spent.

He also said he expects to reintroduce soon a bill he labeled the Clean Contracting Act, which didn't get anywhere in the previous Congress. The bill would curb no-bid contracts and restrict use of subcontracts as well as other steps Mr. Waxman says would curb abuse.

Anti-War Groups Push Impeachment (POL)

By By: Daniel Reilly

Politico.com, January 28, 2007

On Monday, a small army of anti-war activists will fan out across Capitol Hill to lobby for congressional support to impeach President Bush, who's facing a storm of opposition for his handling of the Iraq war.

The activists may get a sympathetic ear on their anti-Bush message from Democrats, many of whom favor formal investigations into the administration's handling of the war and terrorism. But they'll likely get only get polite smiles - and little, if any, support - when they bring up the "I" word.

It's a tricky issue for Democrats in Congress, who share many of the same frustrations about Bush and the war, but are hesitant to even discuss impeachment. "Hell no," said Rep. James Clyburn, D-S.C., the House majority whip, when asked whether impeachment is a possibility.

Other members aren't quite as emphatic as Clyburn, Yet, they make it clear that Bush will not get a free ride on his handling of Iraq and national security.

"The only "I" word I worry about right now is Iraq," said Rep. Henry A. Waxman, D-Calif., chairman of the House Oversight and Government Reform Committee, which is planning hearings on the Iraq reconstruction next week.

Sen. Frank R. Lautenberg, D-N.J. said that calls for impeachment were "premature" although he added: "If (Bush's) failures (in Iraq) continue, there is no telling what the outcome can be in terms of congressional attitude."

Others had a more practical concern. "If we impeach President Bush, then Vice President Cheney is next in line (to be president), so I don't think we'd go there," said Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash.

Many members interviewed by The Politico said they were worried that impeachment proceedings would distract from congressional investigations into Bush's handling of the war. And Democratic Party leaders had indicated before they took control of Congress that impeachment proceedings would be off the table.

Nonetheless, a small but determined group of liberal activists is keeping up the impeachment drumbeat. And on Monday, it'll kick off an aggressive lobbying push.

Embolden by the large anti-war rally Saturday and the president's historic lows in the public opinion polls, impeachment activists sense the time has come for their cause.

"George W. Bush has repeatedly insisted that he has the unilateral right to initiate and escalate wars," said Bob Fertik, president of ImpeachPAC, which raised more than $80,000 last year to support candidates favoring Bush's impeachment. The president's "view of the unitary executive is nothing less than dictatorship. There has to be accountability, there has to be impeachment."

Only one candidate endorsed by ImpeachPAC actually won last fall, however: Rep Keith Ellison, D-Minn., who received $1,000 from the group. And he has backed off.

After calling for impeachment hearings at a campaign rally last October, Ellison recently told the Minneapolis Star-Tribune he's now "a step before impeachment" as he adjusts to realities in Congress.

Tim Carpenter, national director of the Progressive Democrats of America, a left-wing organization that favors impeachment, said there are more than 1,400 members in the group who are specifically working on oversight and impeachment. And he expects "hundreds of them" to lobby on Monday.

Carpenter doesn't expect much traction on impeachment now, but has high expectations about congressional oversight. "So come a month from now, when the subpoenas start rolling, we will be confident that impeachment will be back on the table," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0123051

The "impeachment and anti-war people overlap," said Fertik. "We feel passionately about both, so we are going to be pushing both issues as we walk the halls of Congress."

But not everyone who attended this weekend's march feels the same. Some fear that impeachment proceedings will in fact distract from the primary issue of ending the war. Sue Udry, legislative coordinator the United for Peace and Justice, the umbrella organization which sponsored Saturday's march and Monday's lobbying events, said he organization was not endorsing calls for Bush's impeachment.

Although impeachment supporters know that they face long odds with little support either in Congress or from other groups on the left, many like David Swanson, Washington director of ImpeachPAC vow to fight on.

"If election didn't do it then, the march doesn't do it, then lobbying doesn't do it then, well, we will have to try something else," he said.

More Than Antiwar (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

Washington

It was a few minutes after 11 a.m. when the scattered crowd began moving slowly toward the stage at the end of the Mall. The sky was a beautiful sunlit blue and the Capitol building, huge and white and majestic, offered the protesters an emotional backdrop that seemed almost close enough to touch.

“It’s so big,” said a woman from Milwaukee, who was there with her husband and two children. “It’s lovely. Makes you want to cry.”

You can say what you want about the people opposed to this wretched war in Iraq, try to stereotype them any way you can. But you couldn’t walk among them for more than a few minutes on Saturday without realizing that they love their country as much as anyone ever has. They love it enough to try to save it.

By 11:15 I thought there was a chance that the march against the war would be a bust. There just weren’t that many people moving toward the stage to join the rally that preceded the march. But the crowd kept building, slowly, steadily. It was a good-natured crowd. Everyone was bad-mouthing the Bush administration and the war, but everybody seemed to be smiling.

There were gray-haired women with digital cameras and young girls with braces. There were guys trying to look cool in knit caps and shades and balding baby boomers trading stories about Vietnam. And many ordinary families.

“Where’s Hillary?” someone asked.

That evoked laughter in the crowd. “She’s in Iowa running for president,” someone said.

When a woman asked, “What’s her position on the war?” a man standing next to her cracked, “She was for it before she was against it.”

More laughter.

The crowd kept building. There were people being pushed in wheelchairs and babies in strollers. There were elderly men and women, walking very slowly in some cases and holding hands.

The goal of the crowd was to get the attention of Congress and persuade it to move vigorously to reverse the Bush war policies. But the thought that kept returning as I watched the earnestly smiling faces, so many of them no longer young, was the way these protesters had somehow managed to keep the faith. They still believed, after all the years and all the lies, that they could make a difference. They still believed their government would listen to them and respond.

“I have to believe in this,” said Donna Norton of Petaluma, Calif. “I have a daughter in the reserves and a son-in-law on active duty. I feel very, very strongly about this.”

Betty and Peter Vinten-Johansen of East Lansing, Mich., said they felt obliged to march, believing that they could bolster the resolve of opponents of the war in Congress. Glancing toward the Capitol, Mr. Vinten-Johansen said, “Maybe we can strengthen their backbone a little bit.”

Even the celebrities who have been at this sort of thing for decades have managed to escape the debilitating embrace of cynicism. “How can you be cynical?” asked Tim Robbins, just before he mounted the stage to address the crowd, which by that time had grown to more than 100,000.

“This is inspiring,” he said. “It’s the real voice of the American people, and when you hear that collective voice protesting freely it reminds you of the greatness of our country. It gives you hope.”

When Jane Fonda said, “Silence is no longer an option,” she was doing more than expressing the outrage of the crowd over the carnage in Iraq and the president’s decision to escalate American involvement. She was implicitly re-asserting her belief in the effectiveness of citizen action.

DOJ_NMG_0123052

Ms. Fonda is approaching 70 now and was at the march with her two grandchildren. It was very touching to watch her explain how she had declined to participate in antiwar marches for 34 years because she was afraid her notoriety would harm rather than help the effort.

The public is way out in front of the politicians on this issue. But the importance of Saturday's march does not lie primarily in whether it hastens a turnaround of U.S. policy on the war. The fact that so many Americans were willing to travel from every region of the country to march against the war was a reaffirmation of the public's commitment to our peaceful democratic processes.

It is in that unique and unflagging commitment, not in our terrifying military power, that the continued promise and greatness of America are to be found.

No More Chips For Mr. Bush (HARTC)

By Frank Harris III

The Hartford Courant, January 29, 2007

I keep visualizing our president in one of Connecticut's casinos, laying his chips on the table that is Iraq.

He's at the roulette wheel, and he's already lost, according to an Associated Press tally on Thursday, 3,069 chips, but he's not done yet. He keeps saying just one more spin, one more chance at the wheel.

``I'm the president. I'm the decider. I've got a boatload of chips I can toss onto the table," he says. ``We can still win this thing! Let the wheel keep on turning!"

But others around him say: ``No, George! Stop! Enough is enough!"

Does he listen? No. Sadly, he believes he really can still come out of this even, if not ahead. He jumps up on the table and in a presidential voice loud enough for all of the world to hear, he says: ``21,500 more chips, please!"

And throughout the casino, the words are repeated incredulously: ``More chips for Mr. Bush. More chips for Mr. Bush. More chips for Mr. Bush."

Chips.

That's how our president, George W. Bush, considers the lives of the 21,500 additional American soldiers he wants to send to fight in the civil war that is now Iraq - chips he wants to place on the table before watching the roulette wheel go round and round.

More chips for Mr. Bush.

He can watch them safely from the White House before turning his attention elsewhere to make a witty comment or two.

More chips for Mr. Bush.

He'll look back just in time to see where the little white ball has landed.

More chips for Mr. Bush.

Bullets fly. Bombs blow. Rockets explode. Someone's number comes up. Flag-draped coffins appear. They come home, like chips shoveled into the grim reaper's hand. Mr. Bush appears, says a few solemn words about finishing the job and honoring the gallant sacrifice made by the men and women of this country.

Then it's -

More chips for Mr. Bush.

The call for more is like a desperate gambler thinking, hoping, praying the next wheel's rotation will win back all that has been lost.

Double or nothing?

Those nothings are somethings. They are lives he keeps placing on the table. Lives he keeps losing. What has been lost in this war in Iraq cannot be won back. Still he does not want to leave the table. He's betting the next spin of the wheel will be the winner.

Just one more time, just one more spin, he asks, as he did last week during the State of the Union address.

``Keep it coming!" says the grim reaper. ``I've got your back, George!"

The president obliges.

But I say, step back away from the table, Mr. Bush. I say, you, you at the casino booths. Don't give him any more chips to play with. They are lives. Human beings used as fodder. Pounds of flesh unfairly placed in harm's way to atone for those already gone.

More chips on the table?

He keeps trying different angles, different approaches.

Twenty-one thousand, five hundred more he wants?

DOJ_NMG_0123053

I say not one drop more. Not one pound more. Not one hair more. Not one leg more. Not one arm more. Not one eye more. Not one tooth more. Not one life more.

The CIA World Factbook indicates there are 67.7 million males ages 18-49 in America and 67.0 million females in the same age range. This age group is labeled as ``manpower available for military service" in America.

It's inconceivable the president would be able to come up with that many recruits. Or is it? How far would you go, Mr. President?

As of Thursday, 3,069 American soldiers had died in Iraq. How many more will die by the year 2008, which is when Bush will be out of office? And we are only talking about American lives. This does not include the many more Iraqi lives lost.

Two more years of this?

Congress - stop him!

No more chips for Mr. Bush!

Iranian Reveals Plan To Expand Role In Iraq (NYT)

By James Glanz

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 28 — Iran's ambassador to Baghdad outlined an ambitious plan on Sunday to greatly expand its economic and military ties with Iraq — including an Iranian national bank branch in the heart of the capital — just as the Bush administration has been warning the Iranians to stop meddling in Iraqi affairs.

Iran's plan, as outlined by the ambassador, carries the potential to bring Iran into further conflict here with the United States, which has detained a number of Iranian operatives in recent weeks and says it has proof of Iranian complicity in attacks on American and Iraqi forces.

The Iranian ambassador, Hassan Kazemi Qumi, said Iran was prepared to offer Iraq forces training, equipment and advisers for what he called "the security fight." In the economic area, Mr. Qumi said, Iran was ready to assume major responsibility for the reconstruction of Iraq, an area of failure on the part of the United States since American-led forces overthrew Saddam Hussein nearly four years ago.

"We have experience of reconstruction after war," Mr. Qumi said, referring to the Iran-Iraq war in the 1980s. "We are ready to transfer this experience in terms of reconstruction to the Iraqis."

Mr. Qumi also acknowledged, for the first time, that two Iranians seized and later released by American forces last month were security officials, as the United States had claimed. But he said that they were engaged in legitimate discussions with the Iraqi government and should not have been detained.

Mr. Qumi's remarks, in a 90-minute interview over tea and large Iranian pistachio nuts at the Iranian Embassy here, amounted to the most authoritative and substantive response the Iranians have made yet to increasingly belligerent accusations by the Bush administration that Iran is acting against American interests in Iraq. President Bush has said the American military is authorized to take whatever action necessary against Iranians in Iraq found to be engaged in actions deemed hostile.

The Iranian ambassador abruptly agreed to a longstanding request for the interview — made repeatedly after the first American seizure of Iranians here on Dec. 21 — and seemed eager to rebut the accusations.

The political and diplomatic standoff that followed the Dec. 21 raid until the Iranians were released nine days later has contributed, along with a dispute over the Iranian nuclear program, to greatly increased tensions between the United States and Iran. This month, American forces detained five more Iranians in a raid on a diplomatic office in the northern city of Erbil.

While providing few details, the United States has said that evidence gleaned in the Baghdad raid, made on an Iraqi Shiite leader's residential compound, proves the Iranians were involved in planning attacks on American and Iraqi forces.

How much direction, if any, Mr. Qumi was taking from his government was unclear in the interview, in which he showed disdain for the American accusations as well as a few flashes of restrained sarcasm.

He ridiculed the evidence that the American military has said it collected, including maps of Baghdad delineating Sunni, Shiite and mixed neighborhoods — the kind of maps, American officials have said, that would be useful for militias engaged in ethnic slaughter. Mr. Qumi said the maps were so common and easily obtainable that they proved nothing.

He declined to say whether he believed the maps bore sectarian markings or address other pieces of evidence the Americans said they had found, like manifests of weapons and material relating to the technology of sophisticated roadside bombs. But that is not why the Iranians were in the compound, he said.

"They worked in the security sector in the Islamic Republic, that's clear," Mr. Qumi said, referring to Iran.

But he said that the Iranians were in Iraq because "the two countries agreed to solve the security problems." The Iranians "went to meet with the Iraqi side," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0123054

In a surprise announcement, Mr. Qumi said Iran would soon open a national bank in Iraq, in effect creating a new Iranian financial institution right under the Americans' noses. A senior Iraqi banking official, Hussein al-Uzri, confirmed that Iran had received a license to open the new bank, which Mr. Uzri said would apparently be the first "wholly owned subsidiary bank" of a foreign country in Iraq.

"This will enhance trade between the two countries," Mr. Uzri said.

Mr. Qumi said the bank was just the first of what he said would be several in Iraq — an agricultural bank and three private banks also intend to open branches. Other elements of new economic cooperation, he said, include plans for Iranian shipments of kerosene and electricity to Iran and a new agricultural cooperative involving both countries.

He would not provide specifics on Iran's offer of increased military assistance to Iraq, but said it included increased border patrols and a proposed new "joint security committee."

A number of American and Iraqi officials said Sunday that it was difficult to respond to Mr. Qumi's statements until they had been communicated through official routes. A spokesman for the American Embassy in Baghdad, Lou Fintor, declined to address the statements.

Sean McCormack, a State Department spokesman, said Sunday that the United States had a significant body of evidence tying Iran to sectarian attacks inside Iraq.

"There is a high degree of confidence in the information that we already have, and we are constantly accumulating more," Mr. McCormack said.

He did not address any of the specifics of Mr. Qumi's comments about plans for stronger economic and security ties, but said that Iran currently plays "a negative role in many respects" in the country.

Iraqi officials also said that they could not comment on specific programs until they had seen the details, but expressed a range of views on the wisdom of expanding ties with Iran.

"We are welcoming all the initiatives to participate in the process of reconstruction," said Qasim Daoud, a former national security adviser who is now a secular Shiite member of Parliament.

"My belief is that our strategic alliance is with the Americans, but at the same time we are looking for the participation of any country that would like to participate," Mr. Daoud said.

Barham Salih, a deputy prime minister who is Kurdish and whose duties include economic matters, took sharper issue with Mr. Qumi's criticism of the American presence.

"Iraqi national interest requires seeking good neighborly relations with Iran as with other neighbors, but that requires respect for Iraqi sovereignty," Mr. Salih said.

Mr. Qumi spoke largely in Persian during the interview, but he occasionally broke into English when he wanted to be certain that a point had been conveyed forcefully.

Although Mr. Qumi was not given specific questions ahead of the interview, he was made aware of the general topics that would be covered and seemed prepared with detailed answers in many cases. He seemed particularly keen to give his government's view of what occurred in the early morning hours of Dec. 21, when American forces raided the Baghdad compound of Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, one of Iraq's most powerful Shiite leaders, who had traveled to Washington only three weeks before to meet President Bush.

Within the compound, the Iranians were seized in the house of Hadi al-Ameri, who holds two powerful positions in Iraq: he is the chairman of the Iraqi Parliament's security committee and also the leader of the Badr Organization, the armed wing of Mr. Hakim's political party, which spent years in exile in Iran.

Although the Americans have suggested that the Iranians were providing support for militias like the Badr Organization, Mr. Qumi said that his countrymen were dealing with Mr. Ameri only in his official governmental capacity.

The Iranians would not even have stayed the night in the compound except, in a situation faced by many Baghdad residents, their business lasted beyond the early-evening curfew and they were forced to spend the night, Mr. Qumi said.

Mr. Qumi also warned the United States against playing out tensions in what he called "the nuclear file" in Iraq. "We don't need Iraq to pay the cost of our animosity with the Americans," Mr. Qumi said.

As the interview was breaking up, Mr. Qumi made one last stab at the Americans. If Iran is allowed to undertake reconstruction activities in Iraq, he said, all international construction companies would be welcome. "Urge the American companies to come here," he said.

Cheney Says U.S. Is Sending 'Strong Signal' To Iran (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, January 29, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123055

Vice President Cheney said the deployment this month of a second aircraft-carrier task force to the Persian Gulf delivered a "strong signal" of the United States' commitment to confront Iran's growing influence in the region.

Countries in the Middle East "want us to have a major presence there," Cheney said in a Newsweek interview published online yesterday. Referring to the deployment of the carrier USS John C. Stennis, Cheney said, "That sends a very strong signal to everybody in the region that the United States is here to stay, that we clearly have significant capabilities, and that we are working with friends and allies as well as the international organizations to deal with the Iranian threat."

When the Stennis arrives in the Persian Gulf next month, the United States will have two carrier groups stationed there for the first time since the 2003 Iraq invasion.

The deployment is one of several recent steps by the United States to oppose Iran, which administration officials say is responsible for growing instability in the region. Other actions included a program to kill or capture Iranian agents operating inside Iraq as well as moves to squeeze the country financially.

In the interview, Cheney declined to speculate about possible military strikes against Iran. "We are doing what we can to try to resolve issues such as the nuclear question diplomatically through the United Nations, but we've also made it clear that we haven't taken any options off the table," he said.

The Newsweek interview was the third granted to the media this month by the vice president, who had been relatively quiet since Republicans lost both houses of Congress in November's midterm elections. Despite increasing GOP criticism of the White House on Iraq, Cheney said he thinks President Bush has shored up his position with his Republican base in the past week and evinced little concern about the prospect of resolutions formally condemning the president's plan to send another 21,500 troops to Iraq.

"Most members on our side of the aisle recognize that what's ultimately going to count here isn't sort of all the hoorah that surrounds these proposals so much as it's what happens on the ground in Iraq. And we're not going to know that for a while yet," said Cheney, who also offered a veiled shot at one of the president's strongest GOP critics, Sen. Chuck Hagel (Neb.). "Let's say I believe firmly in Ronald Reagan's 11th Commandment: Thou shalt not speak ill of a fellow Republican," Cheney said. "But it's very hard sometimes to adhere to that where Chuck Hagel is involved."

In an appearance yesterday on ABC's "This Week," Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, dismissed suggestions from administration officials that his resolution condemning the military buildup would embolden the enemy.

"It's not the American people and the United States Congress who are emboldening the enemy," he said. "It's the failed policy of this president, going to war without a strategy, going to war prematurely, going to war without enough troops, going to war without enough equipment and, lastly, now sending 17,500 people in the middle of a city of 6 1/2 million people with bull's-eyes on their back, with no plan."

Exclusive Q&A: Dick Cheney, Man Without Doubt (NSWK)

Newsweek, February 5, 2007

In a rare print interview, Dick Cheney talks about Iraq, Iran, Chuck Hagel, his image as 'Darth Vader' and Bob Woodward.

A man with a reputation for secrecy and seclusion, Vice President Dick Cheney has spent the past few months out in public. He campaigned in the midterm elections, traveled to Saudi Arabia to talk security and eulogized former president Gerald Ford. Last week the perjury trial of his former chief of staff, I. Lewis (Scooter) Libby Jr., exposed what Libby's lawyer cast as tensions between aides to Cheney and President George W. Bush during the CIA press leak in 2003. In his first print interview since the GOP lost control of Congress, Cheney spoke to NEWSWEEK's Richard Wolffe. Excerpts:

WOLFFE: There's a lot of skepticism on the Hill, even inside the administration, about the Iraqi prime minister's ability and desire to take down the militias. What gives you confidence that Nuri al-Maliki is up to the job?

CHENEY: We've got a lot of people who want to judge the success of the Maliki administration after some nine months in office. I think it's a little premature. He has been direct and forthright in responding to our concerns. There is some evidence that he's already beginning to act—for example, Iraqi forces rounding up as many as 600 members of the Jaish-al-Mahdi [Mahdi Army] in the last couple of weeks. His commitment to us is to go after those who are responsible for the violence, whoever they may be—whether they're Baathist or ... Shia militia or criminal elements. At this stage, we don't have any reason to doubt him.

You have spoken about the possibility of regional war in case of American withdrawal. What's the basis for thinking that it would be a broader war?

Well, I think it's a concern that the current level of sectarian violence would increase, and perhaps break out in other parts of the country. It's pretty well concentrated right now in the Baghdad area. It clearly would have, I think, consequences on a regional basis in terms of the efforts that we've mounted not only in Iraq but also in Afghanistan and Pakistan and Saudi Arabia

DOJ_NMG_0123056

... All of a sudden, the United States, which is the bulwark of security in that part of the world, would no longer—could no longer—be counted on by our friends and allies that have put so much into this struggle.

You have extensive contacts, especially in the Persian Gulf with the Saudis. What are you hearing about their concerns about Iran's rise, its role in the region now?

There's widespread concern throughout the region about Iran, and in particular Iran under [President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad. A lot of people in the area—I don't want to attribute this to any one particular government—but a lot of people in the area feel directly threatened.

Is there a concern from those allies that America is too tied down, too overwhelmed with the situation in Iraq to deal with Iran?

I haven't seen that. Most of the nations in that part of the world believe their security is supported, if you will, by the United States. They want us to have a major presence there. When we—as the president did, for example, recently—deploy another aircraft-carrier task force to the gulf, that sends a very strong signal to everybody in the region that the United States is here to stay, that we clearly have significant capabilities and that we are working with friends and allies as well as the international organizations to deal with the Iranian threat.

Can you see a scenario where airstrikes on Iran would be justified?

I'm not going to speculate about security action. We are doing what we can to try to resolve issues, such as the nuclear question, diplomatically through the United Nations. But we've also made it clear that we haven't taken any options off the table.

There has been little open support from the Republican Party for the president's plan for extra troops in Iraq. Do you worry that the party has lost the stomach for the fight?

The election results last November obviously represented a blow to our friends on the Hill, Republicans on the Hill—to go from majority to minority status. A lot of members were concerned or felt that their political fortunes were adversely affected by our ongoing operations in Iraq. What's happened here now over the last few weeks is that the president has shored up his position with the speech he made specifically on Iraq.

Sen. [Chuck] Hagel said some pretty harsh things about the administration. He said there was no strategy. He said—It's not the first time. He said it was a "Ping-Pong game with human beings." Do you have a reaction to that?

I thought that Joe Lieberman's comments ... were very important. Joe basically said the plan deserved an opportunity to succeed ... that we're sending Gen. [David] Petraeus out with probably a unanimous or near-unanimous [confirmation] vote, and that it didn't make sense for Congress to simultaneously then pass a resolution disapproving of the strategy in Iraq.

So you don't think Senator Hagel—I know you dodged completely responding to his comments, but they're not helpful to the cause and to the mission?

Let's say I believe firmly in Ronald Reagan's 11th Commandment: thou shalt not speak ill of a fellow Republican. But it's very hard sometimes to adhere to that where Chuck Hagel is involved.

You made some comments before the war talking about being greeted as liberators. Do you think that public opinion wasn't sufficiently prepared for the length of this conflict? And do you have any regrets about your own role in preparing public opinion for that?

The comments I made were based on the best information we had. There's no question that the struggle has gone on longer than we anticipated, especially in Baghdad ... It does not, though, lead me to conclude that what we're doing in terms of our overall effort, taking down Saddam Hussein's regime, standing up a new democracy in Iraq, isn't a worthy objective. I think it is. I think we have made significant progress. There's still a lot more to do—no question about it. The conflict we're involved in—not just Iraq, but on the broader basis against Al Qaeda, against the threat that's represented by the extreme elements of Islam on a global basis now—is going to go on for a long time. And it's not something that's going to end decisively, and there's not going to be a day when we can say, "There, now we have a treaty, problem solved." It's a problem that I think will occupy our successors maybe for two or three or four administrations to come. It is an existential conflict.

The question about the run-up to war, the weapons of mass destruction. Do you feel that your credibility was hurt by that and that it's harder to make the case about the broader threats now?

Well, I have my own personal view. Obviously, there was flawed intelligence prior to the war ... but we should not let the fact of past problems in that area lead us to ignore the threat we face today and in the future. It would be a huge mistake. In terms of whether or not it adversely affected public opinion, I think it clearly did, but that does not lead me to conclude that we didn't do the right thing when we went into Iraq and took down Saddam Hussein's regime.

Public opinion has this caricature of you as Darth Vader and various things. Do you think you get a fair crack from the media?

DOJ_NMG_0123057

By the time I leave here, it will have been over 40 years since I arrived in Washington, and I've been praised when I didn't deserve it, and probably criticized when I didn't deserve it. And there aren't enough hours in the day for me to spend a lot of time worrying about my image.

Let me ask you about events going on at the courthouse not far from here. It's fairly unprecedented that a sitting vice president would testify—

I'm not going to talk about the trial, obviously.

About your decision to testify, about the precedent?

Sorry, I'm not going to discuss it.

President Ford, his recent funeral—did it put you in a reflective mood about that period? Do you draw any parallels to now?

I was delighted to see the outpouring of tributes to his leadership ... and praise for the tough, tough decisions he made—in particular, for example, the pardon. I reflected back on where we'd been 30 years ago when he made those decisions and, obviously, suffered for it in the public-opinion polls and the press, and how history judged him 30 years later very, very favorably because of what he'd done. He had displayed those qualities of leadership and decisiveness, steadfastness, if you will, in the face of political opposition.

Is there a parallel to now?

There may well be.

Bob Woodward reported that President Ford thought you had justified the war wrongly, and that Ford agreed with Colin Powell that you developed a fever about Saddam Hussein, about terrorism. Did you feel that was accurate?

I've never heard that from anybody but Bob Woodward.

And other comments—criticism from [Brent] Scowcroft about not knowing you anymore. People have gotten quite personal, people you worked with before. You wouldn't be human if you didn't have some reaction.

Well, I'm vice president and they're not.

How US Is Putting More Heat On Iran (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, January 29, 2007

The US isn't facing a two-front war, exactly – but as the Pentagon begins its new push in Iraq, the Bush administration simultaneously is increasing military and political pressure on Iran.

The point is to counter Iranian meddling in Iraq, while making the nation's ruling mullahs think harder about any plans to intensify their nuclear program, according to White House officials. They say further US moves are likely in the weeks ahead.

But it's not clear that such escalation will accomplish more than it will cost, say some experts. Any actual attack on its agents or interests might cause Iran to redouble its current support for Iraqi Shiite militias. Or Tehran could decide to outflank US forces by causing trouble elsewhere.

Iran "has the ability to act throughout the region and beyond given its ties to groups such as Hizbollah and Hamas," said Richard Haas in remarks prepared for delivery before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee last week.

The latest move in the developing US-Iran chess match came on Saturday, when President Bush defended US action against Iranian agents inside Iraq as a crucial defense for American troops. US forces have been authorized to kill or capture Iranians if they deem it necessary, under a new policy first reported last Friday in The Washington Post.

"If somebody is trying to harm our troops or stop us from achieving our goal ... we will stop them," Mr. Bush said following a meeting with top military commanders at the White House.

The US has long worried that Iranian agents inside Iraq have been providing Shiite fighters with sophisticated bomb technology that has made roadside explosions more deadly to US troops. In the recent past, some Iranians have been detained, interrogated, and then set free. This so-called "catch-and-release" policy may now be a thing of the past.

"If you're in Iraq and are trying to kill our troops, you should consider yourself a target," said Secretary of Defense Robert Gates last week in response to a reporter's question about Iran.

Meanwhile, the US has dispatched a second aircraft-carrier battle group to the Persian Gulf as an apparent symbol of its intention to carry out airstrikes against Iranian targets, if necessary. And it has increased pressure on foreign banks and financial institutions to cut ties to Iranian counterparts – warning them that they risk losing access to US financial markets unless they stop doing business with Tehran.

Of course, the US goal isn't just to stop Iranian aid to Shiite militias. Iran's nuclear program has been continuing apace. On Saturday, a key Iranian lawmaker, Alaeddin Boroujerdi, said Iran was currently installing an array of 3,000 centrifuges at a uranium-enrichment plant.

DOJ_NMG_0123058

If true, such a move would represent a slap in the face to the international effort to curtail Iran's disputed program. Three thousand centrifuges would be more than enough to produce fuel for a nuclear bomb.

However, an official of Iran's nuclear agency said over the weekend that "no new centrifuges have been installed in Natanz," referring to Iran's main nuclear facility. At the time of writing, this discrepancy in statements had not yet been resolved.

It's possible that Iran itself is split over whether to take a path of confrontation or accommodation with the US and the international community at large.

Recently a majority of Iran's parliament sent President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad a letter criticizing him for his high-profile foreign travel and blaming him for the country's economic troubles.

That's an indication that international diplomatic pressure and financial sanctions are working, according to some US experts.

Iran hasn't always worked at cross-purposes with the US in its struggle against extremist Islamist terrorism. The Iranian government gave $300 million in aid to the government of Afghanistan, and furnished the US with intelligence about the Taliban.

"They were helpful in Iraq, according to Secretary Gates, until early 2004," noted Lawrence Korb, a senior fellow for the Center for American Progress, in congressional testimony last week.

In some ways, their strategic goals for the region match those of the US. It is unlikely that the Shiite mullahs of Iran would like to see Al Qaeda win a haven in the Sunni-dominated outlying regions of Iraq, for instance. Nor would Tehran likely want any further collapse of order in Iraq, leading to a failed state and a refugee crisis on Iran's border.

Still, it's clear that Iran has recently been troublesome. It appears eager to make the US experience in Iraq as difficult as possible.

But for the US, the problem with squeezing Iran while it struggles with sectarian violence in Iraq is that it is trying to stabilize one country while destabilizing its neighbor.

"We have to choose what our goals for the region are, and right now, unfortunately, the president's plan has us going in two different directions at once," said Robert Malley, director of the Middle East and North Africa program for the International Crisis Group, in testimony to the Senate Foreign Relations panel.

Iraq's Deputy PM Chides U.S. And Iran (AP)

By Kim Gamel

AP, January 29, 2007

Iraq's deputy prime minister on Sunday said Iran and the United States were using Iraq as a "zone of conflict and competition" and jeopardizing efforts to stabilize the country.

Barham Saleh, a Kurd who has ties with both Tehran and Washington, accused the two countries of stepping on Iraq's sovereignty as they jockeyed for advantage.

"Iraqi transition is burdened by many elements of interference in our domestic affairs," Saleh said in an interview with The Associated Press.

He urged Iran and the U.S. to resolve their differences, at least where Iraq was concerned.

"The new Iraq is one that hopes to be at peace with itself and at peace with its neighbors," he said from a gilded chair in the ornate entrance hall of his Green Zone office compound.

"And that definitely requires noninterference in our affairs," he said, declaring that Iran and the United States should see Iraq's well-being and prosperity as a "point of consensus."

The U.S. and Iran, already deeply at odds over Tehran's nuclear program, find themselves in a growing and more public conflict over Iran's involvement in Iraq, where it is accused of training, arming and funding militants fighting U.S. occupation forces.

The Iranian government heatedly blasted Washington earlier this month after U.S. forces raided an Iranian government liaison office in Kurdish-controlled northern Iraq and detained five Iranians. U.S. officials said the Iranians were members of a Revolutionary Guard faction that funds and arms insurgents in Iraq.

Top Kurdish officials and authorities in Baghdad complained that the U.S. raid was done without notification and said the Iranians must be freed, asserting they were in the country on legitimate business.

The detentions hit a nerve as Iraq's Shiite-dominated government faces the delicate task of trying to secure Baghdad with the help of American forces while maintaining ties with its neighbors, including U.S. rivals Iran and Syria.

The White House also has revealed that President Bush has authorized U.S. forces in Iraq to take whatever action necessary to counter Iranian agents who are deemed a threat.

Saleh, who served for 10 years as the Kurdistan Regional government representative to the United States, signaled Iraqi impatience with both Tehran and Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0123059

His ally and fellow Kurd, President Jalal Talabani has been pressing efforts to encourage a dialogue between the two nations.

"I have to admit Iraq has become a zone of conflict and competition between various regional players and international players," Saleh said. "The tensions are there and undeniably there is a spillover effect that complicates Iraqi political and security transition."

"We are grateful to the United States for the effort on our behalf to overcome tyranny. But at the end of the day we are accountable to our own people, our own constituents who demand of us better security and better services," he said.

As for Iran, he said, good relations with the Shiite theocracy were important for Iraq given the countries sit side by side and that Iran gave shelter to many Iraqi dissidents during Saddam Hussein's Sunni-dominated regime and who now wield power.

But, he said, "The failure of this present political process in Iraq will mean chaos in Iraq and ultimately may well mean restoration of the status quo in the form of tyranny in one way or another."

On other topics, Saleh, who is chairman of the Cabinet economics committee, dismissed concerns that a proposed oil law would allow U.S. and other international oil companies too much influence over Iraq's most important resource.

He denied published reports that the proposal would provide for so-called product sharing agreements that would give international oil firms 70 percent of oil revenues to recover initial investment and subsequently allow foreign drillers 20 percent of the profits, tax free and without restrictions on repatriating profits.

"These reports ... about the terms of PSAs (Profit Sharing Agreements) ... are totally and absolutely wrong," he said, acknowledging that concessions would have to be made to attract much-needed investment from foreign oil companies. Details were still under negotiation.

"At the end of the day Iraqi national management will be there but we need partnership with the outside world as well for technology transfer and the flow of funds," he said.

Do Not Endanger Gulf, Saudi King Tells Iran (FT)

By Heba Saleh

Financial Times, January 29, 2007

Saudi Arabia has warned Iran that it could endanger the whole Gulf region if it does not resolve the problems in its "international relations", a reference to Iran's increasingly tense standoff with the United States over its nuclear programme and its role in Iraq.

"We have advised them not to expose the region to dangers," said King Abdullah bin Abdul Aziz, the Saudi monarch. "We do not interfere in anyone's affairs, [but] any state which resorts to unwise acts will have to bear the responsibility in front of the other countries in the region."

The king's remarks, made in an interview with a Kuwaiti newspaper, Al Seyassah, comes amidst increasingly vocal criticism of Iran by officials and the press in the Arab world.

"We are extremely worried about the policies of Iran and the rhetoric coming out of Iran which adds to the tensions in the region," said an Egyptian diplomat. "Their rhetoric confirms the worst fears of the west has about Islam."

America's main allies in the Arab world – Egypt, Jordan and Saudi Arabia – are deeply concerned about the influence Iran has come to wield in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories.

Iran, with its support for the Lebanese movement Hizbollah and the Palestinian Hamas – two uncompromising opponents of Israel – is seen to be propelling the region in a direction counter to that where America's allies want to lead it.

Tehran's backing of Hamas is said by some to be frustrating Egypt's efforts to mediate between the Palestinian factions to forge a national unity government which would, in theory, be more receptive to negotiation with Israel. "Iran's intentions are very clear," wrote Osama Saraya, editor of the government-owned daily Al Ahram on Friday. "It is ... sowing corruption in every direction."

But even if the Arabs are alarmed by Iran's nuclear ambitions and its policies in the region, they do not want a US military strike against it. Mr Saraya says it would have "dire consequences" for the region.

"There is a kind of mobilisation of Arab public opinion," said Abdul Moneim Said, the head of the Al Ahram Centre for Political and Strategic Studies. "But Arab governments are wise enough to realise that an attack against Iran would be detrimental to them and would help their radical opponents."

Egyptian Paper Accuses Iranians Of Complicity In Envoy's Death (NYT)

By Mona El-Naggar

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123060

CAIRO, Jan. 28 — A front-page article in Egypt's semiofficial state newspaper on Sunday accused Iranian intelligence of involvement in the 2005 killing of Egypt's ambassador to Iraq.

The report, which was denied by the Egyptian Foreign Ministry and the Iranian Foreign Ministry, comes at a time of heightened concern in Egypt and other Arab states about Iran's growing influence in the region. Egyptian officials have said they are upset and worried that Iraq is moving away from the Arab world and coming under the influence of Iran, a Shiite and non-Arab state.

The article, which appeared in Egypt's most widely circulated newspaper, Al Ahram, was attributed to anonymous sources and stated that Iran's goal was to "cut off the legs" of Egypt from Iraq.

It said the belief that Iran was involved in the killing helped explain Egypt's support for President Bush's plan to send additional troops into Iraq. It offered no evidence to support those claims.

In 2005, in an effort by Egypt to support Iraq's newly elected, Shiite-dominated government, Ihab Al Sharif was sent to Iraq in June as the first resident ambassador from a Sunni Arab state. One month later, Mr. Sharif was abducted, and he was killed four days later.

The Egyptian Foreign Ministry issued a statement on Sunday denying the newspaper report. "We have no relationship to what was published, and we don't have any information to this effect," Alaa El Hadidy, spokesman for the ministry, added in a telephone interview. "This is an old story buried and closed."

An unidentified person at the Iranian Foreign Ministry told the Islamic Republic News Agency, Iran's official news agency, that the article was "baseless and completely false."

Still, the report on Sunday could strain already tense relations between the countries. While Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia took responsibility for the killing of Mr. Sharif in 2005, his killers were never caught. The killing was seen by Arab states as an attempt by Sunni insurgents to discourage their governments from fostering ties with the mainly Shiite Iraqi government.

But the article contributed to concerns about Iran's seeming quest for influence in Iraq. Speaking on the news channel Al Jazeera on Sunday, Mustafa El-Fiqi, chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee in the Egyptian Parliament, said, "Now we are starting to hear this new tale that could be influenced by the tense nature of Iranian-Arab relations at this stage because of the sectarian war in Iraq, and perhaps in Lebanon and other areas."

Egypt has not sent another ambassador, and no other Arab state has posted one to Iraq.

Iran Wants Time To Review Plan That Delays U.N. Sanctions (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

TEHRAN, Iran, Jan. 28 (AP) — The top nuclear negotiator for Iran said Sunday that his country needed time to review a plan proposed by the head of the United Nations nuclear watchdog agency that called for a delay in imposing Security Council sanctions if the Iranians suspended uranium enrichment.

The head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, Mohamed ElBaradei, proposed the simultaneous time-out plan during the World Economic Forum in Switzerland in an effort to end the standoff between the West and Iran over Iran's nuclear program. The Iranians say their uranium enrichment is for peaceful purposes but the West, led by the United States, says the enrichment could also be used for weapons.

"Time should be allocated to see if the plan has the capacity to solve the case," the Iranian nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, told reporters during a news conference with Russia's national security adviser, Igor Ivanov, who was visiting Tehran.

The Security Council last month voted unanimously to impose limited sanctions on Iran after it ignored demands to halt enrichment. Iran faces the prospect of additional sanctions unless it stops enrichment within a 60-day period that ends next month.

Mr. Ivanov expressed optimism that the dispute could be resolved if both sides agreed to Dr. ElBaradei's proposal.

As a permanent member of the Security Council, Russia last month forced the Council to weaken proposed punitive measures that would have imposed curbs on Iran's Bushehr nuclear power station, which the Russians are helping to construct. But the Kremlin then supported limited sanctions against Iran over its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment.

The International Atomic Energy Agency had no comment on the Iranian statements, a spokeswoman, Melissa Fleming, said Sunday. Dr. ElBaradei said recently that he believed that Iran planned to begin work in February on an underground facility to hold uranium enrichment equipment.

Russia Vows To Keep Schedule For Iran Nuclear Plant (AFP)

By Siavosh Ghazi

AFP, January 29, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123061

Russia's security chief Igor Ivanov vowed to launch Iran's nuclear plant on schedule in September after talks in Tehran with leaders of the Islamic republic.

"Russia is determined and serious in fulfilling its obligation to finish Bushehr plant on the scheduled date," Ivanov was quoted as saying after meeting Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki.

Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei also emphasised the need to complete the nuclear plant on time after meeting Ivanov, who delivered a message from Russian President Vladimir Putin.

"Cooperation and previous commitments should gain momentum and be carried out," Khamenei was quoted as saying on state television.

In September 2006, Russia and Iran signed an agreement setting September 2007 as the deadline for the launch of the Russian-built Bushehr nuclear power station which lies on the Gulf coast in southwestern Iran.

The plant will actually produce electricity from November, and the nuclear fuel for the plant is to be delivered no later than March.

Ivanov, the secretary of Russia's Security Council, also met President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Before concluding his one-day trip to Tehran, Ivanov implicitly asked Iranians to consider UN watchdog chief Mohamed ElBaradei's recent recommendation for a "timeout" in the showdown over Iran's nuclear ambitions.

The proposal would have the UN suspend sanctions and Tehran halt uranium enrichment at the same time.

"It is a proposal which can be taken into consideration because it envisions a suspension of enrichment and a suspension of the enforcement of resolution 1737, and this may allow an attempt at finding a political solution to the crisis," Lavrov told reporters.

Iran's national security chief and top nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani said ElBaradei's proposal needed further examination.

"The Iranian nuclear question is a multifaceted question and cannot be answered in one line, the different proposals must be developed to be taken into account. We must study them to see if they have a capacity to solve the problem," he told reporters.

The deputy head of the Iranian Atomic Energy Organisation, Mohammad Saeedi echoed Larijani's response.

"It is an idea that needs to be developed," Saeedi said.

Russia supports Iran's right to peaceful nuclear technology but voted for a UN Security Council resolution in December that imposes sanctions on Tehran over its repeated refusal to freeze uranium enrichment.

Iran gave conflicting signals about its nuclear work on Saturday with its atomic energy agency denying a statement by a senior MP that Tehran had started to install 3,000 centrifuges to enrich uranium.

Uranium enrichment lies at the centre of fears about Iran's nuclear ambitions as the process can make the fissile core of an atom bomb as well as nuclear fuel.

Tehran says its nuclear drive is aimed at peaceful energy generation, vehemently denying charges that it plans to build an atomic bomb.

The United States has warned its arch-foe Iran of "universal" opposition if it proceeds with plans to beef up its nuclear capacity by installing the centrifuges.

The UN Security Council has imposed sanctions to pressure Iran to stop uranium enrichment, which makes fuel for civilian nuclear reactors but also the explosive core of atom bombs.

ElBaradei is due to report to the UN Security Council by February 21 on whether Iran has suspended enrichment.

If not, sanctions could be tightened and there is increased speculation about a US or Israeli pre-emptive military attack to stop Iran's nuclear drive.

In a joint statement with India on Thursday, Russia called for "diplomacy and dialogue" in the worsening dispute over Iran's nuclear programme, but also urged Tehran to comply with UN demands.

Could Weak Oil Cost Venezuela, Iran Clout? (WSJ)

By David Luhnow, Bill Spindle, And Guy Chazan

Wall Street Journal, January 29, 2007

Softening oil prices over the past few months have spurred hope in Washington that less revenue for oil-rich states could weaken the hand of governments the U.S. considers worrisome -- particularly those in Iran, Venezuela and Russia.

The three nations are potentially vulnerable: Oil-and-gas revenue accounts for between two-thirds and three-quarters of government income in both Venezuela and Iran, and only slightly less in Russia. So, a big drop in oil prices would slow economic growth and hit government finances, forcing them to cut back spending increases that have boosted the popularity of all three governments at home and emboldened them abroad.

DOJ_NMG_0123062

But it is far too early to expect the changing economics of oil to have big political effects. For one thing, although the price of oil has fallen 28% since hitting an all-time high of $77.03 in July, it is still high by historical standards. The three nations, having weathered crises before, have all built up substantial currency reserves to cushion against a further fall in prices.

"Fifty-dollar oil doesn't put any of them in any grave danger," says Michelle Billig, director of political risk at PIRA Energy Group, a New York-based consultancy. "After all, it was only a few years ago that we were talking about an oil windfall for these places at $30 a barrel."

March crude-oil futures settled at $55.42 Friday on the New York Mercantile Exchange, up $1.19 on the day.

Equally important, it isn't clear that any of the trio would radically alter their policies even if squeezed harder economically. Under President Vladimir Putin, a former KGB spy, Russia has put a priority on reasserting its political might and reclaiming the global influence it wielded during the Soviet Union's heyday. Generations of leaders in Tehran have made the development of nuclear power a stated goal -- and asserted the country's hypothetical right to a nuclear weapon -- no matter the price of oil.

Venezuela might have the hardest time pursuing the assertive foreign policy of President Hugo Chávez, a populist and former army officer, if oil prices were to drop much more. Over the past few years, Mr. Chávez has used oil money to try to counter what he sees as harmful U.S. influence in Latin America. Caracas has helped finance some neighbors' debt, and it has handed out cut-rate oil to dozens of countries, including Fidel Castro's Cuba -- and even some U.S. communities through the state oil company's Citgo subsidiary.

Unlike Russia, and to a lesser extent Iran, Venezuela has been much more reckless in spending its oil windfall. Last year alone, public spending grew 43%, widening the gap between total government income and outlays to about 1.5% of the total economy, according to estimates by Morgan Stanley.

So far, falling oil prices haven't dented Mr. Chávez's spending habits. Just last week, he announced a program to send 100,000 poor Venezuelans each year to vacation in Cuba. He also recently offered the army's services to build a road in Nicaragua at a projected cost of $350 million.

While economists agree that Mr. Chávez's free-spending policies may eventually shipwreck the Venezuelan economy, they say that won't happen -- if it happens at all -- for at least another year. The main reason: Venezuela has accumulated more than $36 billion of reserves.

But there are signs Mr. Chávez could be headed for trouble, even without a much bigger drop in oil prices. He recently ordered an increase in gasoline prices -- which the government has long subsidized -- to raise federal revenue. And some economists view his recent nationalization of Venezuela's biggest telephone and electric companies as a sign his administration is eager to raise more money to keep up its spending.

A further drop in oil prices, then, might leave Mr. Chávez with some tough choices about where to trim the fat. High on the list would be his foreign aid. By far the chief beneficiary of Mr. Chávez's largesse is Cuba, which receives 103,000 barrels a day of refined petroleum products in exchange for the services of Cuban doctors and other specialists. Analysts believe aid to Cuba totals about $3 billion a year.

Cutting back on such aid would be a relief in Washington, which worries about the spread of Mr. Chávez's socialist message, and could also be welcome at home, where many Venezuelans resent Mr. Chávez's largesse toward others when Venezuela has seen little progress on issues such as reducing poverty. Indeed, a recent study by Claudio Loser, a former International Monetary Fund official, showed that Venezuela's real per-capita income has grown a cumulative 1% since 1998, the year Mr. Chávez took power.

Mr. Chávez also might be forced to cut back on the domestic front. Last year, Venezuela had Latin America's highest inflation rate, about 17% -- and it is expected to climb sharply this year.

"I think it will be a difficult year for the Venezuelan economy," says Francisco Rodriguez, who teaches Latin American economics at Wesleyan University in Middletown, Conn.

Russia is much less vulnerable to oil prices. Under Mr. Putin, the country has built up $300 billion of foreign-exchange reserves, an $89 billion rainy-day oil fund and runs big yearly budget surpluses. Mr. Putin is loosening the purse strings this year in the run-up to presidential elections in early 2008, with a 26% increase in spending from 2006. But the budget would still break even with oil as low as $38 to $40 per barrel. However, lower oil prices could hurt earnings at energy companies that form the backbone of Russia's economy.

Iran is more exposed to the vagaries of the oil market. As revenue has soared with oil prices, Iran's public-sector spending has expanded almost as fast. To pay for massive subsidies for most daily goods -- including gasoline, bread and heating fuel -- the government has borrowed in each of the past two years from a special rainy-day fund set up to retain some oil revenue for when prices fall again. But that spending has ignited inflation, now running around 15%.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad introduced a budget early last week that included a 20% increase in spending for the Iranian fiscal year that begins in March. He said the government, whose ultimate authority is held by a council of Islamic mullahs, would be able to add to its rainy-day fund if oil prices remain above $33 per barrel, the level the budget assumes for Iranian oil.

DOJ_NMG_0123063

But some private economists doubt the budget calculations and predict Tehran would again fall back on those surplus funds to finance spending.

Baghdad Is Key (WP)

By Stephen J. Hadley

The Washington Post, January 29, 2007

The Baker-Hamilton report explained that failure in Iraq could have severe consequences for our national interests in a critical region and for our national security here at home. In my many conversations with members of Congress and foreign policy experts, few have disagreed.

The strategic review commissioned by President Bush analyzed the options for setting Iraq on a trajectory for success. Alternatives now being discussed in Congress were considered but rejected after the strategic risks and stakes were calculated.

The review considered the option of pulling U.S. forces out of Baghdad and concentrating on al-Qaeda in Iraq and training Iraqi security forces, as some in Congress recommend.

Most people agree that we must focus on fighting al-Qaeda. The president's strategy steps up this fight -- particularly in Anbar province, where al-Qaeda seeks a sanctuary. The administration also agrees that we must accelerate the training of Iraqi security forces. The president's strategy does this -- with benchmarks to track progress and bolster the size and effectiveness of those forces. Training and supporting Iraqi troops will remain our military's essential and primary mission.

But the president's review also concluded that the strategy with the best chance of success must have a plan for securing Baghdad. Without such a plan, the Iraqi government and its security institutions could fracture under the pressure of widespread sectarian violence, ethnic cleansing and mass killings. Chaos would then spread throughout the country -- and throughout the region. The al-Qaeda movement would be strengthened by the flight of Sunnis from Baghdad and an accelerated cycle of sectarian bloodletting. Iran would be emboldened and could be expected to provide more lethal aid for extremist groups. The Kurdish north would be isolated, inviting separation and regional interference. Terrorists could gain pockets of sanctuary throughout Iraq from which to threaten our allies in the region and our security here at home.

The new plan for Baghdad specifically corrects the problems that plagued previous efforts. First, it is an Iraqi-initiated plan for taking control of their capital. Second, there will be adequate forces (Iraqi and American) to hold neighborhoods cleared of terrorists and extremists. Third, there is a new operational concept -- one devised not just to pursue terrorists and extremists but to secure the population. Fourth, new rules of engagement will ensure that Iraqi and U.S. forces can pursue lawbreakers regardless of their community or sect. Fifth, security operations will be followed by economic assistance and reconstruction aid -- including billions of dollars in Iraqi funds -- offering jobs and the prospect of better lives.

As Gen. David Petraeus, the new commander of our forces in Iraq, explained in hearings before Congress last week, reinforcing U.S. troops is necessary for this new plan to succeed. Any plan that limits our ability to reinforce our troops in the field is a plan for failure -- and could hand Baghdad to terrorists and extremists before legitimate Iraqi forces are ready to take over the fight. That is an outcome the president simply could not accept.

The Baker-Hamilton report supports this conclusion. It said: "We could, however, support a short-term redeployment or surge of American combat forces to stabilize Baghdad . . . if the U.S. commander in Iraq determines that such steps would be effective." Our military commanders, and the president, have determined just that.

The focus on reinforcing our troops must not overshadow the comprehensive nature of the changes in the president's strategy. Contrary to what some have suggested, reinforcing our military presence is not the strategy -- it is a means to an end and part of a package of key strategic shifts that will fundamentally restructure our approach to achieving our objectives in Iraq.

Building on experience elsewhere in the country, the new strategy doubles the number of provincial reconstruction teams (PRTs) in Iraq. These civilian-led units will target development aid where it is needed and help the Iraqi government extend its reach to all corners of the country.

Because close civilian-military cooperation is key to success, 10 new civilian PRTs will be embedded with U.S. combat brigades.

The new strategy incorporates other essential elements of the Baker-Hamilton report, such as doubling the number of troops embedded with Iraqi forces, using benchmarks to help us and the Iraqis chart progress, and launching a renewed diplomatic effort to increase support for the Iraqi government and advance political reconciliation.

Ultimately, a strategy for success must present a realistic plan for bringing security to the people of Baghdad. This is a precondition to advancing other goals. President Bush's strategy offers such a plan -- and it is the only strategy that does.

The writer is national security adviser to the president.

DOJ_NMG_0123064

2 Mideast Leaders Agree: US Can't Desert Iraq (NSWK)

Newsweek, January 29, 2007

In any discussion of who might replace Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki if he fails to bring peace to Baghdad, the name of Adel Abdul Mahdi comes up. But the Shiite vice president may be a slim reed to lean on. In an interview with NEWSWEEK's Lally Weymouth at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Abdul Mahdi seemed at best lukewarm to the idea of sending an additional 20,000 American troops to Iraq. Excerpts:

ADEL ABDUL MAHDI

Weymouth: In the United States, many wonder if the situation in Iraq can be brought under control. What do you think of President George Bush's plan to send additional troops?

Abdul Mahdi: We [Iraq and America] both think that Baghdad is a key issue. We have to succeed on that.

But will Bush's "surge" make a difference?

As Iraqis, we think we need more troops in Baghdad. It's up to the multinational forces to decide whether they need more troops.

You talk about multinational forces. But the U.S. administration is sending additional American troops—no one else is volunteering for the job. Are you for that or against it?

I am saying we need more troops in Iraq. Multinational forces are part of it.

But you have to be for or against the U.S. sending an additional 20,000 men.

I am not a military man. I can't say if they need to deploy their troops in Baghdad.

But it's not a military question. Americans are going to die. Is it worth the sacrifice?

I can [only] measure things seeing things as Iraqis [see them]. They are there to succeed, not because they wish to be there. If they want to succeed, we need more troops.

Doesn't success depend on your government standing up to Shia militias that support it?

We are not facing only militias. We are also facing Al Qaeda and insurgents.

Do you believe the government is capable of stopping Shiite atrocities?

I think they can do the job if Prime Minister Maliki takes the practical measures he is announcing.

It's rumored that you're the favorite of the U.S. government [to replace Maliki].

I think al-Maliki can still do it and he should have his chance.

Moqtada al-Sadr, of course, supports the Iraqi government. What happens if U.S. forces go after him?

We are going to impose laws. If you are going to act against the law, this will not be acceptable.

Do you think restoring security in Iraq is possible?

I was in the U.S. in 2003 and 2004. People were optimistic at that time, whether Iraqis or Americans. We couldn't tell them that there was a mess in Iraq—try to be more practical. Now people are so pessimistic and you can't tell them that this country has a chance.

All Americans see on their TV screens are Sunnis slaughtering Shiites and ethnic cleansing in the streets.

Unfortunately this is true. But this is only one part of the picture. Only 12 months ago we had elections and 12 million people voted, Sunnis and Shiites.

What can you show in the next couple of months that will inspire confidence?

If we can succeed in Baghdad, then we can give hope not only to Americans but also to Iraqis. If we can improve services in Baghdad, then journalists will see that, and we'll have a new image.

Do you believe you can really work with the Sunnis?

Of course, yes. Now in the Parliament, you can see Sunnis and Shias. You never saw that before in a country like Iraq.

But there is ethnic cleansing going on in Baghdad.

Absolutely.

Is it the government's policy to help people who have been cleansed from those neighborhoods to return?

Yes.

You have a law in Iraq that no one can carry a weapon?

That's right.

Are you going to use that law to have door-to-door searches to disarm the militias?

Of course, we are doing that and there are some achievements.

Do you believe that America will stay in Iraq or that U.S. troops will leave?

We have to gain the confidence of the American people and the administration.

Do you worry that the U.S. will withdraw?

DOJ_NMG_0123065

Of course we worry. We will be worried whether you stay or leave.

What do you prefer?

We are not going to decide for America. They will decide for themselves. Others bear the responsibility of where we are. We were not consulted about the war decision; we were not consulted about the invasion of Kuwait; we were not consulted about the war between Iran and Iraq; but we have to bear the consequences of all this. I think America has only two alternatives: to stay or to leave. If they stay, they should stay in a helpful way.

AHMED NAZIF

Since he was appointed to lead a mainly technocratic government in 2004, Egyptian Prime Minister Ahmed Nazif has been immersed in some of the Middle East's most complex political problems—the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the widening war in Iraq, not to mention Egypt's own on-again off-again steps toward democracy. He also spoke to NEWSWEEK's Lally Weymouth in Davos last week. Excerpts:

Weymouth: There's a rumor in Washington that the United States is going to bomb Iran. What do you think of the idea?

Nazif: We've said clearly that this would not be a good idea. If it is to deter Iran, it probably will have the exact opposite effect. So I don't see the logic.

How do you assess the strength of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad?

Iran, like any other country, has many factions with many different opinions. We have seen changes in the Iranian way of thinking over the last couple of decades. We've seen Iran coming closer to the communities in the Middle East and then seen them getting a little bit farther. What we need to do is just take them at face value. This is the Iranian government. This is what we are dealing with.

When do you think the peace with Israel will become a warmer peace?

Well the answer is in the question. When Israel has made peace with the Palestinians, with the Syrians, with the Lebanese, I think things will become much warmer.

But in business, couldn't there be warmer relations?

There is a warm relationship in business right now, but at the end of the day it's the whole relationship between the people of the countries [that counts].

Your government has been helpful in trying to form a national unity government between Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Hamas.

We're still facing some problems there because the Palestinians themselves are divided. We were partially successful in 2005 when ... the withdrawal from Gaza took place. If at the time, we had followed up with reassuring measures, especially on the developmental side with the Palestinians in Gaza, we would not be where we are today.

Then came the elections that brought a Hamas government to power a year ago.

We were of the opinion that those Palestinian elections should not be held. We opposed them.

But so did the Israelis, right?

It's the Americans that insisted on the elections. President [Hosni] Mubarak voiced our concern.

Because he thought radicals would win?

Exactly. But I think insistence on getting a democratic "solution" among the Palestinians at the time had sort of taken over [U.S. administration policy]. And, unfortunately, then we lost Israeli Prime Minister Sharon a few months later, and this [combination of events] has created a situation today that is, I do think, worse than where we were a year and a half ago.

So, to be clear, are you saying that the Bush administration, by pushing democracy so hard in the region, failed to see the risk that radical Islamists might be elected?

I think that's true, yeah. When you talk about how to promote democracy, you need to do it within the constraints of the countries you're working with. Palestinians did not elect Hamas because they believe in its principles. They elected Hamas because they were not satisfied with the status quo.

President Abbas recently went to Damascus against the wishes of the United States to meet with the Hamas leadership. Where does Egypt stand on this effort?

Our position is very clear. You need to get inclusion. And inclusion means you cannot ignore somebody. You cannot just say, "Hamas doesn't exist," or "Hizbullah doesn't exist," or "whatever faction in Iraq doesn't exist."

You're saying that Hamas should be included in a future Palestinian government with President Abbas.

Of course. They have to be. They have a majority in Parliament. They've been elected. They need to be there. Now to what extent, that's the negotiable part.

The U.S. appears to be reengaging in the area. You recently met with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Her visit to the region has shown that the United States is interested in moving along. For a change we are starting to look at the issues.

DOJ_NMG_0123066

On her last visit, Rice seemed to put much less emphasis on the need for democracy in Egypt.

Egypt is going through a reform process. President Mubarak came up with changes in the Constitution that would take Egypt further along in democratization. I think the administration is more understanding of what's taking place.

Do you worry about the U.S. withdrawing from Iraq?

Under the current circumstances? Of course! There is no alternative in place. You'll just give those militias a free hand. And I think it would be seen as the U.S. opting out of the region. The U.S. started this, and they need to give closure to it in a proper way. Now, I think that what President Bush came up with is not an opting out, it's a commitment to peace and order. We support this, provided the Iraqi government deals even-handedly with both the Sunnis and the Shias.

Black Hawk Down: The True Cost Of Iraq War (NSWK)

By Weston Kosova

Newsweek, January 29, 2007

For American soldiers stationed in Iraq, one of the few comforts of this war is how easily they can keep in touch with family back home. Many service members call their spouses and kids several times a week and e-mail daily, reassuring them that they are all right. Sgt. 1/c John Gary Brown knew his wife, Donna, worried every time he went up in the air. A Black Hawk helicopter crew chief and gunner with an Arkansas Army National Guard unit, Brown had experience calming the anxieties of his wife of 18 years. War had separated them before: Brown had flown missions over a similarly bleak landscape a decade and a half ago when he served in the gulf war.

That didn't make it any easier for Donna, so Brown called and wrote her almost every day. The only phone available to him was two miles from his barracks. At first he made the trek on foot, then bought a bicycle from a soldier who was rotating out. In their conversations, he reassured his wife that most of the time he was making routine flights over relatively safe territory. He even asked her to send "care" packages filled with sweets so that he could drop "candy bombs" to Iraqi children as the chopper whisked by. But there was no hiding the hazards of his duty. Large and often low to the ground, helicopters are a favorite target of insurgents, who fire at them with machine guns and rockets. They are also prone to mechanical problems, especially in the unforgiving Iraqi climate. About 90 helicopters have been lost since the war began.

Soldiers are not permitted to give their families details about combat operations. So Brown used a simple code when he spoke to Donna. If he mentioned he was going on a "training" flight, she knew not to worry. But if he told her he was going on a "mission," that meant he was heading into dangerous territory and he promised to contact her as soon as he landed. At 5:14 in the evening on Friday, Jan. 19, Donna was at home in Little Rock when Gary called and said the word she dreaded. He was at the airfield and ready to take off—this time on a "mission." Brown had just returned to Iraq after a 15-day home leave. On the phone, he told his wife how much he'd enjoyed being back with her and their two children and pair of grandchildren. Then he cut the conversation short. "I really have to go," he said. In the background, she could hear the thumping of the chopper's rotors.

She began to worry when he didn't call or e-mail on Saturday, but told herself he was probably still on duty and couldn't get to a phone or computer. She spent the day willing the phone to ring. When he still hadn't called by Sunday, she says, she suspected the worst. Still, the solemn visit from the Army's Casualty Assistance Officers came as a surprise. On Monday afternoon, there was a knock on the door. Christian, her 10-year-old grandson, answered and called to her that there were two men outside. She told the boy to ask them what they were selling. He said, "No, you don't understand. They're Army men."

Including Brown, 12 soldiers died around 3 p.m. Iraq time on Saturday when his Black Hawk crashed in Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad. The flight was a seemingly routine haul from the massive Camp Anaconda near Balad to the Iraqi capital, carrying four crew and eight passengers. Not far from the town of Baqubah, Brown's chopper—Easy 4-0—broadcast a mayday signal and went down; an accompanying Black Hawk landed nearby and its soldiers reportedly took fire from insurgents. The Army has been unusually tight-lipped about the details of the crash. It has not said exactly what went wrong. At first it reported 13 people had died, then 12. Officials tentatively blamed an equipment malfunction, then enemy fire. Now they say the crash is under investigation. The families of the soldiers say the Army did warn them not to expect much in the way of remains.

Those looking to put the crash into some larger perspective might point out that 10 of those who died were members of the National Guard—the greatest number of guard members killed in a combat mission since the Korean War. Or that the number of U.S. soldiers killed across Iraq that day (25 in all) made it one of the deadliest since the war began. But the most remarkable thing about the crash might be how quickly the deaths of a dozen soldiers can pass into and out of the public's consciousness these days, if they ever register at all.

More than 3,000 U.S. service members have now died in the Iraq war. At first it was difficult not to feel overwhelmed by the number of deaths. After four years, it is now difficult not to feel numb. In a nation without a draft, the emotional connection between the front and the home front is the weakest it has been in a major conflict in recent memory. There are so many news accounts of troops killed in combat that the details blur. The death of one soldier, or 20, loses its power to shock, except to the families of the fallen.

DOJ_NMG_0123067

At some point, the way we talk about the war itself changes. We speak less and less about husbandless wives and parentless children, and instead obscure the suffering in vaguer, more distant and—guiltily—easier terms. We shake our heads and talk about the "losses."

In Washington, the talk is now all about Iraq. Democrats, emboldened by their control of Congress and the president's sinking poll numbers, no longer fear being labeled "Defeatocrats" if they take a stand against George Bush on the war. And some Republicans, including Sens. Chuck Hagel and John Warner, are speaking out against the handling of the war and about the cost in human life. Nonetheless, the president, trying to appear conciliatory and resolute at the same time, is determined to send an additional 21,000 troops to Iraq, no matter what anyone else thinks. If Congress rejects the idea, Dick Cheney told CNN last week, "it won't stop us."

The president did not learn about the crash until late in the day on Saturday. Each morning he is handed what aides call "the blue sheets"—the overnight Iraq reports from the Situation Room that are printed on blue paper. The first line of each sheet lists the most recent casualties. But reports of the downed helicopter had not yet reached Washington. Bush spent part of the morning talking about the troop increase with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert Gates. Both had recently returned from a tour of Europe and the Middle East to promote the new Iraq strategy. The news wasn't all good. Not surprisingly, some of the allies weren't in favor of a troop escalation.

Is the president right that the additional troops can turn things around? Or is Iraq lost? These questions are the makings of a serious and long-overdue debate over the war. And yet so much of the chatter turns on the politics of the war. Who is up and who is down for 2008? Is the Bush presidency effectively "over" and will Americans trust a Democrat—and possibly a woman—to be commander in chief? Democrats (and rebelling Republicans) invest their passions in clinical debates over "exit strategies" and "withdrawal timetables," and congratulate themselves for "nonbinding" resolutions that condemn an increase in troops while still allowing them to go into the field. But few seem to be grappling with the fate of those soldiers.

There are, as always, more questions than answers about what to do in Iraq. Honest people can disagree about whether it is more dangerous to stay or to leave. But the 12 Americans who died in the Black Hawk crash offer us a vivid reminder of what is happening on the battlefield, and of the cost so many families are paying when loved ones die in combat. Guard members have taken on much of the burden of this war, and those who died aboard that helicopter were like many others who have lost their lives in the fighting: ordinary people asked to do the extraordinary. They were husbands and wives, parents and even grandparents. Some relied on their faith in God, others, their faith in the commander in chief. At least one no longer believed the war was worth fighting, but carried out his duties. Together, they left behind 34 children and at least a dozen grandchildren.

As we contemplate sending more men and women like them into harm's way, their demise leaves behind perhaps the only question that truly matters in wartime: is it worth it?

Army Capt. Sean Lyerly believed it was. At 31, Lyerly was among the younger soldiers onboard the helicopter. A proud Texan from a family with a history of military service, he went to Texas A&M and joined up with the Texas Army National Guard. "It's in the genes," says his father, George Lyerly, who himself served in the Army. "His granddaddy and uncle fought in World War II." Lyerly was determined to become a pilot. He flew relief missions in Louisiana after Hurricane Katrina and told his family about the satisfaction he got from plucking stranded people from rooftops. Up to that point his wife, 24-year-old Csilla, had convinced herself that she had no reason to fear his dedication to the guard. She worried about his flying, but she didn't give a second thought to the possibility of his being called up to serve in combat.

Most of the time Lyerly wasn't anywhere near an Army helicopter. In college he majored in horticulture and later worked as a manager in the garden department at a Home Depot. "The military was one weekend a month, two weeks a year. I never knew they could get deployed," Csilla says. "He mentioned something about maybe going to Bosnia, and I said, 'What do you mean, Bosnia? You're in the guard'." But last February, he got the call, and it wasn't Bosnia. He was nervous about going to Iraq, but he was also proud to become the next in his family to serve overseas. Like so many other soldiers, he said he "felt like he was making a difference." His wife tried to mirror his enthusiasm, but her fears sometimes got the better of her. "I was anxious. I had a bad gut feeling. There was just something ... " she recalls.

A combat captain, Lyerly was based at the sprawling Camp Anaconda, a major way station for the helicopter flights that crisscross Iraq now that the roads are so unsafe. Soldiers had nicknamed the place Mortaritaville because of frequent enemy attacks. Lyerly kept that kind of detail to himself when he called home to Pflugerville, a quiet suburb of Austin, each night at around 9 o'clock. Instead, he tried to re-create some semblance of home life by reading his toddler son, Zack, a favorite bedtime story—usually "Thomas the Tank Engine"—over a Webcam. A couple of days after Csilla was told that her husband had died, she tried to explain to her son what had happened. She told him about heaven, and described how beautiful it was. "Daddy went to heaven to meet God," she said gently. "We can talk to him, but we're not going to be able to see him anymore. He's always going to be able to hear us, but he's not going to come home." Zack looked back at her blankly. "Yes, he is," he said with all the worldly confidence of a 3-year-old. "He's in Iraq. When he's finished, he's going to come home."

DOJ_NMG_0123068

Cpl. Victor Langarica did not share Sean Lyerly's optimism about the mission in Iraq. From the moment he received his deployment orders last April, he seemed convinced that he would not leave the war zone alive. Worse, he believed that he was going to die for no good reason. A twice-divorced single father of a young son and daughter, he had joined the Army hoping to gain the skills that would lead to higher pay than he made at Home Depot. His mother and ex-wives looked after the kids while he was overseas. He was proud of the nine months he served in combat in Afghanistan after 9/11, but the experience left the lighthearted 29-year-old sullen and fearful. Once he was surprised by an Afghan soldier who put a gun to his head. Just as the soldier was about to fire, a fellow American shot the Afghan dead. He never found out who had saved his life, but thought of him as an angel.

Unlike most of the others who died in the crash, Langarica was regular Army. But when he got his deployment papers to Iraq, he didn't want to go. The invasion made no sense to him. " 'I don't understand why Bush is doing this to us'," his mother, Pearl Lucas, recalled his saying. " 'If I die, I won't know why I died, if it was for oil or for revenge'."

Langarica arrived in Iraq last September. His fears about the dangers were justified. Stationed in southern Baghdad, he worked as a heavy-equipment mechanic and shouldn't have been in the thick of combat. But his job required him to repair Humvees and other vehicles that had broken down in the streets, amid gunfire and missile attacks. One day, as he lay under a vehicle performing a repair, a bullet grazed the top of his scalp.

In November, Langarica was granted a two-week leave. He returned to the United States to visit his mother and daughter in Decatur, Ga., and his son in Brunswick, Md. He told relatives that he dreaded returning. His aunt urged him to desert the Army and seek refuge in Nicaragua, where she and his mother were born. But Langarica was determined to finish out his tour, and returned to Iraq. Before he left, he told friends he didn't think he was going to see them again. He had already convinced himself he was "an angel of God—no matter what happens I will always be around." In a letter to his mother in 2003, he had confided, "I know it sounds crazy, but I really believe I am [an angel]."

The night before the helicopter flight, he called home for the last time, certain that he would die the next day. "You better make it," his mother told him. "Your kids are waiting here for you." She put his 6-year-old daughter, Devina, on the phone to talk with him. When he got back on the line with his mother, he was crying.

"I will remember you every second," he said.

Some of the time Jane Allgood was perfectly content not to know what her husband, Col. Brian Allgood, was doing over in Iraq. A West Point grad and orthopedic surgeon, Brian Allgood was the top medical officer for all Coalition forces in Iraq. He also used his position to help train Iraqi doctors. At 46, he was considered to be on the fast track to earning his first general's star. He routinely made hazardous trips around the country; his wife, Jane, a retired colonel who had served in the Army's Medical Service Corps, knew that his life was in danger. "I understood that it was an occupational hazard," she says. "I did not want to know when he was traveling in Iraq." The two had an arrangement. He would call home once a week, and e-mail as often as possible.

Allgood never doubted his path in life. He met his future wife at 17, and had already planned to earn a medical degree and launch a military career. Expert in flight and combat surgery, he also trained as an Army Ranger so that he could better treat jumpers' injuries. He rose quickly, served as the top U.S. military doctor in South Korea and was next scheduled to command a medical brigade in Germany, where his wife and 11-year-old son, Wyatt, live.

Allgood considered himself a doctor first, and stuck his neck out to get troops the equipment he thought they needed. This fall, an infantry unit requested fire-retardant uniforms, which were typically worn only by flight crews. Allgood believed all the men should have them. Within days, he authorized $20 million for the new uniforms. Officers with their eyes on promotion don't often make high-dollar demands of their superiors. "It would have been very easy to say no, or just give them to one unit," says Col. Donald Jenkins, who worked with Allgood in Baghdad. "There was a lot of questioning about the money. He didn't flinch." The mission that took his life was important to him. Allgood had spent hundreds of hours working to improve care for Iraqi civilians injured by insurgent attacks. He was returning to Baghdad that Saturday from Taji, where he had presented the Iraqi people with a new, American-built hospital.

Stories about soldiers fighting in Iraq do not immediately evoke images of grandparents in uniform. But many guard troops, plucked from their everyday civilian lives, are well into their 40s or even 50s. Lt. Col. David C. Canegata III of the Virgin Islands National Guard was the father of four and left behind a 15-month-old grandson. Command Sgt. Maj. Marilyn Gabbard of the Iowa Army National Guard and her husband, Ed, had seven children and 11 grandchildren between them. She was the only woman aboard. At 46, she had been in the military 28 years and was the first woman in the Iowa Guard to reach her rank.

Like Langarica, who eased his fears by believing himself an angel, many of the fallen took great comfort in faith. Canegata played keyboard and sang gospel in church with his wife, Shenneth. Thirty-seven-year-old Staff Sgt. Darryl Booker of the Virginia

DOJ_NMG_0123069

Army National Guard believed it was more than luck that saved him the day a rocket missed him by inches. "He would always tell me, 'I'm covered, Dad'," his father, Earnest Hardy, recalls. "Let me tell you, when he said he was covered, he meant Jesus was looking out for him. He was not talking about the U.S. government."

Others relied on their devotion to the cause itself. Roger Haller, a 49-year-old command sergeant major with the Maryland Army National Guard, was the top-ranking enlisted man in the guard's HQ 70th Regiment. Inspired by 9/11, Haller went to Afghanistan, and later to Iraq, for what would be his final mission. His son, Sgt. Daniel Haller, also served in Afghanistan and Iraq. Daniel is back home, and his father's tour was coming to a close soon. He had hoped to make it in time for his daughter Kathryn's high-school graduation. Retired Command Sgt. Maj. Kathleen Hurley, Haller's longtime friend, reminisced about his optimism under fire and his unshakable belief that he was doing the right thing by serving. She echoed the sentiments of many friends and family members when she said she did not want his service to be forgotten. "I don't want him to be just another casualty statistic. He was so much more."

Last Wednesday, about 1,200 soldiers gathered for a memorial service at Camp Anaconda. The base is home to the 36th Combat Aviation Brigade, the Army National Guard's first helicopter brigade. Four of the men who died in the crash had been assigned to the 36th CAB, whose service of moving men and material around Iraq is known as Catfish Air. The troops stationed there took the crash hard. On that Saturday afternoonthe men knew something serious had happened. Internet and phone service were shut down across the base, a tactic the military uses to prevent information leaks when soldiers are killed. When the lead helicopter on the fateful flight returned, its crew was led off to be debriefed immediately, before they'd even finished shutting down their bird completely. Another 24 hours passed before soldiers on the base were even told that a Black Hawk had gone down.

At the service, helmets and rifles were set up in honor of the dead. The brigade commander and chaplain rose to speak, then close friends of the fallen made short speeches. Together, the assembled soldiers had seen plenty of bloodshed, and many could not hold back their tears. "It was a pretty emotional scene," says Master Sgt. Charles Wheeler, a public-affairs officer. "People were not just trying to stand back and be stoic."

With reporting by Arian Campo-Flores in Decatur, Gretel C. Kovach in Pflugerville, Babak Dehghanpisheh in Baghdad, Stefan Theil in Heidelberg, Dan Ephron, Eve Conant, Richard Wolffe, Daren Briscoe, Jonathan Mummolo and Steve Tuttle in Washington and Andrew Murr, Sarah Childress and Karen Breslau.

Transcript: NEWSWEEK's Interview With Dick Cheney (NSWK)

Newsweek, January 29, 2007

Jan. 28, 2007 - NEWSWEEK: Let's start with Iraq, if I may. There's a lot of skepticism on the Hill, even inside the administration about the Iraqi prime minister's abilities, desire to take down the militias. Some people have said the militias have put him into power, so why would he take them down or want to take them down. So what gives you the confidence to think that he can actually be up to the job?

Dick Cheney: Well, I think we've got a lot of people who want to judge the success of the [Nuri al-]Maliki administration after some nine months in office. I think it's a little premature. I think he has been direct and forthright in responding to our concerns. I think there is some evidence that he's already beginning to act in terms of, for example, Iraqi forces rounding up as many as 600 members of the Jaish al-Mahdi [JAM, or Mahdi Army] in the last couple of weeks. His commitment to us is to go after those who are responsible for the violence, whoever they may be—whether they're Baathist or former regime elements or militia, Shia militia or criminal elements. And I think at this stage, we don't have any reason to doubt him.

You don't think it's a token gesture?

I think it's—people are trying to make a judgment on whether or not this plan is going to work I think far too early. And I think in fairness to the Iraqis, they need to be given an opportunity to follow through on their commitments.

The president—and I think you also—have spoken about the possibility of regional war in case of American withdrawal, a chaos in Iraq, and I think the president referred to it as an epic battle between extremists. What's the basis for thinking that it would be a broader war? What lies behind that kind of analysis in your mind?

Well, I think it's a concern that the current level of sectarian violence—Shia on Sunni and Sunni on Shia violence would increase, and perhaps break out in other parts of the country. It's pretty well concentrated right now in the Baghdad area.

There are a lot of other concerns, as well, with what would happen if we were to withdraw from Iraq and do what many in the Democratic Party want us to do. It clearly would have, I think, consequences on a regional basis in terms of the efforts that we've mounted not only in Iraq, but also in Afghanistan and Pakistan and Saudi Arabia. This is a conflict that we're involved in on a wide variety of fronts in that part of the world. And hundreds of thousands of people literally have signed on in that battle to take on the Al Qaeda or the Al Qaeda types, in part because the United States is there, because we're committed, because we provide the leadership, and because we're working closely with people like President [Pervez] Musharraf in Pakistan, and [Hamid] Karzai in Afghanistan and so forth.

DOJ_NMG_0123070

And a decision by the United States to withdraw from Iraq I think would have a direct negative impact on the efforts of all of those other folks who would say wait a minute, if the United States isn't willing to complete the task in Iraq that they may have to reconsider whether or not they're willing to put their lives on the line serving in the security forces in Afghanistan, for example, or taking important political positions in Afghanistan, or the work that the Saudis have done against the Al Qaeda inside the kingdom.

All of a sudden, the United States which is the bulwark of security in that part of world would I think no longer—could no longer be counted on by our friends and allies that have put so much into this struggle.

But would that encourage them to take a role in an Iraqi civil war? There's this idea that regional powers would step in.

No, I think—I think when you look at Iraq, you have to look at Iraq in the broader context. And you cannot evaluate the consequences of the U.S. withdrawal from Iraq only in terms of Iraq. You've got to look at it in terms of what it means in other parts of the globe, really.

Remember what the strategy is here for Al Qaeda. Their strategy is that they can break our will. They can't beat us in a stand-up fight. They never have—but they believe firmly because they talk about it all the time—that they can, in fact, break the will of the American people and change our policies if they just kill enough Americans, or kill enough innocent civilians. And they cite Beirut in 1983, and Mogadishu in 1993 as evidence of that, and then they see the debate here in the United States over whether or not we've got the right policy in Iraq, whether or not we ought to stay committed there as evidence reinforcing their view that, in fact, the United States can be forced to withdraw if they simply stay the course that they're on, that is to say the Al Qaeda and the terrorist extremists stay the course that they're on.

So Iraq to some extent is a test of that basic fundamental proposition. Is their strategic view that we won't complete the job correct? Or is our strategic view correct, that we can, in fact, organize people in that part of the world, as well as use our forces in order to achieve a significant victory and defeat those elements that, among other things launched an attack on the United States on 9/11 and killed 3,000 Americans.

You've made the case that a collapsed Iraq would become a terrorist haven. The president has also said that. Al Qaeda is essentially … Look at what happened to Afghanistan.

But Al Qaeda is essentially a new organization in Iraq, a Sunni organization and it has this element of foreign fighters. Isn't there a reason to think that if there was full-blown civil war, the Shia would essentially beat them and neutralize that as being a hostile force as they take control of the country?

What's the basis for that?

There are more Shia.

Well, let's look at Afghanistan. In 1996, there were no Al Qaeda in Afghanistan. That's when [Osama] bin Laden moved in and found refuge there. A handful of Arabs, foreign fighters, if you will, subsequently opened up training camps, trained somewhere—estimates range from 10,000 to 20,000 terrorists in the late '90s, developed a safe haven and a base of operations from which they blew up American embassies in East Africa, attacked the USS Cole, launched the planning and training for 9/11. That all took place in Afghanistan under circumstances that are similar to what you've just hypothesized about for Iraq.

OK. Can we talk about Iran? You've traveled the region, you have extensive contact especially in the [Persian] Gulf, the Saudis, what are you hearing about their concerns about Iran's rise, its role in the region now?

I think there's widespread concern throughout the region about Iran, and in particular, Iran under [President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad. I think a lot of people in the area—I don't want to attribute this to any one particular government—but a lot of people in the area feel directly threatened. They're concerned about Iran using surrogates such as the Syrians and Hizbullah, for example, in an effort to topple the government of Lebanon. They're concerned about Iran working through Hamas to prevent any progress of the peace process vis-a-vis Israel. They are concerned about sort of a struggle for leadership of the Islamic world between Shia and Iran and Sunnis elsewhere. They're concerned about Iran's drive to acquire nuclear weapons. And of course, there's a long history of Iran trying to asset itself as the dominant power in the region. It has been a theme that you can find running back several decades.

And one of the unique things I find now as I talk to representatives of governments from the region is they're all pretty much in agreement on that proposition—greater agreement if you will among the folks in the region than I can recall on most other propositions in recent years.

Is there a concern from those allies that America is too tied down, too overwhelmed with the situation in Iraq to deal or have the capacity to deal with Iran?

I haven't seen that. I think most of the nations in that part of the world believe their security is supported, if you will, by the United States. They want us to have a major presence there. When we—as the president did, for example, recently—deploy another aircraft carrier task force to the gulf, that sends a very strong signal to everybody in the region that the United States is here to stay, that we clearly have significant capabilities, and that we are working with friends and allies as well as the international organizations to deal with the Iranian threat.

DOJ_NMG_0123071

That deployment I suppose raised another round of speculation inside Washington that military action was being worked on, that something was around the corner, can you see a scenario where air strikes on Iran would be justified?

I'm not going to speculate about …

It's my job.

… security action. You've got to ask, but the fact is we are doing what we can to try to resolve issues such as the nuclear question diplomatically through the United Nations, but we've also made it clear that we haven't taken any options off the table.

Can we switch to some politics right now? Politics of Iraq, especially. There has been little open support for the president's plan for extra troops in Iraq from the Republican Party. John Warner has obviously come out fairly strongly against it. Do you worry that the party has lost the stomach for the fight?

Well, I think—my sense of it is that the election results last November obviously represented a blow to our friends on the Hill, Republicans on the Hill—to go from majority to minority status. I think a lot of members were concerned or felt that their political fortunes were adversely affected by our ongoing operations in Iraq.

My sense of it is that what's happened here now over the last few weeks is that the president has shored up his position with the speech he made a couple of weeks ago, specifically on Iraq. And I think the speech, frankly Tuesday night, the State of the Union address was one of his best. I think there's been a very positive reaction of people who saw the speech. And I think to some extent that's helped shore us up inside the party on the Hill.

Now, we haven't had a lot of votes yet. The one vote that we've seen was the Senate Foreign Relations Committee yesterday [Wednesday] where—with the exception of Chuck Hagel—the Republicans were united in opposing what [Sen. Joe] Biden and [Sen. Carl] Levin and so forth were suggesting. So I think at this stage, that most members on our side of the aisle recognize that what's ultimately going to count here isn't sort of all the hoorah that surrounds these proposals so much as it's what happens on the ground in Iraq. And we're not going to know that for a while yet.

We've got a very good man in Dave Petraeus. Going out to take command and I think a credible program. And the ultimate test will be how well it works.

Senator Hagel said some pretty harsh things about the administration [on Wednesday]. He said, there was no strategy. He said…

It's not the first time.

Well, he said it was a—the "ping-pong game with human beings." Do you have a reaction to that kind of comment?

I thought that Joe Lieberman's comments two days ago before—it was when the Armed Services Committee had General Petraeus up for his confirmation hearings—were very important. And Joe basically said that the plan deserved an opportunity to succeed that—I think this was Joe, if it wasn't Joe, one of the other members did—that we're sending General Petraeus out with probably a unanimous or near unanimous vote, and that it didn't make sense for Congress to simultaneously then pass a resolution disapproving of the strategy in Iraq.

There are consequences of what Congress does under these circumstances. And I thought Joe was effective in pointing out some of those consequences, both from the standpoint of our people who are putting their lives on the line and for the nation, as well as consequences from the standpoint of our adversaries.

So you don't think Senator Hagel-and now you dodged completely responding to his comments—but they're not helpful to the cause and to the mission?

Let's say I believe firmly in Ronald Reagan's 11th commandment: Thou shalt not speak ill of a fellow Republican. But it's very hard sometimes to adhere to that where Chuck Hagel is involved.

May I ask about public opinion here because a series of—a succession of polls have shown this low level of support for the war, for the president's new plan, looking back, you made some comments before the war talking about being greeted as liberators. You weren't the only one. And of course, the early part of the invasion did go better than people expected. But do you think that people weren't sufficiently prepared, public opinion wasn't sufficiently prepared for the length of this conflict, for the difficulties involved? And do you have any regrets about your own role in preparing public opinion for that?

Well, we—the comments I made were based on the best information we had. I think there's no question but what the struggle has gone on longer than we anticipated, especially in Baghdad, that the events such as the bombing of the Golden Dome in Samarra a year ago was a deliberate Al Qaeda strategy that [Abu Mussab al-]Zarqawi pursued, and it worked. He finally provoked the Shia to retaliate against the Sunni. Things like that, that have I think constituted setbacks.

DOJ_NMG_0123072

It does not, though, lead me to conclude that what we're doing in terms of our overall effort, taking down Saddam Hussein's regime standing up a new democracy in Iraq isn't a worthy objective. I think it is. I think we have made significant progress. There's still a lot more to do—no question about it.

But I guess, the other sense I have that the conflict we're involved in—not just Iraq but on the broader basis against Al Qaeda, against the threat that's represented by the extreme elements of Islam on a global basis now is going to go on for a long time. And it's not something that's going to end decisively, and there's not going to be a day when we can say, there, now we have a treaty, problem solved. It's a problem that I think will occupy our successors maybe for two or three or four administrations to come.

It is an existential conflict. It is, in fact, about the future of civilization on large parts of the globe, in terms of what's represented by Al Qaeda and their associates. And it's very important that we recognize it's a long-term conflict, and we have to be engaged. There might have been a time when we could retreat behind our oceans and feel safe and secure and not worry about what was happening in other parts of the globe. But that day passed on 9/11.

And now, when we face the very real prospect that attacks can be mounted against the United States from various parts of the globe, including Europe—remember, the last threat was out of the U.K. with airliners to be blown up over the Atlantic—and where the possibility exists that the terrorists could next time have far deadlier weapons than anything they have used to date, this is a very serious problem. And the United States cannot afford not to prevail.

The question about the run-up to war, the weapons of mass destruction, do you feel that, in making—do you feel that your credibility was hurt by that, and that, in a sense, no matter what the warnings are about this broader conflict, that, in some ways, getting beyond the run-up to the war and the eternal debate about the run-up to war, means it's harder to make the case about the broader threats now?

Well, I have my own personal view. Obviously there was flawed intelligence prior to the war. We've seen reports from the Senate Intelligence Committee and the Robb-Silberman commission and so forth—but that we should not let the fact of past problems in that area lead us to ignore the threat we face today and in the future. It would be a huge mistake.

And the—in terms of whether or not it adversely affected public opinion, I think it clearly did, but that does not lead me to conclude that we didn't do the right thing when we went into Iraq and took down Saddam Hussein's regime, et cetera.

The media has this—if not the media, public opinion—has this caricature of you, the Darth Vader in the bat cave, and various things. You must be very familiar with that. Do you think you get a fair crack from the media?

Oh, I don't worry about it a lot. I'm at that stage in my life where I'm not running for any office. I'm here to do a job for the president of the United States. It's important that I tell people what I think—and I do. And from the standpoint of the decisions the president makes and the way we try to conduct business, we don't worry a lot about the polls, what they say about us …

Or the newspapers?

… or the newspapers. If you've been around—by the time I leave here, it will have been over 40 years since I arrived in Washington, and I've been praised when I didn't deserve it, and probably criticized when I didn't deserve it. And there aren't enough hours in the day for me to spend a lot of time worrying about my image.

Let me ask you about events going on at the courthouse down—not far from here. We think it's fairly unprecedented that a sitting vice president would testify …

I'm not going to talk about the trial, obviously.

About your decision to testify, about the precedent?

Sorry, I'm not going to discuss it.

Had to ask. I just want to end—because we're running short of time—President Ford, his recent funeral, did it put you in a reflective mood about that period? Do you draw any parallels to now? What was the sort of overwhelming feeling as you thought about then and now, going through all the private and public moments surrounding the funeral?

Well, I did think about, obviously, the president a lot as we went through that, really, week-long period of national mourning. I was, like I think a lot of us who were close to him and worked for him and are part of this administration, delighted to see the outpouring of tributes to his leadership, to what he represented to the country under very difficult circumstances, and praise for the tough, tough decisions he made—in particular, for example, the pardon.

And I reflected back on where we'd been 30 years ago when, after he made those decisions and, obviously, suffered for it in the public opinion polls and the press, and how history judged him 30 years later very, very favorably because of what he'd done and because he had displayed those qualities of leadership and decisiveness, steadfastness, if you will, in the face of political opposition that became a hallmark of his administration.

Is there a parallel to now?

There may well be.

DOJ_NMG_0123073

One other question. Bob Woodward reported that President Ford thought you had justified the war wrongly, and that he agreed with Colin Powell that you developed a fever, I think was the word, about Saddam Hussein, about terrorism. Did you feel that was accurate? Did it surprise you?

I've never heard that from anybody but Bob Woodward.

And other comments that—criticism from Scowcroft about not knowing you anymore—people have got quite personal, people you worked with before. You wouldn't be human if it didn't have some reaction.

Well, I'm vice president and they're not. (Laughter.)

Thank you very much.

Thank you.

250 Are Killed In Major Iraq Battle (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 28 — At least 250 militants were killed and an American helicopter was shot down in violent clashes near the southern city of Najaf on Sunday, Iraqi officials said.

For 15 hours, Iraqi forces backed by American helicopters and tanks battled hundreds of gunmen hiding in a date palm orchard near the village of Zarqaa, about 120 miles south of Baghdad, by a river and a large grain silo that is surrounded by orchards, the officials said.

It appeared to be one of the deadliest battles in Iraq since the American-led invasion four years ago, and was the first major fight for Iraqi forces in Najaf Province since they took over control of security there from the Americans in December.

That handover was trumpeted by the Iraqi government at the time as a sign of its progress in regaining more control of Iraqi territory.

The American military confirmed that the helicopter crashed around 1:30 p.m., and said that two soldiers aboard died in the crash. But American military officials said they could not confirm the total number of dead in the battle.

Col. Ali Numaas, a spokesman for the Iraqi security forces in Najaf, and an Interior Ministry official said the number of dead could rise. They said that the fighting stopped just after 10 p.m. and that most of those killed were militants. An employee at a local morgue said at least two Iraqi policemen were among the dead.

In a statement, the United States military said bodies of the two soldiers aboard the helicopter were recovered. The crash, at least the third involving an American helicopter in Iraq over the past week, is under investigation.

The precise affiliation of the militants was unclear.

Asad Abu Ghalal, the governor of Najaf Province, said the fighters in the orchard were Iraqi and foreign, some wearing the brown, white and maroon regalia of Pakistani and Afghan fighters. He said they had come to assassinate Shiite clerics and attack religious convoys that were gathering in Najaf, one of Shiite Islam's holiest cities, and other southern cities for Ashura, a Shiite holiday that starts Monday night.

At a news conference on Sunday afternoon, Mr. Ghalal said the fighters called themselves the Soldiers of Heaven, and seemed to be part of a wider Sunni effort to disrupt Ashura, which marks the seventh-century death of the Prophet Muhammad's grandson Hussein.

The holiday attracts hundreds of thousands of Shiite pilgrims to Karbala, where Hussein is believed to have been killed, and for days, the roads of southern Iraq have been filled with convoys of pilgrims beating drums and preparing for the day's rituals, which include self-flagellation. In past years, Ashura has been a magnet for violent attacks from Sunnis, with at least 180 people killed on the holiday three years ago.

But two senior Shiite clerics said the gunmen were part of a Shiite splinter group that Saddam Hussein helped build in the 1990s to compete with followers of the venerated Shiite religious leader Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani. They said the group, calling itself the Mehwadiya, was loyal to Ahmad bin al-Hassan al-Basri, an Iraqi cleric who had a falling out with Muhammad Bakr al-Sadr — father-in-law of the Shiite leader Moktada al-Sadr — in Hawza, a revered Shiite seminary in Najaf.

The clerics spoke on condition of anonymity because they said they had been ordered not to discuss Shiite divisions.

Iraqi officials said the group of 100 to 600 fighters was discovered in the orchard Saturday night, leading to a midnight meeting of local authorities who hatched an attack plan.

"We agreed to carry out an operation to take them by surprise," said Mr. Ghalal, the Najaf governor.

At dawn, the governor said, the area was surrounded and the offensive began. He said the militants had antiaircraft rockets and long-range sniper rifles, and, according to a soldier involved in the fighting, Iraqi security forces encountered heavy resistance. Commanders called for reinforcements and a brigade of soldiers from nearby Babil Province joined the fight.

DOJ_NMG_0123074

Eventually, Iraqi officials said, they called on the United States military for help. American tanks and helicopter gunships arrived, and gun battles continued into the night. By 10:30 p.m., the gunfire had died down and Iraqi troops began searching the area for bodies.

Elsewhere in the heavily Shiite south, there were other signs of potential strikes on Ashura. Officials in Karbala said the police arrested three men — a Saudi, an Afghan and a Moroccan — who were found on the road between Najaf and Karbala with a suicide bomb belt and explosives in their car. The officials said the vehicle had been hollowed out so it could be used as a car bomb.

The United States military also announced the deaths of a soldier and a marine on Saturday.

The marine died from combat wounds in Anbar Province, where American troops have been battling Sunni insurgents for months. The soldier, a member of the military police, was killed when a roadside bomb exploded near his patrol north of Baghdad.

Throughout Iraq, the drumbeat of daily violence continued.

In Kirkuk, two car bombs at a Kurdish car dealership and a Kurdish market killed at least 17 people, authorities said.

In Baghdad, 54 bodies were found, many showing signs of torture. At least five girls were killed and 20 wounded when a mortar round hit a school in Adil, a Sunni neighborhood.

At 7:30 a.m., a bomb inside a minibus exploded in a Shiite area of the capital east of the Tigris River, killing one and wounding five. Two hours later, in the Sunni area of Yarmouk in western Baghdad, gunmen killed four people, including a consultant with the Ministry of Industry and his daughter, who were shot on their way to work.

After dark Sunday night, residents of the Yarmouk neighborhood reported that heavy clashes had broken out, with gun and mortar fire raining down for hours.

Also on Sunday, Saddam Hussein's cousin Ali Hassan al-Majid acknowledged in court that he had given orders to destroy scores of villages during Iraq's campaign against the Kurds in the 1980s.

Prosecutors introduced two dozen documents they said incriminated members of the Hussein government in the killing of tens of thousands of Kurds.

The Associated Press reported that Mr. Majid, also known as Chemical Ali because he is accused of using chemical weapons against the Kurds, said the area "was full of Iranian agents."

"We had to isolate these saboteurs," he said.

He added, "I am the one who gave orders to the army to demolish villages and relocate the villagers."

Hundreds Die In Clash Near Shiite Holy City (LAT)

By Louise Roug And Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 29, 2007

BAGHDAD — Iraqi and American forces killed several hundred gunmen apparently planning to attack a Shiite Muslim shrine Sunday, fighting a daylong battle in which a U.S. helicopter crashed, killing two U.S. troops, Iraqi security officials said.

The fighting in the holy city of Najaf on the eve of the Shiite holiday of Ashura came as a mortar attack killed five teenage girls at a school in Baghdad and the daily nationwide civilian death toll again climbed past 100.

Iraqi security officials offered conflicting accounts of the identity and motives of the heavily armed fighters in Najaf, variously describing them as foreign fighters, Sunni Arab nationalists, loyalists of executed former dictator Saddam Hussein, or followers of a messianic Shiite death cult. Some witnesses reported that the attackers wore colorful Afghan tribal robes.

The cause of the helicopter crash in Najaf was unclear, but U.S. and Iraqi officials said it was felled by fire from the ground, and witnesses said they saw it shot out of the sky. It was the third helicopter to go down in eight days.

Three additional U.S. troops were reported killed Sunday.

Sunday's fighting in Najaf and elsewhere was extraordinary, even by Iraq's bloody standards, highlighting the challenge faced by U.S. and Iraqi forces, which are fighting a complex patchwork of elusive enemies, including Shiite militias and Sunni Arab insurgents. The deaths in Najaf would comprise the highest daily casualty toll inflicted by U.S. and Iraqi forces since U.S. troops arrived in Baghdad.

Iraqi security forces took authority over Najaf's security about a month ago. But witnesses and security officials said Sunday that Iraqi forces were being beaten by the enigmatic but well-organized fighters until U.S. forces and air support arrived.

Shaky footage recorded by mobile telephone, broadcast on Iraqi television, showed Iraqi soldiers hunkered behind a berm as intense gunfire erupted and smoke rose in the distance.

Ali Nomas, an Iraqi security official in Najaf, said the fighters belonged to a group calling itself Heaven's Army — one among several messianic cults that have appeared among Shiites, who believe in the imminent return of Imam Mahdi, the last in the line of Shiite saints who disappeared more than 1,000 years ago. Nomas said the information came from interviews with at least 10 detained fighters.

DOJ_NMG_0123075

"Everyday someone claims he's the Mahdi," he said.

Nomas said the leader of the hitherto unknown Heaven's Army had told followers that he was a missing son of the Imam Ali, the cousin and son-in-law of the prophet Muhammad. Ali's remains are entombed in Najaf.

"They believe that the Mahdi has called them to fight in Najaf," he said, adding that fighters had converged on Najaf from other predominantly Shiite cities in Iraq.

Nomas lamented that Iraq's death and destruction had convinced some Shiites that the end of days was coming.

"There's nothing bizarre left in Iraq anymore," he said in a telephone interview. "We've seen the most incredible things."

But Najaf Gov. Asad Abu Gulal said some of the fighters were members of Hussein's Baath Party.

Although they disagreed on the attackers' identity, Iraqi officials and witnesses offered similar accounts of events on the battlefield. Most of the fighting took place in farmland outside the city, which also is home to the most revered Shiite cleric, Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani. Security forces cordoned off the ancient, labyrinthine city to prevent attacks on pilgrims, clergy and holy sites, the governor said.

The gunmen, numbering at least 500, apparently planned to launch their attack today, the 10th day of the Muslim lunar month of Muharram and the holiest day in the Shiite calendar. But Iraqi security forces were tipped off Sunday night about their presence on nearby farms, Gulal said.

Iraqi security forces struck at dawn but were overwhelmed by the militants, who had dug trenches on farms. At least two Iraqi soldiers were killed in the initial fighting, a security official in Baghdad said.

Iraqi forces then called in U.S. air support as well as the Scorpion Brigades, an Iraqi quick-reaction force based in a neighboring province.

Helicopters arrived, but after one crashed around 1:30 p.m., they were replaced by higher-flying jets, as American Humvees and armored vehicles rolled into the area.

Three more Iraqi soldiers were killed, as were at least 250 of the fighters, according to several Iraqi officials. Those numbers could not be independently confirmed. By 4 p.m., the tide of the battle had shifted, but U.S. forces continued bombing into the night in an attempt to stamp out remnants of the militants, Iraqi officials and witnesses said.

Two U.S. soldiers and a Marine were killed in three separate attacks around Iraq on Saturday, the U.S. military said Sunday. The deaths brought the number of U.S. military personnel killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003 to 3,080, according to icasualties.org.

Violence began early Sunday and continued throughout the day in several Iraqi cities, including Kirkuk, where bombings killed 14 people, and Babil, where mortar rounds killed 10 and five bodies were found in the Tigris River. A suspected Baath Party loyalist was assassinated in the southern city of Kut, and in the western city of Fallouja, a car bomb killed two and injured four.

Killers in Baghdad targeted both Sunnis and Shiites. In a Sunni neighborhood in west Baghdad, mortar rounds hit a girl's secondary school, killing five students and wounding 21 others. In another western neighborhood, explosives hidden in a wooden cart killed four and injured 18, while an Industry Ministry advisor and his daughter were shot to death in a nearby area.

In a Shiite neighborhood on the east side of the Tigris River, a bomb exploded on a bus, killing one and injuring five others. Two other bombings killed seven and injured 35 people in Shiite neighborhoods.

Gunmen elsewhere in the capital killed a bank clerk in a car lot near her house. At least 54 bodies were found in various Baghdad neighborhoods, including a woman kidnapped two days ago, her family said.

Meanwhile, Iraqi officials in Diyala province northeast of Baghdad sacked 1,500 policemen, charging them with absenteeism and fleeing fighting. They also dismissed Baqubah Mayor Khalid Sanjary for having alleged ties to Sunni Arab rebels. The province is riddled with Al Qaeda cell members as well as militiamen affiliated with Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr.

roug@latimes.com

Times staff writers and special correspondents in Baghdad, Baqubah, Hillah, Najaf and Kirkuk contributed to this report.

Iraqis Raid Insurgents Near Shiite Holy City (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Saad Sarhan

The Washington Post, January 29, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 28 -- Iraqi soldiers, backed by U.S. helicopters, stormed an encampment of hundreds of insurgents hiding among date palm orchards in southern Iraq in an operation Sunday that set off fierce, day-long gun battles during the holiest week for the country's Shiite Muslims.

DOJ_NMG_0123076

Iraqi security officials said the troops killed scores of insurgents while foiling a plot to annihilate the Shiite religious leadership in the revered city of Najaf. A U.S. helicopter crashed during the fighting, killing two soldiers.

The spokesman for Iraqi security forces in Najaf, Col. Ali Nomas Jerao, said that 250 suspected insurgents were killed in the fighting, which took place about eight miles northeast of Najaf, and that 40 people were detained. The U.S. military did not provide death tolls for Iraqi forces or insurgents.

Thousands of Shiite pilgrims from Iraq and neighboring countries are traveling this week in drum-beating caravans to the southern city of Karbala, 50 miles north of Najaf, in commemoration of the death of the prophet Muhammad's grandson in the 7th century. Iraqi authorities said they believed that the fighters, a diverse cadre of Sunni, Shiite, Afghan and other foreign gunmen, convened under cover of the pilgrims to set up a camp within striking distance of the Shiite religious leadership when attention was away from Najaf.

The fighters, who called themselves the Soldiers of the Sky, are driven by an apocalyptic vision of clearing the Earth of the depraved in preparation for the second coming of Muhammad al-Mahdi, a Shiite imam who disappeared in the 9th century, according to Ahmed Duaibel, a spokesman for the provincial government in Najaf. The governor of Najaf province, Assad Abu Gilel, said the group planned to attack pilgrims and shrines and to assassinate Shiite clerics at the peak of the religious holiday, called Ashura, which culminates Tuesday.

"Imam Mahdi is among you," a voice on a loudspeaker could be heard saying by a Washington Post special correspondent who spent the day at a checkpoint near the orchards. "Fight until martyrdom."

"Today's attack was designed to destroy all of Najaf, even the holy shrine of Imam Ali," said Duaibel, referring to one of the most revered Shiite shrines, near the offices of Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani. If successful, such a provocative attack could surpass in significance the bombing at the Askariya shrine in Samarra last February that drastically escalated sectarian killing in Iraq.

The fighting began overnight when a police checkpoint near Najaf came under fire, leading the Iraqi police to the farms in the Zargaa area where the fighters had dug trenches and stockpiled weapons, said Lt. Rahim al-Fetlawi, a police officer in Najaf. The officers who responded found themselves outgunned by the estimated 350 to 400 insurgents entrenched there, said Col. Majid Rashid of the Iraqi army in Najaf.

Reinforcements from the Iraqi army's 8th Division arrived along with U.S. helicopters and ground troops. Iraqi security forces maintain primary control of Najaf province, and U.S. forces do not have an established, full-time presence there. U.S. military units based in Baghdad responded to Najaf when the fighting escalated.

"They saw that they needed some help and called in air support," a U.S. military official said on condition of anonymity. "That's exactly what they're supposed to do."

During the operation, a U.S. military helicopter based in Baghdad crashed about 1:30 p.m., killing two soldiers, the military said. The military did not say whether the helicopter was shot down.

A Washington Post special correspondent at the scene saw the helicopter trailing smoke and circling before coming down in a field of sandy dirt. Maj. Beshari al-Ghazali of the Iraqi army said that the helicopter was shot down and that another U.S. helicopter took fire but did not crash. Iraqi officials said the insurgents were using shoulder-fired rockets, antiaircraft guns and Katyusha rockets.

"The people we were fighting were highly capable, well trained and very good at street fighting," said Capt. Muthanna Ahmed, a spokesman for the police in neighboring Babil province.

The prospect of insurgents lying in wait to attack Shiites illustrated the crisis between rival religious groups in Iraq, where extremists remain intent on undermining the religious and political order. The attack was the first large-scale battle since Iraqi forces assumed security control of the province last month and one of the deadliest Iraqi-led operations of the war. In August 2004, the U.S. military waged a three-week battle in Najaf against Shiite militiamen loyal to cleric Moqtada al-Sadr.

Iraqi officials said the insurgent leader on Sunday was Ahmed Hassan al-Yamani, a Shiite from Diwaniyah province in southern Iraq.

"This is an impostor Shiite," said Sheik Ali al-Najafi, the son of Bashir al-Najafi, one of the four leading Shiite religious figures in Najaf. "He is aiming at dismembering the Shiites in Iraq" and assassinating Shiite religious leaders, he said, "but God has failed him."

"These are very critical days now, because of the ceremonies of Ashura, and of course there are expectations that terrorist groups and criminals will launch attacks against the pilgrims who are trying to reach the city of Karbala," said Haithem Hasani, a media adviser for Abdul Aziz al-Hakim, the head of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a Shiite political faction.

An Iraqi police official said he believed that some of the seasoned fighters in the date palm grove came from Fallujah and Ramadi, embattled towns in the western province of Anbar that are strongholds of the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0123077

U.S. military officials said the operation was ongoing in Najaf, and the clatter of gunfire and drone of aircraft were heard Sunday night.

The violence continued Sunday elsewhere in Iraq. In Baghdad, mortar shells crashed down on a girls' high school, killing at least five students and wounding 13 other people, including two female teachers, according to Brig. Gen. Saad Sultan of the Interior Ministry.

Gunmen attacked a police station in the al-Wahada district of Mosul, and five of the attackers were killed in the ensuing fighting, according to Maj. Gen. Wathiq al-Hamdani, police chief of Nineveh province.

The U.S. military announced the deaths of three U.S. service members Saturday, a Marine in Anbar province and two soldiers in the Baghdad area.

Also Sunday, the Associated Press reported that two car bombs exploded in the northern city of Kirkuk, killing 11 people and wounding 34, according to a police official.

The AP also reported that the mayor of Baqubah and 1,500 police officers in Diyala province had been fired in an effort to end violence in that region northeast of Baghdad, according to the provincial police.

In the ongoing war crimes trial for the destruction of Kurdish villages in northern Iraq, deposed president Saddam Hussein's cousin said in court Sunday that he had given orders to destroy the villages in the 1980s, the AP reported.

Ali Hassan al-Majeed, known as "Chemical Ali" because he is accused of using chemical weapons during the Anfal campaign, a systematic killing of Kurds, said, "I am the one who gave orders to the army to demolish villages," the AP reported. Ali is one of six defendants facing war crimes charges.

250 Militants Slain In Fight Near Najaf (AP)

By Robert H. Reid, Associated Press

AP, January 29, 2007

BAGHDAD -- U.S.-backed Iraqi troops yesterday attacked insurgents reportedly plotting to kill pilgrims at a major Shi'ite Muslim religious festival, and Iraqi officials estimated that about 250 militants died in the daylong battle near Najaf. A U.S. helicopter crashed during the fight, killing two American soldiers.

Authorities said Iraqi soldiers supported by U.S. aircraft fought all day with a large group of insurgents in the Zarqa area, about 12 miles northeast of Najaf, home to major Shi'ite shrines.

Col. Ali Nomas, spokesman for Iraqi security forces in Najaf, said more than 250 corpses had been found. Iraqi army Maj. Gen. Othman al-Ghanemi also spoke of 250 dead but said an exact number would not be released until today. He said 10 gunmen had been captured, including one Sudanese.

In other violence yesterday, mortar shells hit the courtyard of a girls school in a mostly Sunni Arab neighborhood of Baghdad, killing five students and wounding 20. Two car bombs exploded within a half-hour in the northern city of Kirkuk, killing 11 persons and wounding 34.

In addition to confirming the two American deaths in the helicopter crash, the U.S. command announced three combat deaths from Saturday -- one Marine in Anbar province and two soldiers in the Baghdad area.

Provincial Gov. Assad Sultan Abu Kilel said the assault in Najaf was staged because the insurgents planned to attack Shi'ite pilgrims and clerics during ceremonies marking Ashoura, the holiest day in the Shi'ite calendar. The celebration culminates tomorrow in huge public processions in Karbala and other Shi'ite cities.

Officials were not clear about the religious affiliation of the militants. Although Sunni Arabs have been the main force behind insurgent groups, several Shi'ite militant and splinter groups have clashed from time to time with the government.

The governor said Iraqi soldiers attacked at dawn and militants hiding in orchards fought back with automatic weapons, sniper rifles and rockets. He said the insurgents were members of a previously unknown group called the Army of Heaven.

"They are well-equipped, and they even have anti-aircraft missiles," the governor said. "They are backed by some locals" loyal to Saddam Hussein, the ousted dictator who was executed last month.

Mr. Abu Kilel said two Iraqi policemen were killed and 15 were wounded, but there was no word on other Iraqi government casualties.

A U.S. statement said the American helicopter went down while "conducting operations to assist Iraqi Security Forces" in the attack. It said that two crew members died and that their bodies were recovered. The statement did not say why the aircraft crashed.

It was the second U.S. military helicopter to go down in eight days. Twelve U.S. soldiers died Jan. 20 when a Black Hawk crashed northeast of Baghdad. The Army says it is investigating the cause, but a Pentagon official has said debris indicated the helicopter was downed by a missile.

DOJ_NMG_0123078

The mortar attack in Baghdad occurred about 11 a.m. at the Kholoud Secondary School in the Adil neighborhood, police and school officials said. The principal, Fawzyaa Hatrosh Sawadi, said students were mingling in the courtyard during a break in exams when at least two shells exploded.

The blasts shattered windows in classrooms, spraying students with shards of glass. Associated Press Television News footage showed pools of blood on the stone steps and walkways. A fin from a mortar shell lay on the ground.

Hours after the attack, grieving parents wept as the bodies of their children were placed in wooden coffins. Police said four of the girls were killed instantly and a fifth died later.

In a joint statement, UNICEF and UNESCO called the attack "yet another tragic reminder of the risks facing Iraq's schoolchildren."

No group took responsibility for the attack, but a Sunni organization, the General Conference of the People of Iraq, blamed Shi'ite Muslim militias with ties to government security forces. The Sunni group said the mortar shells bore markings indicating they were manufactured in Iran, which U.S. officials accuse of supporting Shi'ite militias.

U.S. Helicopter Crashes In Iraq; 2 Crewmembers Killed (USAT)

By Jim Michaels And Zaid Sabah,

USA Today, January 29, 2007

BAGHDAD — Two U.S. soldiers were killed Sunday when their helicopter crashed during heavy fighting near the Shiite holy city of Najaf, the U.S. military said.

The helicopter was supporting Iraqi and U.S. forces in an intense battle against insurgents who Iraqi officials said had been plotting to disrupt Ashoura, a holiday of particular importance to Shiites.

Iraqi forces killed 250 insurgents during the battle, said Col. Ali Jrew, a spokesman for Iraqi security forces in Najaf. He said three Iraqi soldiers also died in the fighting.

A U.S. military statement did not say what caused the helicopter to crash, only that the crash is under investigation. It said the two soldiers' bodies had been recovered.

It was the third American helicopter to crash in eight days.

On Jan. 20, 12 U.S. soldiers were killed in a Black Hawk crash northeast of Baghdad. Four days later, a helicopter belonging to Blackwater USA, a private security company, crashed in Baghdad. Five contractors were killed.

Sunday, U.S. and Iraqi forces mounted extra patrols around the country to guard against an attack on Ashoura pilgrims, which could intensify religious warfare.

Ashoura commemorates the 7th-century death of Imam Hussein, grandson of the prophet Mohammed and one of the most revered figures in Shiite Islam. In the days leading up to the Ashoura holiday on Tuesday, thousands of Shiite pilgrims have poured into the streets, some of them beating themselves with whips to symbolize grief over Hussein's death.

Najaf Gov. Asaad Abu Gilel said hundreds of militants gathered just north of Najaf to plot an attack on pilgrims and on Najaf's shrine to Imam Ali, who was Mohammed's son-in-law and Hussein's father. Jrew told al-Jazeera television that the militants had infiltrated the area disguised as pilgrims.

At 7 a.m., Iraqi forces backed by American aircraft launched an attack against the militants, Gilel said. There were no reports of any other U.S. casualties.

A witness said American ground forces had also joined the battle. "I saw an American convoy this morning heading to Najaf," said Khalid al-Shibli, 28, a hotel owner in Najaf. The convoy consisted of Humvees and armored vehicles, he said. The U.S. military declined to release details about the battle. Maj. Steven Lamb said the operation was ongoing and would not comment further.

In other developments Sunday in Iraq:

· Mortar shells hit the courtyard of a girls' school in a mostly Sunni Arab neighborhood of Baghdad, killing five pupils and wounding 20.

The attack occurred at the Kholoud Secondary School in the Adil neighborhood, police and school officials said. The principal, Fawzyaa Hatrosh Sawadi, said students were mingling in the courtyard during a break in exams when at least two shells exploded.

· Two car bombs — one at a car dealer, the other at a restaurant — exploded within a half hour in the northern city of Kirkuk, killing 11 people and wounding 34, police Brig. Gen. Sarhad Qader said. Three ethnic groups — Arabs, Kurds and Turkmen — are in a bitter struggle for control of that oil-rich area.

· Three bombings struck Shiite districts in Baghdad, killing at least seven people and wounding 61, police said. The worst incident was a car bomb that killed at least four and wounded 39 at an outdoor market in Sadr City, a sprawling slum that is a stronghold of the Mahdi Army militia of radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

DOJ_NMG_0123079

· Police in Baghdad said they found 39 bullet-riddled bodies throughout the city, apparent victims of sectarian death squads. Ten more bodies were recovered floating down the Tigris River 25 miles south of the capital.

·Drive-by shooters killed a high-ranking Shiite official at the Industry and Mines Ministry along with his 27-year-old daughter and two other people, police said.

·Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Barham Saleh said Iran and the United States were using Iraq as a "zone of conflict and competition" and jeopardizing efforts to stabilize the country.

·The U.S. command announced the arrest of 21 suspected terrorists, including an al-Qaeda courier, in a series of raids in Baghdad and Sunni areas north and west of the capital. Three are believed to have close ties to the leadership of al-Qaeda in Iraq, the military said.

·The U.S. command announced three combat deaths from Saturday — one Marine in the Anbar province and two Army soldiers in the Baghdad area.

Contributing: Hassan Jarrah in Najaf; Oren Dorell in Baghdad, wire reports.

Shell Hits Baghdad Girls' School, Killing 5 Students (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 28 — The girls had just finished taking an exam and were gathering in an inner courtyard at a school in a mainly Sunni section of western Baghdad on Sunday when a mortar shell crashed down.

The explosion killed at least five girls, ages 12 to 16, and wounded at least 20, witnesses and Iraqi officials said, tearing limb from limb, shattering glass, shredding the students' blue and white uniforms and leaving the survivors bloodied and confused.

"She hugged and kissed me, then went outside and the bomb hit," a teacher at the scene said, referring to one of the girls. "After a few minutes, she was dead."

"We just don't know what to do with the other girls," added the teacher, who did not want to be identified, fearing for her safety. "They're young; they've never seen this."

In a city seemingly numb to bloodshed, attacks on schools can still shock.

The mortar attack — on a day when a battle raged between Iraqi security forces and Sunni militants in Najaf, and the United States military announced the deaths of a marine and a soldier — seemed to confirm that the violence here knows no boundaries. The attack, in the Adel neighborhood, was the latest in a series of assaults on schools and those who educate the young.

Two months ago, a teacher in a Sunni area of western Baghdad was raped, mutilated and strung up by her feet outside the school building, where her body hung for days, American military officers in the area said.

And in the past month, according to Interior Ministry officials, primary and secondary schools in and around Baghdad have been attacked at least six times. In some cases, gunmen opened fire on schools during classes and guards fought them off. In other cases, mortar shells struck. At Al Gharbiya, for example, a secondary school in central Baghdad, 10 people were killed in a recent attack.

Principals and teachers have also been kidnapped and killed, repeating a pattern of terrorism that started with university professors and seems to have trickled down through the school system. In the past month, at least five school workers have been attacked or kidnapped.

A spokesman for the Ministry of Education, Bashar al-Khafaji, said this month that more guards would be added to primary and secondary schools in Baghdad, a seeming acknowledgment that they were becoming a battleground. He declined to give reporters permission to visit the city's schools.

For many Iraqi families, the risk of sending their children to school has already become too great, and promises of government protection may come too late. In many Sunni areas, parents and teachers say, schools are emptying out as students go to class only a few days a week if at all.

Isra Qasim, 35, said she fled Baghdad's Mansour neighborhood, a former Sunni middle-class enclave that now resembles a bombed-out wasteland, because she feared what might happen to her 6-year-old son at school. She left for Amman, Jordan, a few months ago, in time to register him for classes there.

"I came here for him," she said two weeks ago, when she was interviewed in Jordan. "He said he wanted to learn."

Some schools have lost more than a third of their students as families leave the country. Others, like Al Gharbiya, remain closed because of the violence.

The girls school hit on Sunday, Al Khuroud, is near an office of Adnan Dulaimi, a senior Sunni member of Parliament. Several of his family members live close by.

DOJ_NMG_0123080

It was unclear if the mortar shell was intended for the school. Residents of the neighborhood said that mortars had been raining down for days, possibly as retaliation for the heavy bombings concentrated in Shiite areas, which are thought to be the work of Sunni militants. Those attacks have killed at least 300 people throughout the city in recent weeks.

Whether intended or not, the result of the attack on the school was hard to fathom, even in a neighborhood used to violence. Hours after the shell fell, windows were left shattered in the three concrete school buildings, and the schoolyard was covered with blood. Not long before, about 100 girls had been standing there, chattering and laughing.

Teachers and residents said they were not sure when or if they would return.

'Man Down': When One Bullet Alters Everything (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 28 — Staff Sgt. Hector Leija scanned the kitchen, searching for illegal weapons. One wall away, in an apartment next door, a scared Shiite family huddled around a space heater, cradling an infant.

It was after 9 a.m. on Wednesday, on Haifa Street in central Baghdad, and the crack-crack of machine-gun fire had been rattling since dawn. More than a thousand American and Iraqi troops had come to this warren of high rises and hovels to disrupt the growing nest of Sunni and Shiite fighters battling for control of the area.

The joint military effort has been billed as the first step toward an Iraqi takeover of security. But this morning, in the two dark, third-floor apartments on Haifa Street, that promise seemed distant. What was close, and painfully real, was the cost of an escalating street fight that had trapped American soldiers and Iraqi bystanders between warring sects.

And as with so many days here, a bullet changed everything.

It started at 9:15 a.m.

"Help!" came the shout. "Man down."

"Sergeant Leija got hit in the head," yelled Specialist Evan Woollis, 25, his voice carrying into the apartment with the Iraqi family. The soldiers from the sergeant's platoon, part of the Third Stryker Brigade Combat Team, rushed from one apartment to the other.

In the narrow kitchen, a single bullet hole could be seen in a tinted glass window facing north.

The platoon's leader, Sgt. First Class Marc Biletski, ordered his men to get down, away from every window, and to pull Sergeant Leija out of the kitchen and into the living room.

"O.K., everybody, let's relax," Sergeant Biletski said. But he was shaking from his shoulder to his hand.

Relaxing was just not possible. Fifteen feet of floor and a three-inch-high metal doorjamb stood between where Sergeant Leija fell and the living room, out of the line of fire. Gunshots popped in bursts, their source obscured by echoes off the concrete buildings.

"Don't freak out on me, Doc," Sergeant Biletski shouted to the platoon medic, Pfc. Aaron Barnum, who was frantically yanking at Sergeant Leija's flak jacket to take the weight off his chest. "Don't freak out."

Two minutes later, three soldiers rushed to help, dragging the sergeant from the kitchen. A medevac team then rushed in and carried him to a Stryker armored vehicle outside, around 9:20. He moaned as they carried him down the stairs on a stretcher.

The men of the platoon remained in the living room, frozen in shock. They had a problem. Sergeant Leija's helmet, flak jacket, gear and weapon, along with that of at least one other soldier, were still in the exposed area of the kitchen. They needed to be recovered. But how?

"We don't know if there's friendlies in that building," said Sgt. Richard Coleman, referring to the concrete complex a few feet away from where Sergeant Leija had been shot. Sergeant Biletski, 39, decided to wait. He called for another unit to search and clear the building next door.

The additional unit needed time, and got lost. The men sat still. Sergeant B, as his soldiers called him, was near the wall farthest from the kitchen, out of sight from the room's wide, shaded window. Sergeant Woollis, Private Barnum, Sergeant Coleman and Specialist Terry Wilson sat around him.

Together, alone, trapped in a dark room with the blood of their comrade on the floor, they tried to piece together what had happened. Maybe the sniper saw Sergeant Leija's silhouette in the window and fired. Or maybe the shot was accidental, they said, fired from below by Iraqi Army soldiers who had been moving between the buildings.

Sergeant Woollis cited the available evidence — an entrance wound just below the helmet with an exit wound above. He said the shot must have been fired from the ground.

DOJ_NMG_0123081

The Iraqis were not supposed to even be there yet. The plan had been for Sergeant Leija's squad to work alongside an Iraqi Army unit all day. But after arriving late at the first building, the Iraqis jumped ahead, leaving the Americans and pushing north without searching dozens of apartments in the area.

The Iraqi soldiers below the kitchen window had once again skipped forward. An American officer later said the Iraqis were brave to push ahead toward the most intense gunfire.

But Sergeant Leija's squad had no communication links with their Iraqi counterparts, and because it was an Iraqi operation — as senior officers repeatedly emphasized — the Americans could not order the Iraqis to get back in line. There was nothing they could do.

9:40 a.m.

An Iraqi soldier rushed in and then stopped, seemingly surprised by the Americans sitting around him. He stood in the middle of the darkened living room, inches away from bloody bandages on the carpet.

"Get away from the window!"

The soldiers yelled at their interpreter, a masked Iraqi whom they called Santana. Between their shouts and his urgent Arabic, the Iraqi soldier got the message. He slowly walked away.

A few minutes later it happened again. This time, the Iraqi lingered.

"What part of 'sniper' don't you understand?" Sergeant Biletski yelled. The other soldiers cursed and called the Iraqis idiots. They were still not sure whether an Iraqi soldier was responsible for Sergeant Leija's wound, but they said the last thing they wanted was another casualty. In a moment of emotion, Private Barnum said, "I won't treat him if he's hit."

When the second Iraqi left, an airless silence returned. The dark left people alone to grieve. "You O.K.? " Sergeant B asked each soldier. A few nods. A few yeses.

Private Barnum stood up, facing the kitchen, eager to bring back the gear left. One foot back, the other forward, he stood like a sprinter. "I can get that stuff, Sergeant," he said. "I can get it."

The building next door had still not been cleared by Americans. The answer was no.

"I can't lose another man," Sergeant B said. "If I did, I failed. I already failed once. I'm not going to fail again."

The room went quiet. Faces turned away. "You didn't fail, sir," said one of the men, his voice disguised by the sound of fighting back tears. "You didn't fail."

9:55 a.m.

The piercing cry of an infant was easily identifiable, even as the gunfire outside intensified. It came from the apartment next door. The Iraqi Army had been there, too. In an interview before Sergeant Leija was shot, the three young Iraqis there said that their father had been taken by the soldiers.

"Someone from over there" — they pointed back away from Haifa Street, toward the rows of mud-brick slums — "told them we had weapons," said a young man, who seemed to be about 18.

He was sitting on a couch. To his right, his older sister clutched an infant in a blanket; his younger sister, about 16, sat on the other side.

The young man said the family was Shiite. He said the supposed informants were Sunni Arabs who wanted their apartment.

The truth of his claim was impossible to verify, but it was far from the day's only confounding tip. Earlier that morning, an Iraqi boy of about 8 ran up to Sergeant Leija. He wanted to tell the Americans about terrorists hiding in the slums behind the apartment buildings on Haifa Street's eastern side.

Sergeant Leija, an easygoing 27-year-old from Raymondville, Tex., ignored him. He and some of his soldiers said it was impossible to know whether the boy had legitimate information or would lead them to an ambush.

That summed up intelligence in Iraq, they said: there is always the threat of being set up, for an attack or an Iraqi's own agenda.

The Iraqi Army did not seem worried about such concerns, according to the family. The three young Iraqis said they were glad that the Americans had come. Maybe they could help find their father.

10:50 a.m.

Sergeant. Coleman tried using a mop to get the gear, and failed. It was too far away. With more than an hour elapsed since the attack, and after no signs of another shot through the kitchen window, Sergeant B agreed to let Private Barnum make a mad dash for the equipment.

Private Barnum waited for several minutes in the doorway, peeking around the corner, stalling. Then he dove forward, pushing himself up against the wall near the window to cut down the angle, pausing, then darting back to the camouflaged kit.

DOJ_NMG_0123082

Crack — a single gunshot. Private Barnum looked back at the kitchen window, his eyes squeezed with fear. His pace quickened. He cleared the weapons' chambers and tossed them to the living room. Then he threw the flak jackets and bolt cutters.

He picked up Sergeant Leija's helmet, cradled it in his arms, then made the final dangerous move back to the living room, his fatigues indelibly stained with his friend's blood. There were no cheers to greet him. It was a brave act borne of horror, and the men seemed eager to go.

As Private Barnum gingerly wrapped the helmet in a towel, it tipped and blood spilled out.

11:15 a.m.

Sergeant B sat down on a chair outside the two apartments and used the radio to find out if they would be heading back to base or moving forward. He was told to stay put until after an airstrike on a building 500 yards away.

The platoon, looking for cover, returned to the Iraqis' apartment, where they found the family as they were before — on the couch, in the dark, around the heater.

Specialist Wilson continued the conversation he started before the gunshot two hours earlier. The young Iraqi man said again that the Iraqi Army had taken his father. "Will you come back to help?" he asked.

"We didn't take him," Specialist Wilson said. "The I.A. took him. If he didn't do anything wrong, he should be back."

The Iraqi family nodded, as if they had heard this before.

Speaking together — none of them gave their names — they said they had lived in the apartment for 16 years. Ten days ago, before the Americans arrived, Sunnis told them they would kill every Shiite in the building if they did not leave immediately. So they fled to a neighborhood in southern Baghdad where some Shiites had started to gather in abandoned homes. But again, a threat came: leave or die. So less than a week ago, the family returned to Haifa Street.

And now the airstrike was coming.

Sergeant B told the family that they should go into a back room for safety. He asked if they wanted to take the heater with them (they did not), and he reminded everyone to keep their mouths open to protect their inner ears against the airstrike's shockwave.

A boom, then another even louder explosion hit, shaking dust from the walls. One of blasts came from a mortar shell that hit the building, the soldier said. The family stayed, but for the Americans, it was time to go.

12:30 p.m.

Over the next few hours, the platoon combined sprints across open alleyways with bouts of rest in empty makeshift homes. Under what sounded like constant gunfire, the soldiers moved behind the Iraqi soldiers, staying close.

At one point, the Iraqis detained a man who they said had videos of himself shooting American soldiers. The Iraqi soldiers slapped him in the head as they walked him past.

About an hour later, a sniper wounded two Iraqi soldiers who were mingling outside a squat apartment like teenagers at a 7-11. Private Barnum wrapped their wounds with American bandages. He and the rest of the platoon had been inside, taking cover.

"Stay away from the windows," Sergeant B kept repeating. The point was clear: don't let it happen again. Don't fail.

4 p.m.

Downstairs in the lobby of a mostly abandoned high rise on Haifa Street, the sergeant and his men sat on the floor, exhausted. They were waiting for their Stryker to return so they could head back to base. In 14 hours, they had moved through a stretch of eight buildings on Haifa Street. They had been scheduled to clear 18.

Upstairs, Iraqi soldiers searched rooms and made themselves at home in empty apartments. Many were spacious, even luxurious, with elevators opening into wide hallways and grand living rooms splashed with afternoon sun.

Under Saddam Hussein, Haifa Street had been favored by Baath Party officials and wealthy foreigners. The current residents seemed to have fled in an instant; in one apartment, a full container of shaving cream was left in the bathroom. In that apartment's living room, a band of Iraqi soldiers settled in, relaxing on blue upholstered couches and listening to a soccer game on a radio they found in a closet.

They looked comfortable, like they were waiting to be called to dinner.

Sergeant B and Specialist Woollis, meanwhile, talked about what they would eat when they got back to their homes in California. The consensus was chili dogs and burgers.

Sergeant B also said he missed his 13-year-old son, who was growing up without him, playing football, learning to become a man with an absentee father. After 17 years in the Army, he said, he was thinking that maybe his family had put up with enough.

"I don't see how you can do this," he said, "and not be damaged."

A few hours later, the word came in: Sergeant Leija had died.

DOJ_NMG_0123083

Iraq Sliding Into Civil War, Report Warns (FT)

By Guy Dinmore In Washington

Financial Times, January 29, 2007

Iraq is rapidly sliding into an all-out civil war that is likely to spill over into neighbouring countries, resulting in mass deaths and refugee flows, serious disruption of Gulf oil supplies and a drastic decline in US influence in the region.

This grim forecast is set out in Things Fall Apart, a 130-page report released today by the Brookings Institution's Saban Center for Middle East Policy, which also recommends how the US might contain the disastrous consequences of "spillover".

The Washington think-tank distils what it says are the lessons learned from other civil wars, laying out the case histories of Afghanistan, Congo, Lebanon, Somalia and Yugoslavia.

Kenneth Pollack, a former Clinton administration official and CIA analyst who co-authored the report with Daniel Byman, told the Financial Times they were looking for a "Goldilocks solution" - somewhere between "stay the course" and "getting all out".

"It was arrogance in the face of history that led us to blithely assume we could invade without preparing for an occupation, and we would do well to show greater humility when assimilating its lessons about what we fear will be the next step in Iraq's tragic history," the report says.

Brookings identifies six patterns from other civil wars that are already manifesting themselves in Iraq: large refugee flows, the breeding ground of new terrorist groups, radicalisation of neighbouring populations, the spread of secessionism, regional economic losses, and intervention by neighbours. Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Kuwait and Turkey are said to be "scrambling to catch up" with rival Iran.

Among the report's recommendations are "don't try to pick winners", as proxies often fail or turn against their masters; avoid active support for partition; "don't dump the problem on the United Nations"; pull back from Iraqi population centres despite the horrific consequences; bolster regional stability by revitalising the Israeli-Palestinian peace process; set up an international contact group including Syria and Iran; and consider setting up "safe havens" for refugees along Iraq's borders.

Brookings estimates that 50,000 to 150,000 Iraqis have died already since the US invasion in 2003 and cites United Nations figures of 1m Iraqis who have subsequently fled their country.

Mr Pollack, who previously was an outspoken proponent of the invasion, says the lessons of past full-blown civil wars reveal nearly all efforts by states to minimise or contain spillover have failed.

The report will be read with deep concern by the US administration, which is projecting an increasingly discordant picture of how it evaluates Iraq, even while speaking of the serious consequences of failure. President George W. Bush calls it the "nightmare scenario".

Analysts outside Brookings say officials are working on "what next?" strategies in the event that the 21,500 troop reinforcements announced this month fail to halt the sectarian chaos.

Mr Bush has conceded that the US is not winning the war. In contrast, Dick Cheney, his vice-president, asserted last week that the US had achieved "enormous successes" in Iraq. Both reject assertions that Iraq is in a state of civil war.

Mr Cheney told Newsweek that by sending a second aircraft carrier group to the Gulf, the US demonstrated to its allies it would stay in the region and had the capabilities, working with international organisations, "to deal with the Iranian threat".

But Mr Pollack is concerned that the US is stoking a wider conflict and is "careening" into provoking a war with Iran. Even in his "best-case scenario" for Iraq, Mr Pollack fears hundreds of thousands of deaths.

US, Britain Diverge On Troops In Iraq (CSM)

By Mark Rice-oxley

The Christian Science Monitor, January 29, 2007

For more than four years, they have marched in step through the most desperate and perilous episode of their respective leaderships.

When President Bush mustered his Iraq coalition in 2002-03, Prime Minister Tony Blair was his most vocal ally and recruiting officer. On the most contentious issues of the war – Abu Ghraib, Fallujah, political and military strategy – they have managed to maintain unity. Reinforced by an apparently genuine friendship, the Bush-Blair axis has been the unshakable fulcrum on which the Iraq campaign has hinged.

But now, there is a hint of dissonance in the air. Blair's government is desperate to start drawing down the 7,000-strong British force based in Basra at the same time that Bush is beefing up the US contingent in Iraq by more than 21,000. Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, who was confirmed by the Senate on Friday to head the US forces in Iraq, has said he wants the additional troops in Iraq quickly.

DOJ_NMG_0123084

The twang of discord was apparent last week when the US ambassador to Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, hinted at American exasperation over the British eagerness to start withdrawing. "It's clear what our preference would be – the longer we stay together here, the better," he told the BBC.

Members of Parliament said that the impression given was that the allies were no longer in step with each other. "Wouldn't it be better to have a robust exchange of views with the US administration and then implement an agreed strategy?" asked William Hague, the shadow foreign secretary.

Professor George Joffe, a Middle East expert at the Centre for International Studies at the University of Cambridge, says Mr. Khalilzad's words bespeak a rift.

"You can't pretend there is no rift over strategy," he says. "The British are determined to get out of Iraq come what may, whether they have a secure situation in Basra or not. The British forces in Basra, separated between the palace and the airport, are vulnerable to any attempt by a militant group to pick them off.

"And they face a real threat should the Americans move strongly against the Sadrists in Baghdad," Professor Joffe adds. "I can understand the American concerns, and I understand the British anxiety to get out, so there is dissonance."

Some analysts say that Blair has been caught off guard by the sudden change of direction in Washington. When the Iraq Study Group produced its report, advocating a US troop withdrawal by 2008 and a dialogue with Iran and Syria, Blair welcomed it. When Bush rejected the findings and announced his plans for a troop "surge," Blair merely responded that that "made sense."

Lord Tim Garden, a defense spokesman for the opposition Liberal Democrats, said that Blair was wrong-footed by Bush's decision to increase troops. "The British government assumed that [the ISG report] was the new strategy that was to be adopted," he says. "It left them looking flat-footed by the time Bush decided to go in another direction."

Officially, the government says there is no rift, and no timetable for withdrawal, even though they are confident they will be able to hand over Basra Province to the Iraqis in the spring. But privately, ministers are keen to pull at least some troops out for a number of reasons, experts say.

First, troops from an overstretched Army are needed for the fight against the Taliban in southern Afghanistan, where British soldiers have been dying at a rate outstripping the casualty toll in Iraq.

"The British political leadership are desperately keen to reduce the number of British forces in Iraq," says Sir Hilary Synnott, formerly the coalition coordinator for southern Iraq. "There is a greater realization that the burdens on Britain in southern Afghanistan are severely stretching the British Army and, therefore, there is a particular wish to draw down [troops in Iraq]."

Second, polls suggest public opinion strongly favors a pullout. Ever since a top general, Sir Richard Dannatt, suggested last September that the British presence was only aggravating Iraqi sensibilities, the clamor for withdrawal has grown. For the first time, an opposition party – the Liberal Democrats – has outlined a specific timetable for withdrawal of all troops, by October.

"We must go for it because we are now clearly attached to a strategy that the British government and half the US political class do not believe in," says Lord Garden.

A third reason is that Blair's time in office is limited – he intends to stand down in the summer. Joffe says both he and his likely successor, Gordon Brown, are keen to tie up loose ends in Iraq: Blair does not want to leave unfinished business, and Brown does not want to inherit a mess.

Officials argue that it would not be incongruous to have British troops leaving while thousands of American reinforcements arrive. After all, they say, different parts of Iraq need different approaches: Baghdad and Anbar Province need the beefed-up presence. In the south, the British have already ceded control of two provinces to the Iraqis.

Not everyone accepts that rationale. "That argument is becoming difficult to sustain, particularly as everyone is worried that the more robust US rules of engagement in taking on the Shia in Baghdad will have a knock-on effect on the Shia in the south," says Lord Garden. "That could make it more difficult for the British."

Australian PM Urges Against Iraq Pullout (AP)

By Rod Mcguirk,

AP, January 29, 2007

Prime Minister John Howard said withdrawing Australian troops from Iraq would damage Australia's alliance with the United States.

Howard said he agreed to send 2,000 troops to back the U.S.-led Iraq invasion because of the perceived threat of weapons of mass destruction, but also to preserve a security alliance with the U.S. that was formalized in a 1951 treaty. No weapons of mass destruction were found in Iraq.

"I have to now deal with a decision: do we rat on the Americans ... do we say to the Americans, it's got all too hard and too difficult? If anybody thinks that that wouldn't do damage to the alliance, they're kidding themselves," Howard told Southern Cross Broadcasting radio.

DOJ_NMG_0123085

Australia has about 1,300 personnel in the Middle East, including 800 based in Iraq, mostly guarding Australian officials in Baghdad, helping train Iraqi forces and providing backup security in two relatively peaceful southern provinces.

The opposition Labor Party, which opposed the Iraq war, has vowed to withdraw most Australian troops if it wins elections this year.

Howard said democracy has a "reasonable prospect" of taking root in Iraq and the U.S.-led coalition partners should remain in Iraq until then.

"Until we are reasonably satisfied that the Iraqis can look after themselves and deal with the security situation over the years ahead, I think the coalition should stay," Howard said.

Pelosi, Karzai Discuss Troop Increases (AP)

By Jason Straziuso

AP, January 29, 2007

The Afghan president told House Speaker Nancy Pelosi that his security forces need to be stronger as the two discussed possible U.S. troop increases on Sunday, days after the Pentagon extended the tour of 3,200 soldiers, an Afghan official said.

President Hamid Karzai stressed his desire for increased training and equipment for Afghanistan's fledgling army and police forces, the Afghan official said on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to release the information publicly.

Pelosi, D-Calif., and Karzai discussed plans announced last week by the Bush administration to ask Congress for $10.6 billion for Afghanistan, a major increase aimed at rebuilding the country and strengthening government security forces still fighting the Taliban five years after the U.S.-led invasion.

About $8.6 billion would be for training and equipping Afghan police and soldiers; $2 billion would go toward reconstruction.

Pelosi, D-Calif., led a delegation of six other congressional Democrats to Afghanistan to meet with military and government leaders after traveling to Iraq and Pakistan.

The trip comes two weeks after Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., visited the region. Clinton, who entered the 2008 presidential race a week ago, said this month that U.S. leaders should be talking about increasing troop numbers in Afghanistan instead of Iraq.

The attention being paid to Afghanistan by Democrats is a way for them to highlight their seriousness about the fight against international terrorism and say that the Bush administration "led us in the wrong direction" in Iraq, said Marvin Weinbaum, a former State Department analyst on Afghanistan, now scholar at the Middle East Institute.

"It makes a lot of sense, then, to highlight Afghanistan as where the real source of terrorism began and where it still has to be dealt with so that the Democrats come out of this not looking like they're weak-kneed when it comes to battling terrorism," Weinbaum said.

The Pentagon last week said a brigade of U.S. soldiers would stay in Afghanistan four months longer than planned — an effective troop increase of 3,200 soldiers. That announcement came only days after a visit here by Secretary of Defense Robert Gates.

Pelosi, meanwhile, has led a drive in Congress against President Bush's plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq as part of a new security crackdown in Baghdad.

Pelosi told Karzai that Afghanistan has bipartisan support in Congress, the Afghan official said. Members of the delegation also told Karzai they hope to see more coordination and cooperation between Pakistan and Afghanistan.

Earlier on Sunday, the delegation spent about an hour at the main U.S. base in Bagram, where she thanked soldiers from the 10th Mountain and 82nd Airborne divisions for their service, said Lt. Col. David Accetta, a U.S. military spokesman. She also met with Maj. Gen. Benjamin Freakley, the top U.S. general here.

The seven-member delegation also met with U.S. Ambassador Ronald Neumann and Gen. David Richards, the outgoing commander of NATO forces in Afghanistan.

The delegation did not talk to reporters.

The members of Congress stopped in Pakistan on Saturday, where Pelosi met with President Gen. Pervez Musharraf to discuss the situation in Afghanistan and cooperation in countering terrorism.

Pelosi's delegation earlier visited Iraq, where she met with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

The delegation also included Rep. Ike Skelton of Missouri, the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee; Rep. Tom Lantos of California, chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee; and Rep. John Murtha of Pennsylvania, a strong advocate of a phased pullout of U.S. troops from Iraq.

Life Of The Parties (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0123086

By Ann Marlowe

The Wall Street Journal, January 29, 2007

In Afghanistan, many of the problems coming home to roost now are the result of too little American intervention rather than too much. That does not mean too little American aid. In any case, private enterprise is doing very well, thank you: Afghans are a practical people with good capitalist instincts. They can pull themselves out of poverty given the right laws and the rule of law -- as well as the institutions that go to make up a functional civil society.

Of these institutions, one that is most crucial is political parties. Even one-party states have them, and with reason. They bring people together across ethnic and class lines, and often serve as a counterweight to clan ties and religious affiliation. Moreover, they lead citizens to think in national terms, rather than to vote reflexively along ethnic lines. Finally, political parties could be an essential weapon in our counterinsurgency in the border provinces.

But Afghanistan -- thanks to some dubious decisions by the Afghan government, and our acquiescence -- is the land parties forgot. This is even more of a pity because of the dearth of other institutions. Afghanistan is poor not just in per capita income -- about $350 a year, double what it was three years earlier -- but in structures that link unrelated people. All sorts of organizations Americans take for granted simply don't exist. There are no groups like PTAs, children's sport leagues, alumni associations and country clubs. Nor are there those that constitute "special interest politics," such as trade unions, manufacturers' associations, or lobbyists for economic or ethical concerns. Afghanistan is kept poor by the lack of trust among unrelated citizens and the absence of a sense of common interest. All it has are family and ethnic loyalties -- wonderful in many ways for those nurtured within strong families, but not so wonderful for economic growth and civil society.

With very little pulling Afghans together, greed and extremism are more potent forces than in more densely networked societies. The absence of norms of good civic behavior allows some of the Afghan elite to take advantage of their inherited positions to loot their homeland. The corruption of many of Hamid Karzai's associates is undermining efforts to build the Afghan state. How can anyone expect ordinary Afghans to work for the national interest when their country is being robbed blind?

The U.N. feared that strong political parties could revive the civil war, but it is more accurate to say that the absence of overt party politics has allowed the worst covert organizations to flourish. Some 34 former or current members of Hezb-e-Islami, Gulbuddin Hekmatyar's violent fundamentalist party, won seats in Afghanistan's parliamentary elections last September. Perhaps half of parliament's lower house are fundamentalists. And in an environment where legitimate businesses lack an open voice in the legislative process through trade organizations and lobbyists, guess which illegal business is rumored to be financing many MPs? (U.S. and NATO experts are discussing previously unthinkable ideas like buying and destroying the opium crop, since the feeble interdiction programs are not working and the opium money is financing, indeed in some places creating, the insurgency.)

Without competing, coherent ideologies, the Taliban can eat away at the elected government. If it's a choice between Mr. Karzai and associates -- people, not a party -- and a group that claims to fight corruption, who is the average villager going to trust?

There is another factor involved in the seeming revival of the Taliban, and it's not ideology. Afghans are not particularly ideological. The Taliban are popular only within a narrow geographic and ethnic band which mirrors their Hotak Ghilzai tribal membership. As two innovative scholars of Pashtun society, Thomas Johnson and Chris Mason, argue, the districts where the Taliban has gained support are exactly those which are Ghilzai, a powerful tribe that lost out to the Durrani tribe 300 years ago and has tried to bounce back ever since. This is about power, not ideology: The Ghilzai provided the leaders both to Afghanistan's communist movement and the jihadis who opposed them. Now they are attacking NATO troops because we support a Durrani-dominated government. (Mr. Karzai and the royal family are Durranis, and so are most of his Pashtun associates and Afghanistan's power elite.)

Most Afghans can at least see the benefit of civil society and the rule of law. Anyone who is not a member of the largest ethnic bloc, the Pashtuns -- 40% of the population -- has more to gain from strengthening the central government and the concept of Afghan nationhood. (Not incidentally, the relatively prosperous north and west are Tajik, Hazara, Turkmen and Uzbek, with few Pashtuns.) That's 60% of the population, plus progressive Pashtuns and Pashtuns from marginalized tribes. The Ghilzais must be co-opted, too, in order to weaken the insurgency. This must be done cautiously, of course, as they are no more interested in sharing power than are the Durranis.

There are no insuperable barriers to pushing and pulling Afghans toward a functioning democracy and civil society. The problem is that the U.S. and the U.N. have saddled Afghanistan with a voting and parliamentary system that does exactly the opposite, offering no alternative to voting by ethnicity and failing to make it worthwhile for ethnic groups to form coalitions. Elections were set up by the U.N. using a voting system ("Single Non-Transferable Vote," or SNTV) where each citizen chooses just one candidate from a long list of contenders to represent his district. (In Kabul, for instance, 387 candidates were on the ballot, but each voter chose one.)

DOJ_NMG_0123087

Under these circumstances, Afghans have voted ethnically. In the October 2004 presidential election, "no candidate received significant support outside of their particular ethno-linguistic group," as Thomas Johnson of the Naval Postgraduate School has pointed out. Worse yet, Pashtuns and Tajiks -- the two most numerous ethnic groups -- are not only overwhelmingly likely to vote for candidates from their own groups, but against candidates from a perceived rival group. The Pashtun Mr. Karzai did not receive a majority of the vote of any ethnic group save his own. He still won 55.4% of the vote, with the other major candidates gaining 16.3%, 11.7% and 10%.

When the September 2005 parliamentary elections were set up, no political party affiliations were allowed on the ballots; instead, candidates had a randomly picked symbol next to their names and photos (helpful to the many illiterate voters). The prohibition of party politics was largely at Mr. Karzai's urging. As the best-known politician in Afghanistan, it was to his advantage to avoid giving potential opponents the buoying effect of a party affiliation, and to have a rubber-stamp parliament of unknowns. However, while parliament is often ineffectual, it has neither expedited the policies of his cabinet nor been able to present alternatives. Instead, it has been a vibrant but disorganized forum in which neophyte politicians struggle to understand the way legislation is enacted and religious fundamentalists try to block anything that smacks of secularism.

"Parliament came five years too soon," an American advisor to a cabinet minister told me. "It's slowing down approval processes and creating a forum for debate that has yet to prove useful." Given low levels of education and business experience in Afghanistan, even among elites, it's not surprising many MPs have difficulty understanding a budget, much less proposing improvements to it. But having parties in place would have allowed the more capable members to instruct the less prepared.

The absence of political parties was also shortsighted for Mr. Karzai himself, making his effectiveness depend on personal popularity. He was at his zenith when the system was designed; now he is grudgingly accepted as the least of the possible evils by a resigned electorate. Mr. Karzai would be better off with a party organization behind him: In the U.S. even an unpopular president can get things done because party discipline supports him. And a successor to an unpopular president can be groomed within a party even as challengers from competing parties ready their bids. Instead, the Afghan situation is that of a barely competent president with no more competent successor.

Prof. Johnson also points out that most Afghan voters are not represented by a candidate they voted for. Due to a combination of SNTV voting and a 50% turnout, only about 18% of eligible voters in Afghanistan are represented by a candidate they voted for; 64% chose a candidate who lost. Prof. Johnson notes that "many candidates won virtually by chance," with the top finishers in some provinces gathering only a few percent of the votes cast. This might be tolerable in a mature democracy, but is not what one wants in a country with scant trust in the electoral system and little sense of national identity. The next parliamentary elections aren't until 2010, so there is time to set up a better voting system. SNTV should be replaced, requirements stiffened for obtaining a place on the ballot to avoid such farces as choosing among 387 candidates, and runoffs considered.

An Afghan-American member of parliament, Daoud Sultanzoy, has advanced another good idea: take representation down to the district level. Currently, the people of each of Afghanistan's 34 provinces vote for members of parliament from their province, and the highest vote-getters become representatives of that province according to its population. But representatives are not linked with particular districts as they are in the U.S, though some provinces are the size of whole European countries and differ widely in population, terrain and economy. Nor are there mayoral elections for small towns in Afghanistan, so there is no one to represent the national government on a local level.

Afghanistan's biggest problem is not the Taliban, but underdeveloped institutions and a lack of rule of law. It is emphatically not "another Iraq." Most of Afghanistan is relatively peaceful. Just 192 American troops have been killed in action since fall 2001, and in 2006, 206 Afghan civilians were murdered in suicide bombings. Tragic, yes, but in 2003, the last year for which statistics are available, 16,000 Afghan women died in childbirth -- 44 a day.

As this comparison suggests, we need to foster civil society and robust institutions in order to assure a decent life for Afghanistan's citizens. An essential part of this is nurturing political parties.

Ms. Marlowe is the author of "The Book of Trouble" (Harcourt, 2006), a memoir.

Afghan War Takes A Toll On Canada (LAT)

By Laura King And Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 29, 2007

MASUMGHAR, AFGHANISTAN — In the wind-scoured high desert that was once the heartland of the Taliban movement, the will and determination of a little-heralded American ally have been undergoing a harsh test.

For the last six months, the task of confronting insurgents in volatile Kandahar province in southern Afghanistan has largely fallen to Canada, whose troops have participated in myriad peacekeeping missions in recent years but had not seen high-intensity combat since the Korean War.

DOJ_NMG_0123088

Although its nearly 3,000 troops account for less than 10% of the allied forces in Afghanistan, Canada absorbed nearly 20% of the coalition's combat deaths last year, losing 36 soldiers.

A Canadian diplomat also was killed, by a suicide bomber.

The disproportionate casualty count in a region that Taliban commanders have pledged to seize this spring has triggered debate at home about whether Canada is finding itself in a quagmire of American making.

The deployment is a strain for military families. Moreover, the Canadian mission points up the stresses and strains caused by unequal burden-sharing within the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Already, alliance unity has been frayed by what commanders describe as an insufficient overall troop commitment and rules that sharply limit the combat capabilities of some participants.

"Would I be happy if there were more nations in the south? Yes," said Lt. Gen. Michel Gauthier, commander of Canada's expeditionary forces, who toured Canadian outposts in Afghanistan in mid-January.

"Would I be happy if there were fewer caveats?" he added, referring to rules that limited the combat missions of many NATO troops to emergency sorties to aid other alliance forces. "Yes."

A NATO meeting in Brussels on Friday brought a pledge from the U.S. for more troops and an additional $10 billion over two years, but only vague promises from other alliance members.

Canadian military officers in Afghanistan sidestep questions about the safer tasks given to French troops in the capital, Kabul, or to the German deployment in the relatively calm north.

They point instead to others in the line of fire: American troops' front-line engagement with insurgents in the east, the battles that British forces have waged to the west in Helmand province, or other contingents serving alongside Canadians in Kandahar, including Dutch troops.

Even so, Canadian forces who arrived in August were stunned by their initial encounter, a full-blown battle with thousands of insurgents.

Canadian troops took the lead in NATO's Operation Medusa, a September confrontation with Taliban fighters who had entrenched themselves in and around the Panjwayi district, southwest of the city of Kandahar.

"Everyone here has seen someone die," said Cpl. Luke Winnicki, a 26-year-old combat engineer in the Royal Canadian Regiment, gesturing toward dozens of troops in a drafty tent at Masumghar, a hillside outpost about 15 miles southwest of Kandahar.

All eyes on Afghanistan

In the U.S., the Afghan conflict receives far less attention than the larger war in Iraq. But in Canada, it gets top billing daily in newspapers and on TV.

And unlike in the U.S., the public is allowed to see soldiers' bodies returning home in flag-draped caskets.

Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper, at the head of a coalition government, is vulnerable to political attack because of the Afghan mission.

Public support for it dropped to 35% at the end of 2006, one poll said.

In response, popular Foreign Minister Peter MacKay visited Afghanistan this month to reframe the government's message. He said Canada's mission was reconstruction, but it could not be completed without security.

After MacKay's visit, another poll said public support had rebounded to 58%.

One of the country's smaller opposition parties, the New Democratic Party, argues that Canada should focus on diplomacy and reconstruction, and it paints the Afghanistan mission as an attempt to curry favor in Washington.

"Mr. Harper, just like George Bush on Iraq, keeps saying that this war can be won, and that it is going well. It is not going well," party leader Jack Layton said in a speech at the University of Quebec last week. "The violence is escalating, opium production has skyrocketed. Most of our 25 NATO allies are refusing to send soldiers to join in the counterinsurgency mission in southern Afghanistan. And yet, Mr. Harper refuses to see what is happening."

Harper has maintained the backing of his party's main challenger, the Liberal Party, which started the Afghanistan mission in 2001.

"People see the necessity of the war but are not persuaded about the effectiveness," said Paul Heinbecker, a former Canadian ambassador to the United Nations who is director of the Center for Global Relations at Wilfrid Laurier University in Waterloo, Canada.

He said there was a strong desire to see NATO allies share more of the perilous duty.

"We have stepped up and taken part in action while some of our NATO allies have been polishing their fingernails up in Kabul," Heinbecker said.

In a speech this month to troops preparing to deploy to Afghanistan, Defense Minister Gordon O'Connor pledged that Canada would commit more artillery and aircraft in 2007 but not more troops.

DOJ_NMG_0123089

"We will support this mission until progress in Afghanistan becomes irreversible," O'Connor said.

The toll on military families

Military leaders are mindful that Canada's combat losses, though small compared with U.S. deaths in Iraq, loom large in a country with a population of 33 million.

That is particularly true in close-knit military communities such as those surrounding Canadian Forces Base Trenton, midway between Toronto and Ottawa.

Deborah Goulden, 38, whose husband is a military pilot who shuttles troops and supplies to and from Kandahar, knows little about what's going on in Afghanistan. She is on maternity leave with her 2-month-old baby, and also has a toddler. She said she couldn't bear to watch the news.

She doesn't know exactly what her husband, Mark, does or when he is coming home. In a videophone call this month, she was surprised to see him wearing a gun.

Goulden, a 16-year veteran, has been on peacekeeping missions in East Timor, the former Yugoslavia, Haiti and Somalia.

"I am respectful of what he does, and I don't think military people get enough recognition for what they do," Deborah Goulden said at a family center at the Trenton base. "He is there supporting Canadian society and building a very positive environment for a country that needs support. I'm proud that he is a part of that."

Mark Goulden, 38, interviewed at an airfield in Kandahar, described near-daily missions flying C-130 cargo planes to what he characterized as "austere locations."

"You get runways that look like roadways, gravel airstrips in the middle of nowhere, always the potential for enemy fire and mechanical failures," he said.

When he talks to his wife, he said, he tries to "edit it a little. You try not to be dramatic."

He insisted that his wife's task was harder.

Patti Leighton, 41, knows all too well what her husband, Rick, is doing in Kandahar as an engineer helping design schools and police stations.

She doesn't want to hear about the near-misses and gunfights. She already knows the dangers.

She is a military air traffic controller, and time after time this year she has helped guide the planes carrying soldiers' coffins to the Trenton base.

"There was one woman who was deployed over there at the same time as her husband. She had to come back on the plane with the body. She got off the plane and saw their kids waiting for both of them on the tarmac. That was the last one I watched," she said.

Leighton's 17-year-old daughter is tired of her father's absence; her 13-year-old son wants to be a soldier. She has been in the military for 22 years, but this year has been different.

She described standing at attention at a parade and her eyes welling up when she heard the national anthem.

"This year was the proudest year I've ever stood there, because we're over there. When I heard the music, I felt a moment of pure pride. When I heard it, I thought, 'Wow, that's for me. That's for us.' "

Rick Leighton, interviewed at his headquarters in Kandahar, said the hardest part was missing the day-to-day family events like his son's hockey games or the "butting heads" between his wife and daughter over schoolwork and curfews.

Leighton said with the reconstruction team based in the city of Kandahar, several miles from the main military base, he and his colleagues were closer to the bombings aimed at convoys.

He speaks to his family every morning, he said, but never tells them whether he will be traveling outside the headquarters, a journey that always takes place in a convoy of at least three armored vehicles with everyone in combat gear.

"Every time you hear the boom, it shakes you," he said. When the Internet and cellphones go dead moments afterward, "you know there's a communications blackout because someone's been killed."

At the sprawling Kandahar airfield, the Canadian military has managed to evoke some comforts of home. There's an open-air hockey rink and a Tim Hortons coffee and doughnut shop, something of a Canadian institution.

But the near-constant roar of aircraft and the occasional boom of rocket fire leaves little doubt this is a war zone.

On a bare hillside in Masumghar, troops settled in for another wind-lashed night. Powdery dust leaked in through tiny rips in the barracks tent.

"The thing is, you know that your family is in this fight too, and your country," said Winnicki, the combat engineer. "So you're not alone. But you feel responsible for them too."

laura.king@latimes.com

maggie.farley@latimes.com

King reported from Masumghar and Farley from Ottawa and Trenton, Canada.

*

(INFOBOX BELOW)

Canada's cost

More than four times as many Canadians were killed in Afghanistan last year as in the four previous years combined. Canadians, who make up less than 10% of the total forces, suffered about one-fifth of the deaths. Canada's troop toll in Afghanistan:

2002: 4
2003: 2
2004: 1
2005: 1
2006: 36

Forces and casualties

How 2006 casualties compare in relation to force sizes for the nations with the most troops in Afghanistan:

Note: Force numbers are broad contributions and do not reflect exact numbers on the ground at any time.

Sources: North Atlantic Treaty Organization, icasualties.com

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Immunity Issues Tie Brocade Cases Into Knots (LAW)

By Justin Scheck, The Recorder

California Recorder, January 29, 2007

San Francisco's best-known white-collar defendant says he needs the cooperation of prosecutors to defend himself against charges of securities fraud. The government, unsurprisingly, doesn't seem to like that idea.

Over the last few weeks, lawyers for Gregory Reyes, the ex-CEO of Brocade Communications -- and the first person to be charged in the burgeoning stock option backdating prosecutions -- have been frustrated as former company employees have invoked the Fifth Amendment in refusing to be deposed as Reyes prepares to defend SEC civil charges of stock fraud.

That's a problem, Reyes' lawyers say in court filings, because these same witnesses were granted temporary immunity by federal prosecutors to give government investigators their story -- setting up what defense lawyers call an unfair advantage for the government. Their solution: extend the immunity to cover defense depositions, a suggestion the government seems unlikely to follow.

Since the SEC and San Francisco U.S. Attorney's Office charged former Brocade executives with backdating employee stock options in July, the case has been a publicly contentious matter, with defense counsel loudly denouncing the government in court and in the press.

Tensions have increased in the last few weeks, as evidentiary matters in the SEC civil case have started to overlap with the pending criminal prosecution.

That's relatively rare, since most judges will separate such cases, staying the SEC civil suit until the resolution of the corresponding criminal case.

But Northern District of California federal Judge Charles Breyer has decided to move the cases forward in tandem.

That set the stage for an awkward situation for at least 10 or so former Brocade employees. Granted immunity by federal prosecutors for a single interview session with lawyers from the U.S. Attorney's Office and the SEC, they coughed up what they knew about the case.

Not so when defense lawyers for Reyes and ex-HR Manager Stephanie Jensen -- who are charged in both the criminal and civil cases -- and former CFO Antonio Canova, who faces only SEC charges, tried to depose them.

"At the first such deposition on Friday, Jan. 19, 2007," Reyes' lawyer, Richard Marmaro, wrote in a brief filed this week, one witness who had been debriefed by government lawyers "invoked the Fifth Amendment in response to all questions other than her name and address."

The other witnesses did the same thing, Marmaro wrote, handcuffing his ability to defend the civil case.

"We are seeking to depose all of the witnesses who have any information on the charges in the SEC complaint," Marmaro, a partner at Skadden, Arps, Slate, Meagher & Flom, said Thursday. Since those charges seem to be based on witness interviews conducted with temporary immunity -- referred to as "queen-for-a-day" immunity -- he argues that the defense team should have access to the same information.

DOJ_NMG_0123091

That's not possible without a broader grant of immunity, something the government has so far declined to offer, forcing an invocation of the Fifth Amendment that defense counsel, Marmaro said, think "is not only improper, but contrary to the truth-finding process."

Indeed, he wrote in a characteristically aggressive brief, the government and its witnesses seem to be cooperating in an inappropriate fashion.

"When a witness submits freely to questioning by governmental representatives who contend that a fraud occurred (and have the power to prosecute) but declines to answer questions from private-sector parties who contend no fraud occurred (and lack the power to prosecute), something other than a fear of prosecution is obviously afoot," he wrote.

Brown, a partner at Orrick, Herrington & Sutcliffe who represents 11 witnesses in the case, didn't have much to say Thursday. "I've received the motion and we intend to respond," he said.

But according to Peter Henning, a professor at Wayne State University Law School and an expert on white-collar prosecutions, it's unlikely that a lawyer in Brown's position would let his clients be deposed without a guarantee of immunity.

Henning said prosecutors are unlikely to make such a guarantee at this late stage of a case. "They don't want to go down that road, and they certainly don't want to be forced to do it," he said.

Furthermore, he said, Breyer is unlikely to honor Marmaro's request to order the government to facilitate depositions, since case law discourages judges from ordering immunity.

Marmaro seemed especially perturbed with the recent non-deposition of one witness.

"It is difficult to comprehend how the witnesses now before the court can credibly claim fear of self-incrimination," he wrote, pointing to the example of a former Brocade compensation and benefits analyst who had met with the Justice Department and SEC -- and with lawyers for two defendants -- before even hiring a lawyer.

"Yet, once she retained counsel, [Walter] Brown, Ms. Weaver suddenly expressed a desire to invoke the Fifth Amendment in response to all questions from the defendants in this case at her deposition on January 19, 2007.

"She now purports to fear incriminating herself by answering such benign questions as her educational background, whether she had ever met with the SEC or DOJ, whether she knew the civil defendants (even though one was sitting in the deposition room), whether she would testify if summoned by the SEC at trial, and virtually any other topic other than her name and address," Marmaro wrote.

The easiest way out of the muck, Henning said, would be for Breyer to stay the civil case until the criminal trial is over. But that could be a problem -- Breyer said at a Wednesday hearing that he wants to move the Brocade trial along without delay because he's planning to hold civil trials in the fall in two massive drug tort cases.

If the judge is unwilling to issue a stay, Henning said, more wrangling is likely in the works.

"It's a mess," he said.

Greenlight Heads To A Courtroom (WSJ)

By Carol S. Remond

The Wall Street Journal, January 29, 2007

Hedge funds have plumbed many corners of the markets in search of returns. Now Greenlight Capital, a fund with a big negative bet on Allied Capital Corp., is breaking into new ground -- the courts.

The $4 billion New York City fund has filed a lawsuit in federal court in Atlanta in the name of the U.S. government claiming that Business Loan Express LLC, a subsidiary of Allied Capital known as BLX, submitted fraudulent loan documents to the Small Business Administration, bilking the U.S. of millions of dollars.

Greenlight and James Brickman, an individual working with the fund to bring the suit, are entitled to 25% to 30% of the proceeds if their complaint results in an award.

It appears to be one of the first times a hedge fund has filed suit under a provision of the Federal Civil False Claims Act that lets private citizens sue in the name of the federal government. Such cases -- called qui tam complaints -- typically are filed by whistleblowers alleging fraud by their employers.

Allied Capital referred questions to its public-relations firm, Sitrick & Co., which didn't reply to questions submitted. The SEC declined to comment.

BLX declined to comment on the suit through the public-relations firm. Reached by telephone at BLX's Richmond, Va., office, Matthew McGee, a senior vice president, called the suit "ridiculous" and "another ploy" by investors who have made bearish bets on the stock.

DOJ_NMG_0123092

Allied Capital has been under investigation for more than two years by the U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia in connection with a criminal probe of BLX. The company also is the focus of an informal investigation by the Securities and Exchange Commission. The company said in SEC filings that these investigations appear linked to "matters related to the portfolio valuation" and BLX.

Greenlight's Short

Greenlight has a short position in Allied Capital stock -- in other words, a bet that will pay off if the company's stock falls. (Typically, short positions involve the sale of borrowed securities by an investor who hopes to earn a profit by buying an equal number of shares later, at a lower price, to replace the borrowed securities.)

The government in November declined to intervene in Greenlight's case. Under qui tam, the complaint can proceed in the government's name.

The complaint, filed this month, names Business Loan Express, Business Loan Center, Robert Tannenhauser BLX's chief executive, Mr. McGee and George Harrigan, a loan broker.

Mr. Tannenhauser wasn't available for comment and Mr. Harrigan couldn't be reached.

Mr. Brickman, who describes himself as a retired real-estate investor, said he joined Greenlight in the suit because of a "shared belief that a massive fraud has been committed on SBA." Mr. Brickman said he doesn't have a short position in Allied Capital stock and receives no compensation from Greenlight.

Ignoring Signs

Greenlight manager David Einhorn has battled Allied Capital for five years. A week ago, he made public a letter sent by Greenlight to Allied Capital's board, alleging the company failed its shareholders by ignoring signs that suggested trouble with loan documents at BLX.

That same day, Allied Capital issued its own announcement, denouncing Mr. Einhorn's motives and accusing him of trying to manipulate the price of Allied Capital's stock. Allied Capital also said Mr. Einhorn made "numerous misleading allegations" in his letter, without going into detail.

This month, a former BLX executive named Patrick Harrington was indicted by a Michigan U.S. District court on charges he and others defrauded the SBA of almost $77 million in guaranteed loans.

Mr. Harrington, through a lawyer, denied admitting to federal agents that he, and others working for him, knowingly made 76 fraudulent loans as alleged in the federal complaint against him. A jury trial is set for March 13.

According to Greenlight's complaint in Georgia, BLX submitted false loan applications to the SBA to defraud the administration into guaranteeing the loans. The complaint focuses on about $100 million in shrimp-boat loans that were backed by the SBA.

Following the Michigan indictment, the SBA is undertaking a review of loans made by BLX. The SBA said its review could take up to 45 days.

Write to Carol S. Remond at carol.remond@dowjones.com1

Lone Star Probe Engulfs South Korea Chief (WSJ)

By Laura Santini And Lina Yoon

The Wall Street Journal, January 29, 2007

The indictment of Lone Star Funds' South Korea head is part of an investigation into suspicions of wrongdoing by the Dallas private-equity fund that has already delayed the firm's ability to make a lucrative exit from its investment in Korea Exchange Bank.

On Friday, Korean prosecutors indicted Lone Star's country head, Paul Yoo, on allegations of stock manipulation and tax evasion. "This is the continuation of the investigation," a spokesman at South Korea's Supreme Prosecutors Office said. "The case will pass now to the court."

Lone Star, the largest shareholder of Korea Exchange Bank, tried to sell a controlling stake in the bank last year to Kookmin Bank for more than $7 billion, but the process was derailed by a probe into Lone Star's acquisition of KEB. Investigators claimed Lone Star's 2003 purchase was mishandled by government and KEB officials, allowing the U.S. firm to buy 51% of the bank for $1.2 billion. They allege the price was too low. Prosecutors haven't charged the firm with any wrongdoing in connection with the stake acquisition.

Friday's indictment of Mr. Yoo, the third against a Lone Star executive, relates to the merger of KEB's credit-card unit into the bank after Lone Star acquired control. Ellis Short, Lone Star's vice chairman, and Michael Thomson, its general counsel, were indicted late last year on similar charges. Mr. Yoo, who resides in Seoul, couldn't be reached for comment. Lone Star, which has said its executives are innocent, didn't respond to messages seeking comment.

Write to Laura Santini at laura.santini@wsj.com1 and Lina Yoon at lina.yoon@wsj.com2

CRIMINAL LAW:

Journalists To Take Stand In Libby's Perjury Trial (USAT)

By Richard Willing, Usa Today

USA Today, January 29, 2007

WASHINGTON — This is the week the Lewis "Scooter" Libby trial meets the press.

High-profile journalists such as NBC's Tim Russert and former New York Times reporter Judith Miller are scheduled to be called as witnesses as soon as this week, as the perjury and obstruction trial of Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff heads into its second week of testimony.

Libby is charged with lying to investigators probing how and why the identity of CIA officer Valerie Plame was given to reporters in 2003.

Disclosing the name of a covert CIA operative is a crime. Libby has not been charged with that but with lying to investigators during the course of the probe into the disclosure of Plame's identity.

Reporters are notoriously reluctant to talk about work methods, especially confidential sources. Miller went to jail for 85 days to avoid disclosing Libby as a source. Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper went to court in an unsuccessful effort to avoid talking to investigators in the case. He later cooperated with the probe.

Now, however, says a veteran trial watcher, the reporters' central role in the case will be to give evidence.

"There's some real novelty here, as in 'That's Tim Russert on the witness stand, and not on 'Meet the Press,' " says Gregory Wallance, a defense attorney and former federal prosecutor in New York City who has been following the trial.

"But once the novelty is gone, then as with any other witness, we're back to focusing on what was in the head of Scooter Libby."

Prosecutors argue that Libby deliberately lied when he told investigators and later grand jurors that he learned of Plame's identity from Russert in a telephone call on July 10 or 11, 2003. Russert will deny discussing the case with Libby and testify that he learned of Plame's identity several days later from a Robert Novak newspaper column, court papers say.

Miller testified before a grand jury after Libby told her he no longer held her to their confidentiality agreement. She said she and Libby had at least one conversation in which he mentioned Plame. Both occurred before Libby's conversation with Russert.

Libby's defense has signaled that it will also rely on reporters' testimony to show that Libby did not deliberately lie.

In court last week, defense attorney Theodore Wells said Russert may have learned Plame's identity from two NBC colleagues before his conversation with Libby. Russert's colleagues, David Gregory and Andrea Mitchell, were working on the Plame story and may have told a forgetful Russert, Wells said.

"Tim Russert is a great reporter, but he's a human being," Wells said.

"Tim Russert can be confused and make an innocent mistake just like anyone else. The sole issue is: Is somebody telling an intentional lie?"

Wells said Libby talked to 10 reporters in the month before Plame's name became public and only brought her name up once, with Miller. The reporters, including The Washington Post's Bob Woodward, can verify that Libby was not "pushing the (Plame) story," Wells said.

It is unclear which reporters will be called by Wells.

The case already has called attention to the arrangements sometimes shared by Washington reporters and their sources.

Cathie Martin, a press aide in Cheney's office in 2003, testified last week that reporters sometimes agree to quote "senior administration officials" when those officials don't want to be connected by name to some information.

Press officials typically offered exclusive stories, private lunches with Cheney and other inducements to get favorable coverage, Martin said.

When it wanted to get an important story out, she said, the administration's first option was to get Cheney on Russert's Meet the Press.

Testimony resumes today with former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer scheduled to testify for the prosecution. Libby told Fleischer about Plame's CIA job at least three days before Libby says he learned of it from Russert, prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald has charged in court.

Fleischer demanded and received immunity from the prosecution before agreeing to testify. William Jeffress, another Libby attorney, indicated last week that he will argue to jurors that the deal gave Fleischer the freedom to accuse Libby without fear of consequences.

Leak Case: Will Rove Testify? (NSWK)

DOJ_NMG_0123094

By By Michael Isikoff

Newsweek, January 29, 2007

Jan. 26, 2007 - White House anxiety is mounting over the prospect that top officials—including deputy chief of staff Karl Rove and counselor Dan Bartlett—may be forced to provide potentially awkward testimony in the perjury and obstruction trial of Lewis (Scooter) Libby.

Both Rove and Bartlett have already received trial subpoenas from Libby's defense lawyers, according to lawyers close to the case who asked not to be identified talking about sensitive matters. While that is no guarantee they will be called, the odds increased this week after Libby's lawyer, Ted Wells, laid out a defense resting on the idea that his client, Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, had been made a "scapegoat" to protect Rove. Cheney is expected to provide the most crucial testimony to back up Wells's assertion, one of the lawyers close to the case said. The vice president personally penned an October 2003 note in which he wrote, "Not going to protect one staffer and sacrifice the other." The note, read aloud in court by Wells, implied that Libby was the one being sacrificed in an effort to clear Rove of any role in leaking the identity of CIA operative Valerie Plame, wife of Iraq war critic Joe Wilson. "Wow, for all the talk about this being a White House that prides itself on loyalty and discipline, you're not seeing much of it," the lawyer said.

Libby is charged with lying about when and from whom he learned about Plame during the spring and early summer of 2003, a time when the White House was working to discredit Wilson. A former U.S. ambassador, Wilson was dispatched to Niger to investigate reports that Iraq was seeking to purchase uranium from Africa. Wilson said he told U.S. officials there was nothing to those reports. But the president later used the claim anyway in his 2003 State of the Union address, prompting Wilson to charge the administration had manipulated the intelligence about Iraq. The week after he went public, journalist Robert Novak first reported that Wilson's wife, Plame, worked for the CIA—a disclosure that prompted allegations that administration officials had "outed her" in retaliation for Wilson's criticism.

The possibility that Rove could be called to testify would bring his own role into sharper focus—and could prove important to Libby's lawyers for several reasons. Rove has said in secret testimony that, during a chat on July 11, 2003, Libby told him he learned about Plame's employment at the CIA from NBC Washington bureau chief Tim Russert, a legal source who asked not to be identified talking about grand jury matters told NEWSWEEK. If Rove repeats that story on the witness stand, it could back up Libby's core assertion that he honestly, if mistakenly, thought he had heard about Wilson's wife from the "Meet the Press" host—even though Russert denies he knew anything about Plame, and more than a half-dozen officials (including Cheney) have said they passed along the same information to Libby earlier than that.

But the Rove account could cut in other ways. Fitzgerald would likely argue that Libby's comment to Rove merely shows that the vice president's top aide "was even lying inside the White House," according to the legal source. Moreover, Rove is likely not eager to recount the story either. The reason? He would have to acknowledge that shortly after he had the chat with Libby, he went back to his office and had a phone conversation with Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper in which he also disclosed the fact that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA. The disclosure was potentially illegal since, at the time, Plame was employed in the Directorate of Operations, the agency's covert arm. (There is no evidence that Rove or anybody else knew Plame's status at the time—and Rove has never been charged with any crime—but the possibility that White House officials were leaking classified information in an effort to discredit Wilson is what triggered the probe in the first place.)

An equally embarrassing conflict could emerge next week when former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer takes the stand. Fleischer has been one of the most mysterious figures in the case, making virtually no public comments about it since he left the White House in July 2003. In the past he has insisted he wasn't even represented by a lawyer. But it emerged during court arguments this week that Fleischer originally invoked his Fifth Amendment privileges to avoid testifying and then only agreed to do so after he was given an immunity deal by Fitzgerald—an arrangement that normally requires extensive bargaining among attorneys. Fleischer's testimony is critical to Fitzgerald's case: as the prosecutor laid out this week in his opening statement, Fleischer has said that Libby told him over a White House lunch on July 7, 2003, that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA and made a point of describing this information as "hush and hush." Fitzgerald used that account to undercut Libby's grand-jury assertion that he was surprised and "taken aback" just three or four days later when, he claims, Russert told him about Wilson's wife. "You can't learn something startling on Thursday that you're giving out Monday and Tuesday of the same week," Fitzgerald said. Fleischer has also testified that Bartlett also later told him about Wilson's wife and, after hearing it from both Libby and Bartlett, the then-White House press secretary disclosed the information to NBC reporter David Gregory.

On its face, Fleischer's account seems to contradict the repeated public assertions of his immediate successor, Scott McClellan, in October 2003 that nobody at the White House was in any way involved in the leak of Plame's identity. It also potentially puts Bartlett, one of the president's senior and most trusted advisers, on the hot seat. If Bartlett backs up Fleischer, it suggests he himself played a role in passing along radioactive information that triggered a criminal investigation that has plagued the White House for more than four years. If he contradicts Fleischer, it raises questions about the credibility of a man who was President Bush's chief spokesman for the first two and a half years of his presidency. His lawyer declined to comment on what Bartlett will say.

But either way, it's not a scenario that anybody at the White House can be looking forward to.

Sheriff Talks Of A Conspiracy (KNOXNS)

By J.j. Stambaugh

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), January 29, 2007

Hutchison says FBI told him lawyers might try to 'sue him out of business'

With only three days left before turning in his badge, Knox County Sheriff Tim Hutchison said in an interview broadcast Sunday that an FBI agent tipped him off to a 1998 conspiracy by "some lawyers" to destroy his administration through the court system.

He also called lawyer Herbert S. Moncier, his longtime legal nemesis, "an anarchist" and described sheriff hopeful Randy Tyree as unqualified to hold the post of sheriff.

During the 30-minute interview aired on WBIR, Channel 10, Hutchison touched upon several controversies that arose during his 17 years as sheriff, including a series of high-profile lawsuits filed by Moncier over access to public records and alleged civil-rights violations against citizens.

The sheriff said he was approached by an FBI agent in late 1998 who told him that some lawyers were talking about "suing me out of business." Hutchison said he initially laughed off the tip, but after Moncier started filing dozens of lawsuits, "I started seeing exactly what was planned."

"It's somewhat personal between him and me," Hutchison said of his feud with Moncier. "In my opinion, he's an anarchist."

Moncier e-mailed a reply to Hutchison's comments Sunday afternoon.

"He's wrong," Moncier wrote. "I believe in a government of the people, for the people, elected by the people. Not a government of professional politicians who horde power; who peddle government jobs and contracts to their friends and supporters; who punish those who disagree with them; who abuse the powerless; and who become multi-millionaires while in office peddling their influence."

Moncier added: "I do not have a clue what he is talking about an FBI agent told him. It is interesting, however, that an FBI agent was leaking information to him, whether correct or not."

FBI spokesman Gary Kidder said Sunday he had no comment.

Hutchison, who is in his fifth term as sheriff, said he has no immediate plans to run for another public office but declined to rule out the possibility.

He is one of 12 county officeholders being forced out of office because of a recent state Supreme Court decision that upheld voter-approved term limits.

Hutchison said three of his top chiefs have met and decided to push for J.J. Jones, his chief deputy of administration, to be appointed sheriff by County Commission.

Hutchison said he asked the trio to meet because he understood they were each phoning commissioners about the post. He said he urged them to decide on a possible successor among themselves to avoid the possibility that internal friction might cause an outsider to be appointed to lead the department.

Hutchison didn't identify the aides who were vying for the job, but they have previously been identified by Commissioner Greg "Lumpy" Lambert as Jones, Chief Deputy Tom Spangler and Assistant Chief Deputy of Administration Bobby Waggoner.

Jones, who was once the sheriff's chief of detectives, resigned in 1999 and fired off an angry letter describing Hutchison as a "paranoid, selfish, power-crazed tyrant." He went to work at the Knoxville Police Department, ran unsuccessfully against Hutchison in 2002, and then returned to Hutchison's agency in 2005.

When asked by WBIR anchor Robin Wilhoit about his up-and-down relationship with Jones, Hutchison said Jones had experienced some unspecified problems while going through a divorce but has since overcome those issues.

"We've seen the same J.J. from before that is very capable, that cares about this agency, and this is where his heart is," he said.

Hutchison also said he doesn't believe former Knoxville Mayor Randy Tyree, who came close to upsetting him in last year's election, is qualified to be sheriff. "He's been out of law enforcement longer than I've been in it," he said.

Tyree, a lawyer who worked in law enforcement at KPD and the FBI in the 1960s and '70s, said after Hutchison's interview that he hopes to be picked as sheriff and expects there to be "an elevated intensity here in the next 72 hours heading into the (County Commission) meeting on Wednesday."

"Experience is good, but sometimes you can get yourself into a rut, and what I bring to the table is a diversity of experience, all of it dealing with leadership and with public service," Tyree said.

Although he hasn't worn a uniform in decades, Tyree said he believes his administrative and leadership skills are adequate to lead the department. "It needs to be more of a professional organization, less of a political organization," he said. "And that's not dissing Tim. It's the nature of the animal."

Hutchison declined to offer an opinion on the Supreme Court's term-limits decision, saying only that the court's ruling is "the final word."

"I'm not going to argue one way or another ... that's why you haven't heard much out of me," he said.

When asked what accomplishment he was proudest of, Hutchison said he was pleased to have been chosen as the nation's "Sheriff of the Year" in 1998 but credited the honor to the work of his employees, who built a "full-service law enforcement agency" under his direction.

Hutchison said his biggest regret was the acrimonious relationship between the sheriff's department and KPD before Sterling Owen IV was appointed the city's police chief in 2004.

The relationship between the two agencies has improved greatly since Owen took office, Hutchison said, which has led to better cooperation on cases. "That's the way law enforcement better serves the entire community," he said.

Hutchison, 54, didn't want to speculate on what he might do in the future. He said he is a licensed contractor, has invested in an Oak Ridge auto dealership, and has already gotten calls about possibly seeking another elected position.

"I don't know what the Lord has in store for me out there," he said. "I don't have any specific plans for the future at this moment."

J.J. Stambaugh may be reached at 865-342-6307.

Feds Detail Alleged Jail Food Kickbacks (OREG)

By MICHELLE ROBERTS, LES ZAITZ And BRYAN DENSON

The Oregonian, January 28, 2007

Oregon prisons - Investigators say a state buyer and his wife took about $680,000 in payoffs

As Oregon's prison food buyer, Fred Monem began his 2005 performance review with a glowing self-evaluation.

"Continually striving to exceed professional and ethical standards," he wrote of his work, "as well as setting the highest measurement as a role model for fellow staff members."

Monem's bosses agreed, giving him stellar marks. After all, he'd squeezed the system's daily meal costs by 40 percent with an innovative tactic: shopping the "spot" food market for bargains in distressed or expiring goods.

By appearances, the 48-year-old Monem was a hero who'd saved taxpayers millions. But if allegations in federal court papers prove true, Monem himself may face charges including bribery and money laundering.

In an affidavit used to justify searching Monem's home and office, IRS and FBI investigators assert that Monem and his wife, Karen, accepted about $680,000 in kickbacks from companies that sold the state Department of Corrections millions of dollars' worth of food during the past five years.

Fred Monem allegedly jetted to Las Vegas every six weeks to meet with food brokers, where he sometimes picked up bundles of cash. As secret payments rolled into his wife's company, Monem was buying a rental home on the coast, a $77,000 BMW and a golf club membership. When agents searched the couple's home and safe deposit box this month, they found more than $530,000 in cash.

Authorities say they can't recall a bigger Oregon bribery case. Prison officials say they were blindsided.

"There was not a single red flag," Corrections Director Max Williams said Friday.

Monem's attorney said his client should be presumed innocent, and no charges have been filed against him or executives of food wholesalers in California, New York and Maryland who allegedly paid the kickbacks. Prosecutors and the FBI declined to discuss the ongoing investigation, outlined in the 42-page affidavit.

The accusations put a harsh light on a program that has been a prison system showpiece. Under special procurement rules, Monem aggressively pursued distressed and bulk foods on the spot market. The savings have helped Oregon regularly rank among the lowest in the nation for per-inmate food costs.

Though the rules allowed Monem considerable flexibility, Corrections officials said there were checks. Purchases required at least two comparable price quotes to ensure against overpayment, for instance. Exactly how wholesalers were able to charge prices high enough to cover the alleged kickbacks remains unclear.

The state will seek recovery if it turns out that food prices were artificially "jacked up," Williams said.

Although Williams defended the program as a money saver, a national expert on the prison food industry told The Oregonian that buying distressed products is virtually unheard of in state corrections.

Monem has been named in multiple inmate lawsuits, The Oregonian found, and has been the target of complaints about green bologna, moldy hamburger and food cartons purportedly marked "bait fish only."

DOJ_NMG_0123097

Williams insisted that "quality is not an issue" for the meals the state serves its 13,333 prisoners. Meanwhile, his agency is cooperating with federal officials by turning over documents and making employees available for interviews in an investigation that, so far, appears limited to Monem, he said.

Wheeling and dealing

To most, Monem seemed like a typical 9-to-5 state bureaucrat and suburban dad. "He's the kind of guy everybody likes," said Mark Graham, who lives down the street in Salem's Sunset Meadows subdivision.

But the Monem described in a federal affidavit seems more like a character out of a "Sopranos" episode.

When agents raided Monem's tan, two-story home Jan. 10, they found $12,410 in a bedroom closet. An additional $74,000 was stashed in a safe in the garage. At the Monems' bank, a deposit box held $444,700 in cash.

Monem fled his native Tehran in 1979 to avoid mandatory military service. By age 24, he had landed in California, where he owned and operated three family-style restaurants and later took his first job in prison food as supervisor for the now-defunct Service America Corp.

Monem helped oversee food service contracts at more than a dozen jails and prisons in Washington, California and Nevada. In 1991, as Oregon prepared to open the newly built Snake River Correctional Institution in Ontario, the firm won a contract to handle inmate meals.

State officials were so impressed with Monem's efficiency and "ability to wheel and deal" they eventually hired him away in January 1996, and he moved into his current job that September, according to Corrections spokeswoman Perrin Damon.

In December 2002, Monem logged the first of many trips to Las Vegas to meet with executives from Levin & Lawrence Inc., the Santa Clarita, Calif., wholesaler accused of paying the bulk of the kickbacks.

According to the search warrant affidavit outlining the case, the arrangement went like this:

L&L acquired bulk foods -- cold cereal, lunchmeat, burritos, candy bars, chili and jerky. In return for Monem's agreement to buy the items, some with approaching expiration dates, L&L would kick back 20 percent of its net profit on the deal to Monem.

An unnamed informant -- the firm's former controller -- said he was repeatedly asked to write checks for the payoffs by the firm's principals, Michael D. Levin and William S. Lawrence. He told investigators he once heard L&L salesman Howard Roth say that if a product was difficult to sell, they would "make Fred buy it."

The Levin & Lawrence executives and their attorney did not return phone calls seeking comment.

Another former L&L worker told agents he often overheard Roth negotiating prices by phone with Monem. The conversations, he said, left the impression that Monem was willing to pay more for the food than anyone else.

"What can you live with?" the employee recalls Roth asking Monem. "What can you live with?"

Tracking the cash

For five years, agents said in their search warrant affidavit, the money flowed. Records show that L&L and two other food brokers named in the case sold $21 million worth of products to the Oregon system during that time.

The former controller said his bosses frequently peppered him with e-mails or notes saying such things as "I need a check for cash for you know who." One Post-it note, now in the hands of IRS agents, reads: "Mikey needs a check for $8K for cash against Fred's commission."

The informant said Levin, Lawrence and Roth delivered cash directly to Monem in Las Vegas, where they treated him to expensive stays at the Mandalay Bay Hotel and Casino, famous for its 11-acre beach and an aquarium stocked with live sharks.

Records seized by the government show that Monem, often accompanied by his wife, traveled to Las Vegas at least 29 times in the past four years.

But not all the money was delivered that way. By September 2004, the ex-controller said, Monem was instructed to form a corporation so that L&L wouldn't have to "continue writing large checks to cash."

Karen Monem registered a new Oregon company on Sept. 9: Jamm Inc. From then on, the affidavit said, Karen Monem would submit invoices "making it appear that Jamm Inc. had provided consulting services."

By the end of last year, the affidavit said, Jamm Inc. took at least $475,000 in kickbacks.

In December 2005, the L&L executives treated the Monems to a Bears game in Chicago and picked up a $1,337 tab for dinner at Smith & Wollensky. The Monems bought a white 2006 BMW for $77,000. In June 2005, Lawrence, Roth and Fred Monem purchased a $383,000 ocean-view home in Seal Rock. Two months later, they formed a new company, Laromo Inc., to own and lease the property, according to county records and the affidavit.

L&L executives worried about how Monem might explain owning a BMW worth more than his $75,500 state salary. Roth told the ex-controller that Monem had a plan: He would say his father or uncle gave him the money.

Another former L&L worker once got out of repaying a $9,000 loan to the company with a threat.

"Back off," the employee told the former controller, "or I'll blow the lid on Fred."

DOJ_NMG_0123098

Last May, the controller decided to quit and form another food company. According to the affidavit, he called Levin, who cut short a vacation in Hawaii. Lawrence met the controller in a warehouse -- alone.

Levin wanted to know whether he could trust the controller to stay quiet about Monem, Lawrence said at the meeting. The controller asked what it was worth to keep the secret.

Lawrence responded, the affidavit says, with two words.

"Your life."

A string of lawsuits

On Jan. 10, the FBI came knocking at Mark and Dorothy Graham's door.

It was the first they heard of the allegations against their neighbors, whose home was searched that day. They were shocked -- and scared, they told The Oregonian. They had known the couple for years, and were investment partners.

In 2002, the Grahams and Monems formed Leisure Quest Investments to buy and lease real estate as a retirement investment. Property records show that Leisure Quest owns homes in Salem, Keizer and South Beach.

"We never knew where the (Monems') money came from," Mark Graham said. "They didn't tell us any of their business."

Graham is a food inspector with the U.S. Department of Agriculture and said he is assigned to inspect processing plants and slaughterhouses. His job has "absolutely no connection" to the allegations against the Monems, he said. Fred Monem didn't talk much about work but "told us he was doing consulting business" in Las Vegas, Graham said.

The Grahams weren't the only ones who said they were in the dark.

Prison supervisors were lauding Monem for his penny-pinching prowess. His spot market successes had helped slash the daily cost of food -- from nearly $4 per inmate in 1997 to $2.40 in the current budget period.

The program relied heavily on special rules designed to take advantage of the volatility of the food market and the short-term availability of "hot" prices. "For each and every buy, we ensure we are getting the best price by checking with vendors who have access to the same commodity," the Corrections Department said in a statement to The Oregonian.

According to the department, Monem would first find products, then a purchasing specialist would find at least two comparable price quotes and compare them against historic prices before issuing a contract. "Fred had no influence as to who the quotes were from," the agency told The Oregonian.

Williams told The Oregonian that Monem did not have unusual autonomy, and that other executives recalled nothing out of the ordinary. He said the agency is redoubling efforts to ensure that all purchasing rules are followed. Any internal reviews will start after the criminal investigation is completed, he said.

Prisoners noticed that something didn't seem right.

Since Monem took over, he's been named in at least 17 inmate lawsuits. In 2002, officials at the Eastern Oregon Correctional Institution in Pendleton investigated allegations that a package of frozen hot dogs had expired dates on the wrappings.

Nothing came of the investigation, and Monem, in an interview with The Oregonian at the time, chalked up the incident to past conflicts with personnel at the prison.

Among the lawsuits is a July 2005 case filed by prisoner Douglas B. Bennett claiming inmates are being fed "expired, putrefied foods." The file includes affidavits from eight prisoners, including kitchen workers, who complained of green bologna, sour milk, rotten fruit, moldy hamburger, discolored tomato paste, chicken that was thawed, frozen and re-thawed, and a list of long-expired items such as ketchup, salad dressing, meats and fish.

"Fred Monem," Bennett wrote, "has been sending food to feed inmates . . . that has expired or been marked 'bait fish only' or 'not for human consumption, animal feed' since 2002."

Bennett's lawsuit was dismissed last January by U.S. District Judge Anna Brown for procedural reasons. But Michelle Burrows, a Portland lawyer who frequently represents inmates, has heard similar complaints. One inmate, she said, sent her a list of food complaints and the label from a box of fish marked "bait."

"It was the inclusion of the box label that made everything else in the letter more credible," she said.

Barbara Holly, past president of the Association of Correctional Food Service Affiliates and the former food service administrator for Alabama's prison system, said it is highly unusual for prisons to buy distressed food.

"It's not a good practice, and you sometimes end up losing more than you get because it's usually just about to go out of date," she said. "It leaves you wide open for lawsuits as far as inmates go."

Holly said Alabama rules forbade her from buying in the spot food market.

Williams defended food quality in the Oregon system, which spends about $10 million a year on meals. The agency said the three food companies accused of kickbacks did $21 million in corrections business during the five years ending in 2006. That suggests they handled about 40 percent of the system's food expenditures.

DOJ_NMG_0123099

Contacted at their Salem home, Fred and Karen Monem declined to comment. Their Portland lawyer, David H. Angeli, said no one should jump to conclusions about the allegations against his client, who was placed on paid leave pending the outcome of the criminal investigation.

"I would hope," Angeli said, "state officials in Oregon remember that Fred Monem has saved this state millions of dollars through the innovative program he's put into place."

News researcher Lynne Palombo and reporter Ashbel Green contributed to this report. Michelle Roberts: 503-294-5041; michelleroberts @news.oregonian.com

Video Shows Coke Worker Taking Documents (WP/AP)

By Harry R. Weber, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, January 27, 2007

ATLANTA -- A former Coca-Cola secretary charged with conspiring to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant was caught on surveillance cameras removing documents from her office last June, sometimes late into the evening.

A Coca-Cola security expert testified Friday at Joya Williams' trial that a handful of concealed cameras were installed at the Atlanta-based company's headquarters to monitor Williams' movements in different parts of the sprawling complex.

The surveillance video, played for the jury on Friday, was made after Pepsi received a letter last May purportedly from a co-defendant in the case stating that the person was willing to sell confidential Coca-Cola documents and samples of products that Coca-Cola was developing to the highest bidder.

The government has alleged that Williams stole the materials from The Coca-Cola Co. and gave them to co-defendants Ibrahim Dimson and Edmund Duhaney as part of a conspiracy to sell the items to Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo Inc. for at least $1.5 million.

Williams faces up to 10 years in prison if convicted of conspiracy. Dimson and Duhaney have pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing. Williams' lawyer, Janice Singer, told reporters Friday her client intends to testify in her own defense as early as next week.

The surveillance that Coca-Cola conducted of Williams is a key part of the government's evidence against her.

Coca-Cola security expert Deborah Casey testified Friday that surveillance cameras were running between June 7, 2006, and July 5, 2006, the day Williams was arrested.

Video images displayed in court Friday show Williams placing papers in her bag, holding drink bottles in her hand, placing bottles on a cart in a confidential document room and stuffing gift tote bags in her personal bag. Some of the times she was removing materials occurred at night, between 8 p.m. and 10 p.m.

Under cross-examination by defense lawyer Singer, Casey said that other video clips show Williams doing routine work at her desk, making phone calls and carrying on her normal work day.

Casey also acknowledged that on June 27, when Williams is seen removing a box full of documents from the building, the box is open, and Williams walked past security with it. The lawyer is trying to show there was nothing nefarious about what Williams was doing.

Also Friday, a Coca-Cola scientist testified that some of the product samples that the three suspects are alleged to have tried to sell to Pepsi were under development and had not been launched yet.

In other testimony Friday, an FBI agent who questioned Williams the day she was arrested said Williams denied being part of a scheme to steal or sell Coke trade secrets. The agent, Joan Cronier, also told jurors that Williams denied giving any Coke documents to Dimson and Duhaney.

However, Cronier said she observed some Coke product bottles in Williams' apartment that she had never seen before, and she asked Williams where she got them.

"She said that those were collectors items and that everyone at Coca-Cola took that type of stuff," Cronier recalled.

Cronier also said that Williams told her she hadn't talked to Dimson for about a month prior to her July 5 arrest. Cronier said she then told Williams the FBI had phone records showing she talked to Dimson on June 20.

Cronier said Williams responded that "she didn't know anything about it."

Williams, who has pleaded not guilty, was fired from her job as an administrative assistant to Coca-Cola's global brand director after the allegations came to light.

Her former boss at Coke, Javier Sanchez Lamelas, testified Thursday that he didn't believe Williams had the know-how to commit the crime on her own.

The government is expected to wrap up its case Monday, prosecutor Byung J. Pak told U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester on Friday.

The defense will then have an opportunity to present its case.

Six Slain In D.C., Prince George's (WP)

By Mary Beth Sheridan And Rosalind S. Helderman

The Washington Post, January 29, 2007

Four men were killed in the District and two others were fatally shot in Prince George's County in a burst of violence Saturday night and early yesterday, police said.

There was no apparent connection between the six slayings, which included an attack with a baseball bat in Northwest Washington, an apparent robbery in Southeast Washington and a shooting in Oxon Hill, where a gunman fired several times through a sliding-glass door into a man's living room.

Police made an arrest in one of the six cases.

The incidents occurred just weeks after D.C. police announced that homicides had hit a 21-year low in 2006. Killings also declined sharply in Prince George's last year.

The office of D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty (D) said last night that Fenty, Police Chief Cathy L. Lanier and U.S. Attorney Jeffrey A. Taylor will hold a news conference this morning at the site of one of the slayings in Southeast to discuss "their commitment to solve murder investigations in the city and strategies to prevent future homicides."

Two of the weekend slayings occurred in or near Washington's central Shaw neighborhood, where residents have been complaining about a jump in gun violence.

At 10:30 p.m. Saturday, police discovered the body of a 29-year-old man, shot several times, in the first-floor stairwell of an apartment building in the 1500 block of Seventh Street NW, said Sgt. Joe Gentile, a police spokesman. He said police had no suspects in the killing of Deon A. Peoples, who lived in the 1400 block of V Street NW.

Court records show that Peoples was convicted in the 1990s of property destruction, assault and distribution of heroin and cocaine. His mother, Helen Peoples, said he had served jail time but had "turned his life around," becoming a hospital orderly.

Residents said the neighborhood has been plagued by gang violence in recent months. "People are comparing this to the crime waves in the late '80s, early '90s," said Carmen Gilotte. "It's just constant."

Another man was killed about 2:45 a.m. yesterday several blocks away, on 11th Street NW between M and N streets. The man was swinging a baseball bat at other men when one of them grabbed it and dealt him a fatal blow, Gentile said.

A security guard working nearby detained the alleged assailant, Herman Melendez, 21, who has been charged with murder, police said. The dead man's name was not known, nor was Melendez's address, police said.

The other killings in the District were east of the Anacostia River.

About 11:40 p.m. Saturday, police found the body of Kevin Vincent Bradshaw, 41, in the 800 block of Yuma Street SE. He was shot multiple times, police said. "One possibility they're looking at is robbery," Gentile said.

Bradshaw was apparently attacked as he walked home from a bus stop after undergoing kidney dialysis at Howard University Hospital, said his brother, Ricky Bradshaw. "He was a guy who was so good, never been in trouble, never did anything unlawful," he said.

Shortly after 3 a.m. yesterday, police responding to a call about gunfire discovered a man with gunshot wounds in an apartment building in the 300 block of 54th Street NE, Gentile said. The man, whose identity was unavailable, was declared dead at Prince George's Hospital Center, he said.

In Prince George's, a 20-year-old man was killed early yesterday while sitting on the couch in his Oxon Hill apartment, police said. Police responding to a call about 2 a.m. discovered that Darius David Berry had been shot several times through the sliding-glass door of his ground-floor apartment in the 900 block of Marcy Avenue. He died at the scene.

Cpl. Diane Richardson, a spokeswoman for the Prince George's police, said investigators did not know whether Berry was targeted or was the victim of a random shooting.

In Laurel, a man was fatally shot about 3 a.m. during an argument outside J's Sports Cafe in the 12600 block of Laurel Bowie Road, officials said. Richardson said off-duty police officers working security nearby were responding to the fight when they heard a shot.

The crowd scattered, leaving Travis Lashawn Robinson, 29, of Suitland, lying on the pavement, she said. Robinson was taken to a hospital and died a few hours later.

Staff researcher Rena Kirsch contributed to this report.

Money Trail Often Murky In Small-Town Courts (NYT)

By William Glaberson

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123101

As court clerk in the western New York village of Perry, Ruth Milks was in a prime spot to see the kind of big money that moves through the state's smallest courts. Her husband was the village justice, and Mrs. Milks — a former justice herself — collected the fines and fees.

She was also in a prime spot to cash in. Mrs. Milks started adding $35 to parking fines, recording the extra charge on the driver's receipt but not in her court files. By the time state auditors caught up with her in 2003 — only because she had fined one of them — they estimated she had pocketed at least $60,000, which investigators said she spent on gifts and a trip to a casino.

It is no secret that New York's justice courts — an unwieldy system of 1,250 town and village courts that dates back to Colonial days — have been troubled for a long time. Three-quarters of the justices are not lawyers, and state disciplinary records show that some have jailed defendants illegally and denied people basic legal rights. In recent months, the Legislature and state judicial officials have been scrambling to fix some of the courts' more obvious failings.

But one of the most intractable problems those officials face is the courts' miserable record with money, which has been lost, stolen or mishandled in case after case. State investigators have discovered financial records in disarray, missing or simply nonexistent.

It is easy to see why. More than $210 million passes through the justice courts each year in bail, fines and fees. But the part-time justices who are elected to preside in them, many with a high school diploma or less, receive about an hour of initial training in how to safeguard and keep track of the money. They and their clerks, if they have any, often get little supervision or resources, and the justices' pay can be as low as $2,000 a year.

The towns and villages that pay them are required by law to review the courts' books, but often fail to take even a cursory look. The officials who run New York's court system say they have neither the power nor the staff to carefully oversee the justice courts' finances, and even state disciplinary officials can do little more than punish the occasional justices whose crimes or errors come to light.

Small wonder, then, that some court officials have helped themselves. A clerk in Patchogue, a Long Island village with a busy justice court, was discovered stealing only after a new justice noticed a sharp drop in court revenues. A subsequent state audit in 2005 revealed that the clerk, Deborah Gustam-Williams, had made off with $37,500.

Patchogue's mayor, Paul V. Pontieri Jr., laid much of the blame on lax oversight at every level. "Give the fox the key to the henhouse," he said, "and he is going to eat hens."

Size of Problem Is Unclear

The sums that have been reported lost to fraud or ineptitude have tended to be small, but they loom large in the tiny budgets of the villages and towns. And state officials can only guess at the real extent of the problem, because the courts are so rarely scrutinized and the records are so often a shambles. A simple search of local newspaper accounts for this article showed that at least 23 justices or local court clerks have been charged with theft since 1986. And an examination of little-noticed reports by state auditors and disciplinary officials — who have punished 79 justices for financial misdeeds since 1979 — turned up every type of transgressor, from the mundane to the outlandish. Cases range from the Niagara town justice who billed both the state and the town for his judicial-training expenses, to the justice in the Hudson Valley town of Ancram who fled to Montana when faced with a 144-count indictment for methodically embezzling at least $9,000.

A Saratoga justice stashed court funds in his freezer, his shoes and several other unorthodox places. A justice in the Finger Lakes town of Ovid stowed thousands of dollars in a briefcase at home, while another, in the Catskill town of Shandaken, told investigators he had kept more than $1,000 in the trunk of his car. Then, he said, he gave the car away.

A justice in Gouverneur, near the Canadian border, let state disciplinary officials in on his unusual approach to the bail posted by defendants. "I used the money," he said. Another justice, in the Southern Tier town of Allegany, told them he saw nothing wrong with using court funds for his own purchases.

And in 2005, auditors from the state comptroller's office not only turned up a bookkeeping mess in the Southern Tier town of Genesee, but also unearthed undeposited checks that people had written to pay their fines. Some were nine years old.

For many years, those auditors were the state's best hope for maintaining some level of financial order in the justice courts. The comptroller's office audited each court every three or four years.

But the office abandoned that sweeping approach in the 1980s, partly in response to staff cuts and new pressures to monitor larger agencies, said Mark P. Pattison, a deputy state comptroller. Now, even as the number and complexity of the courts' transactions have increased, it conducts only a handful of justice court audits every year — 5 in 2005 and 14 in 2004 — though nearly every one has uncovered evidence of systemwide trouble.

The comptroller's office connected the dots last May, sounding an alarm that "the pervasiveness of these problems" was so great that the Legislature should make fundamental changes, like combining courts or forbidding many of the smallest courts to handle money at all.

DOJ_NMG_0123102

The cry was taken up by the state's chief judge, Judith S. Kaye, who issued a report in November saying the losses and thefts "raise difficult questions about the justice courts' financial integrity."

She imposed some modest new rules to tighten financial controls, and promised more training and resources for justices and clerks. But her report conceded that state court officials were powerless to do much more because the state divides responsibility for fiscal supervision among the towns, villages and several state agencies, none of which has the power to fully police the courts.

The money flows in constantly, much of it in cash: fines for speeding, fees paid by litigants in civil cases, bail and restitution from defendants. State rules require that courts quickly bank the payments, keep careful records, then forward the money and financial reports monthly to the state comptroller. The state sends some of the money back to the towns and counties, which helps lighten the load on local taxpayers.

It sounds straightforward enough. But it was apparently too much for Kerry R. Lockwood, a legal secretary and a high school graduate who in 1999 was elected justice in Plainfield, a town of 1,000 people near Cooperstown.

Although she handled, on average, fewer than four cases a month, her financial reports to the state were routinely late, some by nearly two years — even after the comptroller's office told the town board to stop paying her in May 2005 because of the chronic delinquency.

The State Commission on Judicial Conduct chased her, and her records, for an additional year and a half. She did not respond to several letters. When a commission investigator made an appointment to view her files, she stood him up, leaving a letter at the court saying she could not find many records. And when the commission called her in to testify as to why she should not be removed from office, she did not show up.

She resigned last year before the commission ordered her removal for fiscal negligence. Ms. Lockwood, like many justices and clerks, did not respond to a call seeking comment.

Even in as small a town as Plainfield, her story was familiar. In 1999, the commission removed another Plainfield town justice who was routinely late with remissions and reports: Joseph W. Kosina, a cattle farmer and high school graduate who fell so far behind in his paperwork that he asked the town's other justice to file financial reports on his cases. She fell behind, too.

In an interview last week, Mr. Kosina, 73, explained that he was "computer illiterate" and had been trying to juggle two other jobs. "I was raising beef and delivering the newspaper at 6 o'clock in the morning," he said.

A longtime town councilwoman, Larraine McNulty, said it was nearly impossible to find qualified candidates for the local judgeship, which pays $2,000 a year in Plainfield.

"These judges are in over their heads," she said.

Those with the luxury of court clerks sometimes turn over all the money matters to them. But the clerks are not much better prepared; though many receive some state training, it is not required. Many receive no guidance or oversight from their justices, and some do not want it.

In 2003, when state auditors told Amy P. Hontz, a justice in Angola, south of Buffalo, that her court's records were in disarray, with cash stuffed into some files and money missing, she told them quite a story herself: The court clerk, who had resigned, had kept all the records in her basement and limited the judge's access to them.

In its report last May, the state comptroller's office said that there were accounting and financial-review problems in all 12 courts it had studied, and that 10 justices did not understand some of their most basic financial responsibilities, like balancing accounts or determining the amount due to the state.

Even conscientious justices can get lost trying to dig out from the mistakes of past judges. When state auditors found flaws in the financial practices of the Arcadia Town Court, east of Rochester, in 2004, the two justices explained that they were carrying on a long tradition.

"Our books were maintained," they wrote, "as they were by our predecessors and their predecessors before that."

For many towns and villages, the money generated by the justice courts is an important source of income. So it stands to reason that they would take a keen interest in the courts' books.

But Judge Kaye's report in November noted that "many, if not most, localities do not perform full annual audits of justice court finances."

A few months earlier, the comptroller had revealed that only half of the town and village boards conducted audits, and that many local officials were unaware they were supposed to provide any fiscal oversight at all. He estimated that more than $5.2 million could be missing statewide, from about 430 justice courts, or more than one-third of the system.

Local governments pay a steep price for their lack of vigilance, as some towns have found again and again.

In Palermo, a small town north of Syracuse, local officials called in state auditors in 1998 after their justice, Kimberly Sesso, resigned and the court's canceled checks could not be found. The auditors concluded that $3,439 was missing, and advised the town board to do everything possible to step up its oversight.

DOJ_NMG_0123103

Seven years later the auditors were called back, this time to examine the work of the court clerk, Andrea Busko-Price, who pleaded guilty last May to falsifying court records and stealing at least $1,990. Despite their warning, the auditors concluded, court business had continued as usual.

The town supervisor, Ellen M. Jamerson, apologized and promised to do better. And the two sitting justices admitted that the court clerk had been given complete control over the money. But, they wrote, "in a small township such as Palermo with limited financial and human resources, it is not always feasible to do otherwise."

A Limited Proposal

In what she has called sweeping changes, Judge Kaye said her office would require towns and villages to audit their courts. But the punishment for not complying is less than sweeping: The list of delinquent local governments will be sent to the state comptroller's office — which long ago backed away from comprehensive policing of the courts.

To help fill the gap, Judge Kaye has directed the Office of Court Administration, which she heads, to hire 12 new auditors just for the justice courts.

For now, though, the task of policing the justices falls mostly to the Commission on Judicial Conduct. Although it investigates complaints about judges in all of the state's courts, more than 12 percent of its cases in the last three decades have involved financial mismanagement and theft in the justice courts.

But in legislative testimony last month, the commission's administrator, Robert H. Tembeckjian, said the lack of regular audits by the comptroller had left his investigators with few leads, and staff cuts over the years had put his agency "close to a breaking point."

Even when the commission suspects mismanagement or fraud, proving it can be difficult. Some justices have stonewalled, claiming their records are lost or refusing to meet with investigators.

State officials pursued the town justice in Paris, south of Utica, for nine months in 2001, with letters complaining that financial reports and deposits were late. The state persuaded the town board to stop his pay. Still, the justice, John R. Jarosz, did not bother to check his court clerk's financial records, the commission said, even though he had listed his occupation on a state questionnaire as "accountant."

Eventually, the commission found that the clerk had falsified her books to cover up for missing money. The clerk was the justice's wife.

She resigned. He paid back $3,200, and in 2003 the commission found he had failed to supervise her adequately and censured him, the most stringent punishment short of removal.

The Paris supervisor, Joseph F. Jerzak, said town board members were not pleased that the justice kept his job, but the town's lawyer told them they could do nothing about it.

Six months after his censure, Justice Jarosz was re-elected to another four-year term. The supervisor is a bit stumped. "It certainly doesn't seem very rational," Mr. Jerzak said.

The Apathetic FBI (WP)

The Washington Post, January 29, 2007

CONGRESS WASN'T the only institution whose performance fell short when it came to protecting teenage pages and former pages from the predatory behavior of former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.). A report by the Justice Department's inspector general depicts a disturbingly passive FBI response to creepy, albeit not sexually explicit, e-mails he sent to a former page. As with the lawmakers and staff who received early warnings of Mr. Foley's troubling behavior, the FBI agents who reviewed the messages seemed more interested in figuring out how to drop this hot potato than in taking steps that could have stopped the congressman.

The FBI did face a conundrum in dealing with the Foley e-mails. As its agents concluded, the e-mails on their face did not present evidence of criminal behavior. As a general matter, that's where the bureau's job should start and stop. No one wants a return to a J. Edgar Hoover-era FBI that feels empowered to rummage through people's private lives. As the agent in charge of the FBI's cyber crimes squad told the inspector general, the FBI needs to have a reasonable basis to believe that a crime is about to be committed before acting, because "we're the big, bad government."

But given that minors were involved, the FBI should have done more. The messages were disturbing enough to the former page that he forwarded them to a congressional staffer with the comment that they were "sick" and "freaked me out." The FBI agents who looked at them concluded, variously, that they were "odd" and "inappropriate"; one who read them remembered thinking, "What a freak."

As the report by Inspector General Glenn A. Fine concluded, the e-mails "provided enough troubling indications on their face, particularly given the position of trust and authority that Mr. Foley held with respect to House pages, that a better practice for the FBI would have been to take at least some follow-up steps with regard to the e-mails" -- interviewing the former page, notifying House officials in charge of the page program or at the very least telling the group that had forwarded them to the FBI, Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), that it did not plan to take any additional steps. "We are not the ethics police," the agent in charge of the cyber crimes unit told the inspector general. True, but as the report points out, the FBI's own guide to Internet safety points out that predators often "gradually seduce" their targets with attention and gifts.

DOJ_NMG_0123104

All too characteristically, when Mr. Foley's misbehavior came to light, the FBI blamed its inaction on incomplete and "heavily redacted" information provided by CREW and the organization's alleged refusal to provide additional details. As the report makes clear, that was not accurate. It was the FBI's apathy, not CREW's recalcitrance, that was at fault here.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Farm Boss Gets 30-year Term (MH)

By Ronnie Greene

The Miami Herald, January 29, 2007

The farm boss lured recruits from homeless shelters with promises of good work and steady pay, yet when the destitute arrived at the East Palatka camp of Ronald Evans Sr., they faced a different reality: a hovel-turned-open-market bazaar filled with crack, booze and cigarettes sold from the "company store." Evans docked workers' pay so steeply they pocketed just 30 cents on the dollar.

The workers, mostly black men recruited from Miami to Tampa and beyond, had become literally addicted to the camp, unable to flee until their debt was squared.

On Friday in Jacksonville federal court, Evans faced his penance: 30 years in prison, the longest sentence handed out for abuse of farmworkers in recent Florida history.

"Everyone realized this was an abhorrent act," said Paul I. Perez, U.S. attorney for the Middle District of Florida.

Evans, 59, had been convicted in August on 57 charges of engaging in a criminal enterprise, distributing crack cocaine, dealing in contraband, spoiling the environment, violating federal farmworker statutes and more than four dozen counts of improper financial transactions.

His two labor camps have been forfeited to the government, one in Florida and the other in Newton Grove, N.C., and Evans and his wife Jequita -- his co-defendant -- must hand over $1.1 million in ill-gotten gains.

The sentence handed out by U.S. District Judge Timothy J. Corrigan nearly closes a chapter on one of the most significant federal investigations into claims that workers toiling at the bottom of Florida's rich agricultural industry are often abused and sometimes held as virtual captives.

Evans' wife and son Ronald Evans Jr., both also convicted, will be sentenced next month. On Friday, one underling was given more than five years in prison, another one a year, a third probation and a fourth awaits sentencing.

In 2003, a Miami Herald investigation, Fields of Despair, exposed the rank exploitation of laborers at North Florida farmworker camps, including the practices of crew leaders like Evans. Growers hire these bosses to supply laborers to work the fields and to house and transport them.

The Miami Herald found that Florida had the most scofflaw farm labor contractors in the United States -- more than four of every 10.

`LIKE A SLAVE CAMP'

"It was more like a slave camp. After he gets you there, he's got you," one former Evans worker, recruited from a Tampa Salvation Army shelter, told the newspaper in 2003. ``A couple of guys said they owed $10,000. You might as well owe them your soul, because where can you go?"

U.S. Attorney Perez said the government's investigation was prompted by the newspaper's series.

"We jumped on what you guys exposed," Perez said after the sentencing.

In 2003, the FBI launched a criminal investigation, later to be joined by the U.S. Department of Labor, Environmental Protection Agency and others.

"Several laborers told agents that when laborers became indebted to the Evans Labor Camp, they were not allowed to leave," court records say.

In 2005 a team of agents raided the East Palatka housing camp, gathering evidence including purple spiral notebooks listing the "line" purchases made at the camp each night after dinner and itemizing the amounts "made," "owed," and "balance" due.

'Trusted employees distributed the items and kept careful records. . . . The Evanses deducted the purchases from the laborers' pay envelopes on Saturday, keeping a very large majority of the laborers in perpetual debt and poverty."

Evans charged the laborers $50 a week for room and board, paid them at or near minimum wage, and then deducted hundreds or thousands for their purchases at the company store. Advances of crack cocaine were available on payday, stuffed into the workers' envelopes, the government said.

"The motive behind this business model was wholly economic, designed to drive down labor costs and to turn payment to the laborers into another source of profit," the U.S. Attorney's Office wrote.

CASH FOR CRACK

When Evans needed cash to buy crack, he cashed checks written by farmer clients -- hiding the true intent of the money. "Because large cash transactions must be reported by financial institutions, the defendants instructed the farmers to structure the payments to comply with the reporting requirements," the U.S. attorney wrote.

From 2001 to 2005, Evans and his wife cashed dozens of checks at just under $10,000, the threshold for detailed disclosure -- some for $9,960, $9,996 or $9,999. After his 2005 indictment, the feds say, Evans obstructed justice by persuading one farmer to lie to Internal Revenue Service agents.

The jury also convicted Evans of violating the Clean Water Act after he directed that a large PVC pipe be connected to the camp's septic tanks.

"The pipe continuously carried raw, untreated human excrement underground for some distance and then deposited it directly into Cow Creek," which flows into the St. Johns River, the feds said.

Two other counts say Evans employed unauthorized drivers to transport laborers.

On Friday Evans' lawyers argued for leniency, saying he had actually helped down-on-their luck laborers in need of work. The government countered that he, in fact, had exploited the most vulnerable.

The case was prosecuted by Assistant U.S. Attorney John Sciortino of Jacksonville and Susan French of the U.S. Department of Justice's Civil Rights Division, and included work by the Drug Enforcement Administration and Putnam County Sheriff's Office.

Worker advocates say the prison terms send a message.

"The farmworkers in East Palatka or Fort Pierce . . . maybe will have some recognition there's a real possibility of the government doing something to stop their abusers," said Lisa Butler, an attorney with Florida Rural Legal Services who has brought lawsuits on behalf of laborers against crew bosses and growers in North Florida.

After 'Hate-crime' Melee, Calm Eludes Quaker School (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks, Staff Writer Of The Christian Science Monitor

The Christian Science Monitor, January 29, 2007

Guilford College tries to reaffirm its values after an alleged attack on three Palestinian students.

GREENSBORO, N.C.

Like the banners condemning hate and the chalked peace signs on sidewalks, the makeshift scarecrow that stands on the tree-lined Guilford College campus is a testament to the trauma gripping this small Quaker school, as well its determination to heal.

With a mop for hair and a cardboard-box face, the scarecrow wears a sign inviting students to "Write the definition of community." Pinned to the corkboard hanging around its neck are scraps of paper with words like "Tolerance," "Accepting of all," and "Well-being."

The community scarecrow, as it's called, was erected last week by students after at least five members of the school's football team were accused of attacking three Palestinian students. According to court documents, the players allegedly beat the students with feet, fists, and brass knuckles, while calling them "terrorists" and racial epithets.

This coming week, the FBI and local prosecutors will begin interviewing football players. They'll also interview the three alleged victims.

Five of the football players have already been charged with assault and battery, as well as "ethnic intimidation," North Carolina's formal name for its hate-crimes law. The FBI is also investigating whether the Palestinian students' civil rights were violated.

The altercation shocked the campus and the surrounding community – in no small measure because Guilford is dedicated to core Quaker values like diversity, integrity, and community. It also has a long history of recruiting Palestinians from the Friends Schools in the West Bank, offering them scholarships and paths to a new life.

National hate-crime experts contend the fact that such an alleged attack could take place at a school like Guilford – voted by Newsweek as the "hottest for social conscience" in 2006 – is a reflection of how deeply distrust of Islam now permeates the United States. For data, they point to polls, such as one done by CBS last April. It found that 45 percent of Americans now have a negative view of Islam – more than 9 percentage points higher than in the tense months following the 9/11 attacks. And a

DOJ_NMG_0123106

Washington Post poll found that the number of Americans who believe Islam stokes violence has more than doubled – from 14 percent in January 2002 to 33 percent in March 2006.

"What we have here is a climate where Islamaphobia is not only considered mainstream, it's considered patriotic by some, and that's something that makes these kinds of attacks even more despicable," says Brian Levin, director of the Center for the Study of Hate and Extremism at the University of California at San Bernadino.

The only facts not in dispute surrounding the events of that late Saturday night at Guilford are that a fight occurred, racial slurs were thrown as well as fists, and people were hurt. The three Palestinian students, one of whom was a visitor from North Carolina State University, all sustained concussions and contusions. One also has a broken jaw, another a broken nose. And a third has back injuries. All have been released from the hospital.

"At the end of the day, we believe the facts will show they were attacked by a group of individuals, and it was an unprovoked attack," says Seth Cohen, a lawyer who is representing the Palestinian students.

The father of one of the football players, who was arrested and charged, released a picture to the media that showed his son had a bruise shaped like a belt buckle on his back. He says that is proof the football players were not the only culpable ones. In a statement released to the media last Friday, he wrote: "When all of the facts are revealed, we believe that those who are sensationalizing this story will be rightly embarrassed...."

The college administration, which has its own independent investigation under way, is determined to quell the excited emotions on both sides of the debate. It has said it will not pass any judgments until its review is complete.

"We seek truth, justice, and reconciliation," Guilford College President Kent Chabotar told students at an open forum last Wednesday. "Those are hard – impossible to achieve without due process and without listening to each other."

That determination to uphold the Quaker value of patience has angered some students at Guilford who believe that the college should be moving faster to label the incident a hate crime. During the past week, they've held candlelight vigils, staged a one-day boycott of classes, and held repeated meetings with top college officials.

"If there's one thing almost everybody ... agrees on, is that it was a hate crime," says Yuri Woodstock, a freshman from Roanoke, Va.

Other students believe the school is handling things well. And they've found their colleagues' way of expressing their anger inappropriate.

"Despite being somewhat displeased with the almost irrational initial reaction, I was also pleased to see that people actually cared," says Wes Corning, a senior from Washington, D.C., and president of the school's Community Senate. "It's formed into a real sign that the students like to protect Guilford and all it stands for – they do take the Quaker values really seriously here."

Those values have also helped the local Muslim-American community, which has always had good relations with the college, come to terms with the incident.

"If it had happened at any other college, I'd be standing on the corner raising [a ruckus]," says Isa Abuzuaiter, chairman of the Board of the Islamic Center of the Triad, which represents the estimated 10,000 Muslims in the Greensboro area. "But it's Guilford, and so we really don't know what to do."

Mr. Abuzuaiter and others in the area are doing their best to support the three students. But they are worried about the impact of the incident on their own children. His son Michael, who was born and raised in Greensboro, plays football for Guilford's archrival, Greensboro College.

"Would these players take revenge on my son and try to hurt him on the field? I don't know," he says.

But he and his colleagues are also optimistic about the future for Muslims in America, despite the current climate. And one reason, they say, is the way that Guilford College and its students are responding to the incident.

"The Quakers are our friends. They have always opened their hearts to us," says Badi Ali, president of the Islamic Center. "What we're seeing now is the fruit of those years of cooperation.... We need more education and exposure to each other. We need to stand up for victims and to challenge the racist mood in this country."

'Hate Crime' Of Beatings Divides A Campus (NYT)

By Eddie Huffman

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

GREENSBORO, N.C., Jan. 26 — In this business-minded Southern city that looks more like a sprawling suburb, Guilford College stands out like a hippie commune, a Quaker liberal arts school where students call professors by their first names and regularly stage antiwar protests.

"I regard Guilford as a kind of sanctuary from the madness of the outside world," said Parke Puterbaugh, 51, who began teaching a course about the history of rock music last fall. "A different environment altogether. Dreadlocks, flannel shirts, liberal outlooks and a high tolerance for people's backgrounds and lifestyle choices."

"That is what makes this ugly incident so abhorrent to so many on campus," Mr. Puterbaugh said. "It goes against the core values."

The "ugly incident" occurred outside a dormitory early last Saturday. The police say a group of football players from the college — estimates range from 5 to 15 — beat up three Palestinian students, two of whom are among those who come to Guilford from a Quaker high school in the West Bank city of Ramallah. The third was a friend who attends North Carolina State University in Raleigh.

There has been a great deal of speculation but no official confirmation of a motive for the attack. The police said the injured students first refused public safety officers' urgings that they seek medical treatment. The next day, though, a victim said, they were treated for injuries, including concussions and nerve damage, and told the police that they wanted to press charges.

As of Friday, Greensboro police had filed charges against five football players, primarily for assault and ethnic intimidation. The Federal Bureau of Investigation said it had begun an investigation to determine whether the attack was a hate crime.

Since the attack, several students, including members of minorities, have worn T-shirts saying, "I don't feel safe here," and, "Hate crimes happen at Guilford College."

And one victim, along with Guilford's director of multicultural education, Sekinah Hamlin, has called the incident a hate crime. Students and faculty and staff members have come together in customary Quaker fashion — for a worship service at the New Garden Friends Meeting House near the site of an Underground Railroad station across from the campus, for discussions where all were encouraged to speak and for a daytime vigil. A loose confederation of activist students organized a walkout from classes on Thursday in solidarity with the crime victims.

While some students praise Ms. Hamlin as trying to create a safe atmosphere for minority students to voice their concerns after the beatings, others, including friends of several athletes on campus, accuse her and some students of fostering a divisive, fearful atmosphere.

"It's just driving a wedge between us," said Emily Bradford, 20, a third-year anthropology, sociology and forensic science major from Hillsborough. "That's not what Guilford is all about. That's not what community is all about."

Even the most ardent activists say the incident has led to a lot of stereotyping and name-calling.

"I have a friend who's a footballer," said Casey Thomas, 18, a freshman from Queens. "He wasn't even here that weekend, but he said someone came up and just cursed him out — lectured him."

In spite of the divisions, students across campus sounded remarkably similar themes on Friday, whether at a tiny liberal hangout called the Greenleaf Cafe, a dorm-basement co-op or at the sprawling dining room in Founders Hall. All expressed the desire for everyone to stop stereotyping the attack or anyone involved in it and for people not to rush to judgment but instead have the patience to let the investigative process work itself out.

"Getting to the truth is going to be a process," said Lili Sharpless, 21, a third-year student from Germantown, Pa. "You have to trust that. A lot of people feel the football players should be suspended without going through the process."

Ms. Thomas expressed a similar idea, lamenting divisions among students that she thinks are superficial and wrongheaded.

"This is not a clique war," she said. "This is not a hippie vs. athlete thing."

Woman's Crusade Against Bar Spawns Free Speech Case (LAT)

By Maura Dolan

The Los Angeles Times, January 29, 2007

The most important free speech case now before the California Supreme Court carries neither the heft of the Pentagon Papers nor the emotion of Nazis seeking to marching in Skokie, Ill.

In fact, the figure at the center of the case, a Christian evangelist in Newport Beach, makes an highly unlikely 1st Amendment hero. Anne Lemen, 58, says she doesn't care about free speech, or the constitutional question that her case, like the Pentagon Papers before it, poses: When may government prevent speech before it has occurred?

Lemen just wants to tell people that she believes her nemesis, the Balboa Island Village Inn, is mafia, as are her ex-husband and the guards at a local church, and the police are in cahoots, And, she wonders aloud, why would anyone accuse an innocent Christian woman of lying?

On top of that, Lemen contended, "the bar," as she calls the Village Inn, has attempted to murder her.

Lemen owns a cottage only feet from the restaurant (and led a campaign to restrict it because she said it disrupted the neighborhood. Aric Toll, 41, a chef who bought the restaurant and bar with his parents, filed a defamation lawsuit against Lemen, saying she was ruining his business.

After a trial, a judge ordered Lemen to stop videotaping Toll's customers and barred her from telling anyone that the bar makes sex videos, dabbles in child pornography, distributes illegal drugs, encourages lesbian activities, has mafia links, is a whorehouse and sells tainted food — all false statements, the court said, that Lemen had made. She appealed the order before it could be enforced.

Courts around the country have disagreed over whether "prior restraint" orders in defamation cases are constitutional, and cases involving them are multiplying as people sue to stop defamation on the Internet. The U.S. Supreme Court has upheld prior restraint in cases of national security and obscenity, but not in a defamation complaint. When it took up the question in a case brought by the late Johnnie Cochran against a picketer, the high court said only that the order against the picketer was unconstitutionally broad.

Duke University constitutional law professor Erwin Chemerinsky is paying his own way to California and working free of charge to tell the California Supreme Court today that the order violates Lemen's right to free speech.

If Lemen loses, such court orders might become "a regular remedy in defamation cases," Chemerinsky said. Newspapers could even be barred from covering a person who won one, he said. In his view, the only appropriate remedy for defamation is monetary damages.

But J. Scott Russo, who will represent the Village Inn at the hearing, said the order was Toll's only way to stop Lemen from hurting his business. He said Toll did not ask for damages because it was impossible to specify how much money Lemen had cost him..

"It's ridiculous that someone can stand in front of a restaurant and tell patrons that the food makes you sick and that they sell drugs and have prostitution, and a court would have its hands tied and could not say, 'Stop,' " Russo said.

Balboa Island is a densely packed maze of small but expensive homes close to merchants. The island's reputation for rowdy nightlife has given way to a more sedate atmosphere as rising home prices have turned vacation rentals into year-round homes.

The bar has been on Marine Avenue since the 1930s, and regulars reportedly included James Cagney, Humphrey Bogart and Bing Crosby. Lemen's dispute with Toll began when he and his family purchased it in November 2000. Some neighbors, included Leman, had feuded with the previous owner as well.

Lemen, who owns the two-unit cottage a narrow alley away from the restaurant, began harassing Toll's employees and patrons, calling them "whores" and "Satan," videotaping departing customers going to their cars and taking flash photographs through the restaurant's windows, Toll said.

Later, she helped organize a campaign to stop the city from granting the bar an expanded entertainment license to expand the restaurant's entertainment permit.

.

A burly, reserved man who prefers to work in the kitchen rather than the "front of the house," Toll said there was "no way" he would have bought Village Inn if he had been warned about Lemen.

She once parked in front of his restaurant and blasted the horn for 30 minutes nonstop, he said. On another evening, he said, he watched as passersby scanned his window menu and then fled after Lemen told them the food was poisonous and the place filled with rats.

"I decided something had to be done," said Toll, seated in his mostly deserted dining room on a Sunday night.

Although Lemen continues to deny most of the allegations, the trial judge found otherwise. A Court of Appeal later struck down much of his order on 1st Amendment grounds, including the part that blocked her from disparaging the bar. The court left in place a prohibition against videotaping within 25 feet of the bar.

The California Supreme Court will rule on the case within three months. If it upholds the order, Lemen could be jailed or fined for making the banned statements in the future.

"All you need to win in court are two liars, one to back up the other, against the nice innocent Christian woman," said Lemen who wears her blond hair in a page boy with bangs.

Lemen talks at breakneck speed and sometimes bursts into a religious hymn or dances to the ring of her cellphone. "You should write this down," she repeatedly tells a reporter.

Her Balboa Island home, which she purchased in 1989 and now rents out, has a colorful front garden of fake flowers and a replica of the Statue of Liberty holding the Bible. The garden also contains a large stone Bible with Christian verses and a statue of a lighthouse with the words, "The Lord is our Light." Little booklets about Christianity, titled "Smile, Jesus Loves You," are there for passersby to pick up.

On the front of the cottage hangs a large silver circle emblazoned with an eagle and the words "In God We Trust". She said she put it up after hearing that civil libertarians opposed the mention of God on money.

"I decided I am going to make that a Christian heritage house for you, my Lord," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0123109

During a recent conversation, she suggested she pose "for fun" in a plastic crown with a torch she retrieved from the cottage basement. So adorned, she put her arm around her frontyard Statue of Liberty and belted out religious hymns as people walked by and stared.

Although she is the subject of a major constitutional court case, Lemen doesn't particularly like lawyers — "they are all about money" — and complains that her own lawyer, D. Michael Bush, cares only about free speech and becoming "famous" because of it.

She would prefer her lawyers to focus on "what the bar has been up to."

"What's an attorney if he won't defend you?" Lemen said. "I don't want free speech."

Lemen's lawyers point out that she made many of the disputed statements as part of her campaign against the bar's expanded license, a matter of widespread public interest. She gathered about 400 signatures from the island's 1,200 residents to oppose the permit, but the bar won anyway.

The neighbors now enjoy good relations with Toll's Village Inn, and Lemen said the bar became quieter as a result of her efforts. Lemen, who said she was a registered nurse with grown children, believes she has paid a big price for speaking out.

"There have been four attempts on my life, and the police refuse to investigate because they are part of the bar," she said.

Business owners and residents in the neighborhood praised the owner of the Village Inn and criticized Lemen in interviews. None would be identified. "I don't want her coming after my business," said one.

Another neighbor said of Lemen, "She's just goofy, honey." The neighbor described the owner of the bar as "that poor guy."

Another longtime resident said the bar was not the problem, "It's her. She is just a very unique individual. You just try to stay clear of her."

While renting out her cottage — she said the bar drove her to move — Lemen lives in a gated, adult community miles away from Balboa Island.

There she stores piles of documents about the bar and evidence she has gathered. She asked a Times photographer not to photograph her files because "the bar is gong to break in and take this" if the presence of the files becomes known.

Lemen popped a videotape into her television to show scenes of crowds of young adults in the early morning hours outside the bar several years ago. A young woman in the crowd wore a halter top.

"Look at how she dresses," Lemen gasped.

Some Christian friends of Lemen have been trying to help her. Craig W. Fletcher, who showed up at Lemen's apartment, said he was there for her protection. He described her as his best friend, later adding that he had known her for two months.

"She's really a cross between Florence Nightingale, Joan of Arc and Erin Brockovich," Fletcher said.

Bush, her primary lawyer, said the First Amendment should protect "vulnerable" people like Lemen, who "is just not an effective advocate for herself and could be crushed."

"A kernel of truth can come from the most unlikely sources, which is why I think it is important to have the most free and robust debate," Bush said. "Who knows? Even Anne Lemen might have something to say."

maura.dolan@latimes.com

ANTITRUST:

US Air Works To Save Delta Bid (WSJ)

By Corey Dade, Melanie Trottman, And Susan Carey

The Wall Street Journal, January 29, 2007

US Airways Group Inc. is willing to increase its hostile takeover offer for Delta Air Lines Inc. by $1 billion under certain conditions as part of a last-ditch effort to win support from Delta creditors, according to people familiar with the matter.

The Tempe, Ariz., carrier said over the weekend that it would sweeten its $9.8 billion cash-and-stock bid to about $10.8 billion if the official committee of creditors approaches Delta with a demand that the Atlanta airline open itself to due diligence by US Airways, these people said. To get the additional $1 billion, all in cash, the committee also would have to ask a bankruptcy judge to postpone a hearing next week on Delta's restructuring plan, these people said. The group also would have to agree to support the start of a formal antitrust review.

· The News: US Airways is willing to raise its hostile offer for Delta by $1 billion.

· The Conditions: The official creditors' committee must demand that Delta open itself to due diligence by US Airways. The committee also would have to ask a bankruptcy judge to postpone a hearing on Delta's restructuring plan.

· What's at Stake: The move is aimed at salvaging an acquisition attempt that so far has failed to win broad support from the creditors' committee.

The move by US Airways is aimed at salvaging an acquisition attempt that so far has failed to win broad support from the official committee of Delta creditors, which holds much of the power to decide the airline's fate. The offer from US Airways is set to expire Thursday, and Delta could begin soliciting votes from creditors for its stand-alone reorganization plan following the Feb. 7 court hearing. Gerald Grinstein, Delta's chief executive, has insisted that the airline would be best to emerge from bankruptcy-court protection on its own later this year.

US Airways indicated that the $10.8 billion bid was final, said one person familiar with the matter. This person said the airline didn't consider the increased bid official since it hadn't yet sought director approval.

A spokeswoman for US Airways confirmed that the airline's advisers have been in contact with advisers for the ad hoc committee of Delta creditors, but she declined to comment on any specifics. A Delta spokesman declined to comment.

It isn't known whether the additional $1 billion is swaying any of the Delta creditors on the official committee closer to supporting the US Airways takeover bid. Any sign that the committee is wavering in its endorsement of Delta's strategy to exit from bankruptcy protection on its own this spring would likely have to emerge in the next several days.

The sweetened offer came after US Airways was approached late Friday by a group of Delta creditors that aren't part of the official committee, said the people familiar with the matter. The outside group, consisting largely of short-term investors who are more interested in the US Airways takeover than the official committee, proposed that the bid be increased by more than $2 billion, these people said. The ad hoc group also indicated that some of its members would be willing to publicly state their support for the acquisition.

On Saturday, US Airways responded with its offer of an additional $1 billion in cash, bringing the total cash portion of the bid to about $6 billion, these people said. US Airways wouldn't increase the number of shares from the previous offer of 89.5 million, but it included a termination fee that would be paid to Delta creditors if the deal is blocked by the Justice Department for anticompetitive reasons.

Write to Corey Dade at corey.dade@wsj.com1, Melanie Trottman at melanie.trottman@wsj.com2 and Susan Carey at susan.carey@wsj.com3

Levi's Turns To Suing Its Rivals (NYT)

By Michael Barbaro And Julie Creswell

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

United States Patent and Trademark No. 1,139,254 is not much to look at: a pentagon surrounding a childlike drawing of a seagull in flight.

But the design for a Levi's pocket, first used 133 years ago, has become the biggest legal battleground in American fashion.

Levi Strauss claims that legions of competitors have stolen its signature denim stitches — two intersecting arcs and a cloth label — for their own pockets, slapping them on the seats of high-priced, hip-hugging jeans that have soared in popularity.

So Levi's is becoming a leader in a new arena: lawsuits. The company, once the undisputed king of denim and now a case study in missed opportunities, has emerged as the most litigious in the apparel industry when it comes to trademark infringement lawsuits, firing off nearly 100 against its competitors since 2001. That's far more than General Motors, Walt Disney or Nike, according to an analysis by research firm Thomson West.

The legal scuffles offer a rare glimpse into the sharp-elbowed world of fashion, where the line between inspiration and imitation is razor thin. After all, clothing makers' trade secrets are hung on store racks for all to see, and designs can be quickly copied with small changes to exploit a hot trend.

The lawsuits, which Levi's says it is compelled to file to safeguard the defining features on its jeans, are not about the money — one settled for just $5,000 in damages. Instead, the company says, they are about removing copycats from stores. Nearly all the cases have settled out of court, with Levi's smaller rivals agreeing to stop making the offending pants and to destroy unsold pairs.

But those competitors say the lawsuits are the last resort of a poor loser, a company that has lost billions in sales, laid off thousands of workers and flirted with bankruptcy as the denim industry exploded.

"They missed the boat," said Tonny Sorensen, chief executive of Von Dutch Originals, a six-year-old denim and clothing manufacturer sued by Levi's six months ago for allegedly borrowing the company's double arcs for a back-pocket design. "Now they want to make a lot of noise and scare people away."

Mr. Sorensen said his pocket design "did not look like Levi's at all" because of subtle differences like placing the arcs "one inch to the left" and stitching a line to resemble "a pirate's hook."

Nevertheless, Von Dutch agreed to remove the jeans from dozens of boutiques and destroy hundreds of unsold pairs. "It was one style and it was not that successful anyway, so we made the decision not to fight it," Mr. Sorensen said.

In the majority of cases, Levi's accuses competitors of copying its design of two arcs that meet in the center of the pocket or its famous Levi's tab, a folded piece of cloth sewn into the vertical seam of the garment.

Robert Hanson, Levi's president for North America, said the company manufactured "a product that a lot of people are copying and copying with a lot of success."

Instead of relying on Levi's designs for what he called a "running start," competitors should "look for other devices that don't come remotely close to the Levi's trademarks," Mr. Hanson said. "Be more innovative."

But the privately held Levi's, whose founder sewed together the first pair of jeans in 1873, has been unable to exploit the latest $200-a-pair denim craze — and now claims scores of smaller competitors are riding high because of what it created. When consumers' tastes shifted toward designer jeans that were bejeweled, torn and frayed, Levi's was still selling basic $30 pairs at K-Mart.

In this dispute, back-pocket stitching has become the fashion equivalent of ink blots, with plaintiffs and defendants seeing in the new designs what they want, or need, to see. So far, Levi's view is prevailing.

The company's team of denim detectives — there are 40 across the world, scouring boutiques and department stores — has spotted what they considered offending stitches on jeans from the biggest names in the clothing business: Guess, Zegna, Esprit, Lucky Brand and Zumiez, to name a few.

Even companies that have painstakingly worked to avoid infringing on Levi's trademarks have found themselves in the company's crosshairs. At Rock & Republic, one of the country's fastest-growing jeans makers, designers intentionally placed a cloth label on the right hand side of a back pocket, not the left, which would violate a Levi's trademark.

Levi's sued anyway, arguing its trademarks forbid placing such a label on a vertical seam of a back-pocket. During a tense, five-hour settlement discussion in San Francisco several weeks ago, the chief executive of Rock and Republic, Michael Ball, upbraided Levi's lawyers for their aggressive tactics.

"I take it personally that you try to dictate how I design my jeans," he recalled saying. Still, Mr. Ball said he agreed to stop placing the label on the vertical seam of a right-hand pocket for two years to avoid a drawn-out legal battle.

In an interview, Mr. Ball said his back-pocket stitching "was not remotely close to Levi's" and that he agreed to a settlement, in part, because "I will get bored with that design soon anyway."

Executives at Levi's concede they missed important fashion trends as the denim industry ballooned over the last several years, but they deny the lawsuits are connected to any downturn in their business.

Instead, they say they are simply trying to preserve their intellectual property. Like pharmaceutical companies that sue generic drug makers over their patents or technology companies that duke it out over who owns the right to microchip designs, Levi's says it is trying to protect its most valuable asset, its trademarks.

Clothing companies have battled counterfeiters and each other for decades over design trademarks. Lacoste has defended its alligator, Polo Ralph Lauren fights for its polo player and Nike fiercely protects its famous swoosh.

In that respect, Levi's is no different. As far back as the 1970s, it sued the firm that made Wrangler jeans over the use of identifying tabs on clothing. "We protected our trademarks when business has been terrific and when it's been difficult," said Mr. Hanson.

Yet difficult only begins to describe Levi's business today, after it failed to exploit the designer denim boom in what is widely regarded as one of the biggest debacles in the American clothing business. Levi's sales have plummeted more than 40 percent since 1996 to $4.1 billion, forcing it to close dozens of factories and lay off nearly half of its workforce, or 7,600 employees, in the last five years.

The clothing company faced two major problems over the last decade. Its image and brand — button fly, rugged, and all-around bad-boy cool — was largely built for men, its jeans cut boxy and loose- fitting. At the same time, the company, which once distributed its jeans largely through department stores catering to the rich, had shifted into lower-priced retailers like J.C. Penney, Sears and Wal-Mart.

In the mid-1990s, though, the denim industry underwent a seismic shift as small upstarts began designing tight-fitting, feature-flattering women's jeans and distributing them through luxury boutiques and department stores.

Women suddenly began snapping up jeans from manufacturers like 7 for All Mankind and True Religion that cost more than six times what Levi's charged. Levi's did not produce a premium denim line, Capital E, until just last year.

"The emergence of all this denim sold at astronomical prices simply passed them by," said David Wolfe, creative director of the Doneger Group, a fashion consulting firm in Manhattan. "They should have jumped on the bandwagon but they did not even seem to see the bandwagon rolling, which amazed everyone in the fashion industry."

DOJ_NMG_0123112

The denim manufacturers who recognized the trend openly concede that Levi's has served as an inspiration, if not template, for their products.

"Everyone is borrowing from them, it's inevitable," said Michael Silver, the founder of Silver Jeans, who has had several legal run-ins with Levi's. "They should be happy that people are copying them," he said.

But Levi's is not flattered. "The value of the brand will become diluted if the marketplace becomes crowded with products with similar tabs or stitching to ours," said Thomas M. Onda, a global intellectual property lawyer for Levi's.

So employees at Levi's keep walking into stores and scanning the racks for rivals who dare to stray to close its trademarks, as Steven Shaul, the founder and chief executive of Jelessy Jeans, learned when he slapped several intersecting arcs on a back pocket.

At the time, Mr. Shaul, who loves Levi's and wears its jeans all the time, was confident his design bore no resemblance to the Levi's trademark. "It was not even close," said Mr. Shaul, whose jeans sell for between $200 and $400 a pair.

"It was an original design," he said. "Why would I use Levi's stitching? If my jeans sell for $200, I would not knock off $40 jeans from Levi's."

Nevertheless, Levi's sued in 2005. "The first night after I was sued by them I couldn't sleep," he said. "The second night, no sleep again. Then I started talking to people in the industry and I realized, hey, everyone's been sued by Levi."

Relieved, he quickly settled the case, agreeing not to sell jeans with the offending stitches. "I did not even hire a lawyer," he said.

View Of Media Ownership Limits Changes (USAT)

By David Lieberman

USA Today, January 29, 2007

NEW YORK — When members of the Federal Communications Commission look at TV stations these days, they aren't just kicking back to watch American Idol or Heroes.

Regulators are about to reassess their rules on who can own stations and how many — a review they are legally bound to do every four years. And to rule on the most controversial proposals, they must determine how much damage — if any — the Internet and other new media are inflicting on local stations, which collectively had an estimated $26 billion in ad sales last year.

If officials conclude that competition from the digital world threatens local TV, they might decide it's OK to ease the rules and let companies own multiple stations in a market, or let a newspaper buy a station in its town.

Broadcasters and newspaper companies (including USA TODAY parent Gannett, the largest newspaper publisher and a major owner of TV stations) are lobbying for that.

"If you get rid of the newspaper-broadcast cross-ownership rule, it maximizes the chance for better local news in a community," says Newspaper Association of America CEO John Sturm.

But the case for change becomes weaker if, as many consumer advocates say, stations still generate healthy cash flows and dominate local news.

"A small handful of giants determine what the American people see, hear and read," Sen. Bernard Sanders, I-Vt., said this month at the National Conference for Media Reform, a gathering in Memphis of 3,500 activists.

They fear that once the rules are relaxed, big companies will consolidate even more. "I think that we need greater diversification in the media," Sanders says. "I think we've got to stop media deregulation, big time."

While the issues are important, some can't help but look at this year's debate with skepticism.

"The term 'media monopoly' has meaning, it's had meaning for 60 years, but I think the content of the term is changing," former FCC chairman Reed Hundt says.

" 'Media monopoly' seems now to be about whether you can use the Internet for free or whether there's any limit on what you can send over the Internet," he adds. "The issues of the last 10 years don't have that much resonance anymore."

Even so, opponents of relaxing the rules seem to feel good about their chances of winning the debate — if not at the FCC, then in the newly Democrat-run Congress.

"The best thing we can do is to play offense," FCC Commissioner Michael Copps, one of the two Democrats on the five-member body, told the gathering in Memphis. "We really have this golden opportunity right now. The American people understand what media consolidation is all about."

Many major media companies are looking to downsize and invest in new media, not increase their bets on over-the-air broadcasting. In the last two years, Knight Ridder was sold and broken up, Viacom split into two companies, and Clear Channel decided to go private. Tribune Co. now is trying to figure out which of these paths to take.

The situation may be one reason some companies appear to be investing only a little political capital fighting for the right to grow.

DOJ_NMG_0123113

ABC owner Disney, for one, told the FCC that it's sitting out this year's broadcast ownership fight.

"I haven't seen the same kind of lobbying (to relax ownership caps) that there used to be," says former FCC official Blair Levin, now a managing director at Stifel Nicolaus. "You don't see a lot of people saying, 'Why hasn't (FCC Chairman) Kevin Martin moved on this?' "

Still, the FCC must grapple with the ownership rules. Beyond the legally required quadrennial reassessment, it also has to revisit its decision in 2003 to relax the rules that bar ownership of multiple stations in a market and that prevent a company from owning a newspaper and TV station in the same market. A U.S. Appeals Court sent the rule changes back, saying that the regulators hadn't adequately justified their decisions.

Martin appears determined to loosen or repeal the rule affecting newspapers and stations.

That's "his top priority among the media ownership rules," says Andrew Jay Schwartzman, president of the Media Access Project, a public interest law firm. "So we have a big fight on our hands."

Those favoring a change say TV stations need help.

Cable companies are starting to compete for local TV ads and increasingly have their own local news channels.

What really frightens some local broadcasters, though, is the possibility that ABC, CBS, Fox and NBC, the networks that supply their popular prime-time shows and national newscasts, will use the Internet and other new media to go around them and offer programs directly to viewers.

All the networks are starting to do so on their own websites and through online retailers such as iTunes. In addition, cable and satellite companies are inviting networks to put shows on their video-on-demand menus.

"In the old days — two years ago — there was no way to air your TV show in Milwaukee if you didn't have an affiliate there," says Bernstein Research analyst Michael Nathanson. "But that monopoly has been broken. The networks' strategy has moved past, 'I've got to own everything.' The debate in Washington is very much last decade."

Once consumers find an easy way to put broadband video on their TV sets, "The competitive battle will be fully joined," says Nielsen Analytics general manager Larry Gerbrandt. "Pretty soon, we'll just see TVs equipped with broadband connections."

Major broadcasters are already responding to these trends, even though only a relative handful of people watch TV shows on new platforms now.

Last year, NBC sold four of its TV stations, bringing its total down to 10. And Disney told the FCC that it isn't interested in adding to its fleet of 10 TV stations, which reach 24% of all U.S. households, far below the federal cap of 39%.

"Given the increase in, and attractiveness of, new media outlets," Disney said in a filing, "the Commission may soon find itself considering ways to incent, rather than restrict, ownership of over-the-air broadcast stations."

Major networks, which face their own pressures to boost revenue, are weakening local station balance sheets by phasing out the payments they used to make to affiliates that air their programs.

Meanwhile, stations have had to invest in equipment to broadcast digital and high-definition signals to beat the 2009 federal government deadline to be all-digital and give back the spectrum they use to serve today's analog TV sets.

"That's a continued threat to the financial stability of broadcasting," says National Association of Broadcasters' Dennis Wharton.

Newspaper owners say that they're ready to step in and buy TV stations in markets where they own papers if the FCC lets them.

They are struggling to meet new media competition for ad sales and look forward to a payoff from cross-promoting their products, selling combo ad packages and cutting expenses, possibly including news staffs.

They add that viewers would benefit from having a station owned by a company committed to covering their community.

The amount of local TV news "is trending down, not up," Sturm says. "The only prospect for more local news on local television is for newspapers to be able to own those stations. Every other broadcast ownership regulation the FCC has had since the 1970s has been modified or eliminated. This is the only one that hasn't changed."

Fears that one company will have too much power to shape public opinion, deregulation supporters say, make little sense as the Internet, cable and other technologies virtually allow anybody to reach everybody.

"There are more (media) outlets today than there have been at any point in the past," says media investor Christopher Dixon of GGCP. "Every day that more people are on the Internet, the argument for cross-ownership limitations falls by the wayside."

Those who want to keep current restrictions argue that it's dangerous to be dazzled by Internet hype.

Some 82% of adults in a 2006 survey commissioned by the Consumer Federation of America and Consumers Union said that they still primarily get information about their communities from daily and weekly newspapers and TV and radio stations.

DOJ_NMG_0123114

There's a good reason why the growing collection of local cable news channels and community-focused websites ranked far behind.

"There's nothing there," says CFA research director Mark Cooper. "There are no reporters, if you look at the cable systems. There's no original content, if you look at the Web. It just repeats what they found elsewhere. The origin of most news is still the newspaper and the TV reporters."

And he and other consumer advocates say that broadcasters — the people the FCC regulates — don't need any help to provide strong, independent newscasts.

They're still attractive businesses: The collective value of broadcast TV company stocks rose nearly 30% in the last 12 months, beating the 13% rise in the Standard & Poor's 500. "The next time someone sells a TV station for less than they paid will be the first time," says Art Brodsky of the advocacy group Public Knowledge.

That's why FCC Commissioner Copps says the idea that broadcasters want out is "baloney."

"If the rules are loosened, you'll see a great wave of consolidation, worse than we had before," he told media activists in Memphis. "And you'll never get the genie back into the bottle."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Power Producers Rush To Secure Nuclear Sites (WSJ)

By Rebecca Smith

Wall Street Journal, January 29, 2007

First to Develop Plans Could Tap $8 Billion In Federal Subsidies

With the U.S. on the verge of building a new generation of nuclear power plants, potential owners are racing to identify and lock down the best sites in order to secure billions of dollars in federal subsidies pledged to first-comers.

Their efforts will test local and national attitudes more than two decades after nuclear accidents made headlines. They also represent a considerable financial gamble for the utility industry, which is moving ahead at a rapid pace despite uncertainty ranging from environmental opposition to finding a home for radioactive nuclear waste. In one case, the zeal to secure a promising site has resulted in a nasty legal battle.

A flood of applications seeking permission to build at least 30 reactors, primarily in the South, is expected to pour into the Nuclear Regulatory Commission beginning late this year. If built, the reactors would boost the nation's electricity supply by more than 30,000 megawatts, or 3%. A megawatt is enough to power at least 500 homes.

'A Horse Race'

Under recent legislation intended to jump-start development, Congress is dangling more than $8 billion worth of subsidies, plus loan guarantees, in front of the first few plants that get built. Practically speaking, companies must apply to the NRC this year or next to qualify for the special assistance -- a process that can cost $50 million apiece.

"It's like a horse race," says Adrian Heymer, senior director of new plant development at the Nuclear Energy Institute, a Washington, D.C.-based trade organization. "Most companies are striving to submit applications as fast as they can."

At root is a sea change in views over nuclear power. From 1974 to 1994, spooked by skyrocketing costs, high interest rates and accidents in 1979 at the Three Mile Island plant in Pennsylvania and in 1986 at Chernobyl in the former Soviet Union, utilities canceled 96 nuclear projects in the U.S. Nuclear power currently makes up about 20% of the nation's electricity supply, compared with about 50% from coal, from 104 U.S. reactors.

But in a time of rising concern over price stability, dependence on foreign sources and global warming, nuclear power is on the cusp of a return. It doesn't rely on fossil fuels in tight supply or located in politically troublesome countries. Unlike coal, use of nuclear fuel doesn't create air pollution or carbon dioxide blamed for global warming.

Earlier this month, President Bush in his State of the Union address encouraged "safe, clean" nuclear power. Some existing plants have been getting license extensions from the federal government to keep them running, but the industry argues that aging plants eventually will need to be replaced.

Facing Opposition

Still, there's no certainty the industry will build plants, despite the money being spent on the effort. Development of the federal government's waste depository at Yucca Mountain, Nev., is behind schedule and could still face political opposition. Spent fuel is being stored at power-plant sites, a situation never intended to be permanent. Utilities are worried about the waste-disposal problem and construction costs, which spiraled out of control once before.

DOJ_NMG_0123115

Meanwhile, opposition is gathering. The advocacy organization Public Citizen criticizes the "nuclear relapse" under way and asks opponents near proposed plants to "let us know how you'd like to help" block construction. Utilities expect some opposition but hope nuclear power's spruced-up image as a carbon-free resource will win over environmentalists.

Even the biggest and most profitable nuclear operators are avoiding regions where public sentiment is unpredictable. Big nuclear operator Exelon Corp. is "sniffing around for a site in Texas," says John Rowe, chairman and chief executive of the Chicago-based utility company. He says New Jersey could use more nuclear capacity, but he's "not sure the citizenry is ready for it yet" so he's steering clear. California prohibits nuclear development until there's a federal waste repository.

Focusing on the South

So far, the industry is focusing efforts almost exclusively on the South, where plant operators think acceptance of nuclear power never flagged and where local officials welcome the economic stimulus of multibillion-dollar projects. Applications will focus on sites utilities are confident will pass muster at the Nuclear Regulatory Commission -- locations that are adjacent to existing nuclear units or that were previously approved for nuclear development that never occurred.

Baltimore-based Constellation Energy Inc. has publicly identified two sites for development: the Calvert Cliffs plant in Maryland and -- a notable exception to the Southern concentration of the new sites -- the Nine Mile Point plant in upstate New York. Constellation is willing to chance receptivity because "we already operate there, so we think we can make it happen," says Tracy Imm, Constellation spokeswoman.

The 96 plants canceled long ago represented about half of the number of projects originally proposed. The cancellations were costly at the time, but they created a large inventory of locations now being given a second look. Utilities in many cases still own the sites.

For safety, security and public-relations reasons, nuclear plants typically are built in rural areas. Thus, the jobs they create loom larger than they would in cities. Plants are expected to cost $3 billion to $4 billion, each creating 2,000 construction jobs. Once completed, a plant needs 250 to 400 workers.

A consortium of utilities called NuStart Energy Development LLC is working with the NRC to speed up and smooth out the application and development process. It's working on applications for a new plant at Entergy Corp.'s Grand Gulf nuclear site in Mississippi, using a new General Electric Co. reactor design, and at Tennessee Valley Authority's Bellefonte site in Alabama, using a new reactor design from Westinghouse Electric Co., now controlled by a consortium led by Japan's Toshiba Corp. NuStart members -- Constellation, Duke Energy Corp., EDF International, Entergy, Exelon, FPL Group Inc., Progress Energy Inc., Scana Corp., Southern Co. and TVA -- control half the nation's nuclear capacity.

Utilities also are pursuing separate projects. Dominion Resources Inc. is considering its North Anna site in Virginia, and Southern is looking at its Vogtle site in Georgia; in each case, four units were permitted but only two built. "Atlanta is expected to double in the next 25 years," says Southern's Buzz Miller, senior vice president of nuclear engineering. "We're going to need a lot of new generation."

Legal Battle

The imperative to find sites has set off intense jockeying for position in some cases. One transaction, involving utility operator Duke Energy, has led to lawsuits, underscoring the eagerness to secure potential nuclear sites.

Duke announced its intention to pursue nuclear development last March, and it identified a 2,036-acre riverfront tract in Cherokee County, S.C., as its top pick. It was land Duke previously had owned, and decades earlier it received permission to build three nuclear reactors there. But after investing more than $600 million, Duke canceled the Cherokee projects and sold the parcel for $2 million in 1985.

A partnership, Mark V Land and Development LLC, approached Duke and other utilities to gauge purchase interest in 2005. When Duke learned Southern had emerged the apparent victor, it sued to block the sale. The suit was dismissed as groundless. Mark V, in a countersuit, accused Duke of abuse of process and trying to depress the price. Duke denies the allegations and the case is headed for jury trial. Duke and Southern now are teaming up to develop the site.

Alternative-Fuels Push May Inspire Some Better Bets (WSJ)

By Patrick Barta

Wall Street Journal, January 29, 2007

President Bush's State of the Union address, which called for a nearly fivefold increase in the nation's alternative-fuel consumption by 2017, did little to silence critics who contend that new fuels like ethanol and biodiesel aren't likely to play a major role supplying the world's energy needs in the years ahead.

They see two key problems. First, the profitability of many alternative fuels -- without sizable subsidies -- is still in question. This is especially true now that the cost of raw ingredients used to produce "biofuel," including corn, has rocketed, squeezing profit margins for producers of those fuels.

DOJ_NMG_0123116

At the same time, oil prices have receded since last summer when they hit $77 a barrel; they are now hovering around $55 a barrel. That could lead to losses at some biofuel plants if the trend continues.

In some parts of the world, notably Australia, the market for alternative fuels has already started to look like a bust, with the local media referring to "carnage" in the sector as once-hot companies cancel share offerings or watch their stock prices tumble.

Second, it's becoming clear that boosting output of agriculture-based fuels, such as ethanol, will cause significant new strains on the world's water and land resources, and could drive prices of basic foodstuffs to unacceptable heights, hurting poor consumers.

But even as the outlook for alternative energies darkens, some analysts see a more positive outcome from the latest turbulence: a forced redirection of resources toward alternative fuels that are more efficient and sustainable than the current batch.

These analysts see an analogy in the dot-com bust of 2000. The bust cleared out some of the worst ideas and least-efficient companies in the tech arena, allowing deeper-pocketed investors to consolidate operations and emerge leaner to make the Internet an even more powerful force in the world economy.

They believe a similar scenario will play out in the alternative-fuels market.

"I quite look forward to a period of $45-to-$50 oil prices -- I think it will bring good discipline to the [alternative-energy] market," says Michael Liebreich, chief executive of New Energy Finance, a London-based research firm that specializes in alternative energies.

There are indications that a shift toward more-sustainable investments is already taking place, as some serious investors channel their spending to energies that either produce less environmental fallout -- such as solar or wind power -- or to agriculture-based options that don't require as much water or compete with traditional food crops.

In India, for example, some farmers are rushing to plant jatropha, a little-known oilseed that can be used to make fuel. Jatropha, like some other newer-generation sources of biodiesel, is inedible, so its use doesn't divert a food crop to fuel use. More important, analysts say, it can be grown in arid soil or planted on poor, unused land that is threatened by erosion, making it a relatively environmentally friendly option.

Investors are also directing more money into "cellulosic" fuels that use nonfood commodities such as switch grass or farm waste to make ethanol. A small number of companies, including Spain's Abengoa SA, are attempting to launch projects using such biomass energy.

A growing number of financial institutions, including Bank Sarasin & Co., a Swiss private bank that follows the sector, are advising clients to steer their money into these "second-generation" alternative-energy companies.

Still, the newer alternative-energy sources have their problems. It will likely be years before sources such as jatropha or biomass will be economically viable on a meaningful scale, and it's possible much of the current wave of investment in such technologies will yield losses.

But investments in research can produce results. During the last big alternative-fuels push, after the 1970s oil-price shocks, corn yielded less than two gallons of ethanol per bushel, according to Dan Basse, president of Chicago research firm AgResource Co. In the newest facilities, launched after years of study, a bushel can yield 2.8 gallons or more.

Analysts say there's also far more private capital chasing alternative-energy solutions these days, partly because of the rise of hedge funds and other investment vehicles desperate to find new growth industries. Moreover, subsidies for the industry are more widespread than before. In addition to the U.S., many European countries as well as China, Brazil and others have adopted or are contemplating new biofuel incentives.

Mr. Liebreich at New Energy Finance estimates that investors poured about $70 billion into alternative energies last year, more than double the 2004 total.

Much of the money is coming from well-established companies that could be in a position to buy up distressed assets if the alternative-fuel market continues to struggle.

One such company is Noble Group Ltd. of Hong Kong. Although much of its business is in traditional commodities such as iron ore and coal, Noble has purchased minority stakes in several U.S. ethanol plants and is investing in sugar-based Brazilian ethanol.

"People will overextend and many plants will have financial difficulty," says Ricardo Leiman, Noble's chief operating officer. But he adds that as facilities fail, that could create more opportunities for bigger investors to move in.

Of course, all bets are off if oil prices keep falling. If that happens, alternative energies could wither just as they did after the retreat of the oil-price surges of the 1970s.

The Sum Of All Ears (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

DOJ_NMG_0123117

New York Times, January 29, 2007

For those hoping for real action on global warming and energy policy, the State of the Union address was a downer. There had been hints and hopes that the speech would be a Nixon-goes-to-China moment, with President Bush turning conservationist. But it ended up being more of a Nixon-bombs-Cambodia moment.

Too bad: the rumors were tantalizing. Al Hubbard, the chairman of the National Economic Council, predicted "headlines above the fold that will knock your socks off in terms of our commitment to energy independence." British officials told the newspaper The Observer that Mr. Bush would "make a historic shift in his position on global warming."

None of it happened. Mr. Bush acknowledged that climate change is a problem, but you missed it if you sneezed. He said something vague about fuel economy, but the White House fact sheet on energy makes it clear that there was even less there than met the ear.

The only real substance was Mr. Bush's call for a huge increase in the supply of "alternative fuels." Mainly that means using ethanol to replace gasoline. Unfortunately, that's a really bad idea.

There is a place for ethanol in the world's energy future — but that place is in the tropics. Brazil has managed to replace a lot of its gasoline consumption with ethanol. But Brazil's ethanol comes from sugar cane.

In the United States, ethanol comes overwhelmingly from corn, a much less suitable raw material. In fact, corn is such a poor source of ethanol that researchers at the University of Minnesota estimate that converting the entire U.S. corn crop — the sum of all our ears — into ethanol would replace only 12 percent of our gasoline consumption.

Still, doesn't every little bit help? Well, this little bit would come at a very high price compared with the obvious alternative — conservation. The Congressional Budget Office estimates that reducing gasoline consumption 10 percent through an increase in fuel economy standards would cost producers and consumers about $3.6 billion a year. Achieving the same result by expanding ethanol production would cost taxpayers at least $10 billion a year, based on the subsidies ethanol already receives — and probably much more, because expanding production would require higher subsidies.

What's more, ethanol production has hidden costs. Even the Department of Energy, which is relatively optimistic, says that the net energy savings from replacing a gallon of gasoline with ethanol are only the equivalent of about a quarter of a gallon, because of the energy used to grow corn, transport it, run ethanol plants, and so on. And these energy inputs come almost entirely from fossil fuels, so it's not clear whether promoting ethanol does anything to reduce carbon dioxide emissions.

So why is ethanol, not conservation, the centerpiece of the administration's energy policy? Actually, it's not entirely Mr. Bush's fault.

To be sure, at this point Mr. Bush's people seem less concerned with devising good policy than with finding something, anything, for the president to talk about that doesn't end with the letter "q." And the malign influence of Dick "Sign of Personal Virtue" Cheney, who no doubt still sneers at conservation, continues to hang over everything.

But even after the Bushies are gone, bad energy policy ideas will have powerful constituencies, while good ideas won't.

Subsidizing ethanol benefits two well-organized groups: corn growers and ethanol producers (especially the corporate giant Archer Daniels Midland). As a result, it's bad policy with bipartisan support. For example, earlier this month legislation calling for a huge increase in ethanol use was introduced by five senators, of whom four, including presidential aspirants Barack Obama and Joseph Biden, were Democrats. In a recent town meeting in Iowa, Hillary Clinton managed to mention ethanol twice, according to The Politico.

Meanwhile, conservation doesn't have anything like the same natural political mojo. Where's the organized, powerful constituency for tougher fuel economy standards, a higher gasoline tax, or a cap-and-trade system on carbon dioxide emissions?

Can anything be done to promote good energy policy? Public education is a necessary first step, which is why Al Gore deserves all the praise he's getting. It would also help to have a president who gets scientific advice from scientists, not oil company executives and novelists.

But there's still a huge gap between what obviously should be done and what seems politically possible. And I don't know how to close that gap.

SMELL TEST How Politics Influenced A Big Clean-Up Deal (WSJ)

By Scot J. Paltrow

The Wall Street Journal, January 29, 2007

IMPERIAL BEACH, Calif. -- As Tijuana has boomed, fueled by industrial expansion, something else has also surged: the flood of raw sewage the Mexican border city sends gushing downhill into neighboring California. Less than 60% of the city's sewage is being treated at all, and that only to minimal levels, leaving tons to flow into the canyons and surf of Southern California.

DOJ_NMG_0123118

To stem this growing mess, the American government has chosen an unusual solution. Without any competitive bidding, the U.S. gave Bajagua LLC, a start-up company with no experience in treating waste water, sole authority to build and operate a treatment plant in Mexico.

The tale of Bajagua's success in getting the contract involves, among other things, well-timed campaign contributions to local members of Congress and other political figures. The firm also enlisted people with crucial connections as lobbyists. And when that didn't prove enough, Bajagua obtained backing from Vice President Dick Cheney and the White House, which cleared away opposition by federal agencies, several former senior federal agency officials say.

The Bajagua plan ("Bajagua" is a contraction of the Spanish "baja," for Baja California, and "agua," water) has prevailed even though, when it was first proposed in the late 1990s, it faced opposition from all of the relevant federal agencies. Records show that the State Department, the Environmental Protection Agency, the Justice Department and the Clinton White House's Office of Management and Budget dismissed the proposal as inadequate and impractical, and said it would violate existing law and treaties. Opponents of the plan say it won't stop the main causes of the waste and garbage flowing across the border.

Bajagua's tale shows how plans for federal public-works projects could be diverted by a small group of lawmakers, who were able to push contracts toward big campaign contributors. It also highlights the political difficulties posed by the pollution flowing into the U.S. from burgeoning Mexican border cities.

Recently, the project's backers have missed important deadlines, and officials are questioning whether the company has taken vital steps it claims already were achieved, including obtaining commitments for financing, essential permits and land. The federal government's contract with Bajagua calls for cancellation if the plant isn't built and running by September 2008, leaving the company only 19 months to build and open a plant. As a result, U.S. and Mexican officials have begun to express concern about whether it can succeed. Bajagua's principals say they are on track.

In an unusual step, the U.S. committed itself without appropriating money for the plant, and the final cost isn't known. The federal agency in charge estimates the total cost to the U.S. will be between $580 million and $780 million.

Coastal southern San Diego County lies at the bottom of a drainage system that originates in Baja California mountains in Mexico, feeds into the Tijuana River flowing through the heart of Tijuana and down into the ocean at Imperial Beach, Calif. As it passes through Tijuana, the river picks up raw human waste, battery acid, old tires, household garbage and toxic chemicals. From hilltop squatter settlements surrounding Tijuana, meanwhile, more sewage flows directly down canyons into San Diego County.

Beaches as far north as northern San Diego County are affected, but Imperial Beach, a favorite California surfing spot, has borne the brunt of the pollution. All or parts of the beaches along Imperial Beach and the estuary just to the south of it were closed for 198 days in 2006, according to the San Diego County statistics. The pollution causes health hazards, a weakened local economy, low home prices and harm to endangered wildlife, according to public-health experts, local business owners and others.

In the dry season, a system of special drains often catches the waste flowing through the Tijuana River (which would be dry without waste water) as well as the sewage running down the canyons. These pump the waste to a treatment plant in San Ysidro, Calif. But the drains are overwhelmed in the November-to-April rainy season and sometimes in the dry season too.

The problem was obvious on a late November day, when the San Diego-Tijuana area had its first rain of the season. After only a few tenths of an inch of rain, the raw sewage flow was too much for a drain in the river bed. Water covered with floating garbage and white foam from detergent, and filled with raw human waste, washed into the Tijuana Estuary on the U.S. side, soon reaching the ocean. Health officials closed the beach at the mouth of the Tijuana River.

Justin Jeter has surfed around the landmark Imperial Beach pier for 20 years and says he can't resist going in when the surf is up. But he adds that lately he has suffered frequent sinus and ear infections, which, like many surfers, he attributes to the pollution.

A recent study in the journal Applied and Environmental Microbiology by Richard Gersberg, professor at San Diego State University's Graduate School of Public Health, and colleagues documents high levels of hepatitis A virus and human intestinal viruses in ocean water off the mouth of the Tijuana River and at the Imperial Beach pier after seasonal rains.

The pollution also affects the estuary, a 2,531-acre wildlife reserve, sandwiched between the border and Imperial Beach, through which the Tijuana River empties into the ocean. Joy Zedler, an ecology professor who has studied the estuary, says polluted sediments from Tijuana have eliminated clams, sand dollars and fish species from the estuary and adjacent waters. Endangered birds, such as the light-footed clapper rail, have been harmed, and plants native to the estuary killed off, including a rare species of pickleweed.

Once a sleepy border town, Tijuana is now Mexico's fourth-largest city, with a population of more than 1.3 million. About 2,000 people on average arrive daily to stay. Tijuana's growth stemmed from maquiladora plants -- foreign-owned plants allowed to import materials and export finished goods duty-free -- and more recently the North American Free Trade Agreement and growing cross-border trade.

DOJ_NMG_0123119

With the city's flat land used up, hundreds of thousands of new dwellings eat up the surrounding steep hillsides so quickly that whole new neighborhoods appear in days. Even in many legal developments, the dwellings aren't connected to sewers or running water. Instead, plastic pipes run from indoor latrines, dumping raw waste into the dirt roads. The outflow etches gullies in the roads and flows into the Tijuana River or down the hillsides to the estuary on the U.S. side.

The municipal sewage system is leaky. A reporter driving one day in the city's center during the dry season saw a geyser of sewage shooting up from around a manhole cover and running down the street.

Tijuana has a sewage treatment plant of its own on the coast just south of Tijuana that receives 25 million gallons of raw sewage daily. It treats 17 million gallons to a "primary" standard before dumping it into the surf. Only solids are filtered out, not toxic chemicals, heavy metals and other dangerous stuff. The rest of the sewage is spewed untreated directly into the ocean.

The U.S. has long recognized that Mexico was unlikely to pay all the costs of treating sewage that washes north of the border. Under treaties, agencies in both countries work together on sewage and other issues. The U.S. agency is the International Boundary and Water Commission, an El Paso, Texas-based arm of the State Department.

In the 1990s the commission built the San Ysidro plant, on the U.S. side of the border. It takes in 25 million gallons per day of Tijuana sewage, treats it to a primary stage, then sends it through an 11-foot-wide pipe before discharging it in the ocean 3.5 miles offshore.

That partly treated discharge falls far short of U.S. Clean Water Act standards. In response, the IBWC intended to expand treatment at the plant. It acquired land and planned to increase capacity in steps.

Then Bajagua entered the picture. The small company was established solely to try to build a plant in Mexico under a U.S. government contract to address the Tijuana waste problem.

It grew out of a partnership in the 1990s between James D. Simmons, a former San Marcos, Calif., city councilman who runs a consulting business, and Enrique Landa, a Rancho Santa Fe, Calif., architect-turned-entrepreneur and son of a Mexico City architect. Messrs. Landa and Simmons had put together packages of permits which they sold to construction companies to build a waste-treatment plant in Sonora state in Mexico, and to upgrade treatment at a Mexico City plant.

Mr. Simmons says Mr. Landa's travels in northern Mexico, where he saw an acute shortage of usable water and waste treatment, led him to the idea of building a Tijuana treatment plant. (Through a Bajagua spokesman, Mr. Landa declined to be interviewed.) The two men concluded that they could make money by treating waste, eventually, to cleaner standards and selling the reclaimed water.

Under Bajagua's plan to build a plant in Tijuana, 25 million gallons a day of raw sewage would continue to flow to the San Ysidro plant on the U.S. side where, as now, it would be treated only to primary standards. Then new pumps and pipes would send it back uphill into Mexico to the new Bajagua plant.

After treating the sewage there, Bajagua would send it downhill again, through yet another set of new channels, where it would cross the border a third time, to San Ysidro. Then it would be shunted into the ocean through the existing pipe. Eventually, the Bajagua plant would also treat an additional 34 million gallons of sewage directly from Tijuana, to be sent across the border to the ocean pipe.

The idea of a U.S.-funded treatment plant in Mexico ran counter to an agreement the U.S. had with Mexico committing to build treatment facilities on its own side of the border.

A 1999 environmental-impact statement prepared by the Environmental Protection Agency and the IBWC called the Bajagua plan "not a feasible alternative." It said the plan wouldn't expeditiously meet the goal of additional treatment -- which it said could be accomplished at the San Ysidro plant.

A big criticism, then and now, was that no plan addressed a key source of pollution: the millions of gallons of Tijuana sewage that don't go into any sewer system at all.

Engineers who evaluated the Bajagua plan, including Michael L. Evans, a senior IBWC engineer at the time, concluded that it was unnecessarily costly, because the same sewage would ping-pong across the border three times before being discharged into the ocean.

Bajagua executives say their plan makes sense because the San Ysidro plant has limited room for expansion and faces local opposition. They also say Bajagua would be reimbursed in annual increments only after its plant is up and running. "The only way we get paid back is if we build it, it works and it operates to standards," says Mr. Simmons.

The commission and other federal agencies reviewed Bajagua's plan, and rejected it.

But that wasn't the end. Local members of Congress blocked the IBWC's plan to expand the San Ysidro plant and pushed the Bajagua alternative. Democratic Rep. Bob Filner, whose district includes the San Ysidro plant, and Republican Rep. Brian Bilbray, from a nearby district, in 2000 sponsored a bill promoting Bajagua's plan. A draft of the bill actually named Bajagua as the firm to do the work. When some lawmakers complained, the sponsors changed to wording that they hoped was so specific it would make Bajagua the only possible choice.

DOJ_NMG_0123120

"We basically wanted one company," Mr. Filner says. "So we had to find a way to do it within the law."

From 1996 through 2005, Bajagua officials and their immediate relatives gave more than $56,000 in campaign contributions to Mr. Filner, federal campaign records show, more than to any other candidate in that period. Mr. Filner says he supported Bajagua because he considers it the best solution and his constituents wanted the plant in Mexico. "I'm doing this for my district, not for Enrique [Landa] who is my friend," he says.

The Clinton White House opposed the bill. The Office of Management and Budget stated, "Its approach raises serious foreign policy and legal concerns and will hinder our ongoing efforts to address the region's wastewater treatment needs." But after some amendments, and facing strong congressional support, Mr. Clinton signed it. The bill paved the way for a new treaty with Mexico that would allow the Bajagua project.

Even Congress's backing wasn't enough to overcome opposition by the IBWC and other federal agencies. Arturo Duran, IBWC commissioner in 2004 and 2005, says he had reservations because "it's not normal to sole-source to a company a contract for hundreds of millions of dollars. It's not how the federal government operates."

With progress at a standstill, the California Water Quality Control Board in 2001 sued the IBWC, as owner of the San Ysidro plant. The suit led to a federal court order to bring the plant's discharge up to less-toxic "secondary" standards by September 2008.

It took intervention from the White House and Republican Rep. Duncan Hunter of Southern California to turn events to Bajagua's favor.

On Oct. 14, 2002, Bajagua's Messrs. Simmons and Landa traveled to Roswell, N.M., where Vice President Cheney appeared at Republican fund-raisers. After a public rally, Mr. Cheney met privately with a small group of big contributors at the home of a local Republican backer, energy executive George Yates, Mr. Yates says.

Mr. Simmons says he and Mr. Landa went in response to an invitation received in the mail to the fund-raiser. "Dick Cheney attended that, I got to shake his hand, and had my picture taken, and that was the end of it," he says.

But the next day Mr. Simmons sent a letter on Bajagua stationery to the vice president, expressing gratitude "that you could spend some time with us in Roswell." It added, "I appreciate the opportunity I had to briefly introduce the Bajagua Project to you and your staff." Mr. Simmons also gave a five-page "Bajagua Project Briefing" to Catherine Martin, a top adviser to Mr. Cheney.

In early 2003 -- Bajagua officials say they can't recall the date -- Matthew Simmons, then a lobbyist for Bajagua, met with a Cheney aide about the project in the vice president's offices. (Mr. Simmons, a former legislative director for Rep. Hunter, isn't related to James Simmons.) Other lobbyists hired by Bajagua include James R. Jones, former U.S. ambassador to Mexico.

On Sept. 4, 2003, Bajagua representatives including James Simmons met with officials of the White House's Council on Environmental Quality, which oversees executive branch environmental policy, Bajagua says. The same day Rep. Hunter met with James Connaughton, chairman of the environment council, to press for support of Bajagua, according to emails by IBWC officials disclosed on the Web site of William Weaver, a University of Texas at El Paso professor.

Public records show that Bajagua spent $585,000 on lobbying from 2001 through the first half of 2006.

Beginning in 2003 the White House pressed the relevant federal agencies to embrace the Bajagua project, according to interviews, a report by the Project on Government Oversight, a Washington, D.C.-based nonprofit organization, and email messages and documents posted on Mr. Weaver's Web site. At the Justice Department, a staff attorney who had backed the IBWC's opposition to Bajagua on legal grounds was replaced by a political appointee who reported to then-Assistant Attorney General Thomas Sansonetti, a longtime friend of Mr. Cheney. Staff at the IBWC who had opposed the project were overruled or moved aside, say Mr. Evans and other former IBWC staff.

Lea Anne McBride, a spokeswoman for Mr. Cheney, declined to respond to questions about the vice president's role in the Bajagua case. "The bottom line is that the vice president does not issue government contracts," she said.

In 2004, Rep. Hunter pushed through amendments to the 2000 law that favored Bajagua, further exempting it from normal restrictions on federal contracts. In 2005, the IBWC chose Bajagua as the sole "preferred option" for additional treatment of Tijuana sewage.

The 2002 thank-you letter from Bajagua to Mr. Cheney praised Rep. Hunter, chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, as "our champion." Before the encounter at the fund-raiser with the vice president, Rep. Hunter had received a total of $4,000 in campaign contributions from Messrs. Simmons and Landa and a Bajagua lawyer. Two days after the meeting, he received another $1,000 each from Mr. Landa's brother and sister-in-law.

Bajagua spokesman Craig Benedetto says timing of the contributions was "coincidental." He says Rep. Hunter had no role in arranging access to Mr. Cheney.

DOJ_NMG_0123121

Mr. Hunter's spokesman said the congressman "doesn't specifically recall coordinating a meeting" with Mr. Cheney, but "it would be entirely appropriate for the vice president to be involved in such a meeting" given the importance of the sewage issue.

Concerning the Bajagua campaign contributions, he said, "Congressman Hunter does what he thinks is right for the nation and in the best interest of the San Diego community. This project is no exception." Rep. Hunter has announced he is running for president in 2008.

Meanwhile, Rep. Bilbray, the other sponsor of the 2000 law, received $2,500 in contributions from Bajagua-related individuals. He lost his seat in the 2000 elections and soon went to work as a lobbyist. He represented Mr. Benedetto's public-relations firm to lobby on behalf of Bajagua, for which he received $35,000, records show.

In December 2001, less than a year after Mr. Bilbray's term ended, he testified before the House Water and Environment Subcommittee at a hearing on progress under the 2000 Bajagua-related law. He didn't disclose that he was a Bajagua lobbyist.

Mr. Bilbray says he didn't violate lobbying rules, which forbid a former lawmaker to appear before, or even communicate with, members of Congress to try to influence them on anyone else's behalf for a year after leaving office. He says he testified at the hearing "just representing myself as an author" of the 2000 law.

Last year, Mr. Bilbray was reelected to Congress, taking the seat vacated by Randy Cunningham, now in federal prison for soliciting bribes from federal contractors. Bajagua-related individuals gave Mr. Bilbray $6,850 in campaign contributions.

The cost to the government of the Bajagua project remains unknown. Bajagua and the commission missed a March 2006 deadline to negotiate an agreement which would have set the financial terms. The U.S. would reimburse the company's investment, with an added percentage of profit over 20 years once the plant opens.

Although Mr. Simmons says Bajagua's hopes for big profits lie in selling treated sewage someday as "reclaimed water," U.S. and Mexican officials say Bajagua hasn't submitted any plans for an additional plant to produce the water and has no land or approvals to build one. It isn't clear whether Bajagua legally could sell reclaimed water.

IBWC Commissioner Carlos Marin says Bajagua has missed deadlines for the Tijuana plant. Bajagua insists that, as required, it has arranged for financing. Mr. Simmons says flatly: "We have a commitment from Citibank to finance the project." But the IBWC says Bajagua hasn't given it any documents supporting the claim. Mr. Marin says, "We don't have any proof" of financing. Also, California denied Bajagua a permit it was required to obtain by September 2006 to discharge treated waste into the ocean. Bajagua is appealing.

Bajagua also was to have reached an agreement by September 2006 to purchase land. Mr. Simmons recently said Mexico would be announcing the specific site "in a few weeks." But José de Jesús Luévano, an official at the IBWC's Mexican counterpart, says the government has no intention of selling land to Bajagua. He says a lease is under discussion between Mexico and the company, but any announcement is months away.

Mr. Marin admits doubts about whether Bajagua will meet the 2008 deadline. "The more time that passes, that's getting a little bit leery," he says. Yet the IBWC has put all its eggs in Bajagua's basket. Failure would mean years before any alternative could be in place. Mr. Marin acknowledges that the IBWC has no backup plan.

Write to Scot J. Paltrow at scot.paltrow@wsj.com2

What Would It Take To Clean Up The Bay By 2010? (WP)

By David A. Fahrenthold

The Washington Post, January 29, 2007

To deliver on the pledge to save the Chesapeake Bay in three short years, you could start by digging up a million lawns to fix septic tanks that pollute too much.

Then ask 80,000 farmers to make expensive changes in the way their farms work. Overhaul hundreds of sewage plants, each project with a price tag that could run into the millions.

And find about $28 billion -- enough for six aircraft carriers -- to pay for it all. Right now, authorities are at least $14 billion short.

This month, the Environmental Protection Agency said efforts to restore the bay's health need to be accelerated to meet a 2010 deadline. It turns out that "accelerated" might be understating it: Experts say meeting the goal would require widespread sacrifices from individuals and unprecedented funding from government sources. And even then, it might not be enough.

For now, no such shock-therapy campaign has been proposed. But environmentalists say the bay project's many shortfalls are a lesson: After 19 years, the Chesapeake cleanup is struggling to produce results on par with its promises.

"We have done a truly tremendous job of defining the problem, and we have done a truly tremendous job of defining the solution," said J. Charles Fox, a former head of the Maryland Department of Natural Resources. "But we have not yet succeeded in actually implementing the solution."

DOJ_NMG_0123122

The bay cleanup, in its current form, began in 1987 with an agreement between state and federal governments. They promised that the bay, troubled by dirt, algae blooms and toxic chemicals, would be clean by 2000.

"We thought it was going to be Bethlehem Steel. We thought we were going to be able to point to big polluters," said Jack Greer, an official at the Sea Grant program at the University of Maryland.

Instead, they found that some of the bay's worst pollutants came from such things as manure, lawn fertilizer and human waste. Its troubles began on every street, in every sewer, at the back end of every cow.

"I remember politicians just going pale," Greer said.

When the 2000 deadline was missed, an even more sweeping agreement took its place. The leaders of Maryland, Virginia, Pennsylvania, the District and the EPA pledged to fix the bay's water, its oyster population, its beds of underwater grass and other environmental indicators by 2010.

There have been significant successes since then. Maryland passed a "flush tax," a surcharge on water bills to pay for cleaning up the state's sewage plants and farm fields. The bay's rockfish population has continued its remarkable comeback, which began in the 1980s. Small strips of forest, designed to filter runoff, have been planted alongside 5,000 miles of streams.

But all of that hasn't been nearly enough, officials say.

Thousands of farms still need to implement measures to prevent soil, manure and fertilizer from washing downstream -- from putting up fences to setting aside areas to regrow as forest. In Virginia, the total is near 1.5 million acres -- an area larger than Delaware.

States have said they will need at least $2 billion for these agricultural measures, which often include sending employees out to custom design a plan for each farm and reimbursing farmers for changes. Farmers have said they can't afford the changes themselves.

"If we can't absorb those costs, the only alternative is to get out," said Earl Hance, president of the Maryland Farm Bureau.

Another shortfall: Older septic systems -- including some installed as late as 2005 -- need to be replaced, or at least updated, so they release less nitrogen into groundwater. In Maryland, the most recent documents say 11,000 of 360,000 systems have been fixed so far.

If homeowners pay, each fix costs hundreds or thousands of dollars. Maryland has money to help homeowners pay for septic upgrades -- but not enough to do all of them before 2010. At current funding levels, it would take 580 years.

Also, to make the 2010 deadline, hundreds of sewage plants would need upgrades, so they release less pollution. The cost is estimated at $6 billion.

But money isn't the only problem with reaching the 2010 goal. The upgrades are so complicated, officials say, that they will take years to plan and carry out.

"If I had all the money in the world today, I would guarantee you I could not get it done by 2010," said John T. Dunn, chief engineer of the District's Water and Sewer Authority, whose Blue Plains sewage plant needs such an overhaul. He said that 2014 might be more realistic.

And even if all this effort were expended, experts say some 2010 goals might be impossible. One goal promises that the Chesapeake's oyster population will grow tenfold. But years of restoration efforts have produced no breakthroughs.

"If we're not well on the way by now, it's just not going to happen," said Standish K. Allen Jr., a professor at the Virginia Institute of Marine Science.

Blame should be spread across the watershed, environmentalists say, since all governments failed to act as boldly as the 2010 goals demanded and did little to contain sprawl. But the EPA's Chesapeake Bay Program, which oversees the cleanup, has come in for special blame. Last year, the U.S. Government Accountability Office found that the bay program was not doing enough to coordinate environmental efforts or provide updates.

Critics say the program lost valuable time by calling for elaborate plans instead of plunging straight into pollution reductions. And at the end of all this planning, they say, the cleanup had the paralyzing price tag: $28 billion.

"What that number tended to do is make people say, 'Well, it's impossible. We can't do it,' " said William C. Baker, president of the Chesapeake Bay Foundation, an environmental group.

In response to questions about the management of the Chesapeake cleanup, bay program Director Rebecca Hanmer released a two-paragraph statement. It said the EPA was committed to "continue accelerating our progress toward a cleaner, healthier Chesapeake."

For now, the consensus among environmentalists is that the costs of meeting the 2010 goals are prohibitively high. Instead, they have begun pushing for agricultural and sewer-plant funds to aim at 80 percent of the desired pollution reductions.

Even these revised plans would require wrangling an estimated $3 billion more than state and federal governments have allocated.

DOJ_NMG_0123123

Nineteen years into the bay cleanup -- intended as a model for environmental movements all over the world -- even the easy fixes are hard.

"It's not like you can find a place elsewhere that did it better," said Ann Pesiri Swanson, executive director of the Chesapeake Bay Commission, an advisory body to the cleanup. "That's the tragedy."

A Prime-Time Greening (TIME)

By Jeffrey Kluger

Time, January 29, 2007

There's nothing like a hostile Congress and a war gone sour to bring out the fence mender in a President. Tuesday's State of the Union address was President George W. Bush's most humble yet, filled with domestic goodies designed to appeal to a public fed up with bad news from Baghdad. Immigration, health care and education all got speech time, but most surprising was Bush's new focus on energy and the environment. Is the Oil President really becoming the Eco-President? Opinions are mixed.

Bush's biggest bid was to cut gasoline use 20% by 2017, in part by boosting mileage requirements for cars. The way to do this, the Administration says, is not to bump up all miles-per-gallon standards equally but rather to impose car-by-car rules, depending on the model. "Let experts consider the technology and the effect on safety and jobs," James Connaughton, chairman of the White House Council on Environmental Quality, tells TIME.

To skeptics, this smells fishy. The vagaries of the 1975 mileage laws may prevent the Administration from raising standards this way without first getting approval from Congress. If Bush really wants to boost mileage, they say, he should just tell his Department of Transportation to do so across the board. "There's a bit of slipperiness here," says John deCicco, an automotive engineer and a senior fellow with Environmental Defense. "He doesn't need Congress to get off the dime on this one."

Perhaps more promising was Bush's call to quintuple U.S. production of biofuels such as corn ethanol by 2017. The proposal is solid--to a point. You can't use biofuels without flex-fuel vehicles, and currently there aren't many out there. Plus, manufacturing ethanol is a messy process: smokestack pollution can offset what you save from tailpipes. An overall carbon cap would fix that, but even a greener Bush won't go there. "You dirty up a clean fuel if you manufacture it dirtily," says Sarah Hessenflow Harper, an Environmental Defense analyst and a former agricultural adviser for Senators Sam Brownback and Chuck Hagel.

Bush's other proposals--more solar panels, windmills and nuclear plants--seemed to be rhetorical gauze. Still there were a lot of places a beleaguered President could have gone looking for friends. Greens are pleased that after six years, Bush is finally coming to them.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Drug Gang Revolt Feared In Mexico (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 28, 2007

The Mexican government has sent an additional 9,000 soldiers and police to the country's northern states to confront drug smugglers threatening to rise up against the extradition of their gang bosses.

Mexican Defense Secretary Guillermo Galvan said the government buildup, part of "Operation Sierra Madre," came in response to the Jan. 19 extradition to the United States of 15 suspected smugglers, including 10 reputed drug cartel bosses.

Mexican President Felipe Calderon had dispatched more than 16,000 Mexican army, navy and federal police into the states of Chihuahua, Durango and Sinaloa shortly after he took office Dec. 1.

They have since burned more than 2,500 acres of marijuana fields and 2,000 acres of opium fields and have confiscated nearly 3 tons of cocaine and 20 tons of harvested marijuana in the country's so-called "golden triangle" of drug traffickers.

Mr. Galvan said soldiers and police are prepared to confront any uprising and suggested that he was planning more extraditions as part of a crackdown by the Calderon administration on drug kingpins in the three states.

In the past six months, Mexico has extradited more than 60 fugitives to the United States, including suspects wanted on murder, rape and drug trafficking charges. The extraditions prompted Antonio O. Garza Jr., the U.S. ambassador in Mexico, to say the two countries "are working together to guarantee that neither country will ever be a refuge for those who seek to escape justice."

Mexico's Supreme Court last year struck down a four-year-old ban on extraditions.

DOJ_NMG_0123124

Among those returned to the United States to stand trial was purported Gulf cartel leader Osiel Cardenas-Guillen, who was thought to be running the drug organization from his prison cell in Mexico, and reputed drug kingpin Francisco Rafael Arellano Felix of the Tijuana-based Arellano Felix gang.

Also extradited to the United States were Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, brothers and former chiefs of the Arellano-Felix cartel, and Hector Palma Salazar, former boss of the Sinaloa cartel of Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman -- Mexico's most powerful drug leader who escaped in 2001 from a maximum-security prison and remains at large.

U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) boss Karen P. Tandy has described the extraditions as "unprecedented in the history of Mexico" and said they had directly affected four major drug cartels in that country -- including the Gulf cartel headed by Mr. Cardenas-Guillen. She described that operation as "one of the most brutal and powerful drug cartels in the world."

Mr. Cardenas-Guillen controlled what the DEA has said was one of the major transit corridors into south Texas, and his lieutenants purportedly smuggled hundreds of kilograms of cocaine into neighborhoods across the United States.

U.S. authorities have said Mr. Cardenas-Guillen was responsible for moving 4 to 6 tons of cocaine a month into the United States from 1999 to March 2003. He also has been named as one of Mexico's drug kingpins most responsible for the rising violence along the U.S.-Mexico border in Texas in recent years.

"Ironically, Cardenas-Guillen was a former Mexican federal police officer who betrayed the public trust and exploited that knowledge to protect his organization," Mrs. Tandy said. "Violence, intimidation and murder are his stock in trade."

Suspected Cartel Boss Hires McAllen Lawyer For Defense Team (MCAMON)

By Andres R. Martinez, Monitor Staff Writer

Monitor, January 27, 2007

McALLEN — Suspected Gulf Cartel leader Osiel Cardenas-Guillen has hired prominent McAllen lawyer Roberto Yzaguirre as part of his defense team in a federal drug case that prompted Cardenas' extradition from Mexico a week ago.

Cardenas-Guillen, who faces a 17-count indictment out of Brownsville, was flown to the United States on Jan. 19 with 14 other fugitives.

He appeared in court once this week, but the judge closed the proceedings to the public. His arraignment is set for Feb. 1 in Houston. It's unclear whether the trial will be in Brownsville or Houston.

Yzaguirre defended the Matamoros-based Gulf Cartel's former head, Juan Garcia Abrego, in another federal drug case in 1996. Unlike Cardenas, who was first tried in Mexico before being extradited, Mexican authorities whisked Garcia out of the country without a trial the day after he was arrested.

U.S. Justice Department officials told reporters Monday that Cardenas-Guillen was responsible for smuggling 4 to 6 tons of cocaine a month into the United States from 1999 to 2003. They also claimed he is responsible for a majority of the violence associated with drug cartels during the last few years, including the attempted murder of FBI and Drug Enforcement Administration agents in Matamoros.

Cardenas-Guillen had been running the cartel from his prison cell in Mexico since 2003, according to Mexican authorities.

Yzaguirre was also the lawyer for Guillermo Gonzalez Calderoni, Mexico's former drug czar. Calderoni led Mexico's effort against drug cartels in the early 1990s, but later fled the country after rumors spread that he protected some cartels.

Calderoni lived in McAllen for about a decade. Yzaguirre successfully represented him when Mexico twice tried to have him brought back to Mexico to face charges. The former Mexican official was gunned down leaving Yzaguirre's office Feb. 5, 2003.

Yzaguirre referred all questions about Cardenas-Guillen to the U.S. Attorney's Office in Houston.

Andres R. Martinez covers courts and general assignments for The Monitor. He can be reached at (956) 683-4434.

Mexican Police Investigated For Bribery (AP)

AP, January 27, 2007

(AP) Six federal police officers involved in President Felipe Calderon's anti-drug operation were being investigated for extortion on Friday after they were videotaped taking money from a driver in the border city of Tijuana, officials said.

The men, part of a force of more than 3,300 police and soldiers sent to Tijuana to clamp down on drug gangs and corruption, will be punished if found guilty, the Public Safety Department said in a statement.

A videotape recorded by the Tijuana city police department shows the officers at a checkpoint stopping a motorist and searching his vehicle. After a discussion, the motorist was shown giving the police a handful of cash including at least one $100 bill.

The videotape, taken Jan. 17, was released to the media and posted on Mexican news Web sites on Friday.

Soldiers involved in the anti-drug offensive known as Operation Tijuana have been inspecting firearms belonging to Tijuana's 2,000 city police for three weeks, in response to allegations by federal investigators that a network of officers supports smugglers who traffic drugs into the United States.

The Tijuana police have held demonstrations, complaining they need their guns for their jobs and stand a higher risk of being shot dead without them.

More than 300 people were slain in Tijuana last year, including 13 police officers.

On Monday, the Tijuana police department announced it had issued some officers slingshots and ball bearings to defend themselves.

Calderon narrowly won the presidency last year on a law-and-order platform and has promised to dismantle drug gangs who killed more than 2,000 people across Mexico last year.

Since December, he has sent more than 20,000 police and soldiers to regions across Mexico that have been ravaged by drug-related violence, such as Tijuana and the Pacific resort of Acapulco. Last week, he also extradited four alleged drug kingpins to the United States.

Karen Tandy, chief of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, has described Calderon's battle against drug gangs as "an enormous leap forward."

Tijuana Officers Get Their Guns Back (AP)

By Luis Perez, The Associated Press

AP, January 28, 2007

TIJUANA, Mexico — Police in this violent border city got their guns back Saturday three weeks after they were forced to turn over weapons to federal authorities because of allegations they were colluding with drug traffickers.

Tijuana Public Safety Secretary Luis Javier Algorri said soldiers returned all 2,130 guns to his department.

He planned to send a letter to the attorney general's office asking for the results of the investigation so he could clear up any doubts about his officers. No one from the attorney general's office was available for comment Saturday.

The officers handed in their guns Jan. 4 after President Felipe Calderon sent 3,300 soldiers and federal police to Tijuana to hunt down drug gangs. The soldiers swept police stations and took officers' guns for inspection to see if they had been used to protect smugglers who traffic drugs into the U.S.

Tijuana police initially stopped patrols after their guns were taken, saying it was too dangerous, but most later returned to work. In some cases, officers were accompanied by armed state police. Others patrolled in larger numbers than normal. One officer was seen holding a slingshot that he said was for his protection.

Algorri said the drastic action put the city's safety at risk and cut in half the number of arrests made in January compared to the same period last year. Five officers were injured by assailants who took advantage of them being unarmed, he said.

In several neighborhoods, residents took the law into their own hands, grabbing suspects off the street and tying them up before calling police to haul them off.

Dubbed "Operation Tijuana," the initiative was part of a major military offensive launched by Calderon against drug gangs. The president, who took office Dec. 1 promising to crack down on organized crime, has sent more than 24,000 troops to states plagued by execution-style killings and beheadings as rival gangs fight over marijuana plantations and smuggling routes.

Drug gangs were blamed for more than 2,000 murders nationwide in 2006 and have left a particularly bloody trail in Tijuana, where more than 300 people were slain last year.

Meanwhile, six federal police officers involved in Calderon's anti-drug operation were being investigated for extortion after they were videotaped Jan. 17 taking money from a driver in Tijuana, across the border from San Diego.

The video, recorded by the Tijuana police department, shows the officers at a checkpoint stopping a motorist and searching his vehicle. After a discussion, the motorist was shown giving the police a handful of cash including at least one $100 bill.

Mexico's Latest War On Drug Gangs Is Off To A Rapid Start (NYT)

By James C. Mckinley Jr.

The New York Times, January 27, 2007

MEXICO CITY, Jan. 25 — If any image can sum up President Felipe Calderón's first eight weeks in office, it would be the sight of him dressed in military fatigues addressing troops he had sent into the state of Michoacán to corral narcotics traffickers.

It has been a hundred years since a Mexican president appeared in military garb, and the choice seemed no accident to most people here. Even if the fatigues seemed a poor fit for the bespectacled, bookish head of state, the new president was sending a clear message when he donned them on Jan. 3. He was declaring war on drug trafficking.

DOJ_NMG_0123126

Since he took office on Dec. 1, Mr. Calderón has moved against the drug cartels with a speed that has amazed officials in Mexico and the United States alike. He has sent thousands of federal police officers and soldiers to six states, flooding cities like Tijuana, Acapulco and Morelia with heavily armed men.

He disarmed the notoriously corrupt Tijuana police. He broke a longstanding political taboo and extradited 11 men accused of being important drug dealers to the United States to keep them from operating from prison.

"This is a permanent fight, in which, unfortunately, many have lost their lives," he declared at a meeting of governors and top public security officials, calling for a crusade to reclaim Mexico from drug gangs. "We are fighting without rest so that these sacrifices will not be in vain."

It is too early to tell how much of the offensive is a show intended to persuade the public that Mr. Calderón is serious about attacking the drug trade or whether it is the beginning of a sustained effort that will have a lasting impact.

So far the campaign has had limited success. Military operations have netted only a handful of reputed organized crime members among the 160 people detained. Gangland slayings and kidnappings have dipped slightly where the federal police and military are patrolling, but they continue to happen with unnerving regularity.

Officials in the United States from the president down have loudly praised Mr. Calderón's courage, particularly for the extraditions, and hope it is a trend. But they acknowledge that only a long-term campaign can end the violence in Mexico and stop the flow of drugs.

"Nobody claims that these extraditions are the end," said John P. Walters, the White House drug control policy director. "They are an enormously powerful step to hopefully bring this violence to an end more rapidly."

All this has helped Mr. Calderón politically at home and abroad. Yet skeptics here say rooting out drug trafficking will take more than a few weeks of roadblocks and highly visible federal patrols in drug-plagued towns. The roots of the problem, they say, run deep in Mexican society.

Dealers flush with ill-gotten cash have long corrupted local police departments, in some cases hiring officers as enforcers and assassins or paying them to keep silent about what they know.

Prison officials are also easy to seduce with money, as happened when Joaquín Guzmán, one of the most dangerous drug cartel leaders, walked out of a high-security prison six years ago after bribing guards.

Perhaps more problematic, Mexican citizens generally distrust the police, and fear of reporting crimes has grown in the last year as drug gangs have resorted to beheadings to terrorize the public and their enemies.

Along with the widespread fear comes a certain respect. Big-time mobsters are treated like folk heroes in their home regions, their stories told and retold in popular songs.

And some who fear that Mr. Calderón's actions might not succeed point out that he is not the first to take on Mexico's organized crime. His predecessor, Vicente Fox, started his own term with a pledge to dismantle drug cartels and made significant strides. He created an elite federal force that arrested dozens of kingpins, capos and lieutenants in the Tijuana, Sinaloa and Gulf cartels.

Yet the arrests only seemed to worsen the situation, unleashing a underworld war the likes of which Mexico had never seen. More than 2,000 people were killed in drug-related disputes last year alone, including scores of police officers.

Some criminal justice experts — even those who praise Mr. Calderón's actions — say the key to reducing the power of drug barons in the long run is purging the local police, courts and city halls of corrupt officials, as well as changing the judiciary to make judges harder to bribe.

Some editorial writers and other skeptics have noted that although the president disarmed the Tijuana police, he has done little to clean up the corrupt police departments at the heart of the problem.

But other experts on the drug trade are optimistic that he will do better than Mr. Fox. They note that Mr. Calderón has adopted strategies that worked in Colombia in the 1990s: using the military to take back regions where drug dealers control the local authorities, extraditing top cartel members to the United States and eradicating crops of marijuana and poppies.

Jorge Fernández Meléndez, who has written extensively about the drug trade here, said some of these tactics had been tried piecemeal in the past, but never in such a concerted way with so many resources.

"Of all the strategies used against narcotics trafficking in recent years, this is the most on the mark and the one with the best chance of concrete success," he said.

Mexico's Willing Drug Fighter (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 29, 2007

President Felipe Calderon comes out swinging, but the U.S. is now in another arena.

MEXICO CITY — The U.S. war on drugs has seldom seen a more willing recruit than Mexican President Felipe Calderon.

Since taking office last month, Calderon has sent thousands of soldiers to half a dozen states, where they have pulled up pot plants and opium poppies by the hectare and searched thousands of vehicles at military roadblocks. He also has fast-tracked the extradition of men reputed to be among the hemisphere's biggest kingpins.

But unfortunately for the Mexican leader, who put the drug-trafficking battle at the top of his nation's domestic agenda, the issue that once was a staple of U.S. political speeches has fallen so far off the radar that for the first time in years it didn't warrant a mention in President Bush's State of the Union address.

Drug-related violence, meanwhile, has gone from bad to gruesome in Mexico, where traffickers have tossed hand grenades at enemies and left severed heads as messages. More than 2,000 Mexicans died in such carnage last year, according to media tallies.

Calderon has signaled that he'll ask for millions of dollars in U.S. aid to continue his campaign and extend it nationwide.

"The Mexican people are demanding that their parks, their streets, their schools, their neighborhoods be safe places for their families, where their children can live and grow up in peace," Calderon told a meeting of Mexico's governors last week.

The war against drug criminals, he added, "is a permanent fight."

But the U.S. war on drugs has been overshadowed by the war in Iraq, and its urgency has been tempered by historically low crime rates domestically and statistics that indicate declining drug use among American teenagers. The Times reported last week that the U.S. military had cut aerial surveillance over Pacific and Gulf Coast smuggling routes by more than half and Navy patrols by a third since 2002.

"Mexico is sending a clear message to the U.S., saying, 'We're doing everything we can, even more than you,' " Mexico historian Lorenzo Meyer said. "The U.S. ambassador won't be able to moan about Mexico not fighting crime."

Calderon must find a way to turn U.S. attention back to his advantage, Meyer said.

Calderon has no such challenge at home, where his crackdown enjoys broad support, despite the shaky legal ground of his military roadblocks. Mexicans have the same protections against unwarranted government searches as Americans do, said John M. Ackerman, a law professor at the Institute for Legal Research at the National Autonomous University of Mexico. "The whole thing is of questionable constitutionality," he said.

Yet no lawmaker in the Mexican Congress, even among opposition parties, has raised a legal challenge. The newspaper El Universal published a poll last week showing a third of respondents, spread equally among all three major parties, approved of Calderon's actions; a third said it was too early to judge; and fewer than a fifth were opposed.

But without more U.S. help, Mexico stands little chance of winning a direct confrontation with sophisticated and brutal traffickers who have established a near monopoly in the estimated $65-billion U.S. drug market, analysts say.

Several Texas lawmakers are sponsoring a bill that would pay Mexico $850 million in federal funds over five years for training police and prosecutors. It would more than double the $69 million a year Mexico gets now.

"The stars are finally aligned with Calderon, who is willing to work with the United States, who's extraditing criminals, and who's willing to send troops into hot spots and take on organized crime," U.S. Rep. Henry Cuellar (D-Texas) said. "U.S. leaders have always said Mexico needs to do more, and now we have a Mexican president doing more."

Under pressure from the United States, nearly all new Mexican presidents over the last three decades have taken office with promises to crack down on smugglers and the government corruption that keeps them in business. But ties between Mexican officials and drug lords — some proven, others not — have scandalized every Mexican administration since the 1960s.

Calderon's campaign against Mexico's continuing drug violence, which makes daily headlines here, has not gone unnoticed north of the border.

Bush telephoned Calderon on Wednesday to commend him. And the U.S. government's drug czar, John P. Walters, said last week that "the boldness of the Mexican response here obviously calls upon us to continue, and to match that with our own boldness at home."

Despite the praise, the U.S. drug war "is nowhere on the political agenda," said Mark Kleiman, a professor and director of UCLA's Drug Policy Analysis Program. Kleiman argues that lack of political attention to drug policy is a good thing. "Politicians are incapable of dealing with it," he said.

Despite high-profile arrests and record annual seizures, he said, a steady supply of cocaine, marijuana, heroin and methamphetamine has been available in the U.S. since President Nixon famously declared drugs to be America's "public enemy No. 1."

Common sense, Kleiman said, suggests that Mexican law enforcement ought to attack "the side effects of trafficking" — the violent dealers and organizations. Calderon has the right idea, to put pressure on competing drug cartels until they stop assassinating police officers, bystanders and one another's members, Kleiman said. "Make the bad guys keep their head down."

Carlos Martínez and Cecilia Sánchez of The Times' Mexico City Bureau contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0123128

Mexico Drug Barons Get Warning (SAE)

San Antonio Express, January 27, 2007

MEXICO CITY — By deploying the army and sending top drug prisoners to the United States, President Felipe Calderón appears bent on showing the nation he's in charge and warning gangsters to end a bloody turf war.

The word to Mexico's criminal underworld: Crawl back under your rocks — and kill fewer people — or take major heat from the feds.

By a Mexican congressional estimate, as many as 2,100 people died in cartel violence last year — a dramatic increase from the past.

The bloodletting is a national security concern and a constant source of friction between the U.S. and Mexico.

The boldest executions involved severed heads tossed onto the dance floor of a nightclub and the machine-gunning of six police officers riding in a truck.

"We are absolutely determined, for our children, to recover our streets, parks and cities," Calderón said this week. "We are on our way."

It remains to be seen how long the new president will keep the pressure on, but observers say he's already acting bolder than his predecessor, Vicente Fox.

"He is sending a strong message that some things that were tolerated in the past will not be tolerated anymore," said Jorge Chabat, a Mexico criminal-justice system expert. "It is my guess (traffickers) will get the message and modify their behavior."

"Who is going to invest a dollar in Mexico if you see images of beheaded people on the front pages of newspapers?" he said. "You can not expect to be treated like a civilized country if you tolerate these manifestations of violence."

Chabat said no one expects Calderón's latest actions will put the cartels out of business or stop the drug flow, but they could re-establish some order.

The army was operating checkpoints in the industrial city of Monterrey on Friday, just days after several key drug traffickers, including Osiel Cárdenas, the head of the Gulf Cartel smuggling organization, were handed over to U.S. authorities.

Despite being imprisoned in Mexico, Cárdenas was believed to be following a long tradition of jailed capos using bribes and intimidation to run their syndicates from their cells.

A natural Cárdenas rival, Héctor Luis "El Guero" Palma, once head of the Sinaloa cartel, was also chained by masked federal agents and whisked aboard a U.S.-bound plane.

Calderón took a page from violence-torn Colombia's playbook by sending them to the United States, where if convicted they likely will spend the rest of their lives behind bars.

In Colombia, warring cartels united in an attempt to intimidate the government into stopping extraditions. Police, judges and other officials were murdered and a commercial airliner was bombed to kill a witness.

In the end, the government brought the cartels to their knees — a strategy that in some ways resulted in Mexican gangsters taking over the hemisphere's drug trade.

Chabat said sending Cárdenas and others to the United States likely will create power struggles and therefore more short-term violence within the cartels, but he doubted the gangs would take on Calderón.

"Traffickers know if they go to war against the Mexican government, they will have to face the United States, and that is not a wise decision," he said.

He also noted that Mexico's institutions, including its army, are more solid than their Colombian counterparts.

The military's presence, however, was unusual on the streets of Monterrey, where troops were checking vehicles this week. Motorists eased into lines of traffic that slowly filed by combat-ready soldiers.

There were no immediate reports of arrests or seizures.

The city, most known for its economic clout, has seen increasing drug violence, including shootings in upscale neighborhoods and the execution of a police commander.

Mike Vigil, former chief of international operations for the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said Calderón had to take action.

"When drug trafficking gets so out of control, and you have all this violence generated as a result, it impacts the national security of a country," said Vigil, who was based in Colombia and Mexico.

By shipping traffickers to the United States, where they face federal charges, Calderón is stopping them from running their gangs and making it likely they will never again set foot in Mexico, Vigil said.

"They cannot be kings anymore and are basically severed from their organizations," he said. "All of a sudden, they go from being the head, to being nobody."

DOJ_NMG_0123129

Pike Set To Spend Life In Prison (JPJ)

Jamestown Post Journal, January 28, 2007

Aaron Pike of Jamestown will spend life in prison for his role in Operation Jamestown, a 14-person federal drug case.

U.S. Attorney Terrance P. Flynn, announced Pike's sentencing, which comes after conviction in a jury trial on March 17.

Pike was sentenced by the Hon. Richard J. Arcara, U.S. District Court chief judge, to life in prison in the Bureau of Prisons, five years supervised release, a $100 special assessment and he was ordered to pay $8,617.17 in restitution to New York State Crime Victims Board.

According to Assistance U.S. Attorney's Thomas S. Duszkiewicz and Jorge S. deRosas, who handled the case, said Pike was convicted of organizing a continuing criminal enterprise which involved the distribution of more than 1,000 kilograms of marijuana and more than 4 kilograms of methamphetamine in Jamestown between July 2000 and August 2001. The drugs were allegedly supplied and shipped to Pike in Jamestown by a former inmate he had met while serving in state prison.

''Continuing a criminal enterprise after conviction is the worst crime in federal eyes,'' said Chautauqua County Sheriff Joseph Gerace.

The distribution continued after Pike went to California and led to the execution-style murders of Richard Alicea and Johnny Houston on May 23, 2001, near Gerry. Pike was later arrested in North Carolina in October 2001 and after an initial indictment was returned in July 2001.

The drug investigation also resulted in the convictions of 13 other defendants. Aaron Pike was also sentenced in Chautauqua County Court after his conviction for the murders.

''We conducted the investigation into the homicide,'' Gerace said. ''Our people did a great job and it is satisfying to know that he will not be involved in any other crimes.''

Investigation into the drug case was by the federal Drug Enforcement Administration, under the direction of Special Agent Nancy Cote; the Chautauqua County Sheriff's Department and with the cooperation of the Chautauqua County District Attorney's Office.

Federal Officials Aske States To Tighten Medical Marijuana Law (AP)

AP, January 28, 2007

HONOLULU -- Federal officials want the state to conduct background checks on those certified to supply medical marijuana to patients, saying the state must close loopholes being exploited by drug dealers.

Ed Kubo, chief federal prosecutor for Hawaii, said the December indictment of Richard Velasco, a 49-year-old accused drug dealer from the Big Island, is an example of why the state needs to strengthen oversight of its medical marijuana program.

Velasco was awarded a medical marijuana caregiver certificate in December 2004, just months after Hawaii County police officers discovered 246 marijuana plants growing on his property. He was arrested for drug trafficking.

"There needs to be adequate procedures in place to allow for background checks, inspections, monitoring and reviews so that this law is not a farce," Kubo said.

The state Department of Public Safety should also be required to perform random inspections of the caregiver's plant-growing operation, he added.

"After all, we regulate liquor licenses by unannounced inspections and monitoring, and liquor is legal," Kubo said.

Those with drug or felony convictions should also be prohibited from acting as medical marijuana caregivers.

"We're not interested in investigating the sick and the dying," said Anthony D. Williams, assistant special agent in charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration's Honolulu district office. "But we will continue to investigate and pursue anyone cultivating and distributing marijuana."

Hawaii became the eighth state to allow marijuana use for medical purposes in 2000. There are currently 249 licensed caregivers and 2,609 medical marijuana patients in the state.

Velasco, of Fern Acres, has five criminal convictions. He was arrested Jan. 16 and is in custody at the Federal Detention Center. His trial is set for March 20 in front of U.S. District Judge Susan Mollway.

He was indicted Dec. 21 on two counts of "knowingly and intentionally manufacturing marijuana, to wit: the cultivation of 100 or more marijuana plants," according to an indictment filed in U.S. District Court.

Because Velasco has a felony drug conviction, he faces a mandatory minimum of 10 years in jail and up to life in prison if convicted, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

As a caregiver, Velasco had a certificate allowing him to have up to three mature, flowering marijuana plants, four immature plants and an ounce of usable marijuana for each mature plant.

The certificate must be renewed each year and permits the holder to grow and cultivate marijuana for one patient.

DOJ_NMG_0123130

The unidentified medical marijuana patient in Velasco's care terminated his relationship with Velasco following the arrest.

State Rep. John Mizuno, vice chairman of the House Health Committee, said his panel would likely consider the issue if the Public Safety Department or U.S. Attorney's Office proposed language for legislation.

"We have to try and ensure the safety of our kupuna and our disabled population," Mizuno said. "We would definitely support something that makes it possible to do background checks to weed out these bad apples."

IMMIGRATION:

Fresh Potential On Immigration (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 29, 2007

WASHINGTON — With a new Democratic-controlled Congress and a president newly committed to bipartisan accomplishments, prospects for an overhaul of the nation's immigration laws have never seemed brighter.

But reform efforts could still stumble over the stickiest issue: how to craft a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants that will win the support of lawmakers who draw the line at "amnesty."

In the House, where these conservatives could derail a bill, the job of finding that elusive middle ground falls to Rep. Zoe Lofgren. The San Jose Democrat, who heads the immigration subcommittee, has been buttonholing lawmakers, quizzing them between votes and hosting formal meetings.

"There's a way to deal with this," she said. "The Republicans I've listened to make it clear they're open to dialogue, to practical solutions."

Across Capitol Hill, Sens. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and John McCain (R-Ariz.) are pursuing the same goal as they develop a plan based on last year's comprehensive immigration bill, which passed the Senate, but not the House.

And in his State of the Union address last week, President Bush emphasized the importance of advances in border security and enforcement, a pitch to lawmakers who are nervous about reforms that could be seen as rewarding people who entered the country illegally.

Advocates for a broad immigration bill say it will need the support of at least 20 Republicans in the Senate and perhaps 40 in the House.

"They exist, they just have to be reassured about some things," said Tamar Jacoby, a senior fellow at the conservative Manhattan Institute who backs comprehensive immigration reform. "How do you bring along the people who said 'no' last year?"

The approach Bush took in his speech is a good start, she said. "He talked to them about border security, illegality in communities, assimilation, about working with local cops and communities. I think it's shrewd. I don't know if he can move those people, but the way to do it is address those concerns."

The Senate bill that passed last year encompassed stepped-up enforcement efforts, a program to let immigrants in as guest workers and a process for illegal immigrants to become legal residents.

The Senate seems likely to pass a similar bill this session.

In contrast, the House is legislative terra incognita.

The House passed an enforcement-only bill last year with little debate, but never debated broader legislation. And House leaders will have to appeal not only to Republicans, but to a cadre of freshman Democrats who campaigned for tougher immigration enforcement.

As a result, lawmakers are crafting legislation with conservative Democrats and moderate Republicans in mind.

"A lot of members of Congress made campaign promises, so one of the challenges is to create a comprehensive bill that's consistent with the commitments people made during the campaign," said Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), a co-sponsor of the House version of the Senate bill.

Though immigration is a difficult issue, lawmakers burst out of the legislative starting blocks in the first three weeks of Congress.

Republicans introduced enforcement bills in both chambers and offered tough immigration-related amendments to unrelated Senate legislation. A bipartisan Senate group proposed a bill that would give illegal farm workers a way to become legal permanent residents, a step toward citizenship. And Democrats announced their intention to reexamine the plan to build a 700-mile barrier along the southern border, which the previous Congress passed.

Lofgren said one key to winning over House lawmakers would be education, because few have had a chance to discuss the issues involved.

DOJ_NMG_0123131

"Our challenge is to come up with a bill that will get broad support," said Lofgren. "The House bill that passed last year was a very draconian measure. That's not what the country wants, nor what I intend to pursue, but we need to have a dialogue.

"I'm hoping for a comprehensive package, but I'm pretty confident I'm not going to get everything I want."

She warned that the House process would be slower than the Senate's, but said that she believed lawmakers were ready to act, particularly after watching strident colleagues such as Rep. J.D. Hayworth (R-Ariz.) lose to candidates who back comprehensive reform.

"I don't think that was lost on people," Lofgren said.

Senate leaders Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) have made immigration one of the first 10 bills they will take on. McCain and Kennedy are aiming to introduce their legislation in February and are reexamining the section on legalizing illegal immigrants.

The previous bill included a three-tier approach to illegal immigrants based on their length of stay in the United States, requiring that some of them leave and allowing others to stay. It was designed to appeal to conservatives uncomfortable with treating illegal immigrants who have been in the country for many years the same as those who just arrived.

But the administration has told lawmakers that is unworkable.

Instead, the lawmakers may revert to the formula in their original bill, which required illegal immigrants to pay fines and back taxes, undergo background checks, and learn English, among other requirements, before they could be processed for legal status.

The lawmakers will also rework the provision on the temporary worker program to meet demands from immigrant advocates for more labor protections, and demands from business-oriented Republicans for programs that would supply more workers.

Attempts to bolster the bill's support among conservatives in both parties will focus in part on making employer verification programs more robust. Senate aides say that holding employers more accountable for hiring illegal immigrants would ease concerns some lawmakers have about supporting a comprehensive bill.

Opponents cite the 1986 immigration reform, which included an amnesty for 3 million illegal immigrants, as a failure, charging that it simply encouraged more people to come illegally in the expectation that they would eventually be given citizenship. Today there are about 12 million illegal immigrants in the U.S.

Comprehensive reform supporters argue that illegal immigration increased because the 1986 enforcement provisions were never enforced. They hope to convince skeptics that piecemeal measures will not work as they make their case for broad legislation this year.

Despite the commitments from members on both sides of the aisle, compromise could still prove futile.

For some conservatives, any plan to legalize illegal immigrants would be hard to swallow. And for advocates, who will meet at a Washington summit this week expected to draw 200 grass-roots groups, anything short of that is inhumane.

Cecilia Munoz, vice president of the National Council of La Raza, a Latino civil rights and advocacy group, points to the previous Senate bill's three-tier legalization system as an example of the contortions that result when lawmakers try to compromise.

"It didn't pick up any votes and it made the program unworkable," Munoz said. "After many years of trying to reach that middle ground, it may be time to admit that it does not exist."

nicole.gaouette@latimes.com

Revisiting Immigration Reform (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 29, 2007

It's now up to Democrats in Congress to bring common sense and decency to U.S. immigration policy.

THERE'S BEEN A LOT of optimistic talk since the November election that President Bush and the new Democratic majority in Congress can work together to reform the nation's dysfunctional immigration laws.

The House GOP leadership, after all, was the roadblock to any rational reform in the previous Congress — not only because many top Republicans opposed it but because then-House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert inexcusably refused to allow a vote on comprehensive reform absent support from a "majority of the majority" party. This prevented the approach favored by Bush and the Senate from ever having a chance in the House, even though it might have won a bipartisan majority.

But today's optimism shouldn't be overstated. Realistically, Congress only has about half a year to act before the issue becomes consumed by presidential politics. There is temptation on both sides of the aisle to preserve immigration as an election issue rather than solve the problem.

DOJ_NMG_0123132

Bush's State of the Union address set the right tone for the coming legislative debate. He called for a "legal and orderly path for foreign workers to enter our country," a better process of assimilating new arrivals into American society and for resolving "the status of the illegal immigrants who are already in our country, without animosity and without amnesty."

But therein lies the political temptation. Plenty of Republicans will want to accuse Democrats in 2008 of favoring amnesty, and plenty of Democrats will want to accuse Republicans of animosity toward Latinos, the nation's fastest-growing bloc of voters. Complicating matters is the fact that the leading GOP presidential hopeful, Sen. John McCain of Arizona, joined Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) to write Capitol Hill's best immigration measure of 2006. McCain was then deemed too soft by anti-immigrant zealots.

Leading Democrats have been on the right side of the debate, recognizing the nation's need to provide a legal pipeline for workers and to bring a population of at least 11 million residents out of the legal shadows. Yet immigration didn't even come up in Sen. Jim Webb's (D-Va.) response to the State of the Union speech. Might Democrats be tempted to put off the issue in order to deprive the administration of a major domestic accomplishment? Will their embrace of economic populism translate into raising the drawbridge?

That would be a shame. Because back in the real world, it's a national disgrace that millions of workers vital to the U.S. economy live in fear of the law instead of under its protection.

California Democrats will play a crucial role in the debate. Sen. Dianne Feinstein and Rep. Howard L. Berman of Valley Village are strong advocates of helping the agricultural sector find willing workers. San Jose Rep. Zoe Lofgren now chairs the House Immigration subcommittee, and it will fall on her to draft legislation that combines border security measures with a temporary worker program, visa reform and a path to legalization. But it will be mostly up to Speaker Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco to resist the temptation to put politics above policy and prioritize resolving what is a pressing problem for her state and the nation.

In Exchange For Records, Fewer Immigration Raids (WP)

By Darryl Fears And Krissah Williams

The Washington Post, January 29, 2007

Over the past seven months, Bush administration officials have quietly toured the country, trying to persuade businesses that rely heavily on immigrant labor to join a little-known program that would spare them from embarrassing federal raids if they voluntarily handed over their workers' documents so the government can scan them for fraudulent information.

Officials at the Department of Homeland Security have asked companies to join the ICE Mutual Agreement Between Government and Employers program, known as IMAGE, operated by the department's Immigrations and Customs Enforcement division. It calls on businesses to submit all I-9 employee eligibility verification forms to ICE for an audit and to "ensure the accuracy of their wage reporting" by verifying workers' Social Security numbers, according to a description of the program.

An ICE spokesman said IMAGE is another step in the administration's drive to tighten work-site enforcement as more than a million immigrants illegally cross the Mexican border each year in a quest for jobs.

"The upside for those who . . . participate is that they're better equipped to know whether their workforce is legal, and ICE is less likely to be on their doorstep unexpectedly, interfering with their business," said Matthew Allen, acting deputy assistant director for infrastructure and fraud in the agency's investigations division. "It's an investment in making sure that their workforce is secure."

The government's efforts under IMAGE are much broader and deeper than those under another program, Basic Pilot, in which businesses voluntarily enroll. Companies that take part in Basic Pilot can check the Social Security numbers that job applicants provide against a national database of Social Security and immigration records.

In contrast, IMAGE covers all members of a company's workforce and does a more extensive scrub of records to determine if a worker is in the country illegally or is using fraudulent documents.

Allen would not disclose the names of companies recruited into IMAGE, saying only that dozens have taken the steps toward enrollment.

One business, Smithfield Packing Co., which operates the world's largest hog slaughterhouse, in Tar Heel, N.C., has participated since June, with dramatic results. Twenty-one workers at the plant were arrested last week after the government scrutinized forms submitted by the company.

ICE alerted Smithfield by e-mail of discrepancies in employees' records. A company spokesman said 541 workers in the plant's workforce of 5,000 are facing termination because of discrepancies on their job applications. Nearly half of Smithfield's labor pool is Latino.

DOJ_NMG_0123133

"This is terrible for everyone, us, the employees, their families," said Dennis Pittman, a company spokesman. "It's heart-wrenching. These are our better people. These are folks who have been with us seven, eight, nine years. They are good people. People have been in tears. Fifty or so people have quit.

Pittman called Smithfield's agreement with ICE "a business decision" resulting from an implied threat. "We knew raids could be a possibility," he said. "We felt going this way, there would be less of an effect."

But Smithfield received an added benefit from cooperating with the government, according to the union that is helping its workers organize. Union officials say the company submitted the names of organizers as a tactic to intimidate some workers and get rid of others. The officials note that the National Labor Relations Board has found that Smithfield worked to undermine union elections by intimidating employees in 1994 and 1997.

"Most of the leaders of a walkout in November are on their list," said Leila McDowell, a spokeswoman for the United Food and Commercial Workers. "Whether ICE is consciously in collusion or not, Smithfield could very easily manipulate the process and can use it as a tool to intimidate and threaten workers, which it has done in the past and been found to have done so illegally."

Smithfield strongly denied the claim.

A number of businesses said they have no intention of joining IMAGE, citing the disruptive action at Smithfield. The arrests in North Carolina were the second unpleasant surprise in two months for firms that say they have tried to work with immigration enforcement agencies to hire legal workers, only to be raided.

In December, ICE rounded up 1,297 illegal immigrants in six states in raids on meatpacking plants run by Swift & Co., of Greeley, Colo. Swift's president and chief executive, Sam Rovit, criticized the arrests, saying the company has "played by the rules and relied in good faith" on the Basic Pilot program since 1997.

A Swift spokesman said the company is not participating in IMAGE, preferring to stick with Basic Pilot. Swift has a chorus of supporters among businesses that say they hire immigrants to do work that American citizens do not want, for pay that they will not take.

"There is no upside in signing up for new obligations," said Stuart Anderson, executive director of the National Foundation for American Policy and a former policy chief in the immigration agency. Businesses "end up not only with the current obligations of the law but new requirements," he said.

He compared it to "advising average citizens to drive up to their local police station to get frisked."

In November, ICE pitched IMAGE to the Essential Worker Immigration Coalition, which includes the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Restaurant Association and other trade groups. Co-chair Laura Reiff was not impressed.

"We are loath to participate in a program with self-audits until we get comprehensive reform," Reiff said. "Business understands that it is going to rest on our shoulders to have to verify the employment eligibility of our workforce. We'll take on that obligation, but we can't have it outside of comprehensive reform where we get some assurances."

About 12 million illegal immigrants live in the United States, and unauthorized workers make up 5 percent of the nation's workforce, according to business lobbyists. They mostly fill agriculture, meatpacking, hospitality and construction jobs. Employers say a large reduction of immigrant workers would hurt their businesses and raise the prices of consumer goods.

In last year's immigration debate in Congress, business and advocacy groups sided with bipartisan comprehensive legislation in the Senate that would allow illegal workers to remain in the country if they turn themselves in, pay a stiff fine for crossing the border illegally, learn English and go to the back of the line for a guest-worker program.

Last week, immigration officials pitched IMAGE to the National Council of Agricultural Employers. The presentation included a slide about the vulnerabilities of "allowing illegal aliens to exploit employment opportunities," said Craig Regelbrugge, a spokesman for the American Nursery & Landscape Association and the Agricultural Coalition for Immigration Reform.

After the presentation, Regelbrugge raised his hand. "I can save you a lot of time," he recalled telling ICE officials. The vulnerabilities are "the existence of 1.6 million job opportunities, many of which are seasonal and intermittent," he said. "Virtually no Americans are applying to work in the fields."

He added: "We really can't focus on partnering with you until we have a solution."

Staff writer Spencer S. Hsu contributed to this report.

Landscape Changes For Illegal Alien Jobs (WT)

By Sean Lengell

The Washington Times, January 29, 2007

Illegal aliens, long a vital component of the nation's agricultural work force, are swapping hoes and spades for jackhammers and feather dusters.

DOJ_NMG_0123134

Fifty years ago, as many as 90 percent of all undocumented workers came to the U.S. to work in agriculture-related businesses. But while farms and rural meat-packing and poultry-processing plants still rely on cheap, immigrant labor, illegal aliens increasingly are flocking to urban areas for work.

And with the Washington area's relatively strong economy and building boom, the region is home to one of the nation's fastest-growing communities of illegal aliens, immigration analysts say.

"They're everywhere -- and they're doing all kinds of work," Georgetown University professor William McDonald said.

The types of jobs filled by the region's illegal aliens fall mostly in two categories: construction and related jobs, including landscaping, roofing and general day-labor work, and the service industry.

"In this region, we don't have a lot of manufacturing -- we never have -- but there is a lot of construction, due to the strength of the economy and the growth of the suburbs in this region," said Audrey Singer, an immigration fellow at the nonprofit Brookings Institution in Washington.

"Then there is also a whole slew of service-sector jobs that these immigrants are finding, including restaurant jobs and domestic work in people's homes."

The region's immigrant population is considerably more diverse than elsewhere in the U.S. The most notable difference is that Washington's Mexican population, both legal and illegal, is disproportionately smaller than other markets.

Instead, immigrants from El Salvador make up the largest local contingent of foreign nationals who have crossed the border unlawfully, although communities from other Central American nations, as well as Mexicans, Asians and Africans, also live in the area.

"What happens with a lot of these immigrant communities is that there is an initial settlement for whatever reason, and then when someone else is looking to immigrate, they say, 'Where can I go where somebody will help me get a job and get settled?' " said Jeff Passel of the nonprofit Pew Hispanic Center in Washington.

Pinpointing with any certainty the number of illegal aliens in the region, where they live and where they work is impossible. But with census figures putting the Washington metropolitan area's foreign-born population at more than 1 million, some analysts say as many as one-third are here unlawfully.

Mr. Passel estimates that 300,000 illegal aliens live in the area -- an increase of about 100,000 since 2000.

Most illegals in the area live in the suburbs, with only about 15,000 to 30,000 in the District.

About 40 percent of all foreigners living unlawfully in the U.S. initially arrived legally with a valid work, tourist, student or other visa, but stayed once the document expired, Mr. Passel said.

"This is certainly a group that doesn't get much attention," he said. "And it's a group that has valid Social Security numbers."

Locally, that number could be even higher. Many within Washington's large Salvadoran community initially were granted "temporary protected status," which Congress gave to thousands of Salvadorans fleeing civil war and natural disasters since the 1980s. Many stayed after their protected status expired, either unwilling or unable to return to their home country.

"There isn't a lot for many of them to go back to -- their homes or villages and their industries and their local economies have been destroyed," Miss Singer said. "So having this legal limbo with temporary protected status doesn't necessarily encourage them to go back, but it doesn't necessary encourage them to invest [in their community] while they're here, either."

Finding and deporting foreign nationals who have overstayed visas isn't easy. Because so many communities, including Washington, rely heavily on cheap immigrant labor, authorities often are reluctant to hunt down illegal aliens, Mr. McDonald said.

"Internal enforcement is a joke. Nobody really takes immigration law that seriously," he said.

TAX:

Turning A Blind Eye, IRS Enables Church Politicking (USAT)

By Dan Gilgoff

USA Today, January 29, 2007

Last year was supposed to spell doom for sermons that endorsed political candidates or parties. Months before the congressional elections, the IRS made front-page headlines by trumpeting a new effort to crack down on churches that violated IRS restrictions on politicking by houses of worship. The offensive was framed as a reaction to the 2004 election cycle, when a growing number of churches were seen to be engaging in prohibited political activism — such as pulpit endorsements — with impunity.

It may come as a surprise, then, that when the IRS releases its tally of complaints against church politicking in the '06 election — anticipated in the next month or so — the number is expected to be even higher than it was in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0123135

But that should be no surprise at all. Fact is, the IRS has never seriously enforced the 1954 law that forbids churches to aid candidates for elected office. (It has been amended to ban opposing political candidates as well.)

The agency defends its record by noting that churches enjoy special legal protections that prevent the IRS from proactively monitoring them for violations. According to IRS spokeswoman Nancy Mathis, the agency cannot launch an investigation into a church unless it receives a complaint from a parishioner or an independent watchdog group.

"It's not like we're sitting in the pews," says Mathis. "It's the honor system plus some third-party oversight."

IRS experts outside the agency say a bigger stumbling block to enforcement is the American cultural taboo against government intrusion into churches. Mathis estimates that only about five churches have ever lost their tax-exempt status by violating the rule. That's one church for each decade the law has been on the books.

This enforcement vacuum is aggravating the very problem that Congress set out to fix in 1954: preventing Uncle Sam from subsidizing partisan politics. Political consultants, scholars and news reports all confirm that, with each passing election, more churches — both liberal and conservative — appear to be pushing the envelope in endorsing or opposing candidates. These churches typically argue that they are advocating issues, such as opposition to gay marriage or the war in Iraq — perfectly legal under IRS rules — as opposed to specific candidates.

The law banning tax-exempt organizations, which include churches, from partisan politics was engineered by then-Senate Minority Leader Lyndon B. Johnson. Its detractors, mostly Christian conservatives, have argued that Johnson was seeking retribution against a non-profit group opposed to his reelection.

While there is some truth to that claim — Johnson's language was attached to another, unrelated bill as an amendment with reportedly little or no debate — the law has been upheld by the courts. And even before its passage, the U.S. government had long tailored tax exemptions to charities that confronted problems such as poverty because such groups provided a clear benefit to the public and saved the federal government time and money.

That's why American taxpayers should be concerned about the IRS enforcement vacuum: Tax exemptions for non-profit groups were never intended to offer tax relief to partisan political advocacy.

By failing to enforce the 1954 rule, however, that's exactly what the IRS is doing. The agency has concluded investigations into complaints filed against 40 churches in the 2004 election cycle. Though so-called "political intervention" (IRS-speak for actions that violate its prohibitions on backing or opposing candidates) was substantiated in all but three cases, not a single house of worship saw its tax-exempt status revoked. Instead, the IRS wrote advisories, warning citations that carry no punishment, or assessed excise taxes, the equivalent of light fines, on those churches.

The IRS justifies this slap-on-the-wrist approach by claiming that it wants to bring churches into compliance with IRS rules rather than punish them. But because federal law prevents publication of a list of such churches and their violations, there is no example for other churches to follow concerning what kinds of political activity go too far. The IRS does periodically issue guidelines for churches, but those receive much less attention than would a newspaper story about a church that crossed the line.

David Barton, an evangelical activist who was hired by the Republican National Committee to reach thousands of pastors in the 2004 campaign, says he hasn't heard of a single church losing its tax-exempt status in his nearly 20 years of political activism. If he hasn't, who has?

Of course, it's not just conservative evangelical churches backing Republican candidates that flout the IRS rule without consequence. Most of us have become familiar with the sight of Democratic candidates addressing liberal African-American congregations from the pulpit after being introduced by a pastor who is clearly making an endorsement. And All Saints Episcopal Church in Pasadena, Calif., has attracted national scrutiny because it is the subject of an IRS investigation triggered when a pastor there delivered an anti-Iraq war sermon that appeared to support Democratic presidential nominee John Kerry on the eve of the 2004 election.

If history is any guide, All Saints has little reason to fear revocation of its tax-free status. And if the church's legal team is right, the case will turn out to be another instance of a partisan group — this time on the right — trying to harass a church with which it disagrees politically. Indeed, with the IRS claiming it can launch investigations into churches only in response to complaints filed by parishioners or outsiders, the enforcement of a law intended to stamp out partisan politics in churches has become the province of partisan political organizations looking to make trouble for their churchgoing enemies.

In an interesting twist, though, many Christian right activists have taken up the liberal All Saints' cause, vowing to fight any IRS attempt to revoke the church's tax-exempt status. A strange marriage, to be sure, but churches on both left and right have much to gain by pressuring the IRS to continue ignoring its own rule. And as long as the agency does, partisans on both sides will continue filling the vacuum with complaints.

Dan Gilgoff is a senior editor at U.S. News & World Report. His book, The Jesus Machine: How James Dobson, Focus on the Family, and Evangelical America are Winning the Culture War, will be published in March.

DOJ_NMG_0123136

Soaking The Rich, Again (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 29, 2007

Democratic Senator James Webb of Virginia played the class card in his State of the Union response Tuesday night, but he is apparently too new to the job to realize how crucial "the rich" are to his party's spending ambitions.

Data released last week from the Congressional Budget Office confirm that the tax cuts of 2003 keep soaking the rich, especially on their capital gains. CBO and Congress's Joint Tax Committee originally estimated that reducing the capital gains rate to 15% from 20% would cost the Treasury $5.4 billion from 2003-2006.

Whoops. Actual revenues exceeded expectations by 68%, creating a $133 billion revenue bonanza for the feds. CBO's original forecast for 2006 was for $57 billion in capital gains revenues, but actual receipts were $110 billion. This surprise windfall is one reason the budget deficit is also far lower than CBO predicted.

The lower capital gains tax has raised stock values by raising the after-tax return on capital investment. It has also given stock owners a greater incentive to sell their shares, and then reinvest the proceeds, because the tax penalty on these transactions is lower. Class warriors like Mr. Webb often forget that the capital gains tax is voluntary. Investors can defer paying the tax for years by holding on to their stock. This creates what is called the "lock-in effect" that deters an efficient allocation of investment capital.

The 2003 rate cut liberated hundreds of billions of dollars of capital for new investment. By the way, the National Venture Capital Association reports that venture capitalists invested $25.5 billion in 2006, the biggest burst of dealmaking since the stock market bubble burst in 2000. This is seed money for new companies and new jobs that will lift future tax revenues.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Pelosi, Two Other Democrats Failed To Disclose Roles In Family Charities (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, January 29, 2007

WASHINGTON — U.S. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and two other prominent Democrats have failed to disclose they are officers of family charities, in violation of a law requiring members of Congress to report non-profit leadership roles.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the fourth-ranking House Democrat, and Sen. Evan Bayh of Indiana also did not report they serve as family foundation directors, according to financial disclosure reports examined by USA TODAY.

All three foundations are funded and controlled by the lawmakers and their spouses, and do not solicit donations from outside sources.

Pelosi spokesman Brendan Daly said Friday the speaker will amend her reports. He said it "was an oversight" that she had not listed her position dating back to 1992.

Members of Congress and top executive branch officials are required to file yearly reports on their personal finances, including any positions they hold with businesses or non-profits. At least 16 other lawmakers from both parties have reported holding similar positions, records show.

Bayh spokeswoman Meghan Keck said it was "simply an oversight" that he did not disclose his charity role. Bayh has since amended his reports, Keck said.

Emanuel, chairman of the House Democratic Conference, does not believe the law requires him to disclose his foundation post, spokeswoman Kathleen Connery said. "We believe we're following the instructions of the (ethics) committee exactly right, but if we're not, we'll amend our report," she said.

Stanley Brand, a former House general counsel, said the 1978 federal ethics law does not allow lawmakers to omit their positions with family non-profits.

Pelosi and other Democrats made ethics and greater transparency of how they do business a top priority in the 2006 elections. When the Democratic-controlled Congress convened Jan. 4, the House changed its ethics rules but did not specifically address financial disclosure forms.

The Senate passed an ethics bill earlier this month that would boost penalties for knowingly filing false financial disclosure statements.

"Despite all the ethics reforms, there's still no enforcement," said Melanie Sloan, a former federal prosecutor and head of the liberal-leaning Citizens for Ethics and Responsibility in Washington.

Filing a false report could be prosecuted as a felony, Sloan and Brand said, but prosecutions are rare. Last year, then-Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist failed to report his role in a family charity. He updated his disclosure form and wasn't punished.

DOJ_NMG_0123137

Democrats Put Own Money Into Charitable Foundations (USAT)

By Matt Kelley

USA Today, January 29, 2007

WASHINGTON — Rep. Rahm Emanuel made millions as an investment banker. Sen. Evan Bayh had leftover cash after two successful campaigns for Indiana governor. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi's husband, Paul, became wealthy investing in real estate and technology firms.

It was with this money that each of these Democrats started a charitable foundation.

Emanuel, Bayh and Nancy Pelosi are officers of the foundations that carry their names but failed to disclose the fact on their annual financial disclosure reports filed with Congress. Tax records show the foundations donated mostly to hometown charities that reflect the lawmakers' personal and political attitudes. None of the foundations received donations from outside sources.

The oldest and most prominent of the three is the Paul and Nancy Pelosi Charitable Foundation. Created in 1992, the non-profit has donated hundreds of thousands of dollars in recent years. The charity reported having about $576,000 on hand at the end of 2005 after donating $316,000 to other charities that year.

Georgetown University, Paul Pelosi's alma mater, was the biggest recipient of the foundation's giving. Georgetown received nearly $300,000 since 2003, including $10,000 to the university's Wall Street Alliance, a group that raises the university's profile in the financial community. Vincent Wolfington, a Georgetown classmate and business partner of Paul Pelosi, was vice chairman of the alliance at the time of the donation.

The San Francisco Museum of Modern Art received more than $80,000 from the Pelosi foundation in recent years. Roselyne Swig, a longtime friend and financial backer of the House speaker, is on the museum's board of directors. The congresswoman has represented a part of San Francisco since 1987.

The Rahm Emanuel and Amy Rule Charitable Trust was formed in 2002, when the Chicago lawmaker was first elected. The former Clinton White House aide and his wife, Amy Rule, are its only donors. Emanuel was an investment banker after serving in the White House.

The trust reported having $2,900 on hand at the end of 2005 after receiving $34,000 from Emanuel and donating more than $31,000.

During the past three years, Emanuel's charity gave nearly $25,000 to the Anshe Emet synagogue and school in Chicago, and $15,000 to the foundation run by former president Bill Clinton. It also gave $14,000 to Marwen, a Chicago charity that provides art classes and other educational help to low-income children. Rule is on Marwen's board.

The Evan and Susan Bayh Foundation, also formed in 2002, reported having $663,000 in assets at the end of 2005. It gave $55,000 in 2004 and 2005 to a charity that provides direct financial assistance to Indiana National Guard members and their families.

Nearly all of the foundation's funding came from money left over from Bayh's gubernatorial campaigns. Bayh served two terms as Indiana governor, leaving office in 1997. State law allows candidates to transfer campaign funds to charities.

Bayh doesn't plan to raise any more money for the foundation, said Meghan Keck, his spokeswoman.

No Free Lunch: New Ethics Rules Vex Capitol Hill (WSJ)

By Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, January 29, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Every year, lobbyists for the seafood industry serve up choice Gulf of Mexico seafood at a reception for members of Congress. At next month's event, called "Let the World Be Your Oyster," legislators were supposed to feast on raw oysters from Acme Oyster House and oyster pasta from Drago's, a famed New Orleans restaurant.

Raw oysters are still on the menu. But the oyster pasta has been shucked. That dish runs afoul of new ethics rules passed by lawmakers -- specifically, what's being called the "toothpick rule."

To cut down on wining and dining by lobbyists, the House and Senate have drafted new rules that bar lawmakers and congressional aides from accepting almost any meals from lobbyists. Hors d'oeuvres are an exception. So is "food that you have to eat standing up using a toothpick," explains Washington lawyer Brett Kappel, who advises lobbyists and companies about ethics rules. Oyster pasta, the seafood lobbyists decided, would be difficult to eat with toothpicks.

Stung by a series of corruption and bribery investigations on Capitol Hill, Congress is moving to enact the most far-reaching ethics reforms since the Watergate scandal. Both chambers have approved new rules, but legislation has not yet been finalized. The result: considerable uncertainty about what's allowed, and some unintended consequences.

DOJ_NMG_0123138

The American Heart Association canceled free CPR training on Capitol Hill for fear the sessions would violate a new ban on giving lawmakers and aides anything having more than nominal value.

A House prohibition against taking trips on corporate jets, approved this month, has turned into a headache for some lawmakers. The rule forbids House members from boarding any "non-governmental airplane that is not licensed by the Federal Aviation Administration to operate for compensation or hire," unless they are traveling to a fund-raising event.

Most private planes aren't licensed that way. That means that the dozen or so House members who are pilots would violate the rule by flying their own aircraft. Rep. Dennis Rehberg, a Republican from Montana, however, is free to continue flying. He flies a rented Sikorsky helicopter. The ban applies only to "fixed-wing" aircraft.

The rule "was written by people who don't know the difference between private planes and corporate planes," says Rep. Collin Peterson, a Democrat from Minnesota, who has stopped flying his own four-seat propeller plane across his 400-mile-long district.

Republican Rep. Robin Hayes commutes from North Carolina to Capitol Hill in his own plane. He often picks up other lawmakers along the way. He's made the trip at least once since the rule took effect. He and Mr. Peterson say they are working to change the rule to cater to the pilot-lawmakers. They say they think the problem will be resolved in the next month.

The Senate has proposed banning lawmakers' spouses from lobbying the Senate. A clause exempts those who were lobbying a year or more before their spouses became senators -- which accounts for just about all of them. But the wife of Sen. Kent Conrad, a North Dakota Democrat, wouldn't be able to continue lobbying the Senate on behalf of Major League Baseball. That's because she got into the business after her husband was elected.

Because the rules ban gift-giving by lobbying groups, dozens of amateur softball teams on Capitol Hill will no longer be allowed to accept balls, bats and league fees from corporations and lobbying organizations. The Nuclear Energy Institute's sponsorship of the team of Rep. Joe Barton, a Texas Republican who until recently headed the Energy and Commerce Committee, could be in trouble.

"I don't think you will see that happening anymore," said Bill Sells, a lobbyist with the Sporting Goods Manufacturers Association. The trade group will provide plastic bases to the league, but only if they are returned at the end of the season.

Team sponsorship by bars and restaurants is still OK, provided they don't use registered lobbyists. That means the "Smell the Glove" team from the office of Rep. William Jefferson, a Louisiana Democrat, can still receive support from Trusty's, a Capitol Hill bar.

The no-meal rules, which took effect this month, are especially knotty. They apply to meals from lobbyists and from people who work for companies that employ registered lobbyists. That means that a congressional aide can't accept a hamburger from the National Association of Home Builders, which uses lobbyists. But an aide can be treated to a steak dinner by companies that don't have registered lobbyists, such as home builders Toll Brothers Inc. and NVR Inc.

The rules are leading to other peculiar results. Consider the competing annual events to commemorate National Hot Dog Day on Capitol Hill. Each July, the American Meat Institute gives away hundreds of hot dogs to lawmakers and aides at an invitation-only reception in the courtyard of a House office building. The trade group pays former Major League Baseball players to hand out the hot dogs.

Each year on the same day, People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals, an animal-welfare group, holds a separate reception for lawmakers and aides outside the same House office building. It hands out 1,000 vegetarian hot dogs. Unlike the meat lobby's bash, the PETA event is open to the public. Instead of paid baseball stars, the animal-welfare group recruits Playboy models to hand out the veggie dogs. The women dress in skimpy bikinis fashioned partly from lettuce.

PETA does not use registered lobbyists, which makes its event kosher. The meat institute, which does use lobbyists, isn't sure whether its event would fall under one of the 23 exemptions to the meal ban.

"Right now, everyone in town is trying to figure out what this all means," says Jesse Sevcik, a vice president of legislative affairs for the American Meat Institute. He says he plans to talk to aides on the House ethics committee to figure out how to make the event permissible. One option is to turn it into a "widely attended" event -- which is one of the exemptions.

Drago's oyster pasta was on the menu of the annual seafood reception for lawmakers until the seafood lobby did some checking. Stacey Viera, a spokeswoman for the National Fisheries Institute, one of the sponsors, called the Senate ethics panel to see if the event would pass muster.

"They said: 'You don't have any chairs or silverware, do you?'" recalls Ms. Viera.

In the new ethics environment, the use of chairs and tables suggests that a meal carries more than nominal value. "It's unusual to invite people to something and not let them sit down, but that's one of the quirks of the rule," says Mike Voisin, of Motivated Seafood, an oyster-harvesting and processing company that is one of the organizers.

DOJ_NMG_0123139

Another sponsor, McIlhenny Co., the maker of Tabasco sauce, has decided to stop giving ties and golf shirts with the Tabasco logo to lawmakers and aides, worried that the clothing would be deemed too valuable. The National Fisheries Institute has offered to hand "gummy fish" candies in small packets that bear the institute's name.

Write to Brody Mullins at brody.mullins@wsj.com3

Senate Does Right By Grass-roots Lobbyists (RC)

By Stephen M. Hoersting

Roll Call, January 29, 2007

Roll Call praises the Senate's recent work on ethics and lobbying reform with one exception (Editorial, "So Far, So Good," Jan. 24). It characterizes as a "major deficiency" in the bill the "exclusion of a provision to require disclosure of 'astroturf' lobbying — the generation of mass communications to Members from special interests often joined together in coalitions euphemistically named to conceal their true aims."

Of the policy proposals circulating Capitol Hill to correct lobbying abuses, strengthen the relative voice of citizens and add accountability to the earmarking process, "grass-roots lobbying disclosure" provisions seem oddly out of place. Proposals for grass-roots lobbying disclosure do nothing either to sever the link between lobbyist cash and lawmakers' pecuniary interests or to strengthen the relative voice of citizens.

Grass-roots lobbying — encouraging or stimulating the general public to contact lawmakers about issues of general concern — is citizen-to-citizen communication that fosters citizen-to-lawmaker communication. It correspondingly weakens the relative strength of lobbyist-to-lawmaker communications, in furtherance of Congress' objective in seeking lobbying reform.

Proponents characterize the activity as "astroturf lobbying" to imply that the public outcry from such campaigns is fake. It is not. No matter if it is corporations or well-heeled lobbyists who alert citizens to a pending issue, all grass-roots campaigns are "organic" in this sense: They tap true concerns of real citizens. Whatever stimulates a citizen to speak about an issue, once he or she speaks, he or she speaks for reasons of his or her own and speaks directly to his or her elected representatives. This is precisely the point of participatory democracy in our republican form of government.

Roll Call says the provision may have failed because of "confusion over the wording of the Senate draft bill." But on the most offensive aspect of grass-roots lobbying disclosure there is no confusion (albeit an apparent lack of understanding), for even Roll Call asserts that the House should "require professional lobbyists who form and manage coalitions to disclose what groups comprise them and how much money they are spending to drum up appeals to Congress."

Requiring grass-roots organizations to register or compelling lobbyists to disclose when they assist groups in contacting fellow citizens would strip consultants of constitutionally guaranteed anonymity and would deprive organizations championing unpopular causes of skilled representation. This anonymity, long recognized and protected by the Supreme Court, fosters political association, guards against unwarranted invasions of privacy and protects the consultants who assist such groups from possible retribution.

Disclosure is not always a good thing. The rationale for requiring disclosure of contributions to campaigns, and of direct lobbying activity, is the same for protecting anonymity in policy discussions: to protect citizens from retribution by abusive officeholders. History demonstrates that while such retribution may be uncommon, it is real.

It is not hard to imagine why officials in 1950s Alabama might have wanted to know the names of National Association for the Advancement of Colored People members, and why the Supreme Court said in response that "[i]t is hardly a novel perception that compelled disclosure of affiliation with groups engaged in advocacy may constitute as effective a restraint on freedom of association as [other] forms of governmental action." It also is easy to imagine the leverage Alabama could have put on the NAACP and the potential damper on the civil rights movement if 1950s Alabama knew about the NAACP what the 21st-century Congress proposes to learn about grass-roots organizations.

The abuse of nonprofit entities by a handful of lobbyists to host golf trips or entertain lawmakers can be cured in other ways without enacting disclosure measures too attenuated to the problem Congress seeks to address, and that could damage or diminish America's system of information exchange or drive skilled consultants away from unpopular causes.

Stephen M. Hoersting is executive director of the Center for Competitive Politics.

Democrats' Budget Bill Halts Many Earmarks (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, January 29, 2007

WASHINGTON -- It was just a spud for starters: a $200,000 spending earmark Congress added in 1982 for the breeding of Eastern Russets. A quarter century and $28 million later, special research grants for potatoes top $1.4 million annually with no end in sight -- until now.

DOJ_NMG_0123140

As part of a giant spending bill to be filed in Congress tonight, Democrats will take a spade to more than $186 million in such research grants, which have quadrupled in the Agriculture Department since the 1980s. Hardest hit are the nation's 58 land-grant colleges, which have become dependent on the funds and now are caught in the backlash against members of Congress "earmarking" money for particular causes or recipients.

Filling about 150 pages, the bill will govern spending for the last eight months of fiscal 2007 -- ending Sept. 30 -- and coming just a week before President Bush submits his budget request for fiscal 2008, its proposed cuts underscore the changed landscape after November's elections. The new Democratic majority has declared a moratorium on earmarks, while Congress establishes rules to deal with past abuses in the appropriations process. But only now will Washington get a glimpse of the full impact on spending and the balance of power between Congress and the White House.

Many agriculture grants, like the ones for potato research, had become almost fixtures of the government. Although the topics of agricultural-research grants, such as the Mormon cricket and wheat sawfly, aren't household names, the funds can be vital in paying graduate students and protecting agriculture against pests and blight.

"Funding to land-grant colleges in agriculture is like investing in a fire department," said Thomas Payne, dean of agriculture at the University of Missouri, which could lose about $17 million in annual research funds. "Research is a long-term investment. It isn't a light switch to turn on and off."

Most of the earmarked funds will be redistributed back to the colleges through federal aid programs. But many, like Missouri, will receive less than they do now through earmarks. "It's going to be devastating to the University of Florida and the land-grant college system," said Jimmy Creek, a university senior vice president for agriculture.

Restoring earmarks in future budgets will be that much harder once whole accounts have been wiped out.

Beyond agriculture, dedicated pots of money for small business and community development grants also are expected to be eliminated in the coming budget bill.

Necessity dictates some of the earmark cuts, since the underlying budget bill will permit an increase roughly equal to inflation; therefore, any real growth in one area requires cuts in another. For example, a portion of the agriculture research funds could end up being diverted to food safety inspections after recent E. coli incidents.

But eliminating earmarks doesn't always produce savings. For example, the Environmental Protection Agency will continue to distribute the roughly $197 million earmarked in fiscal 2006 for state water projects. However, that distribution now will be dictated by the agency or federal funding formulas -- not by lawmakers.

That is the biggest rub, since Democrats know they are giving more spending discretion to a Republican, President Bush. In a single stroke, Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Robert Byrd (D., W.Va.), a champion of legislative power, is eliminating more earmarks in dollar terms than all the line-item veto bills he has fought in his career -- a fact that astonishes his fellow Democrats.

But by shaking off the pork barrel, Congress can take a firmer stand for its priorities, such as education spending. And the administration will pay a price for having submitted a budget that critics say low-balls the need for new appropriations, by assuming fee increases that are politically difficult and have never materialized.

"The lesson is be careful what you ask for in a budget," said Mississippi Sen. Thad Cochran, the ranking Republican on the Senate Appropriations panel. "You may get it, and that may be all you get."

Just as congressional earmarks are scotched for the remainder of fiscal 2007, Mr. Bush's own initiatives will be scaled back to meet the bill's $463.5 billion spending cap, chosen to conform to the president's initial fiscal 2007 budget. The same limits contributed to a breakdown of the budget process after November's elections, leaving most of the government dependent on a stopgap spending bill to carry it through Feb. 15.

Republicans planned to saddle Democrats with the chore of quickly coming forward with a blueprint for the final eight months of fiscal 2007. The result is unlike anything attempted before by Congress. "It's unique, certainly for modern times," said White House Budget Director Rob Portman.

This isn't a typical omnibus spending package or an extension of the stopgap bill, which has proved untenable for many agencies. Instead, Democrats opted for a hybrid, which begins by freezing government spending at 2006 levels and then cuts and adds to increase net spending by between $10 billion and $12 billion, before hitting the cap.

Veterans medical care alone could consume $4 billion; defense health programs for active-duty military personnel, another $1.4 billion. Just to get back to 2005 funding levels, Democrats want to add $2.3 billion for health and education accounts such as Pell Grants for low-income college students.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation needs more money to hire agents. Google Inc. Chief Executive Eric Schmidt wrote Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.) last week, seeking more funds for the National Science Foundation. Fighting AIDS overseas remains a priority. At home, Medicare turns out to have underbudgeted by $52 million the annual cost of a telephone hot line to help the elderly pick a prescription-drug plan.

DOJ_NMG_0123141

This sets up a fight over the Democrats' reluctance to fund an extra $4.1 billion the military wants for base closings and moving about 12,000 troops back to the U.S. from Europe and Asia. Delays could complicate Army deployments for Iraq as well, but adding the full $4.1 billion would make it impossible to meet other domestic priorities.

"We're the cleanup brigade," said House Appropriations Committee Chairman David Obey (D., Wis.). And with cleaner hands on earmarks, Democrats hope to make their decisions stick.

Write to David Rogers at david.rogers@wsj.com1

As Spending Deadline Looms, Congress Debates Earmarks (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, January 29, 2007

President Bush told Congress last week that he wants to cut earmarks in half, a popular notion after the $223 million "bridge to nowhere" and other seemingly wasteful projects were tucked into the federal budget by lawmakers.

And Democrats now in charge of spending on Capitol Hill say they will not allow those narrow, special-interest provisions when they introduce a resolution this week to fund the federal government for the remaining eight months of the current fiscal year. Those unprecedented ground rules complicate an urgent matter, for unless Congress can agree on a new spending plan by Feb. 15, the government will shut down.

But what precisely is an earmark?

That question has been at the heart of passionate negotiations across the capital as lawmakers, federal agencies and lobbyists argue over what constitutes waste and what is legitimate spending.

"I heard an appropriator say this week that it was like Justice [Potter] Stewart's definition of pornography -- it's hard to define an earmark, but he knew it when he saw it," one Democratic staffer said.

The debate goes beyond semantics. The stakes are huge -- deciding how to spend $463 billion between now and Sept. 30 on thousands of programs run by local communities, states and federal agencies. While public debate on Capitol Hill has been dominated by the war in Iraq, closed-door arguments about what the federal government will fund this year have been nearly as intense.

The Congressional Research Service says there is no widely accepted definition of "earmark." The White House won't take a stab at it either, saying through a spokesman that it will be addressed when the president presents his fiscal 2008 budget next month.

"Defining earmarks is a little like defining a terrorist," said Ellen Miller of the Sunlight Foundation, a nonpartisan group aimed at making government more transparent. "One man's terrorist is another man's freedom fighter. Part of the problem is there is no standard. Some of the earmarks are good stuff that government ought to be doing. This has the potential of throwing the baby out with the bath water."

Earmarks have exploded in number in the past decade -- climbing from 4,126 in 1994 to 12,852 in 2006, according to the Congressional Research Service -- and this has led to abuses. Former representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.) is serving a prison sentence after pleading guilty to bribery for steering government money through earmarks to defense contractors that gave him expensive gifts in return.

Citizens Against Government Waste, which publishes an annual "Congressional Pig Book" cataloguing pork-barrel spending, considers an earmark to be "a project inserted by a member into legislation without debate or hearings, usually to serve someone or some special interest," said Thomas Schatz, president of the group. By that definition, CAGW identified 9,963 earmarks in the 11 appropriations bills in 2006 that cost taxpayers $29 billion.

But federal budget expert Brian Riedl at the Heritage Foundation said an earmark is "anytime Congress specifies who will receive a government grant or contract, anytime they list an entity, specific recipient or location."

If that meaning is applied, vast swaths of the federal budget could be considered earmarks. Take the Army Corps of Engineers, for instance. Most of its budget consists of individual projects to repair dams, dredge harbors and build bridges -- each of which is an earmark under Riedl's definition. The same goes for the Environmental Protection Agency, which has a budget filled with specific clean-water projects and sewer-improvement plans.

If it adheres to Riedl's definition, Congress could just provide lump sums to federal agencies without directions specifying which projects should be funded. That would give the Bush administration significantly more flexibility in spending.

"It cedes more power to the executive branch," said Rep. James T. Walsh (N.Y.), the ranking Republican on the House Appropriations subcommittee on Labor, Health and Human Services, Education, and related agencies. "The Congress has the power of the purse. . . . For us to give that up is a mistake."

Walsh unsuccessfully argued that $700,000 for gang-prevention programs in Syracuse and $10 million for nuclear fusion work at the University of Rochester are vital to his district and deserve a place in this year's budget. Those items had been vetted by the Appropriations Committee last year and approved by the House but now have been caught up in the Democrats' earmarks moratorium, he said: "That has always been the problem, trying to define what an earmark is. Some of it is essential spending."

DOJ_NMG_0123142

Last year, the Republican-controlled Congress failed to pass nine of the 11 annual appropriations bills that finance the federal government. Though the House did approve most of those bills, Senate leaders never scheduled votes on them. Congress ratified money for defense and homeland security but left the rest of the federal budget -- including Social Security, Medicare, veterans programs, education and transportation -- in limbo.

They have been operating at 2006 levels through a series of stopgap measures, the latest of which expires Feb. 15. If Congress does not approve some new type of funding measure by that date, the federal government will screech to a halt.

The Democrats who took over the appropriations process in the new Congress, Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.) and Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.), said it would take too much time to complete the regular appropriations process for the current fiscal year at the same time they expect to begin examining Bush's fiscal 2008 budget.

To quickly resolve the current budget, the Democrats are writing a resolution to fund the government -- without earmarks -- for the remainder of the year. Obey and Byrd expect the resolution to total $463 million, the amount left over from Bush's 2007 budget after the homeland security and defense budgets are removed.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) said he intends to bring their resolution to the House floor Wednesday.

Obey's staff has been the target of "intense" pressure, letters, phone calls and visits from other lawmakers and lobbyists trying to make a case that their particular earmarks are necessary and not pork, according to one Democratic staffer.

In a recent private meeting with Republican members of his committee, Obey spelled it out: no exceptions to the earmark moratorium.

"It's caused a lot of heartburn among members," said Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.). "Everybody has now pretty much come to the reality that it's not going to happen."

Obey and Byrd said earmarks will resume with the 2008 budget, but under new rules passed by the Democrats. Legislators will have to disclose any earmark they insert and will have to certify they have no personal financial interest in the earmark, among other changes.

For Negroponte, Move To State Dept. Is A Homecoming (WP)

By Laura Blumenfeld

The Washington Post, January 29, 2007

Above the toilet, in the powder room at John D. Negroponte's house, a framed political cartoon hangs at eye level. In the cartoon, President Bush is congratulating Negroponte on his job as intelligence czar. Near the president, advisers stand holding memos marked "WMD" and "North Korea." They're blowing bubbles, wearing a dunce cap and a beanie.

Bush: "John, you're now in charge of all my administration's intelligence."

Negroponte: "And where would that be?"

Now, less than two years after becoming the nation's first director of national intelligence, Negroponte is leaving. Tomorrow, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee will convene hearings on his nomination as deputy secretary of state. From the outside, it seems like an unusual move, a demotion. Negroponte, 67, is stepping down from a Cabinet-level position as the president's top intelligence adviser and coordinator for all 16 U.S. intelligence services to become the No. 2 at State.

But from the inside of Negroponte's Tuscan, mustard-colored Washington home, the mystery of his career move dissipates with the steam from a pot of Earl Grey tea.

"About my life . . .," Negroponte said in his living room on a recent afternoon. He clicked Greek worry beads and sat near a wedding photo of his British wife. "Basically, I'm a diplomat. There's no escaping that. I've done it for so long, I've kind of internalized it."

Speculation over Negroponte's departure has split national security circles. Some question Negroponte's performance as DNI. Rather than unifying the intelligence community, they say, he created another bureaucratic layer. Others say that his step down is in fact a step up, that he will be in line to be secretary of state, if Condoleezza Rice moves on.

Sitting near his fireplace, though, Negroponte suggests another answer. Halfway through his sentence about studying politics in France in college, he blurted out, "all my life, I wanted to do this kind of work."

Negroponte worked for State from the 1960s, when he was a junior political officer in Vietnam, to 2005, when he served as ambassador to Iraq. He has been the U.S. envoy to Mexico, the Philippines, the United Nations and, most controversially, Honduras.

DOJ_NMG_0123143

In past confirmation hearings, he has been grilled over his 1981-1985 stint in Honduras, during the Contra buildup. Although the evidence is equivocal, and he denies the allegations, he has been accused of suppressing information about human rights violations by the CIA-backed Honduran military.

The charges have hardened into Negroponte's public legacy from Honduras. His private legacy is another matter.

"Who's that?" Negroponte said, calling out to a creak on the stairs. "Hellllo?" He paused. Another creaking sound. "Alejandra?"

A young woman peeked into the living room. "Where's George?" said Alejandra, 23. George, 17, appeared. Then Sophia, 13, and John, 19.

Four of the five Negroponte children were at home. They drifted in and out of the living room, onto the couch, and into the conversation. Asked how he stayed connected to the countries he served in, Negroponte said, "Mexico is a good example --"

Alejandra interrupted, "Well, Honduras -- there's us."

While in Honduras, Negroponte and his wife, Diana, a historian, adopted five orphaned or abandoned Honduran children.

Negroponte, the son of a Greek shipping magnate, and Diana, the daughter of the chairman of British Steel, educated the children as they had been educated, taking them skiing at the Negroponte chalet in Switzerland, sending some to Negroponte's boarding school at Exeter and others to Diana's British boarding school, St. Mary's.

"A family tradition," Alejandra said.

"Tea, anyone?" Diana said, carrying a silver teapot. "Come on, you won't die of my tea."

"You might," joked Sophia.

The teacups were a wedding gift. "We haven't thrown them at each other," Diana teased.

"We have another set for that," Negroponte said.

Diana lighted a fire, her posture erect even as she bent over. The children sat around telling stories of their father's nine months in Iraq. Sophia said she was sad. They were not allowed to visit, for security reasons.

"On Thanksgiving we had him on speakerphone in the middle of the table for about an hour," Alejandra recalled. It was a black telephone. They called it Dad.

Negroponte tried to call every day. He left voice-mail messages in song.

"When we were feeling low, we played them," Diana recalled, singing: "Good morning, Sophia, la-la! I love you, la-la-la!" Diana turned to her daughter. "Sophia, can you think of any stories about your dad? How nice he is, when I'm beastly?"

"Um." (Later Sophia noted that Dad likes to inhale helium from balloons and recite his title in the voice of Alvin and the Chipmunks: "Hi! I'm John Negroponte, U.S. ambassador to the Philippines!" Negroponte said, "We ought to get a regular supply.") Afterward, when the children scattered, he said: "The nicest story is the adoption of Marina."

After years of trying to have a child, they decided to adopt. In Honduras, a nun contacted Diana.

"And she said, 'I have your child,' " Negroponte said.

"Johnny, I'm terribly sorry," Diana said, her voice rising. "But for me, the kids is a highly private part --"

"Not this part --"

"Well, you phrase it the way you want."

"In any case, Diana brought Marina home and it happened, we had Congressmen Jim Leach and Steve Solarz visiting us . . ."

Negroponte arrived home to find the 8-month-old girl. The congressmen, a Republican from Iowa and a Democrat from New York, ran out and bought a stuffed elephant and donkey.

"I still carry the picture of her crawling around on the floor of the residence," Negroponte said, taking out his wallet.

Negroponte kept the tiny, creased photo with him in Iraq. He said he looked at it often. Security concerns in Iraq made life "confining." In his Iraq album, there's a photo of a woman at her desk, wearing a helmet and a flak jacket. "That's my secretary," he said. It was taken during an incoming-missile alert. Iraq was the one post where Negroponte didn't learn the language.

"I was relieved when I left," he said.

In his new job, Negroponte will return to Baghdad "at an early date," he said. The job change had been "on again, off again, since last May, after several frustrated attempts to find a successor as DNI." On New Year's Eve, national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley called with the offer. Negroponte was on the beach in south Naples, Fla. Hadley was in north Naples.

Negroponte, who has lived overseas for some 22 years, said his foreign experience would be valuable: "Look around at the government in highest circles. Who's had the opportunity to live abroad?"

As the No. 2 at state, Negroponte will assume responsibility for Iraq. He will also be the lead person for policy toward China and northeast Asia, including North Korea. His five languages will help.

"Your Mandarin might need a little polishing," Diana said.

"I'd be reluctant to take a quiz in Vietnamese," he acknowledged.

DOJ_NMG_0123144

Negroponte pulled some aquamarine worry beads from his pocket. At the United Nations, he had traded beads with the Syrians.

Negroponte said, "It throws people, who's this American using worry beads?"

"He's an East Mediterranean, don't underestimate him," Diana said, and then retreated.

Negroponte walked by a photograph above the piano. It was Diana's mother, a Belgian countess, having lunch with a chum.

"Diana's mother is a very good friend of the Queen of England," Negroponte said, pointing to the friend. "It doesn't come across --" he chuckled "-- as the average American profile, I'm afraid. But what are you going to do?"

The Negroponte girls recalled meeting Grandma's friend, the queen.

"Mom taught me now to curtsy," Alejandra said.

"People look at us like, 'Wait -- you're Latin American, adopted. How do you know the queen?' " said Marina, 24.

"I was the last to be adopted," Sophia said pouting.

Negroponte walked in: "Well, I don't think we can adopt any more."

The girls looked up -- Alejandra from the couch, Marina from a chair and Sophia from the floor where she sat listening to her iPod -- at their father. No speculation here. Negroponte's five children knew why he was going to State.

"It's full circle," Alejandra said. "He started there."

And during his hearings, if the human rights accusations come up, "we all know it's there, the Honduras thing," Alejandra said. Critics have hung posters on the lampposts on their street, calling their father a "war criminal."

"We take them down," Alejandra said. "Sophia will scratch them off."

They have a different image of their father: For Christmas, they bought him Russian nesting dolls. The largest doll is President Bush. Inside of Bush is President Bill Clinton. Next, there's President George H.W. Bush, and inside of him, President Ronald Reagan. Finally, the tiniest wooden doll popped out.

"He works for everybody," Alejandra said.

She held the fat little doll between two fingers. It was labeled "Dad," pasted with Negroponte's smiling face.

Google Halts 'Miserable Failure' Link To President Bush (NYT)

By Noam Cohen

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

It has been a bad month for anti-Bush snarkiness.

First, the anodyne impressionist Rich Little was selected to address the White House correspondents' dinner as a follow-up to the scathing routine last year by Comedy Central's Stephen Colbert. Now a favored online tactic to mock the president — altering the Google search engine so the words "miserable failure" lead to President Bush's home page at the White House — has been neutralized.

Google announced on Thursday on its official blog that "by improving our analysis of the link structure of the Web" such mischief would instead "typically return commentary, discussions, and articles" about the tactic itself.

Indeed, a search on Saturday of "miserable failure" on Google leads to a now-outdated BBC News article from 2003 about the "miserable failure" search, rather than the previous first result, President Bush's portal at whitehouse.gov/president.

Such gamesmanship has been termed "Google bombing," and is not unique to President Bush, or even politics. John F. Kerry, the Democratic presidential candidate in 2004, was linked to the search "waffles," while other Google bombs have been elaborate jokes or personal vendettas.

Writing on the Google blog, Matt Cutts, the head of the Google's Webspam team, said that Google bombs had not "been a very high priority for us." But he added: "Over time, we've seen more people assume that they are Google's opinion, or that Google has hand-coded the results for these Google-bombed queries. That's not true, and it seemed like it was worth trying to correct that misperception."

Mr. Cutts was not available on Friday to expand on his blog, a Google spokeswoman said. A White House spokesman had no comment on the issue.

Despite the changes by Google, some other Google bombs are still operative. A search for "French military victories" still produces a first result that says, "Your search — French military victories — did not match any documents." Click there and your find a mockup of a Google search page asking the question "Did you mean: French military defeats."

The organizer of the "miserable failure" Google bomb was George Johnston, a political activist and software programmer in Bellevue, Wash.

What began as a prank become something more after Hurricane Katrina, Mr. Johnston said. In September 2005, he said he noticed a renewed interest in the "miserable failure" prank; he believes "people were in shock over New Orleans" and began typing “failure” into their searches. Mr. Johnston said he considered Google’s decision politically motivated, even if was not done by hand, and noted that the company had agreed to censor results in China. “I believe them that they tweaked the algorithm, but it is such weasel words,” he said. “The fact that some Google bombs still work makes me think they have a blacklist essentially of ways of tweaking results.”

DOJ_NMG_0123145

He hasn’t given up the fight, he said, and remains unhappy with Google’s tweak. “They say they fixed it. I think they broke it,” he said. NOAM COHEN

Callous Abortion Backers (WT)

By Chris Smith

The Washington Times, January 29, 2007

WhenHouse Speaker Nancy Pelosi boldly proclaimedthis month that this would be a Congress that remembers the children, I couldn't help but think that this smart, savvy grandmother of six, who now wields the most powerful gavel in the world, was forgetting someone.

A whole lot of someones, for that matter.

At swearing-in, when Mrs. Pelosi invited the accompanying congressional kids to join her at the rostrum to "touch the gavel" as history was made, I smiled and thought what a gracious gesture and photo-op. And then I thought again of the forgotten girls and boys -- at last count more than 49 million of them -- killed by what is euphemistically called "choice." To be sure, born children need strong and stable families, better access to health care, educational opportunities, a clean environment to grow up in and freedom from violence and abuse.

The speaker is right, Congress should remember the children and strive to enhance the welfare and wellbeing of our young. No one is more precious than our children.

But it is equally valid and true that unborn children have inherent worth, value and dignity. They are children, too. They are not disposable commodities, nor are they junk. American jurisprudence -- and public officials in all three branches of government -- too often treat them that way. A Congress that remembers the children should strive to leave no child vulnerable, including the unborn.

In recent years, modern medicine and scientific breakthroughs have shattered the myth that unborn children are not human persons or alive. Birth is merely an event -- albeit an important one, but only an event -- in the life of a child.

Today, ultrasound technologies and other diagnostic tools have helped doctors to diagnose illness and disability before birth. New and exciting breakthrough health-care interventions for the unborn, including microsurgeries, are leading to an ever-expanding array of successful treatments and cures of sick or disabled unborn babies in need of help. Unborn children are society's littlest patients. This Congress should remember them as well.

In stark contrast, abortion methods rip, tear and dismember or chemically poison the fragile bodies of unborn children. There is nothing whatsoever benign, compassionate, or just about an act that utterly destroys the life of a baby and often physically, psychologically or emotionally harms the woman.

Abortion is a violation of fundamental human rights and should be treated as such. The right to life is for everyone, regardless of age, race, condition of dependency, disability, or stage of development. Congress has a duty to remember, and a duty to protect, everyone at risk -- not just the planned, the privileged and the perfect.

There is a new, powerful group of women called Silent No More who courageously speak of their personal abortion tragedies. They protest that abortion is neither a compassionate option nor a reasonable choice; rather it is an act of violence.

Women wounded by abortion -- like actress Jennifer O'Neill; singer Melba Moore; civil-rights activist Dr. Alveda King, niece of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.; and a co-founder of the National Silent No More Awareness Campaign, Georgette Forney -- have called on us to listen to their heart-wrenching stories and take seriously our moral duty to protect women and children from the predators who ply their lethal trade in abortion mills throughout the land. Dr. King has asked "How can the 'Dream' survive if we murder the children?" These brave wounded women are the new champions of life.

They have refused to be silent any longer. They care too deeply about other women and their children and they want others to be spared the anguish they have endured. And to the millions of women who have aborted, they are uniquely equipped to convey the breathtaking love, healing and reconciliation that God provides to those who ask.

More and more women are speaking up and proclaiming that "women deserve better than abortion," and I agree.

In one of Dr. Seuss's most memorable books for children and grandchildren, an elephant named Horton hears a small person -- "a who" -- crying for help and discovers a whole town of tiny persons living on a speck of dust called Who-ville. Horton cherishes and seeks to protect them. When an eagle steals the speck of dust, Horton pleads "please don't harm all my little folks, who have as much right to life as us bigger folks do."

DOJ_NMG_0123146

Against all adversity and personal insult Horton painstakingly recovers Who-ville and begs the mayor to get all the little people to make a big noise so everyone will understand that they exist. They all yell and scream, but to no avail. No one but Horton hears them. However it is the voice of the smallest of the small that puts them over the top. Dr. Seuss writes, "Finally, at last their voices were heard!" They rang out clear and clean. And the elephant smiled and said "do you see what I mean? They proved they ARE persons, no matter how small and their whole world was saved by the smallest of all."

Mrs. Pelosi, unborn children are persons, no matter how small. They cry out for your -- our -- protection and safety, and to be remembered. On this one, we could all learn a lot from Dr. Seuss.

Rep. Chris Smith is a 14-term Republican from New Jersey.

Schumer's Tort Epiphany (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 29, 2007

Write about politics long enough and you come to think you've seen everything. But even we didn't expect to see a leading Senate Democrat declare that tort law abuse is making America less economically competitive. Has Chuck Schumer told his colleagues about his epiphany?

Mr. Schumer was knocked off his horse last week on the way to a press conference with Governor Eliot Spitzer and New York City Mayor Mike Bloomberg to discuss the ways that regulation is driving financial business from U.S. shores. Governor Spitzer's presence was so ironic that even he -- not famous for his self-deprecation -- had to joke about it. But the really big news is that Mr. Schumer endorsed a study declaring that tort reform is the single biggest key to retaining U.S. leadership in global finance.

As political conversions go, this is like Dick Cheney endorsing a stronger Congress. Mr. Schumer is chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, which puts him at the center of fundraising for Democratic candidates. And trial lawyers have been a leading and deep-pocketed constituency for Democrats, donating millions of dollars in each election cycle. Over the last decade, more than 90% of trial lawyer donations have gone to Democrats. In return, the Democratic Senate caucus has been a bulwark against tort reform.

Senator Schumer himself has a mixed voting record on reform. As a Representative, he voted for the Securities Litigation Reform Act in 1995, but he opposed an attempt to go further in the next Congress. As a Senator, he's voted against asbestos-litigation reform and class-action reform.

But as the McKinsey report commissioned by Messrs. Schumer and Bloomberg notes, settlements of securities class actions have been rising every year for years. In 2005, the total bill hit $3.5 billion -- and that number excludes $6.2 billion in WorldCom-related settlements alone.

Apart from some $7 billion in Enron-related settlements, the bill for 2006 is expected to be somewhat lower, according to the McKinsey study. But then most stocks had a good year, and securities lawsuits always thrive in a difficult market. Both the McKinsey report and last year's interim report from the privately funded Committee on Capital Market Regulation reach the same conclusion: Concern about an unpredictable and expensive legal lottery is a major impediment to listing securities in the U.S. The McKinsey report relates that, among the executives surveyed, litigation risk ranked second in importance in deciding where to do business, after the availability of qualified workers.

The CMR report released last November put it this way: "Foreign companies commonly cite the U.S. enforcement system as the most important reason why they do not want to list in the U.S. market." And a big part of "enforcement" in the U.S. is private litigation. That report also points out that securities class actions are unknown in most of the international money centers competing with the U.S. for financial business.

Mr. Schumer argued at Tuesday's press conference that a number of the report's recommendations could be handled "administratively," through rule-makings and the like by the SEC. But this is whistling past the tort graveyard. Sarbanes-Oxley has already laid the seeds for the next big round of shareholder lawsuits by creating a number of new causes of action against companies that misbehave.

The true costs of those provisions have yet to be tested for the simple reason that it will take a recession or a stock-market correction to trigger the next round of attempts to turn corporate miscalculations into income redistribution opportunities. So far, this ticking bomb inside Sarbox has received little notice compared to the very real costs of compliance with Section 404 on internal controls. But we can expect to hear more about it after the first wave of Sarbox lawsuits starts hitting the papers. Until that happens, the current consensus that Sarbox is tolerable and the SEC merely has to enforce it more sensibly will remain the conventional wisdom.

Senator Schumer was silent on the prospects for tort reform, which will be the real test of his sincerity. As a New Yorker, Mr. Schumer has been hearing a good deal from Wall Street on this, and we hope his press conference isn't just a constituency massage. He shouldn't be able to have it both ways by holding press conferences in New York City, then returning to

DOJ_NMG_0123147

Washington and winking to Tommy Boggs, Harry Reid and the tort lobby that it's all merely talk. If his conversion is real, we look forward to his energetic leadership in building a bipartisan majority for tort reform.

A Good Idea Inside A Bad One (TIME)

By Matt Miller

Time, January 29, 2007

In 1992 the first President Bush's budget was at theÂ printer when congressional Republicans revolted. Bush, they were told, planned to fund expanded health coverage by leaping on one of American politics' "third rails": the fact that the value of employer-provided health benefits is not included in employees' taxable income. Making a portion of these benefits taxable, Bush the Elder reckoned, was a smart way to pay for health care for folks who had none. But G.O.P. leaders were apoplectic. Didn't Bush understand that a tax hike meant political death? The uproar was so swift and furious that White House staffers spent the night using razor blades to excise the offending page from printed budgets.

First George W. Bush went to Baghdad when his daddy wouldn't. Now, with the health-care plan the President floated in his State of the Union address, he's literally picking up a page his father wouldn't keep in his health-care playbook. But the son has shrewdly disguised his slow-motion tax increase as a tax cut.

Here's how. To make health care more affordable, Bush wants to create a standard deduction for health insurance like the one offered for dependents. Families with private health plans would have their first $15,000 in earnings exempt from taxes (for individuals, it's $7,500). The idea, Bush argued sensibly Wednesday night, is to "level the playing field" between today's tax-advantaged employer-provided benefits and those purchased outside the workplace, where growing numbers of Americans seek coverage. But Bush would offset these new deductions by taxing employer-provided benefits above that $15,000 (or $7,500) level. The White House guesses that in the first year 30 million people (whose employer plans are richer than the deduction) would see their taxes rise as a result, while 100 million would see their taxes reduced. Yet here's the trick: these numbers would reverse over the next decade, because the value of the deductions will be indexed to rise only with inflation, while health premiums, rising faster, will leave more people facing the new tax.

It adds up to a clever mouthful for a President desperate to change the subject from Iraq and to offer his party a market-oriented angle on an issue Democrats hope to ride into 2008. For those who buy coverage outside the workplace, it's a boon. But Bush's plan isn't a serious attempt to cure what ails health care and might make some things worse.

For starters, Bush's staff says his plan would reach just 3 million to 5 million of the 47 million uninsured. If that's what this White House calls "bold," it's hard to know what "inadequate" would look like. Moreover, there's a real risk that Bush's deduction could effectively bribe healthier workers to flee employer group plans for the individual-insurance market, where cheaper coverage tailored to their health status would leave more cash in their pockets. This could unravel the larger risk pools that keep premiums lower for everyone.

Still, if Democrats are right to dismiss Bush's overall plan as too little, too late, they're wrong to dis his call to reform today's regressive health-tax exclusion. A nearly invisible $200 billion subsidy that tilts its largesse toward executives in high tax brackets and workers who already have rich plans would normally be assailed by liberals as unjust. But because this particular subsidy bolsters hefty benefits negotiated by their union allies, Democrats overlook the inequity. "It's ironic and embarrassing," says Len Nichols, a former Clinton health official now at the New America Foundation. Farsighted Democrats admit as much. Andy Stern, the leader of the Service Employees International Union, and Jim McDermott, a doctor and a Democrat from Seattle on the Ways and Means Committee, tell me that if universal health coverage were being discussed, they would revisit the sacred tax exclusion as a way to help fund it.

Bush's nervy war on our wrongheaded health-tax subsidy will probably go nowhere, but it's destined to be revived if Democrats get a shot at comprehensive reform after 2008. Even a President as unpopular as Herbert Hoover probably had a good idea or two eventually to steal too.

Sloan: Don't Forget To Fix Social Security (NSWK)

By Allan Sloan

Newsweek, January 29, 2007

Sometimes what people don't say about a topic is more interesting than what they do say. Consider, if you will, President Bush's State of the Union message. Social Security—the focus of his speech two years ago—got only a few fleeting mentions in last week's address. But if you delve into the low-profile details of Bush's high-profile health-care proposals, you discover that embedded in them is a plan that would effectively trim future Social Security retirement benefits for some people, while reducing their current Social Security tax payments to help pay for health insurance.

DOJ_NMG_0123148

I'm not attacking this idea the way I went after Bush's Social Security "reforms" of a few years ago. It's just that I'm a Social Security junkie, and that aspect of Bush's health proposals interests me—if only because it points out how high Social Security taxes are for many families, relative to the income tax.

Here's the deal. Bush wants to let taxpayers who have health insurance exclude $7,500 (for singles) or $15,000 (for married couples) from their taxable income, but would include as income the value of employer-paid health insurance, currently tax-free. The exclusions would be exempt not only from federal income tax, but from Social Security and Medicare tax, as well. Bush said his plan would let a couple earning $60,000 a year save $4,500 of taxes. According to the White House Press Office, that $4,500—30 percent of $15,000—is based on the couple being in the 15 percent income-tax bracket and also paying 15.3 percent in Social Security andMedicare taxes.

In reality, the couple would probably save only about $3,400 in taxes, because employers pay 7.65 percent of the 15.3 percent Social Security and Medicare tax. So unless Bush's $60,000 family happens to be self-employed, it would save 22.65 percent of $15,000 rather than the 30 percent Bush used. But $3,400 is still serious money.

Now, let me show you how Bush's health-care proposals could reduce future retirement benefits of today's taxpayers, who would in effect be trading reduced retirement income tomorrow for help in covering health-insurance costs today. Remember that Bush would let you exclude $7,500 (singles) or $15,000 (couples) from taxes—but that you'd pay income, Social Security and Medicare taxes on employer-paid health care. So if your employer pays less than $7,500 (or $15,000) toward your health care, you'd pay less Social Security tax than you pay now.

Got that? Let's proceed. Paying less Social Security tax would reduce your future Social Security retirement benefit, which is determined by a formula that's based on how much Social Security tax you pay. The way the formula works, someone who pays Social Security tax to the max each year—for 2007, it's on $97,500 of income—would see his benefit shrink by less than 15 percent if he excluded $15,000 from Social Security tax. But low-paid people—who get much more in benefits per dollar of Social Security tax than maxed-out folks do—would see benefits shrink by a far higher percentage. "A family earning $30,000 a year could see its retirement benefit cut in half," says Len Burman, director of the Tax Policy Center in Washington. That would be an especially serious blow, because $30,000 families tend to rely almost entirely on Social Security for retirement income, whereas high-income families typically supplement Social Security with retirement accounts, pensions and savings.

I'm not offering you Burman's opinion (or mine) on Bush's health-care proposals, because plenty of people are holding forth about them. But not many are dealing with their Social Security aspect. For that matter, few people these days are dealing with Social Security at all.

That's unfortunate, because the longer we wait to come to grips with Social Security, the harder it will be to fix the problem posed by baby boomers' retiring en masse. And the more Social Security will continue to distort federal budget numbers by making the deficit look smaller than it is: last week's update by the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office projected a $172 billion deficit for the current fiscal year; that's 52.5 percent less than it would have been without the $190 billion Social Security surplus. That $190 billion—in theory, at least—is committed to future Social Security beneficiaries. Logic suggests that we can't both commit that money to Social Security and use it to reduce the reported budget deficit. But Washington has its own logic, and its own math.

Sure, keep an eye on the health-care debate. But don't forget Social Security. It may be on the back burner for now—but it's still cooking.

OTHER NEWS:

Economists Change Rate-cut Tune (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh And Barbara Hansen

USA Today, January 29, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Federal Reserve will wait to cut interest rates until the end of 2007, not earlier this year as was expected just a few months ago, economists say.

Economists surveyed by USA TODAY expect the unemployment rate will tick higher this year as the economy grows at a steady, but not blazing, pace. The slower growth is expected to lead to a sharper pullback in inflation than what was predicted three months ago.

The 56 economists were surveyed Jan. 18-24.

"We're going to see two distinct pieces. The first half of the year is going to be pretty blah, tepid growth," says Sean Snaith, director of the Institute for Economic Competitiveness at the University of Central Florida. "In the second half, things will pick up a little bit."

DOJ_NMG_0123149

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his colleagues meet Tuesday and Wednesday to discuss interest rate policy. All of the economists expect the Fed policymakers will leave their target for short-term interest rates, which influences borrowing costs economywide, at 5.25%, the highest in six years.

The Fed has left interest rates unchanged since June after raising them 17 times over two years. Looking at the median of the answers, the economists do not expect a change in interest rates until the fourth quarter, when they expect a quarter-percentage-point cut. The median is the point at which half of the answers are higher and half are lower.

The expectation for a rate cut at year's end represents a significant change. Just three months ago, economists said they expected the Fed would cut rates in the second quarter.

But since then, data have suggested the economy is faring better than was expected given the sharp slowdown in housing. Economists are now predicting the softening in this year's job market won't be as substantial as they predicted last quarter. That suggests the Fed doesn't need to cut rates.

But opinions vary. Several economists, such as those at Merrill Lynch and U.S. Trust, expect the Fed will cut rates by at least a percentage point by the end of 2007. Others, such as those at The Conference Board and Bear Stearns, predict rates will be higher at the end of the year than they are now.

The difference of opinion stems from varied views of what the Fed needs to combat in 2007. While 52% said slower economic growth was the bigger risk facing the U.S. economy, 48% said inflation was a larger concern.

Fed officials make such an assessment when deciding interest rate policy: If inflation is the bigger risk, they are more likely to raise rates than cut them. If slower growth is the bigger risk, they are more likely to cut rates.

The sharp difference of opinion doesn't surprise Timothy Rogers. The chief economist for Briefing.com in South Natick, Mass., says there are just too many unknowns, such as the state of the labor market, business investment and housing. Although he expects the Fed to cut rates once this year in the fourth quarter, he says he can come up with very plausible reasons why a rate increase may instead be needed.

"It could go either way right now," he says. "Anyone who comes out and says he knows which way things are going is full of malarkey."

A Long Stretch Of Steady Rates (WSJ)

By Peter A. Mckay

The Wall Street Journal, January 29, 2007

There isn't much that moves the market like a shift in interest rates by Federal Reserve policy makers. This year, it is beginning to look like the Fed won't move much.

As central-bank rate setters prepare for their first meeting of the year this week, investors increasingly are resigned to a longer pause in rate moves than previously expected.

Yet it might be that it is the pause that refreshes. In recent years, the stock market usually has performed well when the Fed declines to move up or down, as it has since last summer.

Some Wall Street forecasters say the Fed could go all year without changing its rate targets, a prospect that contributed to the market's sluggishness last week.

Such predictions run counter to many investors' hopes for a quick rate cut, which would lower borrowing costs and encourage more consumption throughout the U.S. economy, potentially helping corporate profits and thus stocks.

There is a lingering risk that stocks' latest rally may already have run its course. The Dow Jones Industrial Average is up 14% since the Fed last changed its benchmark rate, raising it a quarter percentage point in late June to 5.25%. Many analysts believe the market is likely to remain especially volatile in the weeks ahead as investors rejigger their bets to reflect new rate expectations.

The main reason for bulls' overall optimism is that, as fourth-quarter reports roll in, corporate profits seem to be doing just fine even without Fed action. Wall Street expects profits at companies in the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index to rise by more than 10% for the quarter -- a slower pace than in the previous few years' boom but still solid growth by historical standards.

"There's a growing sense among investors that if the economy is OK, then profits will be OK, so I don't really need the Fed to step in and help me" with lower rates to spur economic growth, says strategist Jack Caffrey of J.P. Morgan Private Bank.

Mr. Caffrey says his firm still expects a rate cut this year, perhaps during the summer if unemployment creeps higher. But that timetable has been pushed back from earlier estimates of a spring rate cut. "The data just weren't supporting that idea," Mr. Caffrey says.

Many analysts say the Labor Department's better-than-expected report on December payroll growth, released Jan. 5, set off hand wringing among investors that the economy might not be slowing enough to justify a rate cut.

DOJ_NMG_0123150

Since that report came out, the Dow Jones Industrial Average has floundered, off 0.1% despite touching several new records.

Last week, as investors continued to shift their rate-related bets, the blue-chip average fell 78.51 points, or 0.6%, to 12487.02, up just 0.2% this year.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index also slipped 0.6% last week, off 8.32 points, to 1422.18, up 0.3% on the year. The technology-heavy Nasdaq Composite Index fell 0.6%, or 15.82 points, to 2435.49, up 0.8% on the year.

The Fed's rate committee will meet tomorrow and Wednesday, with a rate decision due Wednesday afternoon. Futures contracts tracking the likelihood of a Fed move recently have reflected a 98% chance the central bank will leave its rate target unchanged, with only a 2% chance of a quarter-point cut.

Ethan Harris, chief U.S. economist at Lehman Brothers, has been telling reporters since mid-December that he expects no rate move from the Fed in 2007.

If anything, he now says, there is some risk the Fed may raise rates this year, if the current supply of relatively cheap money throughout the global financial system begins to translate into more inflation in the U.S.

"I don't understand why some strategists are rooting for rate cuts," says Mr. Harris. "To me, a cut would tell you the Fed is quite worried about the economy. The things that would get them to reach that decision would not be a good environment for stocks."

If the Fed does indeed keep rates unchanged all year, it would constitute the longest pause since the late 1990s, in the midst of the dot-com boom.

Going back to 1989, the S&P 500 index has risen an average 10.1% during Fed pauses, not including the current one, according to research firm Thomson Financial.

Mike Thompson, director of research at Thomson Financial, says the key difference between the market now and during the late-1990s is that the market value of stocks relative to their expected earnings hasn't skyrocketed to unusual levels as it did during the bubble.

That comparison should bode well for the market in the months ahead. Explaining the more fundamental reason that flat rates might help stocks is trickier. One possibility, Mr. Thompson says, is that investors might like Fed pauses for similar reasons to why they tend to like the White House and Congress to be controlled by different political parties.

The common wisdom on Wall Street is that, if the government is divided, it is more likely to result in legislative gridlock, which cuts down on the chance that Congress will do something to hurt business. Likewise, Mr. Thompson says, if investors know the Fed is going to be on pause, maybe they grow confident that the central bank won't "overshoot" on its rate targets and set off runaway inflation or, even worse, a recession.

Like Lehman's Mr. Harris, Mr. Thompson expects the Fed to keep its rate targets unchanged throughout 2007. "For them to move, it would take some economic report to come in really, really bad, below what everyone is expecting," says Mr. Thompson. "It's hard to see what that would be."

Write to Peter A. McKay at peter.mckay@wsj.com1

Refining Stocks Still Have Plenty Of Fuel For Now (WSJ)

By Jeffrey Ball

Wall Street Journal, January 29, 2007

With President Bush calling for significantly slowing the growth in gasoline consumption in the next decade, stocks of some companies that refine crude oil into gasoline slipped temporarily last week, a sign that some investors are reassessing growth prospects for the refiners.

That long-term concern may have overshadowed a near-term opportunity. There are good reasons to conclude refiners of crude are poised for a nice seasonal stock pop as the high-demand summer driving season approaches.

In his State of the Union speech last week, Mr. Bush urged a big increase in alternative fuels such as ethanol and a potential toughening of federal automotive-fuel-economy standards. Both measures, he said, are intended to hold the growth in gasoline consumption to 20% below its projected level in 2017.

The market reacted immediately. As word of the president's energy proposals surfaced Tuesday, hours before the actual speech, the stocks of some producers of corn-based ethanol inched up -- and those of some refiners inched down.

Time will tell whether Mr. Bush's proposals will meaningfully slow the growth in America's gasoline use. It would take real technological breakthroughs for the U.S. to produce the volume of ethanol the president outlined, requiring the country to move beyond corn, the current feedstock for U.S. ethanol, and use "cellulosic" materials such as switchgrass and wood chips, which are far more plentiful, to make the fuel.

DOJ_NMG_0123151

Cellulosic ethanol is largely experimental; how many years it would take to reduce its cost to a competitive level is an open question. (See Commodities Report, page C3, on ethanol's wide range of costs.)

If the president's policies to curb the growth in U.S. gasoline use succeed, "the impact on refining would be drastic," Deutsche Bank AG oil analyst Paul Sankey wrote in a research note last week following the president's address.

Whatever happens during the next decade, however, the nuts-and-bolts realities of the U.S. refining industry suggest investors may do well in the next several months by investing in refiners of old-fashioned crude oil.

Right now, largely because of a warmer-than-expected winter that has curbed demand for heating oil, another product of the refining process, oil refiners' margins are low. Analysts expect some of the same pressures that last summer pushed up U.S. gasoline prices -- and refiners' margins -- will be repeated as the summer driving season approaches.

Margins will "stabilize and start going back up in the spring," said John Parry, a senior oil analyst at John S. Herold.

The energy-research company is bullish on refiners Tesoro Corp., which will report fourth-quarter earnings today, and Sunoco Inc. and Valero Energy Corp., both of which will report this week. Although Herold doesn't rate those stocks, it has what Mr. Parry calls an "inferred buy" on them, because the stocks are trading below what Herold regards as their value based on their average margins over the past three years. Herold has recommended investors buy ConocoPhillips, an integrated oil company with a significant refining business.

Mr. Parry owns stock in Tesoro, Sunoco, Valero and ConocoPhillips, among other oil companies. Herold doesn't own shares in the companies, but it has done business with ConocoPhillips in the past year.

The underlying reason for the near-term bullishness on refiners, Mr. Parry and other analysts said, are government regulations pushing refiners to blend into gasoline the same brew President Bush touted as an antidote to high pump prices: ethanol.

Regulations in parts of the country with particularly dirty air require special blending agents be added to gasoline to reduce the air pollution produced when the gasoline is burned in cars and trucks. Historically, the chief blending agent was methyl tertiary butyl ether, or MTBE. Because of concerns that MTBE contaminates groundwater, the government effectively has prodded refiners to phase it out, and now refiners typically use ethanol as a substitute.

Particularly in summer, ethanol is harder to blend into gasoline than MTBE is. Mixing in ethanol requires adding other chemicals that are in short supply in the U.S. That raises pump prices -- and refiners' margins.

Doug Leggate, a Citigroup Inc. oil analyst, predicted Tesoro will be the first beneficiary of the seasonal bump, because it does much of its business on the warm West Coast. Tesoro's shares already have risen markedly this month. Next up for real gains, Mr. Leggate said, are Valero, focused on the Gulf Coast, and Sunoco, based on the East Coast. Sunoco has the most "upside potential," he said.

Mr. Leggate has "buy" ratings on Tesoro, Valero and Sunoco. He has a "hold" on ConocoPhillips, generally because of the company's exposure to the upstream oil business, which Mr. Leggate has regarded as less promising than the refining business. Mr. Leggate doesn't own shares in any of these companies, but Citigroup owns Sunoco shares and does business with Sunoco, Tesoro and Valero, among other oil companies.

Aronson+Johnson+Ortiz LP, a quantitative money-management firm in Philadelphia with holdings of about $28 billion under management, has raised its holdings in refiners including Tesoro and Sunoco. During last year's third quarter, the most recent period for which statistics are available, it raised its holdings in Tesoro to 227,900 shares, up 202,300 shares, and it raised its holdings in Sunoco to 1.19 million shares, up 849,700 shares, according to FactSet Research Systems Inc.

Within the energy sector, "the refiners are looking more attractive because of their value tilt," said Stefani Cranston, a portfolio manager at the firm.

Deutsche Bank's Mr. Sankey is bearish. In addition to his long-term concerns about the threat ethanol poses to gasoline consumption, he notes that one big factor boosting refiners' margins last year was lingering refinery damage from the 2005 Gulf Coast hurricanes. Most of that is fixed.

Mr. Sankey -- who has "hold" ratings on most of refiners, including Sunoco, Tesoro and Valero -- doesn't personally own any of the stocks, but Deutsche Bank does, and it provides investment-banking services to many refiners.

Some refiners have said they are worried by Mr. Bush's ethanol push and are reconsidering plans to expand their gasoline production as a result. Adding less supply could have the effect of keeping gasoline prices higher.

Because "the mandatory nature and scope" of the president's proposals "give us serious pause," Marathon Oil Corp., an oil company with a big refining business, said in a statement following Mr. Bush's speech, "we must now re-evaluate our long-term investment program," especially prior plans to expand refinery capacity.

Mixed Reviews For Clinton In Iowa (WP)

By Dan Balz

DOJ_NMG_0123152

The Washington Post, January 29, 2007

CEDAR RAPIDS, Iowa, Jan. 28 -- Lynda Waddington met Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton twice this weekend as the Democratic senator from New York made her initial campaign visit to the state with the nation's first presidential caucuses. Clinton, she said, is nothing like the politician she sees portrayed in the press.

"The media in particular has a bad habit of taking our candidates and giving them back to us in a caricature," said Waddington, an Iowa Democratic Party official and activist. "Al Gore was a bumbling elitist. With Hillary, they have her painted as a cold fish. That's absolutely what you do not get in person. She's very warm and very intelligent."

Kay Hale met Clinton for the first time at a house party in Cedar Rapids on Saturday night. "I just never really had a true opinion of her," said Hale, who calls herself a "granny nanny" and drives a school bus. "I didn't hate her. A lot of people hate her or they like her, and I am not that way. I found her to be very warm."

Based on those reactions, Clinton and her campaign advisers may justifiably conclude that she made a positive first impression on Iowa Democratic Party activists. But a 90-minute conversation with 14 Iowa Democrats here Sunday afternoon tells a more complete and not-so-encouraging story of her candidacy in its early stages.

Widely admired and seen as strong and intelligent, Clinton nonetheless engenders substantial doubts among people who, by virtue of Iowa's place at the front of the nominating calendar, could play an outsized role in selecting the next Democratic presidential nominee.

"Competent and capable, but she's my fourth choice," said Dale Hedgecoth, a carpenter at a local high school.

"Strong, but not it," added Dona Howe, a first-grade teacher.

The 14 party activists were invited by The Washington Post to come together to talk about the presidential race. All are currently uncommitted. Their views are in no way a scientific sample, but as voters who pay especially close attention to presidential politics, they offer clues to the future in their impressions.

At the end of the conversation, these activists were asked whether they are leaning toward any particular candidates. Six said they are totally uncommitted. Of the other eight, three mentioned Clinton as one of the candidates they are looking at with the most interest.

Their opinions underscored what polls and strategists are saying: The Democratic race in Iowa is wide open. There is great interest in Illinois Sen. Barack Obama but many questions about whether he is ready to be president. Former senator John Edwards of North Carolina is well known to Iowa activists, but for someone leading the polls here he evoked a curiously unenthusiastic reaction among many in the group. Other candidates sparked limited interest, although there were kind words for former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware.

Clinton began her campaign a week ago as the national front-runner for the Democratic nomination, but in Iowa she remains a candidate with question marks behind her name. Iowa activists like to poke and probe the candidates. They have not had a chance to do that with Clinton, and it shows.

The fact that she could be the first woman elected president sparks a strong reaction among many women and some men. "This gender thing is an artificial distraction," said Dave Langston, a project manager whose wife is in elective office.

But even those who want to see a woman elected to the White House worry that Clinton may not be able to win a general election, given her political baggage. "I think that it would be amazing to have her be our president," said Hollyanne Howe, a high school student. "I fear that if she is nominated, she won't be electable. I would love to see her get elected, but my biggest fear is that it won't happen and we'll get stuck with another President Bush or whomever else."

Most of those in the group strongly oppose the Iraq war, and Clinton's 2002 vote authorizing Bush to go to war rankles many. Several said they want to hear fuller explanations from her about why she voted the way she did and how she would try to end the war and bring the troops home.

"Having read all the press accounts" about her opening day in Iowa, "I still don't know what she's going to do," said Roy Porterfield, an unemployed automotive manager.

"She dodged the issue," said Bob Bromley, a retired clergyman.

"That's what concerns me," Porterfield responded. "Is there any single greater issue than the war? She better offer a solution to that real quick."

Clinton attempted to do just that on Sunday morning during a town hall meeting in Davenport, with a scathing attack on Bush and a detailed description of where she stands. But based on the reactions of the 14 Democrats, who gathered at Crosby's restaurant in downtown Cedar Rapids, it will take repeated visits to get that explanation across to activists in a party with a long antiwar tradition.

Around the table, Obama evoked some of the most effusive responses, with repeated use of the word "charismatic." But the group was decidedly split about whether he is ready to be president.

DOJ_NMG_0123153

Joe Stutler, a systems analyst, said that "the C-word, 'charismatic' " describes his view of Obama but that the senator reminds him of a rock star coming off the release of a double-platinum album. "Is the first album the one and only?" he asked. "Is he a one-hit wonder? I can see him as vice president now."

But Liz Belden, a retired educator, said Obama is just what the country needs. "In my estimation, he is a gem, he's one in a million, and he does have the experience, if you read his books," she said. "I would like to see a mind like that go to Washington, D.C."

Edwards has been to Iowa 17 times in the past two years and leads many of the early polls in the state. Seen as personable, bright and compassionate by these activists, he nonetheless left them struggling to explain why they had doubts about him as a potential president.

"I really like Edwards," said Ann Bromley, a retired city worker. "I think he's intelligent and compassionate. I don't think he's electable, and I don't know why. Something is missing." Others nodded in agreement.

Clinton Seeks Iowa Connections (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, January 29, 2007

DAVENPORT, Iowa -- One of the most well-known women on the planet spent the weekend introducing herself.

"I am Hillary Clinton," she began yesterday before a standing-room-only crowd, just as she had a day earlier before a throng in Des Moines.

Each time, the audience of Iowa Democrats laughed and cheered, as if in on the joke that a former first lady, current New York senator and newly minted Democratic presidential candidate wouldn't be recognizable to all. Yet for Mrs. Clinton, this is serious: Getting enough people to know her as she'd like to be known -- rather than as the cold figure that even some admirers perceive -- is critical to her hopes of getting the party's nomination, let alone being elected the first female president.

The senator's challenge is plain in this state that holds both parties' first nominating caucuses a year from now. Mrs. Clinton is the Democrats' early front-runner nationally -- about 40% of Democrats support her, twice as many as her closest rival, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, can claim. But in Iowa she has trailed in polls behind Mr. Obama and two other candidates: former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, who has been working the state since his 2004 White House bid; and Iowa's former Gov. Tom Vilsack.

"Hillary carries a lot of baggage, and the only way she can unload that is to meet with people," says Dennis Goldford, a political scientist at Drake University in Des Moines. "People want to feel personally comfortable with a president. That's where Hillary has a problem."

So a week after announcing her presidential bid over the Internet, Mrs. Clinton was here in the flesh for what she calls "conversations," trying over a sub-freezing weekend to show fellow Democrats she isn't an ice queen. For Iowans, who jealously guard their 30-year role as vetters of presidential candidates, Mrs. Clinton can pass their "electability" test only by first passing their "likability" test. That would allow them to imagine she could overcome her polarizing image and attract the votes of independents, if not Republicans, needed to win back the White House.

'Most Iowans Do Not Jump Early'

She aced her tests for Richard Brannan. The 70-year-old longtime former county commissioner went skeptically to Saturday's rally at a Des Moines high school gymnasium. "She connected," he said. "She wasn't on stage two minutes and she had the crowd in her hands."

But many others said they wouldn't commit this early. Karin Hill, 45, of Marshalltown, Iowa, after getting Mrs. Clinton's autograph, said she liked the senator. But, she added, "I like Edwards. I like Bill Richardson," New Mexico's governor. "I like Barack Obama."

"Most Iowans do not jump early when it comes to the caucuses," says Iowa's Senate Majority Leader Mike Gronstal, one of about a dozen Democrats who dined with Mrs. Clinton at a Des Moines supporter's home Friday night. "They want each of the candidates to dinner," he quipped about Iowans' expectations of getting to meet all comers. "That's somewhat of a challenge for Hillary because of the media bubble around her."

For her maiden campaign weekend, scores of reporters, including television crews from Switzerland and Japan, followed the senator around Des Moines, Cedar Rapids and Davenport. As she will this coming weekend in New Hampshire, Mrs. Clinton mixed small private events, in which she met with party officials and labor leaders, with larger public "conversations" in each city.

The one in Des Moines Saturday drew a couple thousand, with many spilling into an overflow room. Early yesterday, perhaps 500 filled a county fairgrounds hall despite temperatures outside below zero.

She took questions, town hall-style, most from clear fans but a couple from skeptics of her 2002 vote to authorize force in Iraq. Afterward, she invited all to come forward to speak individually. A crush of photographers along with a number of Secret Service agents made it difficult for Iowans to press in. But most did, and she stayed to sign autographs, pose for photos and answer more questions.

DOJ_NMG_0123154

'I Know What Not to Do'

Mrs. Clinton emphasized several issues, from health care to global warming. She tended not to bring up Iraq in remarks, addressing it mainly when asked. She reiterated her charge that Mr. Bush rushed to war and waged it incompetently, and that she wants to work for a bipartisan solution to end it. It's a position, she acknowledged, that falls short of the aggressive antiwar stance that some liberals influential in the nominating contest would like.

She repeatedly used her answers to show a folksy, self-deprecating and even humorous side. In promising to work again for universal health care, for example, she alludes to her disastrous stewardship of her husband's 1993-94 health-care initiative. "Since I do have a little experience in this area, I know what not to do," she said in Des Moines, to much laughter.

But Mrs. Clinton also sought to assure party activists that she will be steely enough to answer partisan attacks of the sort she and her husband have drawn for years. During her Saturday visit to state party headquarters, one official asked what lessons she had learned from John Kerry's unsuccessful 2004 campaign; many Democrats believe Mr. Kerry lost because he failed to fight back against conservatives' assaults. "When you're attacked, you have to deck your opponents," Mrs. Clinton said, to applause from about 50 officials.

She nearly brought down the house in Davenport yesterday when, for those in the audience who hadn't heard, she paraphrased one man's question: "What in my background equips me to deal with evil and bad men?" Several Democrats afterward said they interpreted her delivery as a charmingly funny allusion to her husband's past marital misbehavior -- a controversy that still leaves some voters uncomfortable about her candidacy.

But in a later news conference, Mrs. Clinton expressed mild exasperation that reporters were suggesting the audience interpreted her remark that way. "I get a little funny and now I'm being psychoanalyzed," she said. "... I don't think anybody felt that, I'm sorry."

Write to Jackie Calmes at jackie.calmes@wsj.com1

Sen. Clinton Calls For Pragmatic Approach To Stop Troop Escalation (MCGG)

By Ed Tibbetts

Mason City Globe Gazette, January 29, 2007

DAVENPORT — U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., argued Sunday for a pragmatic approach to stop the troop escalation in Iraq, saying it's easy to appeal to people with "soundbites" and calls to cut off funding.

Clinton wrapped up a two-day swing through Iowa by spending much of the day in Davenport. It was what she promised would be the first of many trips to Iowa, site of the first-in-the-nation presidential caucuses. She announced 10 days ago she's running for president.

Many admirers greeted her Sunday. But there were direct questions, too, like about her 2002 vote to authorize President Bush to go to war.

Clinton, in interviews and before crowds, said she took responsibility for her vote, but claimed the president abused it and was at the "height of irresponsibility" by saying the war would last beyond his years in office.

She steadfastly refused to call her vote a "mistake," and said what's important now is that Congress build bipartisan pressure to stop the buildup and redeploy troops.

She said cutting off funding for the troop increase isn't the answer.

"It is easy to have a soundbite and say something that is emotionally gratifying," Clinton said, but a bipartisan vote of disapproval would "send a very clear message to the White House."

"This is an evolving policy," she said in an interview with the Quad-City Times. "We're working hard to do anything that gets the president's attention."

Other Democratic presidential candidates, such as John Edwards and Tom Vilsack, have called for a more forceful approach.

Clinton got an unexpected laugh at a fairgrounds appearance when a questioner, referring to terrorists in the world, asked about her experience dealing with "evil and bad men."

Repeating the question, Clinton said, "What in my background equips me to deal with evil and bad men?"

That prompted growing laughter in the crowd, with Clinton smiling.

After a long pause, she said, "On a slightly more serious note," then gave an answer on dealing with terrorists.

Later, at the news conference, Clinton was asked three times about the incident and laughed at being "psycho-analyzed." She brushed off the idea, broached by a reporter, that the audience was thinking of the well-publicized behavior of her husband.

DOJ_NMG_0123155

The former first lady did conjure up memories of former President Bill Clinton in at least this respect: She hung around the fairgrounds long after most people left, shaking hands, signing autographs and posing for pictures.

She also won high marks from at least one man who served in Iraq.

Eli Shetler, of Moline, said he was grateful Clinton held her criticism of the president to a minimum because, while he thought Bush's performance has been lacking, "I'm ready to hear answers."

Shetler's 11-year-old daughter, Cassie, handed a large poster to Clinton that read "Hillary Clinton. For your Future."

Clinton signed it and gave it an A-plus, telling her to "follow your dreams."

"It was cool," Cassie said.

Clinton took questions on education, trade and health care and pledged her loyalty to ethanol, too.

In the interview with the Times, she said she is now an ethanol booster, despite her vote less than two years ago against a measure requiring 7.5 billion gallons of ethanol be mixed with the nation's fuel system by 2012.

The mandate has created a greater market for the corn-based fuel.

Clinton said she opposed the measure because there were worries in 2005 that ethanol would drive up the price of gasoline in New York, as well as other concerns. She said Sunday those concerns have been alleviated.

"I am a very avid promoter of ethanol," she said. "Balancing what my obligations to New York were and what the situation is now, I have no reservations at all."

Clinton also continued to call for robust free trade, but said it should be "smart, pro-American trade."

Rory Washburn, executive director of the Tri-City Building Trades Council, said Clinton had work to do with labor but that her remarks showed him she had their concerns in mind.

"Labor standards need to be upheld," he said.

Clinton: Iraq War Bush's Responsibility (AP)

By Mike Glover

AP, January 29, 2007

Hillary Rodham Clinton said Sunday that President Bush has made a mess of Iraq and it is his responsibility to "extricate" the United States from the situation before he leaves office.

It would be "the height of irresponsibility" to pass the war along to the next commander in chief, she said.

"This was his decision to go to war with an ill-conceived plan and an incompetently executed strategy," the Democratic senator from New York said her in initial presidential campaign swing through Iowa.

"We expect him to extricate our country from this before he leaves office" in January 2009, the former first lady said.

The White House condemned Clinton's comments as a partisan attack that undermines U.S. soldiers.

About 130,000 American troops are in Iraq and Bush has announced he was sending 21,500 more as part of his new war strategy.

Clinton held a town hall-style forum attended by about 300 activists, giving a brief speech before taking questions for nearly an hour. Pressed to defend her vote to authorize force in Iraq before the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003, Clinton responded by stepping up her criticism of Bush.

"I am going to level with you, the president has said this is going to be left to his successor," Clinton said. "I think it is the height of irresponsibility and I really resent it."

Bush describes Iraq as the central front in the global fight against terrorism that began after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. "The war on terror will be a problem for the next president. Presidents after me will be confronting ... an enemy that would like to strike the United States again," he recently told USA Today.

One questioner asked Clinton if her track record showed she could stand up to "evil men" around the world.

"The question is, we face a lot of dangers in the world and, in the gentleman's words, we face a lot of evil men and what in my background equips me to deal with evil and bad men," Clinton said. She paused to gaze while the audience interrupted with about 30 seconds of laughter and applause.

Meeting later with reporters, she was pressed repeatedly to explain what she meant. She insisted it was a simple joke.

"I thought I was funny," Clinton said. "You guys keep telling me to lighten up, be funny. I get a little funny and now I'm being psychoanalyzed."

She told reporters that evil men included al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden, who remains at large. "Isn't it about time we get serious about that?" she said.

During the town hall meeting, she tried to make clear that she thinks she would be a chief executive with enough fortitude to confront any danger facing the country.

DOJ_NMG_0123156

"I believe that a lot in my background and a lot in my public life shows the character and toughness that is required to be president," Clinton said. "It also shows that I want to get back to bringing the world around to support us again."

The meeting was scheduled for a downtown restaurant but was switched to a pavilion at a nearby park when it became clear that hundreds of people planned to attend.

At virtually all her stops in this early nominating state, she ran into questions about her Iraq vote. She says Bush misled Congress and she now wants a cap on the number of troops, as well as beginning a "phased redeployment" of troops from Iraq.

The White House said it was disappointing that Clinton was responding to Bush's new war strategy "with a partisan attack that sends the wrong message to our troops, our enemies and the Iraqi people who are working to make this plan succeed."

"The height of irresponsibility," spokesman Rob Saliterman said, "would be to cap our troop numbers at an arbitrary figure and to cut off their funding."

Clinton does not support cutting funding for American troops, but does favor that step for Iraqi forces if the Baghdad government fails to meet certain conditions.

Clinton defended the role that Congress has played, saying newly empowered Democrats are beginning to build pressure on Bush to act, but the public needs to be patient.

"We are at the beginning of a process," Clinton said. "It's a frustrating process, our system is sometimes frustrating."

In making the case for her candidacy, Clinton cites her years as first lady, when Bill Clinton was president for two terms, and two winning campaigns for the Senate.

"I believe that my qualification and my life experience equip me to hit the ground running in January of 2009," Clinton said. "I have a unique perspective having been in the White House for eight years and understanding the challenge that comes from trying to govern our great country."

Clinton said he will run hard in Iowa's leadoff caucuses, an early contest her husband skipped when he sought the nomination in 1992. That year, Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin was in the race and Democratic rivals opted not to challenge him in his home state.

"My participation in the Iowa caucuses is the only thing in politics that I will do that Bill has not done," she said.

First Stop, Iowa: Clinton Fields Questions About Iraq, Health Care (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, January 29, 2007

DAVENPORT, Iowa — New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, concluding her first weekend of campaigning for the Democratic presidential nomination, said President Bush should get the nation out of Iraq and stop saying he's going to hand off the war to his successor.

"I think it's the height of irresponsibility and I really resent it," Clinton told more than 300 people Sunday at the Mississippi Valley Fairgrounds. "This was his decision to go to war. ... And we can expect him to extricate this country from this before he leaves office."

A week after entering the race, Clinton made her first trip to Iowa in more than three years. Iowans, the first voters in both parties' nomination contests, are accustomed to quizzing White House hopefuls and did not spare Clinton.

Along with a raft of you-go-girl comments from thrilled women, Clinton took repeated questions about her 2002 vote for the Iraq war and what she would do about the war now; her failure as first lady to deliver on health care reform and how she would fix the system now; and potential resistance to a female candidate.

"I'm a woman. I'm a mom. But I'm running because I think I'm the most qualified person to be president in January 2009," Clinton said here.

Her remarks on Iraq drew a response from the White House. Spokesman Rob Saliterman called them "a partisan attack" and added it would be "the height of irresponsibility to cap our troop numbers at an arbitrary figure and to cut off their funding." Clinton supports a cap but opposes a funding cutoff.

Clinton leads in all national polls of prospective Democratic nominees, but two surveys of likely Iowa caucus-goers this month put former North Carolina senator John Edwards well out in front. Clinton was clustered with Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack.

At appearances with crowds ranging from 50 to more than 1,000, the former first lady swept through Iowa with the trappings of a seasoned candidate. Her "Hillary for President" signs and stickers conveyed informality and the message that this isn't about her husband.

There was a moment Sunday after Clinton, smiling, paraphrased a question about Iran, North Korea and Osama bin Laden as "what in my background equips me to deal with evil and bad men?" The audience erupted in a long round of cheers and laughter.

DOJ_NMG_0123157

Later, a reporter told Clinton some people thought she was referring to Bush but a few said she might have meant "the bad side of Bill." "Oh come on," Clinton said, looking stricken. "I don't think anybody in there thought that."

The senator posed a series of questions to listeners here: Are you paying college tuition? Are you in the Medicare prescription program? What type of health care system would you like?

There was sparse support for mandates that employers provide health insurance, or that individuals buy it. Almost every hand went up for a system for all like Medicare.

"That really makes a lot of sense, because you could get the costs down," Clinton said. But she said such a plan, like her 1994 proposal, is vulnerable to attacks that it is "government-run health care." Clinton said she will work this year to cover all uninsured children and seek input from voters before proposing larger changes. "This time we're going to build the consensus first," she said.

The man who asked about Clinton's health care failure called his question tough. Later, another man asked a more pointed question about what she would do to end the war since she voted for it. "As we speak here today, young men and women are dying halfway around the world," he told her.

Clinton responded the way she has since 2004: Bush misused the authority she and others gave him and "if we had known then what I know now, there never would have been a vote and I never would have voted to give him that authority."

Unlike some of her rivals, such as Edwards, Clinton does not support immediate troop withdrawals or cutting off money for additional troops. "It is easy to have a sound bite and to say something that is emotionally gratifying," she told reporters. She said a bipartisan resolution of disapproval, backed by Republicans as well as Democrats, would be a solid first step: "We have to put enormous pressure on him to end the war he started."

Clinton doesn't call her war vote a mistake, but some anti-war listeners got that impression. "Everybody's entitled to a mistake," said Margaret Cebuhar, 57, a Davenport homemaker whose son served in Iraq. "She admitted it. That's good enough for me." Cebuhar called Clinton "awesome" and said Obama had fallen lower on her list.

Diana Toelle, 59, a former teacher from Clive, said Clinton's appearance in Des Moines amounted to a "job interview" and she will be checking out all the candidates. So why was Toelle wearing a "Hillary for President" sticker? "That's because they slapped it on me."

Clinton: I Was Misled On Iraq (CHIT)

By Ray Quintanilla

Chicago Tribune, January 29, 2007

DAVENPORT, IOWA -- On the second day of her campaign swing across the state, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) confronted her vote for the invasion of Iraq by saying she was misled, and she called on President Bush to provide a solution before leaving the White House in 2009.

"I live with this every day," Clinton told a standing-room-only crowd Sunday in this Mississippi River community. "The president is determined to move forward on a plan that won't succeed. He should extricate the country before he leaves office."

The remarks were Clinton's first public statements on the war since arriving in Iowa on Saturday for a "conversation with Iowans" campaign tour across the state, whose January 2008 presidential caucus promises to be hotly contested by fellow Democrats including former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and others.

Yet Clinton said no matter how much she disapproves of the war's progress, she would not vote to cut funding for U.S. troops. Instead, she said, Iraq's government officials must be warned that their funding would be reduced "because they are not doing what they are supposed to do."

During much of her Iowa visit, Clinton emphasized the breadth of experience she has gained in foreign and domestic affairs while serving in the Senate for six years and during eight years as first lady in the White House.

It's time for a seasoned and tested candidate like her, she added, taking what might be seen as swipe at the candidacy of Obama, a Senate freshman.

"I am the best-qualified person to be president," Clinton said. When it comes to dealing with the war, "this is life and death."

Walt Barchman, 86, of Davenport, one of about 400 people who crowded into a small building on the municipal fairgrounds Sunday morning, said Clinton "is the most experienced candidate for president who has ever come through Iowa."

Others in the audience said Clinton's pledge to work for health-care coverage for all Americans won them over, even with the caucus a year away.

"Everyone knows the cost of health care is just out of this world," said Murl Richardson, 61, a retired social worker.

Clinton spent much of the day crisscrossing this eastern Iowa community in a seven-car motorcade. After her fairgrounds town meeting, Clinton met with about 100 supporters in a Davenport school and held a news conference.

DOJ_NMG_0123158

During the news conference that marked the end of her weekend campaign tour, Clinton was asked to explain her earlier remarks about being able to go toe-to-toe with hard-line regimes such as those in North Korea and Iran.

Many of the hundred supporters chuckled as a reporter questioned whether her earlier comments about dealing with "evil and bad men" may have referred to her husband's marital infidelity in the White House.

"You guys tell me to lighten up. I get a little funny, and now I'm being psychoanalyzed," she shot back during the news conference. "Oh, come on. I don't think anyone thought that [it was referring to her husband]," she said.

Barbara Trish, a professor of political science at Grinnell College, said campaigning across Iowa will be different this year than during the last three decades because of the war in Iraq.

"Sen. Clinton is highly regarded across the state," she said. "There's going to be a lot of hard work between now and the date of the caucus."

Hillary Defends Her Vote On War (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 29, 2007

DAVENPORT, Iowa -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton yesterday defended her 2002 vote to authorize the war in Iraq, a vote that Democratic activists have said could doom her campaign for the presidency.

"At the time, I said 'This is not a vote for pre-emptive war.' I said that on the floor of the Senate. I said that we should not go to war unless we have allies," she told about 300 Iowans gathered at a fairground for a town-hall-style meeting.

In her first public comments about that vote since she arrived in the state Friday, Mrs. Clinton shifted most of the blame onto President Bush for his execution of the war.

"He took the authority that I and others gave him, and he misused it and I regret that deeply," she said. "If we knew then what we know now, there never would have been a vote. I never would have voted to give this president that authority."

Yesterday's event was in stark contrast to her first public forum in Iowa on Saturday, where Mrs. Clinton drew no pointed questions about her vote. It was an indication that the staunchest anti-war Democrats had stayed away from her event, so by Saturday night she sought to address the question directly on her own.

"I know how difficult the last six years have been, particularly because of this president's foreign policy, his pre-emptive war in Iraq, his management of the war and his stubborn refusal to change course," she told a small gathering at a home in Cedar Rapids on Saturday night.

Mrs. Clinton also held her first press conference since announcing her White House bid Jan. 20 and told reporters that the world is less safe because of how the war in Iraq has played out.

"I understand how ... much more dangerous it is" because of what she called "the president's policies" at a high school library here yesterday.

She also said she will "wholeheartedly support" either of the Senate resolutions condemning Mr. Bush's plan to add 21,500 troops to those already in Iraq -- so long as it is "a clear statement of disapproval."

Mrs. Clinton also demanded that Mr. Bush pull all U.S. troops out of Iraq in two years, calling the war "his decision" and saying it would be "the height of irresponsibility" to pass it along to the next commander in chief.

"We expect him to extricate our country from this before he leaves office" in January 2009, she said.

White House spokesman Rob Saliterman called Mrs. Clinton's words "a partisan attack that sends the wrong message to our troops, our enemies and the Iraqi people who are working to make this plan succeed."

But most of the questions from reporters yesterday pertained to a moment earlier in the day when she responded to a question from the town-hall audience about whether her life has prepared her to face down "evil men" in the world, such as Osama bin Laden. As Mrs. Clinton often does, she repeated the question for those who might not have heard it.

"What in my background equips me to deal with evil and bad men?" she said aloud and lingered in thought for a moment. The audience roared with laughter and applause as Mrs. Clinton prolonged her silence with perfect comic timing.

But at the press conference later in the day, reporters were not laughing. The first question and several after demanded to know what precisely she meant. Each time, she dodged the suggestion that she was making light of a question about "evil and bad men."

Finally she grew exasperated and said: "I thought I was funny."

Then she told the several dozen reporters: "You guys keep telling me to lighten up. I be a little funny and now I'm being psychoanalyzed."

Among the few questions asked yesterday that did not pertain to the voter's question dealt with her stand on illegal immigration. She noted that she supported last year's Senate-passed bill that critics say would grant amnesty to the estimated 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens currently in the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0123159

"I hope that we're going to return to considering that in the new Democratic Congress," she said. "I believe in a tough but clear earned path to citizenship."

Clinton Jokes About `evil And Bad Men' (MCT)

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, January 29, 2007

DAVENPORT, Iowa - When you're Hillary Clinton, it seems you never get away from the question of bad men in your life.

Clinton's musing about her ability to deal with "evil and bad men" punctuated a town hall meeting Sunday as an Iowa audience erupted with delight in imagining who might be on her list.

Wrapping up her inaugural campaign trip to Iowa as a presidential candidate, the New York senator was breezing through a friendly, policy-laden question-and-answer session when one person asked her how she would handle the kind of men who rule Iran and North Korea.

"We face lot of dangers in the world and in the gentleman's words, we face a lot of evil men," Clinton said in response. "People like Osama bin Laden come to mind."

She added, with a pause and a shrug of her shoulders that seemed to suggest sarcasm: "What in my background equips me to deal with evil and bad men?"

That drew loud laughter, applause, hoots and whistles from the Democratic audience.

Some said afterward they thought she was referring to her suffering with a philandering husband. Others thought it was meant to conjure up people like President Bush or former House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

Either way, Clinton apparently sensed that it seemed oddly inappropriate for a question about Iran and North Korea to end up a televised laugh fest.

"On a slightly more serious note," Clinton said, "I believe that a lot in my background and a lot in my public life shows the character and toughness that is required."

The audience response and Clinton's own contradictory comments later in the day were unscripted moments in a two-day swing that underscored both her strengths and vulnerabilities as she jumps into the battle for the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

The very nature of the crowd's laughing response to the notion of Clinton and bad men was reminiscent of the empathy many Americans had for her when her husband was caught having an affair with a White House aide. Yet it also served as a reminder that the scandal will follow her.

Facing reporters later, Clinton at first insisted she was thinking only of the serious issues she would face from international threats. Asked again, she said she was thinking about how Bush has failed to produce favorable results in the last six years.

Asked a third time later in the news conference, Clinton acknowledged she was trying to draw a laugh.

"I thought I was funny," she said. "I get a little funny, and now I'm being psychoanalyzed."

Told that some in the audience laughed at the thought of Bill Clinton, she said, "Oh, come on. I don't think anybody in there thought that."

Beyond the laughter and some warm greetings from fans, Clinton faced pointed questions about issues such as Iraq and health care that suggested she will face many skeptical Democrats in the state that kicks off the nominating process next January.

One asked whether she bore responsibility for the failure in 1993 and 1994 to enact universal health care coverage as she and her husband promised.

"We tried very hard in `93-`94, and we could not put together the political consensus that we needed to make changes," she said.

She added that she wants universal health care, but has not yet decided whether to pursue it through the existing system of employer-provided insurance, mandating coverage like states do with auto insurance, or going to a government-run program similar to Medicare.

The key, she said, is building the political consensus first, so that the eventual plan cannot be shot down as it was in the 1990s.

For more on her campaign, www.hillaryclinton.com

Clinton Says She's Learned From Mistakes (DMR)

Des Moines Register, January 28, 2007

Davenport, Ia. — U.S. Sen. Hillary Clinton told an eastern Iowa audience today that her mistakes leading a highly publicized health care reform effort in the 1990s have changed how she approaches the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0123160

"I learned a lot in '93 and '94," the New York Democrat told more than 500 supporters and party activists at the Mississippi Valley Fairgrounds. "I can tell you I come into this experience with my eyes wide open."

At the start of her second day campaigning for president in Iowa, Clinton said she and her husband, then-President Bill Clinton, failed to anticipate the fierce resistance the universal health care plan she crafted would encounter.

"We did not put together the political consensus we needed to make changes," she said, responding to a pointed question about the failed effort 13 years ago.

Clinton said she does not believe the political will yet exists for a government-run, universal health care system. Instead, she says the best way to begin moving toward health insurance coverage for everyone is to guarantee it for children.

"And then we"re going to go on from there," she said.

Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards and U.S. Rep. Dennis Kucinich, who have declared their candidacy for the 2008 Democratic nomination, have criticized an incremental approach toward universal health care.

Clinton's morning appearance today followed a full slate of private and public events in Des Moines Saturday, her first day campaigning in the lead-off presidential caucus state.

Saturday, more than 2,000 central Iowans crowded into East High School in Des Moines for an event similar to today's, where Clinton spoke briefly before taking questions.

Prior to that, she met with labor leaders and the state Democratic Party's central committee. After the East High town hall meeting, she stopped by an event in Des Moines sponsored by the African American community before meeting with labor leaders and party activists in Cedar Rapids.

The former first lady leads national polls for Democratic presidential preference, but trails Edwards in Iowa and is running near-even with Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, according to recent polls of likely caucus-goers.

The Davenport forum was originally scheduled for the back room of a Davenport restaurant, but had to be relocated when ticket requests exceeded its capacity.

Clinton planned to attend church in Davenport before holding a mid-day news conference at Davenport Central High School. Clinton was expected to leave Iowa in the afternoon.

In Iowa, Clinton Calls Bush Reckless (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut And Dan Balz

The Washington Post, January 29, 2007

DAVENPORT, Iowa, Jan. 28 -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), toughening her tone during a second day of campaigning in Iowa, accused President Bush of trying to pass the problems in Iraq on to the next president and described his actions as "the height of irresponsibility."

"The president has said this is going to be left to his successor. He has said that on more than one occasion," Clinton said during a town hall meeting here Sunday morning. "I really resent it. This was his decision to go to war."

Her comment quickly reverberated at the White House, where a spokesman issued a statement denouncing Clinton for a "partisan attack that sends the wrong message to our troops, our enemies and the Iraqi people."

Clinton, still relatively new to the presidential race, got a glimpse of how direct and inquisitive Iowa voters can be as she faced questions about her failed health-care plan in the 1990s and her ability to confront foreign threats. But she appeared prepared for the interrogation and showed a flash of humor as well.

Asked by a voter what qualified her to handle leaders from countries such as Iran and North Korea, Clinton began her reply, then stopped and, for effect, repeated the question.

"What in my background equips me to deal with evil and bad men?" she said wryly, prompting peals of laughter from the audience. She had begun with a reference to Osama bin Laden, but the crowd's reaction suggested they thought her experience with "bad men" involved someone other than the terrorist leader.

In a news conference later that day, Clinton tried to avoid explaining which "bad men" she had been referring to, initially insisting that she had simply repeated the audience member's question.

Minutes later, though, she acknowledged she had been showing her playful side. "I thought I was funny," she said, chiding reporters who pressed her on the remark. "You know, you guys keep telling me to lighten up. I get a little funny, and now I'm being psychoanalyzed."

Clinton has sought to strike a balance during her first days as a presidential candidate, between proving her toughness and revealing her personality after years of being closely guarded in public. She dropped nuggets from her personal biography -- comparing her high school in Illinois to ones she visited in Iowa and casually referring to her husband as "this guy from Arkansas" -- into lengthy and detailed discourses about public policy.

DOJ_NMG_0123161

More than questions on Iraq, Clinton heard repeated questions Sunday morning about health care, a subject that was once a liability for her but that she is now seeking to turn into an asset. One voter asked her bluntly what happened when she and her husband, former president Bill Clinton, tried to expand coverage in 1993-1994 and what she intended to do now to reach that goal.

"It's a fair question," Clinton replied, "because everybody who cares about this issue -- which is nearly everybody in the country -- knows that we tried very hard in '93-'94 and we could not put together the political consensus that we needed to make changes."

What followed was a 10-minute explanation of why the Clintons had failed then, how the problem has grown worse in the subsequent years and why she is not ready to outline in any detail her plan for the future. ("I'm not ready to be specific until I hear from people," she said.)

In keeping with her expressed desire to hold a "conversation with Iowans," Clinton asked at one point for a show of hands from the audience to see how many would prefer employer-based health insurance, how many would prefer a system in which individuals purchased insurance, with help from the government if necessary, and how many would prefer a system modeled on Medicare.

The audience overwhelmingly favored moving toward a Medicare-like system for all Americans. But Clinton, recalling the famous "Harry and Louise" ads run by opponents of her early-'90s health-care plan, warned that until there is greater political consensus, the same kind of attacks could sink any new efforts to provide universal coverage.

"I've been through this, so I know how hard it's going to be," she said.

On Iraq, Clinton continued to explain her 2002 vote authorizing the war in Iraq without apologizing for it, saying that even at the time, "I said this is not a vote for preemptive war." She said she opposes Bush's plan to send more troops to Iraq and favors capping the number of troops at the level it was on Jan. 1.

Traveling in an eight-car entourage that included her campaign manager, her deputy campaign manager, her Iowa director, four communications strategists and a cluster of Secret Service agents, Clinton made several attempts over the weekend at mingling with Iowa voters in small gatherings, including at a house party in Cedar Rapids on Saturday night.

After two days in Iowa, Clinton flew to Florida for a meeting with labor organizers and was scheduled for a stop in Texas on Senate business before returning to Washington on Monday night. Next weekend, she makes her first trip to New Hampshire, the first early-primary state.

Clinton, In Iowa Debut, Stresses Experience (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan

The Los Angeles Times, January 29, 2007

DAVENPORT, Iowa — The contours of Hillary Rodham Clinton's presidential campaign sharpened in her frenetic weekend visit to Iowa as she sought to distinguish herself from Democratic rivals by stressing her experience in the White House and the U.S. Senate.

In hours of remarks at stops in Des Moines, Cedar Rapids and Davenport, Clinton avoided direct strikes at her two leading opponents, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina. But her efforts to draw contrasts with them — mainly by casting herself as more experienced — were clear as she fielded dozens of questions from Iowans.

Looming large for Clinton was her husband's White House legacy, the upside and the downside. On Sunday, it led to her first stumble of the campaign in this snowbound city on the Mississippi River, as she told a joke widely understood to be about the Monica Lewinsky scandal, then denied it had crossed her mind.

Repeating a man's question for those who could not hear him at a bagels-and-coffee gathering of several hundred, Clinton said he wanted to know "what in my background equips me to deal with evil and bad men."

The crowd's laughter gradually built, lasting a full 30 seconds, with the New York senator smiling gamely the entire time.

"On a slightly more serious note," she continued, "I believe that a lot in my background and a lot in my public life shows the character and the toughness that is required to be president."

When asked later at a news conference what was on her mind during the laughs, she said she was thinking she "could do a pretty good job" in pursuing Osama bin Laden, and "our leadership for the last six years hasn't really produced results."

Incredulous reporters persisted in asking what she was thinking. "I thought I was funny," she said. "You know, you guys keep telling me lighten up, be funny. You know, I get a little funny, and now I'm being psychoanalyzed."

Finally, asked whether the crowd was thinking of President Bill Clinton, she said no.

Still, Clinton's otherwise smooth navigation through her debut weekend in Iowa as a presidential candidate reflected the depth of her campaign experience — two Senate runs, her husband's two bids for the White House and his races for Arkansas governor and attorney general.

DOJ_NMG_0123162

In Cedar Rapids, she joked about her husband skipping the Iowa caucuses in 1992 because U.S. Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa was in the race. "This is the only political experience I will ever have that he had never had," she said.

On foreign and domestic policy, Clinton cited her 12-year White House and Senate record, an implicit contrast with Obama, a former Illinois state senator elected to the U.S. Senate in 2004, and Edwards, a former trial lawyer who served one Senate term.

As she made her way among schools, homes and diners, she portrayed her eight years as first lady as one of her main job qualifications. She also vowed to seek advice often from her husband.

"I think it's really productive for presidents to use former presidents," she said, citing President Bush's reliance on his father and her husband to raise money for tsunami relief.

She cast her failure to win congressional approval of a healthcare overhaul during Bill Clinton's first White House term as an asset, saying it taught her the value of seeking bipartisan consensus for universal coverage.

"I've been through this, and I know how hard it's going to be," she told the breakfast crowd in Davenport.

"We can't change anything if we don't get it through the Congress."

Her emphasis on bipartisanship — whether on healthcare, Iraq or immigration — underscored the challenge she faces in overcoming her polarizing public image, part of the Clinton White House legacy. Over and over, she compared her Iowa journeys — she plans many more — to her "listening tour" of upstate New York in the 2000 Senate race. Little by little, she said, she built support among Republicans who initially disliked her.

Once they "got to know me," Clinton said, "they could work through all the characterizations and stereotypes that are out there."

"That's all I'm asking for," she told 150 invited guests Saturday at a reception in Cedar Rapids.

Facing pointed questions on the unpopular war in Iraq, Clinton defended her support of a nonbinding resolution from Congress condemning the administration's increase in troop levels.

"I know there are those who say it has no teeth," she said. "But if we don't have a bipartisan statement of disapproval, we will never get the attention of this White House."

Like Edwards, Clinton voted in 2002 to authorize the invasion of Iraq. But over the last year, Edwards has spoken out more aggressively against the war and urged Congress to take tougher action to reduce troop levels, saying "Silence is betrayal." Obama, who was an Illinois lawmaker when the war started, spoke out against the authorization vote at the time.

In that context, Clinton said Sunday that the U.S. "should do everything possible to bring the Iraq war to the right end as soon as we can, and bring our troops home, but let me just say here that that's easy to say, and everybody coming to Iowa's going to say it. It doesn't matter what they did or didn't do five years ago; everybody's going to say it."

Clinton also said she resented Bush's suggestion that the war would be "left to his successor." Bush went to war "with an ill-conceived plan and an incompetently executed strategy, and we should expect him to extricate our country from this before he leaves office."

Hillary: Dealing With 'Evil, Bad Men'? No Problem (NSDY)

By Glenn Thrush

Long Island Newsday, January 29, 2007

DAVENPORT, IOWA -- Who are the evil men on Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's mind?

During a question-and-answer session yesterday morning, a voter asked the Democratic presidential frontrunner how she'd deal with "evil, greedy, rotten, power-hungry leaders ... like Osama bin Laden ... who happen to be men."

After repeating the question, a grinning Clinton sarcastically asked the crowd at the Mississippi Valley Fairgrounds, "And what in my background equips me to deal with evil and bad men?"

As the room erupted in laughter and hooting, Clinton dipped her head, smiled sheepishly and reveled in her own mischief.

An informal survey of attendees yielded the following guesses about whom she was referring: A) her husband, Bill B) Attorney Kenneth Starr, who took over the Whitewater probe in August 1994 C) President George W. Bush D) Former Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich.

Later, at a news conference, no fewer than three reporters demanded to know the object of her disaffection. It was slow going.

First, Clinton claimed "evil men" encompassed only bin Laden and other bad actors on the world stage.

Then a scribe asked why she would have been smiling if bin Laden was on her mind. Clinton responded with, "I was thinking about how our leadership of the last six years really hasn't produced results," which elicited groans from the 100 or so reporters gathered for a news conference in a Davenport school library.

DOJ_NMG_0123163

Finally, a New York TV reporter suggested some people thought she was referring to the "bad side of Bill," which Clinton vehemently denied.

"I thought I was funny, you guys keep telling me lighten up, be funny," she said. "You know, I get a little funny and now I'm being psychoanalyzed."

Rich Liberals Fatten Obama's Coffers (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, January 29, 2007

Sen. Barack Obama is scoring gains in the early campaign-money sweepstakes, pulling in checks from liberal movie moguls, Silicon Valley executives and financiers such as George Soros in a bid to match Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's huge financial advantage in the race for the Democratic presidential nomination.

The youthful senator from Illinois, whose meteoric political fame has propelled him to the top tier of his party's presidential contenders, has not only been raising serious money for his White House campaign, but has made inroads into Mrs. Clinton's financial power base in New York, the Hollywood movie industry and among trial lawyers, campaign-finance consultants said.

"Senator Obama is clearly enlisting the support of a lot of people out there. He has the potential to raise $75 million to $100 million. But it remains to be seen how he performs as a candidate over the next three to four quarters," said Chip Smith, deputy campaign manager for Al Gore's 2000 presidential bid and a longtime party strategist.

"But Senator Clinton has demonstrated a fundraising prowess that has produced a lot of donors and givers for our party. She has an incredible roster of people committed to her campaign," Mr. Smith said.

The former first lady, who would become the first female nominee of a major political party, starts out with a huge $14.4 million war chest leftover from her 2006 Senate campaign. She has an even more valuable list of donors from her husband's successful presidential races in 1992 and 1996 and a network of seasoned campaign fundraisers that a Clinton supporter said "can raise $100 million without breaking a sweat."

But reports coming in from Democrats across the country say Mr. Obama is raking in checks from a variety of major donors in part because of his support for troop withdrawal from the Iraq war and his near-perfect liberal voting record.

"I don't think money is going to be a problem for Obama. At this stage of the game, he is what the late [Republican strategist] Lee Atwater used to call a rocket. He's a fresh face that captures the attention and fancy of the public," said campaign-finance lawyer Jan Baran.

Mr. Soros, the New York philanthropist who gave millions of dollars to liberal activist fundraising groups such as MoveOn.org in an attempt to defeat President Bush in 2004, sent the Illinois senator a check for $2,100 (near the maximum $2,300 allowable under campaign-finance limits) right after he announced his presidential exploratory committee.

In Los Angeles, where the movie industry has been a major source of Mrs. Clinton's campaign fundraising, there has been a much-talked-about Democratic shift to Mr. Obama among major movie producers. Producers Jeffrey Katzenberg, Steven Spielberg and David Geffen were reported working on a fundraiser for Mr. Obama for soon after his expected Feb. 10 formal announcement of his candidacy.

Mr. Geffen is officially supporting Mr. Obama and is expected to help him reach out to others in the film industry, and Mr. Spielberg and Mr. Katzenberg have not said who they will endorse.

Mr. Obama was also reported to be picking up support in Silicon Valley's high-tech industry.

Mrs. Clinton has lost some supporters in financial and entertainment sectors who question her electability. Among them is financial banker James Torrey, who heads the Torrey Funds, a global investment hedge fund.

"I think she's a great senator, but I'd rather see Barack Obama as president. I think Republicans will make it their life's work to bring her down," Mr. Torrey told the New York Times.

Both Mr. Smith and Mr. Baran caution against reading too much into early fundraising.

"Howard Dean, an obscure governor from tiny Vermont, raised $40 million -- a record in off-year fundraising then -- and was on the cover of all the national newsmagazines. By the time the Iowa caucuses came along, he came in third," Mr. Baran said.

Occidental Remembers 'Barry' Obama (LAT)

By Larry Gordon

The Los Angeles Times, January 29, 2007

Memories of 1980 at Occidental College's Haines Hall have the standard fragments of the era: stereos blasting the B-52's through the dorm, pot-fueled bull sessions about the revival of draft registration, late-night cramming for economics exams.

DOJ_NMG_0123164

That otherwise private nostalgia took on public significance this month when a former Haines Hall resident from Hawaii known at the time as Barry announced that he was forming an exploratory committee to run for president of the United States.

U.S. Sen. Barack Obama is usually described as an alumnus of Columbia University, where he earned his bachelor's degree, and of Harvard Law School.

But the Illinois Democrat began his undergraduate education at Occidental, and the 1,825-student liberal arts college in the Eagle Rock neighborhood of Los Angeles is not shy about claiming him as an alumnus for his two years there (1979-81) on full scholarship. Perhaps, some think, it's where his political and oratory skills were nurtured.

Despite the somewhat awkward facts that Obama transferred from Occidental and that his official website biography doesn't even mention the campus, old friends and former teachers at the well-regarded 120-year-old school proudly described him as a serious scholar and a good athlete who helped the JV Tigers basketball team to an undefeated season.

Though some express surprise at his current prominence, classmates recall a slim, good-looking teen with a moderate Afro, a taste for Casa Bianca's Hawaiian-style pizza (pineapple and ham) and a role in protesting college investments in firms doing business in South Africa during the apartheid era.

In his 1995 autobiography, "Dreams from My Father," Obama recounted how he was accepted into "several respectable" colleges but chose Occidental "mainly because I'd met a girl from Brentwood while she was vacationing in Hawaii." On Friday, in an e-mailed response to questions from The Times, Obama said had "fond memories" of Occidental. "It's a wonderful, small liberal arts college. The professors were diverse and inspiring. I ended up making some lifelong friendships there, and those first two years really helped me grow up."

Roger Boesche, a professor of politics who's cited as Obama's intellectual mentor at Occidental, said the young man from Honolulu was "a very thoughtful student and a very curious student."

Obama enrolled in two of Boesche's courses: a survey of American government and political thought from the Revolution through the civil rights movement and an advanced look at modern European political thought, which tackled such philosophers as Friedrich Nietzsche and Max Weber.

"You didn't take my European Modern class without wanting to think about deep ideas," said Boesche. Teacher and student later lost touch until Obama, then an Illinois state senator, ran for the U.S. Senate in 2004 and Boesche launched a warm e-mail correspondence.

Eric Newhall, a professor of American studies and American literature at Occidental, said Obama played with flair as a fiercely competitive guard in faculty-student pickup basketball games.

"I remember him clearly as better as an offensive player than a defense player," he said. Now Newhall likes to lightheartedly brag that he "scored a good number of baskets against the senator of Illinois. I would love to say I scored against the president."

On a more serious note, Newhall said Obama already showed glimpses of social conscience and what his supporters describe as his charisma. "Clearly the guy had a presence," he said. "He came off as a serious, articulate, intelligent young guy," Newhall recalled. "I didn't say, 'Here is presidential timber,' but I said to myself, 'I like our student body because they are going out to do interesting things.' "

He and others recall a strong speech Obama made at a campus rally urging South Africa divestment. Obama, in his book, considered that a big moment: "I figured I was ready, and could reach people where it counted," he wrote. "I thought my voice wouldn't fail me." Still, Obama initially thought he had flopped.

Dorm neighbor Ken Sulzer, now a lawyer in Century City, remembers Haines Hall's loud soundtrack of New Wave bands like the Flying Lizards. Hallway debates tackled the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and President Carter's subsequent revival of draft registration.

Obama "did not impose his personality but certainly was well-respected among his peers and always had that great voice, even when he was 17, 18," Sulzer said. In Boesche's European politics class, Sulzer said he was impressed at how few notes Obama took. "Where I had five pages, Barry had probably a paragraph of the pithiest, tightest prose you'd ever see.... It was very short, very sweet. Obviously somebody almost Clintonesque in being able to sum a whole lot of concepts and place them into a succinct written style."

John Boyer, a skin cancer surgeon in Honolulu, fondly recalled evenings driving around Los Angeles and sharing pizza near campus. Boyer described himself as conservative politically and opposed to some of Obama's positions, but added, "What I admired about him then and now is that he is a very principled person in how he formulated his views."

A woman who knew Obama at Occidental but did not want to be identified said she remains surprised that "Barry" might run for president. "It was just different times then. People sat around and smoked dope and talked about how they would reform the world. But you never thought they would," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0123165

Although college friends would not discuss his drug use, Obama has publicly said he smoked marijuana and tried cocaine in high school and college.

Obama, now 45, came to Occidental's lushly landscaped campus after graduating from the Punahou School, a prestigious private academy in Hawaii. The son of a white American woman and a black Kenyan father who had been an exchange student at the University of Hawaii, he spent some of his childhood in Indonesia, where a stepfather lived.

Obama wrote about his search for a racial identity and said he often hung out with other black students at Occidental but also "the foreign students. The Chicanos. The Marxist professors and structural feminists and punk-rock performance poets ... When we ground out our cigarettes in the hallway carpet or set our stereos so loud that the walls began to shake, we were resisting bourgeois society's stifling constraints."

Today, blacks and Latinos comprise about 22% of the student body, more than double what it was in Obama's time.

Anne Howells, a retired English professor, said she wrote Obama a recommendation for his Columbia transfer — even though he sometimes turned in assignments late.

"He wanted a bigger school and the experience of Manhattan," she said. "I thought it was a good move for him."

In his e-mail, Obama confirmed that he transferred partly "because Occidental was so small, I felt that I had gotten what I needed out of it and the idea of being in New York was very appealing." But another reason was that he had many older friends who were graduating.

College spokesman Jim Tranquada said federal privacy rules forbid releasing grades, but that Obama left in good standing.

So can Occidental legitimately claim him as an alumnus? "By all means," said Jim Jacobs, alumni relations director. "Who wouldn't want to claim him as an alum?" Many colleges list anyone who has studied on campus for at least a year, he said.

Obama, in his e-mail, said he is "happy to be an honorary alumnus, though my loyalties are obviously divided with Columbia, where I had a wonderful time as well."

Occidental already is linked to presidential politics through Jack Kemp, class of 1957. The former pro quarterback and Republican congressman ran for president in 1988 and was a vice presidential candidate in 1996.

Current students are aware that Obama once was one of them, said senior Rachel Kay, a coordinator of Haines Hall, where he lived as a freshman.

"I don't think they are more in favor of him because he went here," Kay said. "But to have some connection is cool."

larry.gordon@latimes.com

Comics: An Obama Problem (NSWK)

By Nick Summers

Newsweek, January 29, 2007

Pundits, donors, opponents red and blue—everyone's getting ready for a Barack Obama presidential bid. But one group is still unprepared: the nation's comedians, who say the pol appears almost invulnerable to caricature. How do you make fun of someone when all the audience knows is that he's popular and charismatic? "There's this thing in America where you can't make fun of someone who's a nice guy, works hard, does well," says Darrell Hammond, the pitch-perfect "SNL" impersonator of Dick Cheney, Bill Clinton, Al Gore and others. "And that's all we know about Obama right now." He does have a funny name and big ears, but that's not enough to play off, like "Gore is dull" or "Kerry flip-flops." Race works to his advantage, too. White comics might tread cautiously—which rarely makes for good comedy. At least until the campaign is underway and Obama says or does something that gives them some meat, comics and writers are scratching their heads. They told PERI what they think might work:

MAKE FUN OF HOW YOU CAN'T MAKE FUN OF HIM

"Obamamania" has become absurd. "Daily Show" viewers heard a heavenly noise—"a choir of angels," host Jon Stewart said. "It can only mean one thing: Barack Obama did something." Jay Leno's line: "The big story, of course: 'American Idol.' But enough about Barack Obama."

SWITCH IT UP: MAKE FUN OF VOTERS

"People tell pollsters they'll vote for a black candidate, but once they're in that booth ... " says stand-up Greg Giraldo (an alum of Columbia and Harvard Law, just like Obama). Jokes about racial anxieties can be powerful—or professional death. Might work only from a black performer.

STALL

"Give him time," says "Real Time With Bill Maher" exec producer Scott Carter. Colin Powell, Wesley Clark—others have seemed too perfect for comedy before, but everyone tarnishes. "He has this halo, a messiahlike aura that just can't last as we get to know what he thinks about this issue and that issue." He'll crack before '08.

DOJ_NMG_0123166

JUST GIVE UP

It's hopeless. "Since Obama lacks faults, weaknesses or imperfections of any kind, I guess they'll just have to soberly discuss his evenhanded policy positions," suggests Peter Koechley, managing editor of The Onion. He's making a joke.

TIME Poll: Hillary Vs. McCain? (TIME)

By Tony Karon

Time, January 26, 2007

Hillary Clinton is the clear front-runner to win the Democratic Party's nomination for President in 2008, but the Republican race will be a close contest between Senator John McCain and former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani — with McCain edging Giuliani by a three- to four-point margin. And a presidential face-off between Clinton and McCain, right now, would be close to a dead heat. Those are some of the key findings of a new TIME poll earlier this week that canvassed a random sample of 1,064 registered voters by phone.

Despite the buzz generated by Senator Barack Obama entering the race, the survey found that Senator Clinton would beat him for the Democratic nomination by a margin of 40% to 21%. Senator John Edwards is a distant third with 11%. Obama clearly suffers a disadvantage in profile among likely voters, with only 51% indicating that they knew enough about him to form an opinion, compared with 94% saying the same of Hillary Clinton. In Obama's favor, however, is his far lower negative ratings. While 58% of voters familiar with Hillary Clinton have a positive view of her, 41% give her negative marks, for a net favorability score of +17. By contrast, Obama's net favorability score is +47. On the Republican side, Giuliani has a net favorability rating of +68, with only 14% having a negative view of him. McCain's net favorability score is +45.

McCain, however, holds a narrow lead of 30% to 26% over Giuliani for the G.O.P. nomination. A race between McCain and Clinton would be a virtual tie (47%-47%), according to the poll, while McCain would beat either Obama or Senator John Edwards by a 7-point margin.

Clinton's popularity within her party does not translate as easily across party lines as Obama's does, or indeed as Giuliani's and McCain's. Only 58% of the total sample of respondents had a very or somewhat favorable impression of her, compared with 82% for Giuliani (including 7 out of 10 Democratic voters), and 70% each for Obama and McCain — both of whom showed strongly among independents. These figures must be read against the fact that 94% of respondents said they knew "a great deal" or "some" about Clinton, while 73% said the same of Giuliani and 66% of John McCain. Only 51% knew "a great deal" or "some" about Obama.

If the election were held now, Rudy Giuliani appears to have the support of the greatest number of respondents of both parties, with 56% indicating they would "definitely" or "probably" support him — followed by Hillary Clinton (51%) John McCain (50%) and Barack Obama (50%). But Clinton has a strong edge when the question is which presidential candidate people would most like to have over to their homes for dinner. The former First Lady led the dinner-invitation field with 26%, while Obama and McCain tied for second place at 15%. But with the New Hampshire primaries a year away, the the four leading contenders all have some work to do: Obama in making himself better known, Clinton in making herself better liked, McCain in matching Giuliani's appeal to Democratic voters, and Giuliani in landing more invitations to dinner.

Fineman: What Are Hillary's Biggest Hurdles To Victory? (NSWK)

By Howard Fineman

Newsweek, January 29, 2007

So far, so good for Hillary Clinton. She launched her presidential campaign with a smooth professionalism that reminded me of George W. Bush's debut eight years ago. The technology has changed (Web chats vs. a chartered-plane fly-around), but the message was the same: we know the game cold, it's in the family blood, we are inevitable. Making a surprise entrance the weekend before the president's State of the Union address, Hillary introduced herself as a "Back to the Future" candidate who would usher in a sobering return to Clintonism (with "bold but practical" ideas for new times) after what Democrats have come to see as a nightmarish Bush interregnum.

The blitz moved the numbers. The new NEWSWEEK Poll shows Hillary beating her Democratic rivals in two-way matchups (55 to 35 percent over Sen. Barack Obama, 62 to 29 percent over former senator John Edwards). She does better than they do against Republicans, beating Sen. John McCain 50 to 44 percent, for example. Reviews in the Senate Democratic cloakroom—a snake pit of presidential politics—were upbeat. "The perception was that she had leveled off, had even lost altitude," says one habitué, who is neutral and therefore insistent on anonymity. "But she handled these last few days brilliantly."

Still, it is a journey of a thousand hurdles. A few:

IRAQ. The grass roots/Net roots deeply doubt her antiwar cred, her support for a toughly worded (but functionally meaningless) Senate resolution notwithstanding. Their favorite major candidate thus far is Edwards, who calls his authorizing vote in 2002 a "mistake" and supports slashing funds for the president's troop escalation. MoveOn.org and its allies have little general election clout, but they have plenty in the primaries. This year, I'm told, they plan to hold "issues elections" on their Web sites, with each candidate represented by a YouTube-able statement. The first issue contested: Iraq. The likely winner: not Hillary.

DOJ_NMG_0123167

MONEY WARS. The struggle for the allegiance of big donors is on, especially between Hillary and Obama. There is a new generation of hedge-fund fat cats, and competition is fierce. Terry McAuliffe, the Hillary über-fund-raiser, jovial tell-all author ("What a Party!") and former party chair, makes it clear that he thinks it's a bad idea to give to more than one candidate—though, in fact, it's not all that uncommon. "They don't help themselves if they do," he says, "because they come off as not really being a supporter of anyone." In New York, the issue is moot: Hillary has the town more or less locked up; ditto for Obama in Chicago. Los Angeles, home of the never-quite-concluded deal, is another story. Some major figures (Steven Spielberg, David Geffen) agreed to host a fund-raiser for Obama; now, after some fast footwork by Hillary supporters, Spielberg is cohosting one for Hillary.

NET RISK. On the Web, Hillary offered herself as an openhearted neighbor, eager to bond over coffee. It was an appealing image, one the campaign will guard by carefully limiting the national press's access to her in places such as Iowa. Is Hillary really the warm and welcoming person we saw on the couch? Friends say yes, but evidence to the contrary can come from anywhere—including video from campaign-trail cell-phone cameras. What the Internet giveth, the Internet taketh away. Not everything can be controlled, even by a Clinton.

Attack Ads Go Online And Underground (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 29, 2007

'Viral' Web video spreads fast and far, biting candidates hard -- sometimes with their own words.

In a dim Culver City editing room, two video snippets of Republican presidential hopeful John McCain fill the monitors. In the first, he says same-sex marriage should be allowed. In the second, he says it should be illegal.

The clips are part of the payoff of a weeks-long hunt by filmmaker Robert Greenwald and his production team for damaging Internet video of the Arizona senator.

Greenwald, the producerdirector of scathing documentaries about Fox News and Wal-Mart, hopes to shatter McCain's image as a straight-talking maverick. But instead of creating a full-length film, he is assembling clips of McCain for a series of two-minute Web videos. The idea is to turn McCain's own words against him, spreading the videos through e-mail, blogs and websites.

"The effectiveness is hearing and seeing him say stuff," Greenwald said in the editing bay. The videos "go right to the character issue — who he is."

The first whack at McCain, now on the video-sharing site YouTube, joins a rapidly growing collection of Web videos posted by critics of leading contenders in the 2008 presidential race. Targets so far include Barack Obama, Rudolph W. Giuliani, John Edwards, Mitt Romney and Hillary Rodham Clinton.

The explosion of video-sharing on the Web poses major risks for presidential candidates: Gaffes and inconsistent statements witnessed by dozens can be e-mailed instantly to millions.

The White House ambitions of Republican George Allen of Virginia were dashed in no small part by a Web video that showed him, at a campaign event, calling an Indian American "macaca." Allen also lost his November bid for reelection to the Senate.

And Romney, a former Massachusetts governor, was hit this month with an anonymously posted YouTube video made of footage from a 1994 debate in which he took liberal stands on abortion and other matters. Romney, who has staked out more conservative positions in his quest for the Republican presidential nomination, posted his own video to explain the shift.

"I was wrong on some issues back then," he told viewers. "I'm not embarrassed to admit that."

For the candidates, as well as their detractors, the chief attribute of Web video is its broad reach, accomplished at little or no expense.

"You can grab it, send it, link it, and at zero cost," said Matthew Dowd, a top strategist for President Bush's 2004 reelection campaign. "Two hundred thousand people could see it in 24 hours."

Several White House contenders have already made promotional Web videos a central part of their communications strategy, using them to reach supporters directly, without a media filter. Democrats Clinton, Edwards, Obama and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson each made Web video statements for their campaign launches.

Clinton has been especially aggressive. The New York senator and presumed party front-runner took questions from supporters on three evenings last week in half-hour Web chats. As part of a broader effort to warm up voters (a fireplace crackled in the background when she appeared Wednesday on NBC's "Today" show), Clinton pivoted from Iraq and healthcare to the delights of gardening, dog-walking, movie watching, swimming and even closet cleaning.

DOJ_NMG_0123168

McCain is planning his own Web version of reality TV. He has hired a videographer to record behind-the-scenes campaign moments of the senator in relaxed settings.

"What the campaign can do in a Web video is show a more personal side of the candidate," said Spencer Whelan, who works on McCain's online communications team.

But the same technology allows others to broadcast — often anonymously — videos utterly outside the campaigns' control. Already, attack videos range from the caustic to the ridiculous.

McCain's comic potential is on display in a YouTube video featuring the melodically impaired senator singing lines from "The Way We Were" and other Barbra Streisand tunes in a "Saturday Night Live" skit.

Another video on the site shows Giuliani dressed in drag, with Donald Trump nestling his face in the former New York City mayor's fake breasts — a gag from a long-ago press dinner that struck many New Yorkers as funny, but might puzzle some Republican primary voters in, say, South Carolina.

Edwards, the 2004 Democratic nominee for vice president, is the subject of a popular prank video that uses humor to skewer the former North Carolina senator. Mocked by critics as "the Breck girl" in 2004, the telegenic candidate is shown fussing with his hair for a full two minutes in preparation for a TV interview, as Julie Andrews sings "I Feel Pretty." YouTube visitors have viewed it more than 27,000 times.

Among the Clinton material posted on the site is a home-video excerpt, first broadcast by ABC News, that shows her confiding to someone at a campaign fundraiser that she avoided e-mail because of constant investigations of the White House during her husband's presidency.

Obama, a newcomer to presidential politics, is just starting to draw the sort of negative attention that the Clintons have long attracted. Last week, Chicago-area political consultant Joe Novak posted several Web videos taking aim at the Illinois senator's wife, Michelle, for her healthcare business dealings.

"I've gotten very angry over the fawning cheerleading that's going on in this city by so-called reporters," Novak said.

Obama campaign spokesman Dan Pfeiffer said Novak's videos show that the Web "is rapidly becoming the place to put video that is too inaccurate and too scurrilous to put on television."

For candidates, one of the troublesome aspects of Web video is also one of its most appealing: the ability of viewers to send it to untold numbers of like-minded voters on an e-mail list.

"A lot of what strategists rely on is the viral impact of sending something to your existing list, and have them push it out to friends and family — make them evangelists and messengers," said Brent Blackaby, the founder of Blackrock Associates, an online political strategy consulting firm.

But the impact of a negative video can be devastating — and undetectable. For candidates trying to appeal to a distinct demographic group, for example, video that shows them taking stands that the group opposes can spread fast without the campaign's knowledge. And the words pack a more profound emotional punch when they come from the candidate's own mouth.

"Voters understand that everybody's shading the truth, but this stuff, they can look at it and say, 'Jeez, that's what he said,' " said David Doak, a veteran Democratic ad maker.

Giuliani, for one, is facing an underground Web-video effort to undercut his appeal to the social conservatives who dominate the Republican nomination race. Two videos posted on YouTube show him making remarks at City Hall news conferences that could prove unpopular among them. In one, he calls for an expansion of immigration. The other shows him announcing a city lawsuit against gun manufacturers, accusing them of deliberately selling more guns than needed for hunting and law enforcement.

"The more guns you take out of society, the more you're going to reduce murder," he says in the video.

To Greenwald, who is not getting paid for the McCain project, Web video offers a chance to end what he sees as the senator's "free ride" in the mainstream media. "It's primarily that there was a story that wasn't being told," he said.

His first video strings together some McCain statements on Iraq, the Confederate flag, Christian conservatives and same-sex marriage — remarks contradictory enough to suggest that McCain falls short of delivering the "straight talk" that he made a trademark of his first campaign for president, in 2000.

"I certainly think we'll make an impact, and he'll have to respond to what we're doing," said Cliff Schecter, a Democratic consultant working on Greenwald's project. "That's all you can hope for."

But McCain campaign spokesman Danny Diaz declined to comment on the Web-video attacks.

"Our focus," he said, "is on using video that communicates a positive message about our candidate."

michael.finnegan@latimes.com

DOJ_NMG_0123169

In Politics, The Camera Never Blinks (or Nods) (NYT)

By Tom Zeller Jr.

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

BEYOND its fulfillment of a constitutional requirement, the president's annual State of the Union address has come to provide much pomp. It's a prime-time gala where Washington's best and brightest gather for an evening in the media spotlight, and where the nation tunes in with varying degrees of interest, cynicism or boredom at the bloated spectacle of it all.

Oh, sure, there's the actual speech itself. But generally speaking, the odds for climactic elements — for truly earth-moving, unexpected locutions — are so low as to be negligible.

Copies of the speech are customarily distributed to members of the news media ahead of time — on the condition, of course, that they not be published until after the president begins his delivery. But in the age of the Internet, even that handshake agreement between the press and president has broken down: Copies of the speech could be found at sites like the Drudge Report and ThinkProgress.org well before President Bush began his address shortly after 9 p.m. last Tuesday.

"We'll start respecting White House embargoes when they start telling the truth," wrote the editors at Think Progress.

It is perhaps no surprise, then, that Web gremlins would chuckle as the cameras panned the chamber Oscar-style last week and alighted on what appeared to be Senator John S. McCain of Arizona, a presumed candidate for the Republican nomination for president, in an unguarded moment of slumber.

It is, perhaps, also no surprise in the age of YouTube — where unscripted video clips have become political Molotov cocktails — that a "McCain sleeping" snippet was uploaded to the Internet and was being discussed and linked in short order.

Whether the original intent was political sabotage or simple humor is hard to say, but either way the clip went straight for Mr. McCain's Achilles' heel: his age. He is now 70 years old. By 2008, if elected, he would be the oldest president to move into the White House.

So a video of the elderly statesman appearing to doze during the president's speech — and particularly during a portion of the speech where terrorism was being discussed — seemed to put questions of his fitness for office in stark relief.

And in that sense, the video brouhaha — a short-lived and misguided brouhaha, considering that he wasn't sleeping after all — constitutes one of the first "macaca moments" of the 2008 campaign. It is also a sign that Mr. McCain — and every candidate who has, or will, throw a hat into the ring — will have a very, very long road ahead.

Now, for those who have been living under a rock, it was former Senator George Allen of Virginia who was caught on video last August referring to an opposition aide — who was of Indian descent — as "macaca," a racial slur obscure to many Americans, but potent enough to have caused a media frenzy when the video hit the Internet. Mr. Allen was not re-elected.

Reasonable people can disagree on the extent to which that single incident was to blame for Mr. Allen's defeat, but there was no question in anyone's mind that the YouTube culture — in which every public moment can be clipped, cropped and distributed instantly across the globe by anyone at any time — had changed the rules of the game. As with the broken embargo on the State of the Union speech, there is no longer the default expectation that exposure can be managed. All bets are off.

The theory of Mr. McCain's supposed nap got an early boost from Tucker Carlson of MSNBC, who was blogging the speech live at hardblogger.msnbc.msn.com.

"If you're McCain, who will be over 70 by 2008, you'll want to make doubly sure to demonstrate your alertness and vigor," Mr. Carlson wrote just after 10 p.m. Tuesday. "You definitely won't want to slump in your seat, out cold, when Bush starts talking about Iraq. And yet that's exactly what McCain did tonight, napping on camera for 10 agonizing seconds."

On Wednesday morning, the Drudge Report carried the headline "McCain Eyes Wide Shut During Bush Speech," along with a link to a "Sleepy Senator John McCain" video clip that had been uploaded to YouTube (and is still available of this writing: snipurl.com/McCain). It shows Mr. McCain in a straight-on shot, sitting in the crowded chamber, chin to chest, with eyes that appear to be closed.

David All, who runs the David All Group, a Washington firm focusing on developing new-media strategies for Republican campaigns, theorized at his Web site, davidallgroup.com, that the original uploader — a user going by the sobriquet monzsca — was not likely a political operative himself, but rather someone who simply thought the clip was funny. Mr. All suggests, however, that others seeking to damage Mr. McCain saw an opportunity.

"Though the clip was not created by an opposing campaign, it was probably identified by at least one of those campaigns as a tool to swipe at McCain to help make the argument that McCain is 'too old' to be president, and passed it along to Drudge," Mr. All wrote on Thursday, in a deconstruction of the "Sleepy John" affair.

"Whether he meant to or not, the YouTube user created a video that went viral, amplified by a coveted Drudge link," he wrote, "and is now getting a lot of front page treatment on a popular Web community, YouTube."

DOJ_NMG_0123170

From Drudge, the clip and the discussion bounced around the blog circuit (including the Screens blog here at The Times as well as my own Times blog, The Lede), as did a swell of countervailing evidence, which ultimately won the day: it seems that Mr. McCain was, like just about everyone else in attendance that night, simply glancing down at his copy of the speech and reading along.

Mr. All gives high praise to swift action by McCain operatives, who uploaded a separate YouTube video showing a perky Senator McCain applauding heartily during the speech (snipurl.com/Hearty). They also pointed bloggers to links of a video montage — prepared by the folks at The Hotline's On Call blog — demonstrating that others who were gathered in the House chamber that night, while clearly reading something in their laps, also appeared to be napping if shot at some angles (snipurl.com/ReadClips).

It was good political gamesmanship, and the thrust and parry provide an object lesson in the power of Internet video, particularly in the political arena. A candidate, an elected official, even a journalist who remains ignorant of this weapon — how to handle it, how to know when it has been unleashed and from what direction — proceeds at a certain peril.

Of course, even one's best efforts at damage control may go unappreciated.

Said one commenter at Mr. All's site: "Asleep or not, McCain et al. forgot one of the maxims of modern politics: When cameras are in the room, keep your head up and smile."

Feeding Frenzy For A Big Story, Even If It's False (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 28 — Jeffrey T. Kuhner, whose Web site published the first anonymous smear of the 2008 presidential race, is hardly the only editor who will not reveal his reporters' sources. What sets him apart is that he will not even disclose the names of his reporters.

But their anonymity has not stopped them from making an impact. In the last two weeks, Mr. Kuhner's Web site, Insight, the last remnant of a defunct conservative print magazine owned by the Unification Church led by the Rev. Sun Myung Moon, was able to set off a wave of television commentary, talk-radio chatter, official denials, investigations by journalists around the globe and news media self-analysis that has lasted 11 days and counting.

The controversy started with a quickly discredited Jan. 17 article on the Insight Web site asserting that the presidential campaign of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton was preparing an accusation that her rival, Senator Barack Obama, had covered up a brief period he had spent in an Islamic religious school in Indonesia when he was 6.

(Other news organizations have confirmed Mr. Obama's descriptions of the school as a secular public school. Both senators have denounced the report, and there is no evidence that Mrs. Clinton's campaign planned to spread those accusations.)

In an interview Sunday, Mr. Kuhner, 37, said he still considered the article, which he said was meant to focus on the thinking of the Clinton campaign, to be "solid as solid can be." But he declined to say whether he had learned the identity of his reporter's sources, and so perhaps only that reporter knows the origin of the article's anonymous quotes and assertions. Its assertions about Mr. Obama resemble rumors passed on without evidence in e-mail messages that have been widely circulated over the last several weeks.

The Clinton-Obama article followed a series of inaccurate or hard-to-verify articles on Insight and its predecessor magazine about politics, the Iraq war or the Bush administration, including a widely discussed report on the Insight Web site that President Bush's relationship with his father was so strained that they were no longer speaking to each other about politics.

The Washington Times, which is also owned by the Unification Church, but operates separately from the Web site, quickly disavowed the article. Its national editor sent an e-mail message to staff members under the heading "Insight Strikes Again" telling them to "make sure that no mention of any Insight story" appeared in the paper, and another e-mail message to its Congressional correspondent instructing him to clarify to Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama that The Washington Times had nothing to do with the article on the Web site.

"Some of the editors here get annoyed when Insight is identified as a publication of The Washington Times," said Wesley Pruden, editor in chief of The Washington Times.

And in an interview, John Moody, a senior vice president at Fox News, said its commentators had erred by citing the Clinton-Obama report. "The hosts violated one of our general rules, which is know what you are talking about," Mr. Moody said. "They reported information from a publication whose accuracy we didn't know."

Mr. Kuhner's ability to ignite a news media brush fire nonetheless illustrates how easily dubious and politically charged information can spread through the constant chatter of cable news commentary, talk radio programs and political Web sites. And at the start of a campaign with perhaps a dozen candidates hiring "research directors" to examine one another, the Insight episode may be a sign of what is to come.

DOJ_NMG_0123171

To most journalists, the notion of anonymous reporters relying on anonymous sources is a red flag. "If you want to talk about a business model that is designed to manufacture mischief in large volume, that would be it," said Ralph Whitehead Jr., a professor of journalism at the University of Massachusetts.

With so much anonymity, "How do we know that Insight magazine actually exists?" Professor Whitehead added. "It could be performance art."

But hosts of morning television programs and an evening commentator on the Fox News Network nevertheless devoted extensive discussion to Insight's Clinton-Obama article, as did Rush Limbaugh and other conservative talk radio hosts.

And the Fox News rival MSNBC has picked up several of Insight's other recent anonymous "scoops." Among them: that Mr. Bush was afraid to fire his adviser Karl Rove because "he knows too much"; that there is a rift between President Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice over the president's support for Israel; and that Mr. Bush spent the months before the midterm elections in a bunker-mentality focused on the Iraq war and the elections to the exclusion of all else. Mr. Kuhner has appeared as a guest on both networks.

A spokesman for MSNBC declined to comment. Representatives of News World Communications, the arm of the Unification Church that owns Insight, could not be reached for comment on Sunday night.

Mr. Kuhner said, "Our report on this opposition research activity is completely accurate," and he argued that all major news organizations relied on anonymous sources. Mr. Kuhner, in an editor's note on Insight, said the Web site could not afford to "send correspondents to places like Jakarta to check out every fact in a story." The Web site pays up to $800 for an article.

Mr. Kuhner said he was not yet convinced by reports from officials of the elementary school that Mr. Obama attended in Indonesia about its secular history. "To simply take the word of a deputy headmaster about what was the religious curriculum of a school 35 years ago does not satisfy our standards for aggressive investigative reporting," he wrote.

Insight was founded two decades ago as a conservative print magazine called Insight on the News. It started the career of the journalist David Brock, who became famous for writing sensational magazine articles and books about Anita Hill and later Mrs. Clinton. Mr. Brock later recanted much of what he had written, and now runs a liberal media group dedicated to countering what it considers be conservative bias in the news media.

Insight had thousands of subscribers, but its reputation was checkered by its false reports, which included an assertion that President Bill Clinton was selling plots at Arlington National Cemetery to Democratic campaign donors, and, during the Bush administration, that Saddam Hussein's purported weapons of mass destruction might have been found.

Officials of the Unification Church closed the print magazine about a year and a half ago, and tapped Mr. Kuhner to run it as a stand-alone Web site. He worked for three years, from 2000 through 2003, as an assistant national editor at The Washington Times. Before that, he was a history professor, but did not finish his dissertation. After leaving The Washington Times, he worked for a Republican policy group.

Mr. Kuhner said he insisted on editorial independence, reporting only to the board of New World Communications. Under his tenure, Insight's Web site has claimed a series of anonymous scoops, many centered on the White House. In addition to the article about Mr. Bush's feud with his father, there was also a January 2006 report that the United States was preparing for a covert attack on Iran and a February 2006 report that Vice President Dick Cheney would step down after the midterm elections.

Mr. Kuhner said Insight stopped using bylines to encourage contributions from reporters for major news organizations. He said such contributors could not write what they knew under their own names for their main employers, either for fear of alienating powerful sources or because of editors' biases.

"Reporters in Washington know a whole lot of what is going on and feel themselves shackled and prevented from reporting what they know is going on," Mr. Kuhner said. Insight, he said, "is almost like an outlet, an escape valve where they can come out with this information."

"The team I have has some of the most seasoned, experienced reporters in this town, so I know the material I am getting is rock-solid." he said. "The reporter has to give his or her word that, 'It is solid, Jeff,' " Mr. Kuhner said.

During an interview, he invited this reporter to moonlight for Insight. "I will take a look at your work," he said. "I will do a background check. You may get a call from me." He declined to say where the contributor who offered the Clinton-Obama story worked.

"I said, 'That is a sexy story, if you can confirm it,' " Mr. Kuhner recalled. After Insight posted the article on Jan. 17, Mr. Kuhner said, he was disappointed to see that the Drudge Report did not link to it on its Web site as it has done with other Insight articles. So, as usual, he e-mailed the article to producers at Fox News and MSNBC.

Lieberman May Back Republican In 2008 (AP)

AP, January 29, 2007

Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman, the Democratic vice-presidential nominee in 2000 who won re-election as an independent last year, says he is open to supporting any party's White House nominee in 2008.

"I'm going to do what most independents and a lot of Democrats and Republicans in America do, which is to take a look at all the candidates and then in the end, regardless of party, decide who I think will be best for the future of our country," Lieberman said Sunday.

"So I'm open to supporting a Democrat, Republican or even an Independent, if there's a strong one. Stay tuned," said the three-term lawmaker who caucuses with Senate Democrats.

Lieberman is an ally of GOP Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a 2008 hopeful, and supports President Bush's new Iraq strategy. Lieberman won re-election as an independent last fall when Democrats backed an anti-war candidate who won the party primary.

Speaking of which politician he may support in 2008, Lieberman said, "Obviously, the positions that some candidates have taken in Iraq troubles me. Obviously, I will be looking at what positions they take in the larger war against Islamist terrorism."

He added, "I am genuinely an independent. I agree more often than not with Democrats on domestic policy. I agree more often than not with Republicans on foreign and defense policy."

The senator said he wanted to select someone "I believe is best for the future of our country. ... Party is important, but more important is the national interest. And that's the basis that I will decide whom to support for president."

Lieberman spoke on "Fox News Sunday."

___

WASHINGTON (AP) — Even Sen. Joe Biden jokes about the Democrats' crowded White House field for 2008, which he is joining this week.

"I'm the 800th candidate," said Biden, who plans to make it official on Wednesday.

Dominating the early stages of the race are New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama. Other candidates include former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, the 2004 vice presidential nominee; Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, and Ohio Rep. Dennis Kucinich.

"I am absolutely confident, if I get to stand on a stage, sit in the room with all the candidates you mentioned, I'll do just fine," Biden said in a broadcast interview when Clinton, Obama and Edwards were specifically cited.

"This is a marathon. If people learn my story, learn my record, I think I can compete. The question is, can I raise the money?"

The Delaware senator was interviewed on "This Week" on ABC.

___

WASHINGTON (AP) — James Garfield was the last sitting House member to win election as president when the Ohio Republican captured the White House in 1880.

Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., realizes he is up against history as his 2008 campaign moves ahead.

"Well, that's true. But on the other hand, somebody's got to win this race," he said Sunday. "And I think my messages of a strong national defense, secure border, bring some of those high-paying manufacturing jobs back that we've given away because of trade deals that weren't smart.

"And I think that my messages will resonate with the American people and I think I've got a chance to win this thing."

Hunter faces a crowded GOP field, including Sen. John McCain of Arizona, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback and Colorado Rep. Tom Tancredo.

Until Democrats took control of Congress this month, Hunter was chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, which oversees military policy.

But he is little known outside of Congress and his San Diego district. He is a strong opponent of illegal immigration who wants fences extended along the U.S.-Mexico border and supports the prosecution of smugglers bringing illegal immigrants across the border.

Hunter appeared on "This Week" on ABC.

McCain Passes On RSC Invite (RC)

By Susan Davis And Lauren W. Whittington

Roll Call, January 29, 2007

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) has decided not to address House Republican conservatives when they convene at their annual retreat this week, while one of his top rivals for the GOP's 2008 White House nod will be among the headliners of the event.

DOJ_NMG_0123173

Not only is McCain not attending the annual Conservative Members Retreat — which draws members of the Republican Study Committee and is sponsored by the Heritage Foundation — Republican sources said that McCain's campaign never responded to the invitation.

The GOP's three most prominent 2008 hopefuls — McCain, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani — were invited to meet with the group when it gathers in Baltimore this Thursday through Saturday.

Romney will make an appearance at the retreat, while Giuliani sent his regrets and said he had a scheduling conflict. McCain's campaign never responded to inquiries.

Other headliners of the retreat include former Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), who is mulling a White House run, and former Sen. Phil Gramm (R-Texas), who already has signed on with McCain's campaign.

McCain campaign spokesman Danny Diaz did not address why his boss wouldn't attend, or why he didn't respond to the invite, but he said the Senator enjoys many friendships on Capitol Hill and has daily opportunities to reach out to conservative lawmakers.

"While he's not going to be able to attend this particular meeting, he's fortunate to be able to meet every day with conservative leaders in the United States Capitol," he said.

McCain has long had a tumultuous relationship with conservatives. His run for the GOP presidential nomination in 2000 put him squarely in the cross hairs of religious evangelicals and other movement conservatives who had lined up behind the candidacy of then-Texas Gov. George W. Bush. The South Carolina primary, dominated by the party's most conservative wing, was especially bloody for McCain.

McCain has since mended fences with Bush and reached out to conservatives, many of whom are untrusting of the man they see as a maverick who has bucked his own party as often as he has supported it.

An aide to a prominent House conservative said that Members were more puzzled than offended at the apparent disinterest in the retreat coming from the McCain campaign.

According to sources, staff at both the RSC and Heritage reached out to the Romney, Giuliani and McCain campaigns in mid-January to schedule appearances at the annual gathering traditionally held in Baltimore.

Giuliani's team could not attend due to an unbreakable scheduling conflict on the West Coast, and Romney accepted the invitation and is scheduled to appear Friday. More than 100 House Republicans are members of the RSC, and while attendance lists weren't confirmed at press time Friday, about half of those Members are expected to attend.

Romney has been the most overtly active of the three in recruiting supporters in the House. A few members of the RSC already have endorsed him, including GOP Reps. Marsha Blackburn (Tenn.), Tom Feeney (Fla.), Howard McKeon (Calif.) and Dave Camp (Mich.).

One aide suggested that McCain's campaign underestimated the importance of building early support in the House.

"The McCain campaign is missing the boat entirely and failing to grasp the importance of the momentum that adding House Members early builds," the aide said, adding: "In light of Gov. Romney's energetic outreach to conservatives in the House, it's puzzling and perhaps telling about McCain's own outreach strategy to House Members."

A spokesman for Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Texas), the chairman of the RSC, said only that conservatives were looking forward to the scheduled discussions at the retreat.

"Chairman Hensarling is very pleased that Gov. Romney has agreed to speak to House conservatives and is looking forward to welcoming some of the best minds in the conservative movement to meet with Republican Study Committee members," said Brad Dayspring. Hensarling has not yet endorsed any presidential candidate.

Romney's appearance at the RSC event comes as his opponents are working to highlight his own ideological history, which includes a conversion from moderate to more hard-core conservative stances on several key social issues. There also is unease among conservative Christians with Romney's Mormonism.

"Gov. Romney can go meet with House conservatives and pretend to be one of them but it's important to remember that John McCain served in the U.S. House as a real conservative," said one GOP official close to the McCain campaign.

Romney spokesman Kevin Madden said that the former governor has a lot in common with RSC members when it comes to both their "political and policy philosophy" and that he looks forward to talking with them about issues such as spending priorities, national security and global terrorism.

McCain does have vocal supporters within the RSC. Former RSC Chairman John Shadegg (Ariz.) and Rep. Jeff Flake (Ariz.) are both behind their Arizona colleague. Rep. Spencer Bachus (Ala.), an RSC member, signed onto McCain's campaign as southeast co-chairman last week.

Mike Huckabee Launches Presidential Bid (AP)

AP, January 29, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123174

Conservative Republican Mike Huckabee, seeking to repeat the success of another former governor from Hope, Ark., said Sunday he is taking the first step in what he acknowledged is an underdog bid for the White House in 2008.

"I think this is an opportunity to show the American dream is still alive and there's hope and optimism that can be awakened in a lot of people's lives if they think that a person like me can run and actually become president," Huckabee told The Associated Press

The 51-year-old Huckabee, who took over as governor at the height of Bill Clinton's Whitewater scandal, comes from the same small town — Hope — in the same rural state as the former Democratic president.

Huckabee, who left office Jan. 9 after serving 10 1/2 years as governor of a Democratic-leaning state, faces steep odds in a crowded GOP field that includes well-known and well-funded hopefuls such as Sen. John McCain of Arizona, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani.

"One of the reasons that I'm running for president is because I think that America needs folks who understand what it is to start at the bottom of the ladder and climb their way to the top," Huckabee said in a broadcast interview. "We've got a lot of people who are born on third base and think they've hit a triple.

"America loves an underdog. America loves people who have had to struggle and for whom every rung of the ladder has been sometimes three rungs up and two back down, Thank God for the one you've gained, and keep climbing," Huckabee said.

He planned to travel to Iowa, an early nominating state, on Tuesday and Wednesday.

Huckabee is setting up an exploratory committee that will allow him to raise money and hire campaign staff in an effort to gauge his prospects.

Huckabee is a staunch opponent of abortion rights and gay marriage, but faces a tough fight from other conservatives in the field for support from the GOP's right flank. This is an important voting bloc in the nominating contests.

Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback, a favorite son of the religious right, is already in the race. Other conservatives, such as California Rep. Duncan Hunter and Colorado Rep. Tom Tancredo, will battle for their share of the vote.

While Arkansas is a predominantly Democratic state, Huckabee won two full terms in landslides. He championed tax increases for public schools, expanded state insurance programs for the children of the working poor and opposed banning state services for illegal immigrants.

Nationally, Huckabee is perhaps best known for his dramatic weight loss and his emphasis on healthy lifestyles. He shed 110 pounds after being diagnosed with diabetes. He also saw his political profile rise when he headed the National Governors Association for one term.

Since he left office, Huckabee has been on a nationwide tour to tout his book, "From Hope to Higher Ground: 12 Stops to Restoring America's Greatness." With chapters on taxes and foreign policy, Huckabee's book lays out his potential talking points for a presidential campaign.

Huckabee appeared on "Meet the Press" on NBC.

Former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee Joins Race For White House (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, January 29, 2007

WASHINGTON — Former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee, the latest contestant for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination, casts himself as a pragmatic outsider with executive experience and credibility with evangelical Christians.

Huckabee said Sunday that he is forming an exploratory committee, which allows him to raise money for the race. On Tuesday, he starts a two-day visit to Iowa, which kicks off the primary season with caucuses in less than a year.

"One of the reasons I'm running for president is because America needs folks who understand what it is to start at the bottom of the ladder and climb their way to the top," Huckabee said Sunday on NBC's Meet the Press. The Arkansas native said he was the first male in his family to graduate from high school.

"America loves an underdog," Huckabee said. "America loves people who had to struggle and for whom every rung of the ladder has been sometimes three rungs up and two back down.

Other Republicans who are raising money for presidential campaigns or declared their candidacy include Sens. John McCain of Arizona and Sam Brownback of Kansas, former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani, Reps. Duncan Hunter of California and Tom Tancredo of Colorado, and former governors Mitt Romney of Massachusetts and Jim Gilmore of Virginia.

"I don't think that having a Washington address and being in Congress will be an asset," Huckabee told reporters earlier this month at a lunch near the Capitol.

Huckabee, a former Baptist minister, was born in Hope, the same town as Bill Clinton. He took office in 1996 after then-governor Jim Guy Tucker was convicted of fraud and conspiracy in a case arising from the Whitewater investigation. Since then Huckabee, 51, has lost 110 pounds and written a book about it.

DOJ_NMG_0123175

A onetime president of the Arkansas Southern Baptist Convention, Huckabee said at the lunch that he is "unquestionably solid" on issues that matter to religious conservatives, such as opposition to gay marriage and abortion. Beyond that, he said his accomplishments "on issues that matter to everybody," such as health care and education, will give him broad appeal.

Huckabee said he is an atypical Republican, citing his "passion for music and art education" (he led a drive to make it mandatory in Arkansas) and his expansion of health coverage for children. "Some of us Republicans actually like kids."

Huckabee's tenure as governor was marked by several ethics controversies. The state ethics commission cited him five times for violations involving unreported gifts and cash. As he left office he took heat for wedding-gift registries at two stores. He said they were set up by his wife's friends and were meant to provide housewarming gifts for the couple's new home.

Republicans already are competing for religious conservatives, a pillar of the GOP coalition. Brownback, who is Catholic, has led efforts in Congress to restrict abortion and stem-cell research and to ban gay marriage. McCain and Romney also are reaching out.

"It's who I am," Huckabee said. "I don't have to prove that to anybody."

Contributing: Fredreka Schouten, USA TODAY

Rebel Chuck Hagel: A President In The Making? (NSWK)

By Jonathan Darman

Newsweek, January 29, 2007

Chuck Hagel wears pain on his face. The senior senator from Nebraska earned two Purple Hearts in Vietnam, where a mine blew out his eardrums and delivered a sharp burn up the left side of his head. When he is thinking hard, his brow droops low, weighted and weary; when he smiles, his eyes slip into thin slits. His brother Tom calls this Hagel's "running gear"—the thick mask of intensity he shows the world.

That intensity was on display last Wednesday as he sat and stewed at a hearing of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The panel was considering a resolution condemning President Bush's proposal to send 21,000 additional troops to Iraq; Hagel, a cosponsor of the resolution, would be the only Republican on the committee to vote for its passage. As he listened to his colleagues make their cases for and against the president's plan, Hagel told NEWSWEEK he noticed something missing: an acknowledgment that the Senate was talking about committing real troops, the men and women whose "fighting and dying" make a war. He had no prepared text but the words came easily as he took his turn at the mike. Calling Iraq the country's most divisive issue since Vietnam, he dared his fellow committee members to take a stand. "I think all 100 senators ought to be on the line on this," he said. "If you wanted a safe job, go sell shoes." For a moment, his colleagues were silent and stunned. Later that afternoon, Joe Biden, the committee's Democratic chairman, complimented him on his performance. "I've rarely seen such a powerful connection between the heart and the mind," Biden said. "That was deep in you."

Viewed from afar, the stuff inside Hagel looks like the stuff that makes Republican presidential candidates. He is a third-generation party member who grew up idolizing Teddy Roosevelt and Dwight Eisenhower. He says he was the only student in his Roman Catholic high school to support Richard Nixon over John F. Kennedy in the 1960 presidential election—and when he cast his first vote, an absentee ballot from Vietnam, it was for Nixon's winning ticket in 1968. His conservative credentials are impeccable: according to Congressional Quarterly, he voted with the White House more times in 2006 than any other senator. He is manly, Middle American—and when he talks about military matters, he exudes the cool confidence of a warrior-statesman who knows that war is hell.

But Hagel, who as of late last week was in the final stages of weighing a presidential run, is never mentioned in the top tier of Republican candidates for one, simple reason: since the initial buildup to the war in Iraq, he has assailed the Bush administration's policy—in sharp words, in constant refrain and, most unforgivably, in public. His outburst last week was the culmination of a four-year campaign to raise public outrage about a war he's always considered disastrous. His stance has earned him the enmity of the White House. Asked about Hagel last week in an interview with NEWSWEEK, Vice President Dick Cheney said: "I believe firmly in Ronald Reagan's 11th Commandment: THOU SHALT NOT SPEAK ILL OF A FELLOW REPUBLICAN. But it's very hard sometimes to adhere to that where Chuck Hagel is involved."

Cheney, however, doesn't necessarily speak for his party. In the latest NEWSWEEK Poll, only 30 percent of voters approve of Bush's performance as president. Even 31 percent of Republicans think Congress has not done enough to challenge the administration on the war. After the disastrous 2006 midterm elections, Republicans are no longer taking their talking points on Iraq from the White House—several members of Hagel's caucus have suggested they'd support a resolution criticizing the surge when it comes before the Senate this week. Meanwhile, the three leading contenders for the Republican nomination, John McCain, Mitt Romney and Rudy Giuliani, are all vulnerable on the war—all three are in the minority of Americans who support the president's plan. Hagel may be the one Republican who can fully separate the party from the troubled legacy of George W. Bush as the GOP looks to 2008.

DOJ_NMG_0123176

The tale of Hagel's reluctant rebellion is the story of a man haunted by wars then and now—and of a party at a crossroads, weighing Hagel's past transgressions of disloyalty against the simple necessities of survival. Chuck Hagel has a lifetime of lessons in loyalty and war. His father, Charlie, flew raids for the Army Air Corps over the islands of the South Pacific during World War II. Born in 1946, Chuck was the eldest of four boys and grew up fascinated by the great conflict his father had fought in. In his childhood, his family moved through a series of Midwestern towns, but his father would always serve as commander of the local VFW. His mother and father taught their boys that loyalty to country was paramount and that every generation had its war. "It was as religious as going to church," Hagel tells NEWSWEEK.

Charlie Hagel never talked much about his war. A member of the fabled Greatest Generation, he thought it unseemly to brag about his exploits on the battlefield. But there was something darker enforcing the silence, memories that gave him nightmares and caused him to drink too much. "If they'd had the resources available back then," says Hagel's brother Tom, "he would have been diagnosed with posttraumatic stress disorder. I don't know what happened to him over there." Charlie never got a chance to tell his sons; he died of a heart attack when Chuck was just 16. For decades, all his boys would really know of his time at war was what they could find in a musty attic, the things Charlie had carried back: a handmade machete, a grass hula skirt, black-and-white photos of Japanese Zero fighters hurtling across the Pacific sky.

Two Hagel brothers would soon learn the lessons of the battlefield firsthand. Chuck and Tom were both sent to Vietnam where by some oversight (neither brother can explain it) they managed to defy Army regulations and fight in the same unit. In time, each brother would get a chance to save the other's life. In rare moments of reflection, the brothers spoke of their father, wondering how their experiences matched up with his. "Southeast Pacific. Jungles. Fighting the Asians," Chuck says. "We often talked about that." Mostly, though, the brothers focused on fighting—and staying alive. It was 1968, America's bloodiest year in the war, and on the ground the brothers were hardened by a grisly conflict they tried not to think of as futile. "You see it today in Iraq," says Tom. "We go in, kill all these insurgents, lose all those people. Then we leave town and they just move back in. Same damn thing we did every day over there."

Their tours up, the Hagel boys returned home, Vietnam still swirling in their heads. Tom quickly turned against the war, convinced he had toiled gruesomely for a mistake. Chuck, stubbornly patriotic, couldn't abide this talk; he and Tom quarreled constantly, sometimes coming to blows. But Hagel harbored his own silent doubts. He spent the '70s devouring histories of American involvement in Southeast Asia, eventually (and privately) concluding that Congress's failure to ask tough questions about the conflict in Vietnam amounted to gross negligence. He recalls making a vow to himself: "If America were to go to war again and I was in a position to influence things, I would do everything I could to understand the reality and not allow another Vietnam to occur."

Hagel got his chance to extend some influence when he won election to the Senate in 1996. He was an enthusiastic partisan, leading his state's Republican Party as Nebraska shifted solidly red. But Hagel's party loyalties extend only so far. From the early days of the Bush administration, he was uneasy with the president's apparent zest for war in Iraq and worried that a post-Saddam Iraq could not be stabilized without a broad international coalition. He shared his discomfort in frank, private conversations with administration officials and, as his detractors noted, on more than one Sunday talk show. Hagel makes no apology for his public candor. "The reason we have a very, very thin layer of confidence in leadership by the American public is because we don't answer their questions and we don't play straight," he says. "So when Senator Hagel gets asked the question on a talk show on Sunday morning, 'What do you really think about what we're doing?' I've never pulled my punches." In August 2002, Cheney traveled to the Veterans of Foreign Wars Conference and declared that "Saddam Hussein now has weapons of mass destruction." Shocked, Hagel called up his closest allies in the Bush administration, Secretary of State Colin Powell and his deputy Richard Armitage. "That was a war speech," Hagel told them. His friends assured him that Cheney had gone too far and that war could still be diverted through diplomacy.

Hagel still worried and the war came. When the Senate debated a resolution authorizing the administration to use force to remove Saddam, Hagel took to the Senate floor and spoke in damning, eloquent terms of the folly of the whole affair. He then proceeded to grant the president the authority he needed. It was a painful contortion—one that could hurt him in a presidential contest—perhaps understood only by those who knew Hagel best. "I'm sure in the end it was, 'Damn, he's my president'," Tom says of his brother's vote. "It was, 'I have strong doubts about things, but I can't be disloyal'." Hagel, who now says he regrets his vote, admits a sense of duty played a role. "He's the commander in chief," Hagel says. "We all owe some loyalty, not to the president, but to the office itself."

To many Republicans, Hagel's gesture of obedience wasn't enough. As Iraq quickly deteriorated after Saddam's ouster, Hagel loudly voiced his frustration with the Bush administration—first urging the president to send in more troops, then saying he had no confidence in Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and, in time, concluding there was no purely military solution for Iraq. Conservative bloggers began calling him chief of the Even Republicans—wobblers whose names filled press stories on how "even Republicans" criticized the president, who was still reasonably popular. Reaction was particularly harsh from constituents back home. "It was, 'Senator, you're not as smart as the president'," says Hagel. " 'You're just a Vietnam-vet crybaby'."

DOJ_NMG_0123177

In the midst of the maelstrom, Hagel found an unexpected voice of consolation: his father's. In the fall of 2005, the Hagel brothers received a box from some cousins—it contained letters Charlie had written home during and after World War II. In many ways, the letters provided a tragic portrait of the young airman, coping with the strains of battle by imagining an idyllic postwar world. "That's what they all wanted," Hagel says. "They wanted peace, they wanted stability, and they didn't want any more of what they saw." But in one letter Hagel shared with The Washington Post in 2005, Charlie makes his own reality plain. "If I thought I would ever have a son who would have to go through this," he wrote to his sister Doris in 1944, "I would never get married."

Hagel's own two children, daughter Allyn, 16, and son Ziller, 14, are still too young to worry about war, but they are on his mind. As he nears his decision on running for president—a decision he says will come sometime in "the next couple weeks"—it is the effect on his family, he says, that weighs most heavily. This is, of course, what all politicians say while figuring out if they've actually got a shot. Hagel may have a hard time making his own case. With McCain and Romney running hard, the supply of Republican campaign talent, and cash, dwindles by the minute. For Hagel to succeed in the primaries, he'd have to count on a Republican Party acting decidedly unlike itself—turning to a fresh face and ignoring past indiscretions. "It's a question of taste," says an adviser to one Republican candidate who would not publicly criticize Hagel. "You don't have to love the war to think it's inappropriate when a United States senator constantly berates the president in public."

But Hagel, along with Democratic candidates Barack Obama and John Edwards, is that rare 2008 contender whose position on the war is a potential strength, not a weakness, in a general election campaign. In fact, Tom Cole, the new chairman of the National Republican Campaign Committee, says that while he disagrees with Hagel's war stance, he's urging 2008 congressional candidates to show a similar candor when talking about the war. "I think we've reached that point in the debate," Cole says. "He's being intellectually honest."

Hagel's speech at the Foreign Relations Committee last week earned him new fans on the left, some of whom are hoping he'll run for the White House as an independent—a notion he dismisses as ludicrous. He chafes when it's suggested he could run as an "antiwar candidate," and thinks he's earned the right to define himself. "I've always said you'd better listen to the guys who've had the experience of having to actually carry the rifle," he says, "and see the tragedy of war ... Down in the mud, having to face the fact his buddy's brains are next to him because his head's been shot off." Hagel speaks these words with sadness. He walks the halls of the Senate with a gray melancholy that makes some who know him wonder if he has the fight in him for a long-shot presidential run. But Hagel is an old soldier who has fought without question before. The wound on his face was born in a flash of fire.

With Richard Wolffe and Holly Bailey

Will Pro-War Stances Hurt 2008 GOP Hopefuls? (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, January 29, 2007

Matt Dowd knows more about the politics of war than almost anyone who has worked inside Bush's inner circle. The president's long-time pollster was the chief strategist for the Bush-Cheney campaign three years ago, when he helped frame the conflict in Iraq as a winning issue for his boss. But as Dowd surveys the field of 2008 presidential candidates, he's puzzled. "The American people have decided what they think about the war and are ready to look to the next stage," he says. "What I don't understand is why the big three GOP candidates have all chosen to follow the president's approach rather than offer up their own alternative."

The White House, of course, isn't complaining. At a time when congressional Republicans are turning against the war in growing numbers, the backing of the top 2008 contenders—John McCain, Rudy Giuliani and Mitt Romney—is a godsend. But for the candidates themselves, the strategy of carrying Bush's baggage seems politically reckless. It might help them in the primaries: most of the Republican base still supports the war and President Bush. But as the GOP discovered in November, the base isn't big enough to secure victory in a general election.

Al Gore faced a similar dilemma in 2000, when he ran in the shadow of the scandal-stricken Bill Clinton. Like Gore, the '08 contenders from the GOP need to seem both critical and loyal toward the man still in the Oval Office. It won't be easy. According to the latest NEWSWEEK Poll, 58 percent of voters would like Bush's presidency to be over—including 21 percent of Republicans. Almost two thirds of those surveyed believe Congress has been too timid in challenging Bush on Iraq since the war began.

McCain's longstanding support for the war left him little choice but to back the president's latest surge plan, his aides say. Still, his repeated clashes with Bush give him some distance from the president. "There's a brand identity with McCain that allows him to support Bush when he thinks he must and disagree when he wants to as well," says one of his strategists, who didn't want to be named discussing '08 planning. And it doesn't hurt that McCain, a Vietnam vet who suffered more than five years as a POW, has serious war credentials.

DOJ_NMG_0123178

McCain's rivals are struggling to match his gravitas on issues of war and peace. Giuliani's aides (speaking anonymously about the candidate's thinking) say he consulted with a dozen military and regional experts—some pro-surge, some anti—before supporting Bush's plan. The ex-mayor touts his experience in cleaning up a big city—no matter that Haifa Street is a long way from Times Square.

Last year Romney, then the Massachusetts governor, was happy to criticize Bush's handling of the war. More recently he has tempered his comments. He's been consulting an A-list of advisers, including Henry Kissinger and former generals Barry McCaffrey and Anthony Zinni. Romney's pitch is that he has "competence"—an unsubtle dig at Bush's failings—according toa senior aide who asked to be unnamed while talking strategy. Romney didn't clean up New York City. But he's not shy about how he saved the Salt Lake City Olympics from mismanagement and scandal.

Just one announced candidate has split with the GOP pack. Sam Brownback, the socially conservative Kansas senator, was in Baghdad the day before Bush addressed the nation about his new Iraq policy. What he found was disheartening. Shia leaders blamed everything on the Sunnis, and the Sunnis felt the same about the Shiites. "I think we care more about a peaceful Iraq than they do," he tells NEWSWEEK. Brownback says he opposes Bush's surge, but won't vote with the Democrats on the war. He may be an Iraq-war critic, but he's still hoping to win the GOP nomination.

With Holly Bailey

8 Keys To The Campaign (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi, Perry Bacon Jr, Ana Marie Cox, James Carney

Time, January 26, 2007

IRAQ

HOW THE WAR SCRAMBLES PARTY LINES

The Iraq war has actedÂ like bleach on this year's primary colors: political stripes have faded and dissolved as candidates scramble to explain how they would get America out of Iraq without igniting the Middle East. The most conservative candidate for the G.O.P., Sam Brownback, is closer on Iraq to Democrat Joseph Biden than he is to John McCain. Democrats John Edwards and Hillary Clinton, meanwhile, are worlds apart.

The Republican Party has perhaps the deepest identity crisis over the way forward in Iraq. G.O.P. voters are down on Bush but still largely behind the war, and three leading Republicans--John McCain, Mitt Romney and Rudy Giuliani--would like to change policy but refuse to abandon the mission. All three back Bush's troop increase. McCain has, however, attacked the Administration's handling of the war. Brownback--like fellow Republican and potential candidate Chuck Hagel--supports scaling back the U.S. military mission and appears to be betting that by next winter Republican voters will be looking for an exit strategy.

Most Democratic voters oppose the war and want it ended. But too dovish a position by candidates now could look weak to independents and centrists in the general election. Hillary Clinton backed the war and the mission through last November's election but has since called for capping troop levels. Biden, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, calls for cautious withdrawal and scores points for his proposed political solutions, including direct talks with Iran and Syria. Always antiwar, Barack Obama has taken the party position of cautious withdrawal: a troop drawdown starting in four to six months. John Edwards has come out hard and early to declare his vote authorizing the war was a mistake and to issue the strongest antisurge message among the major Democratic candidates.

No position on either side is particularly safe; they are all gambles on a certain outcome in Iraq. If the situation on the ground stabilizes, the leading Republicans and Clinton will appear steady hands; if it deteriorates, Biden, Brownback and Edwards will look wiser.

MONEY

THE FIRST TEST: WHO CAN RAISE THE MOST CASH

After Barack Obama posted an online video to announce he was running for President and promised a new kind of politics for his campaign, he went straight old-school. He spent much of the rest of his day dialing for dollars, asking wealthy Democrats to support him in his quest to compete with Hillary Clinton's deep pockets. When Clinton got into the race a few days later, the New York Senator made clear she would avoid public financing for her campaign--forgoing a system that matches the first $250 of every individual campaign donation--because she believes she can raise much more than the $50 million limit imposed on candidates who accept matching funds in the primary.

The 2008 presidential campaign may show that race, religion and gender don't matter, but money still talks, and more loudly than ever before. In 2003, John Edwards surprised everyone by raking in $7 million in campaign donations in the first three months of the year. That amount will be like Monopoly money after 2008. Strategists say the two eventual party nominees could well spend up to $500 million each before the general election.

DOJ_NMG_0123179

Whether they get their money by calling, blogging or throwing lavish fund raisers, would-be contenders had better start quickly. Raising even $50 million for the primary this year means coming up with $137,000 a day.

RELIGION

CHASING VOTERS INTO THE PEW

This time around, candidates from both parties are looking for the right tone on religion. On the Republican side, the usual scramble is under way to win over the large Evangelical base, which is still without a top-tier candidate. Many conservative Christian activists admire Sam Brownback for his opposition to embryonic stem-cell research, abortion and gay marriage, even though he is a long shot. Three G.O.P. front runners aren't exactly dream candidates for social conservatives: Mitt Romney faces a challenge in explaining his Mormonism to conservative Christians suspicious of it. Rudy Giuliani supports abortion rights. And in 2000 John McCain called conservative Christian activists like Jerry Falwell "agents of intolerance."

Democratic candidates for 2008 are determined to build credibility with religious swing voters. Barack Obama devoted a chapter to his religion in his newest book and is far more likely to talk about his "personal relationship with Jesus Christ" than McCain, who keeps religious matters largely to himself. In December Obama publicly joined Brownback at an AIDS-awareness convention at Saddleback, the Rev. Rick Warren's evangelical megachurch in Orange County, Calif. On its website the Clinton campaign, in a bio of the New York Senator, describes at length that "faith was central to her family. Her mother taught Sunday school, and Hillary was a regular in her church youth group."

But Democratic activists may have little appetite for overt religiosity, particularly if it impinges on socially liberal issues. Former vice-presidential nominee John Edwards, though he is tacking left in his second White House run, nonetheless had to disappoint a questioner at a New Hampshire town hall who wanted him to support gay marriage. "I am just not there yet," Edwards says.

AMAZON FACTOR

FIRST, WRITE A BEST SELLER

This election cycleÂ may boast the most ever candidates with best sellers: John McCain with Faith of My Fathers, Barack Obama, riding high on the hardcover and paperback lists (The Audacity of Hope and Dreams from My Father) and Hillary Clinton, whose Living History sold more than 1.2 million hardbacks. The most memorable title belongs to former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee, who wrote Quit Digging Your Grave with a Knife and Fork after losing 100 lbs. If he's not elected President, he could at least make it into Oprah's Book Club.

LAST-MINUTE CAMPAIGNS

THE WAIT-AND-SEE PRIMARY

Despite the rash of newÂ candidates announcing their bid this month, some heavyweights are holding out, either for tactical reasons or out of indecision, and could shake things up with a late entry into the race. The biggest could-be contenders are former Vice President Al Gore and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich. Gore denies that he plans to run, but his hit film, An Inconvenient Truth, and his strong stands on climate change and the war in Iraq have rehabilitated him with Democratic activists.

Gingrich has energized some on the right with his calls for a conservative revival in the Republican Party. If Mitt Romney's attempt to woo the party base fails, Gingrich, who's already polling in third place, could capitalize. Some dream of a run by George W. Bush's brother, former Florida Governor Jeb Bush, or Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, although the President's low approval ratings and the lack of progress in Iraq could dim their prospects. But with 21 months before the election for the announced candidates to pummel one another, voters may tire of the whole bunch, leaving the door open for a fresh bid by a familiar face.

OPERATIVES

RECRUITING THE NEW GURUS

The hunt is onÂ for theÂ next Karl Rove, the political consultant with the strategic acumen and message magic to steer a candidate all the way from Iowa to the Oval Office.

The biggest names in the race, Clinton and McCain, have the early talent advantage. The former boasts Hillaryland--a cadre of loyal, long-serving pros--with the addition of a few carefully selected people from her husband's operation. McCain retains his inner circle from 2000 and has scooped up a slew of Bush veterans, even though some aided in the trashing of McCain in the infamous South Carolina 2000 primary. "We're in the business of making friends now," explains one of the Arizona Senator's old hands.

DOJ_NMG_0123180

Hillary Clinton, of course, has the top political consultant who is not on the payroll: her husband. And then there's Rove. Bush's political guru coyly refuses to say whether he plans to advise a Republican in the 2008 race. If he does and his man wins, the next Karl Rove could be ... Karl Rove.

THE BLOGOSPHERE

WINNING OVER THE ONLINE ACTIVISTS

While the past fewÂ elections have seen candidates try out newfangled blogging technology with all the comfort and skill of a granddad on a skateboard, the 2008 candidates are doing everyone a favor by not trying to be bloggers.

"Bloggers put much more of a premium on understanding the medium rather than joining in," says Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Mitt Romney. Romney's strategy is to participate in podcasts and talk regularly with top conservative bloggers, an approach that has made him the top vote getter in Republican blogger straw polls, though he lags in national telephone ones.

Hillary Clinton, a real-world front runner, dwells in the low one figures in blogger surveys, but she has hired former Kerry hand Peter Daou to burnish her Web image. Daou says bloggers need to be wooed like any other reporters--or voters, for that matter. "It's very old school," he says. "I just reach out to them one by one." Employing bloggers instead of just courting them is a tricky next step, though. McCain was chastised last year when a blogger posted attacks on Romney without disclosing up front that he was on McCain's payroll.

NEW FACES

HOW CAN YOU TELL A BROWNBACK FROM A VILSACK?

Only a few candidates are famous. The rest are known mostly in their universes--the Senate or Arkansas, say--or as perennial protest candidates. Here's a primer on the faces you might not recognize in the crowd.

SAM BROWNBACK

A standard-bearer of the social right--with a twist. He speaks out against poverty, the genocide in Darfur and the war in Iraq

MIKE HUCKABEE

The socially conservative ex-Governor of Arkansas lost more than 100 lbs. while in office. His story of fitness redemption may resonate with voters

DUNCAN HUNTER

A boutique candidate for lovers of military hardware and a pro-Bush foreign policy, the Congressman (R.-Calif.) has ties to bribe-taking Duke Cunningham

TOM TANCREDO

The Colorado Rep's big issue, border control, inspires base G.O.P. voters. He has sponsored legislation punishing Sudan for its war in Darfur

TOMMY THOMPSON

The former Wisconsin G.O.P. Governor made a name in welfare reform in the '90s. He's pushing a plan to split Iraq into three separate states

DENNIS KUCINICH

Yes, it still rhymes with "spinach." His antiwar stance, looking better now than in '04, has drawn backers among House colleagues in both parties

CHRISTOPHER DODD

The affable Democrat is popular in the Senate. Fluent in Spanish, he's an expert on Latin America and is strong on children's issues

TOM VILSACK

Inexperienced in foreign affairs, he's a likable self-made man. His hopes ride on his record as Iowa's Governor and a champion of ethanol fuel

Alter: New Hampshire Before New Year's? (NSWK)

By Jonathan Alter

Newsweek, January 29, 2007

I saw Mayor Richard Daley of Chicago last week, and he used a political term from the past: "Favorite son." Until the '60s, local party leaders would often keep their powder dry before a nominating convention by pledging their delegates to a senator or governor from their state. Occasionally, one of these favorite sons—like Illinois Gov. Adlai Stevenson in 1952—would win the nomination; more often, their delegates became bargaining chips. Daley was explaining why he's backing Barack Obama. Illinois officials are rallying behind him, just as New York has united around Hillary Clinton.

DOJ_NMG_0123181

Could this be an omen? A convention instead of a coronation has been the dream of political reporters for a generation. It's still highly unlikely. But no incumbents are running in either party, and the new, yet-to-be-determined primary schedule scrambles old assumptions.

Anyone who claims they know how this will go is blowing smoke. Polls don't help much. A Clinton adviser, who didn't want to be named speculating, told me he thought Hillary might fall behind Obama—then rally as a compelling underdog. An adviser to John McCain, unnamed for the same reason, is worried about Sam Brownback (currently at 1 percent in the polls). There's widespread concern that the front-loading of primaries—meant to help parties settle on a nominee quickly—may backfire. "You can make the case that it will mean an earlier nominee—or a later nominee," says Howard Wolfson, Hillary's spokesman. "The law of unintended consequences means that what we think we know, we don't know."

All we know for sure is that New Hampshire is determined to maintain its tradition of holding the first-in-the-nation primary, even if it means voting this Christmas, and that Iowa and Nevada will hold their caucuses before New Hampshire votes. (Thanksgiving, anyone?) Most likely, all three, plus South Carolina, will hold their contests in January.

Big-state governors like Arnold Schwarzenegger in California and Jon Corzine in New Jersey are trying to move their primaries from late spring all the way up to Feb. 5, with Illinois and Florida expected to join them. With the old tradition of winner-take-all primaries gone, the parties could face a situation where the vast majority of delegates are chosen by late March, but no candidate has it sewn up. Then the real fun would begin.

The conventional view is that the schedule will favor candidates who can spend in big media markets. Under this theory, should front runners get upset in Iowa or New Hampshire (a strong possibility, if history is any guide), they have a firewall. But don't ignore the power of momentum and technology.

Presidential politics features what George H.W. Bush in 1980 called "Big Mo." If the time period after an early primary win is short enough, momentum can often propel a candidate to victory in states where he has nothing else going. I remember landing in Atlanta with Gary Hart in 1984, a few days after he shocked Walter Mondale in New Hampshire. A Hart staffer met the plane and I asked him how big an operation they had in Georgia. "You're looking at it," he said. Hart nearly took Georgia anyway, and he won Ohio, Florida, California and other states on a shoestring. Had the 1984 primary calendar been as front-loaded as 2008, Hart would almost certainly have been the nominee, though he had much less money and official support than Mondale.

The same thing goes for McCain in 2000. He thrashed George W. Bush in New Hampshire and seemed headed for the nomination. But 18 long days lay between New Hampshire and South Carolina, enough time for Bush to claw (and slime) his way back. McCainiacs were marveling last week over how few days will elapse between early contests in '08. They think this favors them. But should Brownback (from nearby Kansas), or Mike Huckabee (a former minister) resonate with Iowa's religious GOP caucusgoers, McCain could be in trouble there. Throw in a win for former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney in next-door New Hampshire and McCain may have only a week to turn things around and get on the scoreboard in South Carolina.

Another '08 wild card: the Web. Long-shot Howard Dean raised $45 million in '04 by striking a chord. Imagine what could happen if a second-tier candidate with a first-rate message won a key primary. You'd hear the sound of his servers crashing, but, soon enough, ka-ching! Technology has a way of breaking down hierarchies. Like a revamped primary schedule, it could bust apart the old system of selecting presidents. But, hey, who knows?

23-Month Campaign (NYT)

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

In the old days, presidential races were one-year events. John F. Kennedy announced his candidacy on Jan. 2, 1960, and was elected that November. Earlier this month, would-be candidates who were still deciding whether to run in 2008 were being accused of reckless delay. Presidential campaign pundits were saying that if Senator Hillary Clinton had waited another minute to announce, Senator Barack Obama would have locked up every New Hampshire county committee member and hedge fund billionaire.

This really is an election on hyperspeed.

Part of this is due to the peculiarities of the race. President Bush is so unpopular that a power vacuum is opening up in Washington and, for the first time in many election cycles, both parties' nominations are wide open. The Internet is also fueling the overdrive, with "netroots primaries," in which the voting has already begun.

The biggest factors, though, are money and an ever-compressed schedule. California, Illinois, Florida and New Jersey are all maneuvering to move up their primaries to next February. That has candidates rushing to lock up the big donors — and bypassing the public finance system. Senator Clinton has already made clear that she will be opting out for both the primary and the general election. Senator John McCain, a major supporter of campaign finance reform who is no longer sponsoring a big reform bill that once bore his name, seems likely to do the same, with many candidates to follow. The problem with the 23-month campaign is not just the fatigue it will inspire, but the effect on democracy. Bundlers — master fund-raisers who package individual contributions into big ones — will have even more power. There is no way to stop candidates from hurling their hats into the ring so early. But there are things that can, and should, be done.

DOJ_NMG_0123182

The national parties should stop the states' mad race to have first-in-the-nation primaries. They should adopt a schedule that reformers have been proposing for years: regional primaries that rotate, so that voters in every state eventually have a turn to be among the first to vote. Congress should fix the broken public financing system, which has not been significantly updated since it was adopted in 1974. Spending limits need to be raised, to keep pace with ever-rising costs. More money needs to be put in the fund, and there should be more flexibility to help candidates who accept public financing compete against big-money candidates who opt out.

If Hillary vs. Obama vs. Rudy vs. McCain is already starting to feel old, remember that there are more than 600 days to go. We will never return to the time when presidential campaigns unfolded handshake by handshake in New Hampshire — and we shouldn't — but Congress and the national parties can set a more thoughtful 21st-century pace.

GOP Leaders Fear Departures (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, January 29, 2007

Hoping to minimize their vulnerability in the upcoming election cycle, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and National Republican Senatorial Committee Chairman John Ensign (Nev.) are privately making the rounds to urge GOP colleagues to run again in 2008 — and backing the request with promises of strong support from the party.

McConnell and Ensign, charged with re-electing GOP Senators as well as winning back the majority this cycle, have been meeting over the past several weeks with GOP Senators facing re-election, according to Republican Senators and aides.

Twenty-one Republican-held seats are up in 2008, nearly twice the number of Democratic seats that will be on the ballot. One Republican — Sen. Wayne Allard (Colo.) — already has announced he will not run again next year.

Don Stewart, McConnell's spokesman, said the Minority Leader wants to do what is necessary to keep his colleagues in the Senate.

The class of Senators up in two years is critical to the strength of the GOP, Stewart said, noting that it represents both a cast of experienced veterans and a large bloc of up-and-comers first elected in 2002.

"This is a very effective group of Members that he'd like to see stay in the Senate," Stewart said. "This is a big, strong group."

Senators and aides privy to the closed-door conversations said McConnell and Ensign are making a strong and early sell to encourage their incumbents to seek another term. They also have vowed to provide incumbents with the resources necessary to mount a successful campaign, especially in competitive states where Democrats are likely to invest heavily, Republican sources said.

"I just met with Sen. McConnell and Sen. Ensign to discuss my re-election plans," Sen. Lamar Alexander (Tenn.) said last week. "I am sure he'll be having 20 more of those meetings."

Alexander is weighing a run for a second term in the Senate, a move McConnell hoped to influence when he handed the Tennessee Republican a coveted slot on the Appropriations Committee earlier this year.

Alexander said he will make his decision in the "next couple of weeks," but he acknowledged that McConnell "gave me a reason" to want to continue to serve in the chamber.

Sen. Norm Coleman (R-Minn.), who could face a tough re-election, said he also has met with the pair, saying they have pledged "to do what has to be done" to help him win. Coleman said the conversations were less about ensuring he runs and more about offering support, since Coleman said "it wasn't much of a sell for me" because he is aggressively seeking a second term.

"They said they are ready, willing and able to help," Coleman said.

McConnell and Ensign have moved quickly to get the Republican political operation in place. Since Ensign took over as chairman of the NRSC in January, he has devised a comprehensive strategy to help Republicans recapture the majority this cycle.

The Nevada Republican is expanding donor pools, targeting new contributors and asking his fellow Senators to raise and give millions more to the campaign committee.

A senior GOP aide said Senate leaders initiated the meetings with the 2008 incumbents late last year, adding that McConnell didn't want to waste any time looking ahead to what's expected to be another competitive election cycle.

"He's not a procrastinator," the aide said. "His [modus operandi] is to set out and have a roadmap and make it happen."

Another GOP aide added the meetings "are not a secret" and are "about touching base" with the incumbent Senators. "We are all in this together," said the aide. "The leader is laser focused" on winning back the majority.

DOJ_NMG_0123183

So far, none of the 11 Senate Democrats up in 2008 have announced plans to retire, while Allard is the lone Republican so far to opt against trying for another six-year term.

Republicans already are bracing for a bitter battle with the Democrats over Allard's seat, given the Democrats' recent political inroads in Colorado.

Neither party is taking their incumbents for granted. Republicans, in particular, are mindful of their Members stepping down, given they must hold onto all of their current seats and capture two more to retake control of the chamber in two years.

Sources indicated that Senate GOP leaders are only seriously concerned about a handful of seats, including those held by Coleman and Sens. Susan Collins (Maine), Gordon Smith (Ore.) and John Sununu (N.H.).

GOP leaders are keeping an eye on Senators who may opt to retire at the end of the Congress, such as Alexander and Sens. Thad Cochran (Miss.), John Warner (Va.), Elizabeth Dole (N.C.), Pete Domenici (N.M.) and Ted Stevens (Alaska).

Dole, Domenici and Stevens all have said they plan to run again.

"My decision is to run for the Senate," Domenici said last week. "You know that."

Others are less definite. Warner, who is up for a sixth term in 2008 and is extremely popular in his home state, said last week he has gotten the sell from McConnell and Ensign but is taking his time talking to his constituents before he makes a final decision.

"I have met with them previously, and told them that I lean in that direction [of running]," Warner said last week. "I want to take some time and meet with people and get the opinions of my state. I like to have consultation."

But Warner was quick to note: "I have high confidence in them as a team and their willingness to help those of us who are up in '08."

Cochran In No Hurry To Decide On '08 Race (RC)

By David M. Drucker

Roll Call, January 29, 2007

Sen. Thad Cochran (R-Miss.), under pressure from Senate Republican leaders to decide whether he'll run for re-election in 2008, is stepping up his fundraising activity and said Friday through a spokeswoman that he is leaning toward seeking a sixth term.

Cochran spokeswoman Margaret Wicker said the Senator does not plan to make a formal decision until late this year or early 2008, but she indicated that the 69-year-old Mississippian is inclined to not disappoint his supporters who are encouraging him to run again.

"He's leaning toward running," Wicker said.

About six Republican Senators have left the door open to retiring next year. But those six are part of a larger group of 19 out of the 21 GOP Senators up for re-election in 2008 who have indicated to the National Republican Senatorial Committee that they plan to stick around. Of the two who haven't given such assurances, Sen. Wayne Allard (Colo.) recently announced that he'll retire, while Cochran had been relatively noncommittal.

Republicans say Cochran recognizes the bind his conference is in — the GOP is defending 21 seats to the Democrats' 12 in 2008 — and is trying to do everything he can to make sure his seat stays in the GOP column. Cochran would be heavily favored if he runs for re-election, but an open seat could produce a highly competitive contest.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and NRSC Chairman John Ensign (Nev.) have been urging Cochran to inform them of his plans sooner rather than later.

Cochran "definitely understands [leadership's] desire, and respects that," said one Washington, D.C.-based Republican familiar with the situation. "He is being thoughtful already on fundraising."

Mississippi Republican insiders — citing what they describe as a "major" fundraiser Cochran has scheduled on Feb. 20 in Jackson — believe he is inclined to run for re-election, although they profess no direct knowledge of his 2008 plans.

Their read on Cochran is that he approaches big decisions in a slow and methodical fashion and is not prone to arm-twisting from above. This could be why pressure from the leadership within the Senate Republican Conference hasn't caused Cochran to reconsider his timeline for determining whether he'll run for re-election.

"I'm hearing that he's going to do it — that he's going to run again," said one Mississippi Republican.

Should Cochran retire, the person at the top of most Republicans' lists to run to replace him is six-term Rep. Chip Pickering (R). The Congressman was prepared to run in 2006, had Senate Minority Whip Trent Lott (Miss.) chosen to call it a career, and he is seen as eager to do so whenever one of his state's Republican Senators retire.

Also mentioned as possible candidates are Rep. Roger Wicker (R) and Gov. Haley Barbour (R), who is running for re-election this year. Barbour currently professes to have little interest in the Senate, but his name is bandied about as a leading contender should Cochran's seat open up.

DOJ_NMG_0123184

"I certainly hope [Cochran] runs again. He's our senior Senator and one of our great leaders," said Mississippi Republican Party Chairman Jim Herring.

The field of potential Democratic candidates is less clear at the moment, although the an open seat is seen as possibly competitive despite the recent spate of success Republicans have had in the former Democratic stronghold.

One Democratic insider based in Mississippi expects the Senate candidate field to come into view after March 1, the filing deadline for running for statewide and state legislative offices this year. Once the candidates on the 2007 ballot emerge, those who might run in 2008 — whether against Cochran or for an open seat should he retire — will be easier to gauge.

One Democrat who has been mentioned for statewide office repeatedly is former state Attorney General Mike Moore. Moore led the legal fight waged by several states against the tobacco industry, and he helped negotiate a large payout worth millions of dollars to state coffers around the country.

Moore, now a lawyer in private practice near Jackson, did not return a phone message left late last week requesting comment.

Regardless of who ends up as the Democratic nominee, said one Mississippi Democrat, "I do anticipate that the Democrats will field a formidable opponent in 2008." This Democrat added that his party — following a strategy laid out by Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean — plans to compete with the Republicans up and down the ballot in the Magnolia State.

Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee spokeswoman Deirdre Murphy indicated that Democrats don't plan to give Cochran a free pass in 2008, despite the fact that he is well thought of at home and won his 2002 race with 85 percent of the vote.

"Thad Cochran has a long history of putting Washington before Mississippi, and it is going to hurt his Senate re-election bid in 2008," Murphy said.

GOP Getaway Focuses On Return To Roots (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, January 29, 2007

CAMBRIDGE, Md. -- House Republicans spent most of their 48 hours at last week's retreat here examining why they lost the congressional majority and trying to formulate a winning way forward.

"If we continue to work together as a team, we will in fact earn our way back to majority status," Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio said as members gathered at the Hyatt Regency Chesapeake Bay.

The 160 Republicans attending the retreat heard from motivational speakers and peppered President Bush with questions about his Iraq policy during a private session with the commander in chief. Now, leaders say, it's time to prove Republicans understand the message voters sent in the November elections.

"The solution is to bring solutions and be very practical," said Rep. Kay Granger of Texas, the Republican Conference vice chairman. "Let them know we listened and we're making some changes."

Freshman members agree.

"We have to show the American public that we can get things done," said Rep. Mary Fallin of Oklahoma. Voters "want to see Congress work on real solutions to real problems."

Aides noted a higher turnout than in recent years, with only about 40 of the chamber's 202 Republicans skipping the retreat. Several Republicans agreed members left Friday with a "back to basics" mentality focusing on fiscal responsibility and conservative principles in homage to the party's roots.

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich was the lunch speaker Thursday, reminding members that "big ideas work" and saying American voters should understand Republicans want to help them, a vision he used to orchestrate the party's 1994 gains.

Leaders said Mr. Gingrich challenged members to "think outside the box" and reminded them that winning a majority won't be easy.

Republicans, most of whom have never served in the minority, will need to present these ideas as they battle Democrats on policy and procedure and for publicity.

"We're going to intelligently propose good alternatives as we fight. We're not going to try to create total gridlock, which basically shuts things down," said Rep. John Carter of Texas, the Republican Conference secretary. "We're going to have ideas that go with that fight, so that we are clearly showing what makes us Republican."

Former University of Notre Dame football coach Lou Holtz brought members to their feet following an oyster-bar dinner, telling football stories and urging the party to talk about its vision for America.

"It was the boost that we needed coming off a losing election," one member said.

DOJ_NMG_0123185

Rep. Patrick T. McHenry of North Carolina said it felt more like a corporate retreat than one focused on "political nuts and bolts."

"This retreat was about the broad vision that we walk away with, how we want to move the country forward, rather than talking about specifics of legislation," he said.

Republicans also came away from the getaway realizing now that they have identified the reasons for losing, and it is time to stop licking wounds and start convincing the American public why they deserve to be trusted again.

Members agreed they must promise to control wasteful spending and to hold themselves and every member of the party to the "highest standards of ethical conduct," Mr. Boehner said.

The Republican leader said to win, members must do four things: Re-establish credibility, use all of the tools available to the minority, advance new ideas and unite to work toward a common goal.

"The American people basically agree with us," Mr. Boehner said. "We own the moral high ground, our president has the bully pulpit, and we have each other. The ability to work together is there, we need to use those tools that are available to us and find those solutions not forgetting our principles."

The unity part may prove tough as members face public opposition to the war in Iraq and as there is a clear split in the party over immigration. But members said there is common ground on economic and energy policy.

Mr. Bush, speaking Friday, repeated themes of last week's State of the Union address, saying Congress must curb pork spending, balance the budget without raising taxes and reauthorize the No Child Left Behind Act.

"These are big ideas, and it's going to require us working together to get the job done on behalf of the American people," Mr. Bush said.

Leaders agreed the private, one-hour discussion with the president was cathartic, allowing members to gripe, to question and to rally.

"It has a settling effect when people see the strength and courage of his convictions and you get a glimpse into the broader thinking behind his decisions," said Republican Conference Chairman Adam H. Putnam of Florida.

Deputy Whip Eric Cantor of Virginia said a central theme in Mr. Bush's remarks was that Washington hasn't changed him.

As for immigration, "It's an example of where the president is still the same president. He is where he is," Mr. Putnam said.

Most present for the discussion said while the passions over immigration are hot, members are struggling to agree on tough border security before tackling the more-divisive question of what to do with the estimated 12 million to 20 million illegal aliens currently in the United States.

At Retreat, GOP Tries To Regroup (RC)

By Susan Davis

Roll Call, January 29, 2007

CAMBRIDGE, Md. — Twelve years after he helped lead them into the majority following decades in the wilderness, it seemed fitting that ex-Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.) was the keynote speaker for the House Republicans' first retreat back in the minority.

According to Members and aides in attendance, Gingrich told his Republican brethren at the Hyatt Regency Chesapeake Bay on Maryland's Eastern Shore to challenge themselves to redefine and recapture the enthusiasm for the Republican Party.

"He really outlined the hard work it is for new and bold solutions" to emerge, said Rep. Wayne Gilchrest (R-Md.).

House Minority Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio) was more direct. "It was Newt being Newt," Boehner told reporters, promptly shooting down questions as to whether Republicans were seeking to create another document similar to the "Contract with America." "No, no, no," Boehner said.

While Republican leaders and the rank-and-file continue to promote the message of "new ideas," it appears they don't yet know where to start.

One leadership aide said the retreat was helpful in getting the Republican Conference as a whole to understand the reasons why the GOP lost the majority.

Republican pollsters David Winston (a Roll Call contributing writer), Ed Goeas and Neil Newhouse led a session that challenged the belief among many House conservatives that they lost because the base did not turn out.

"After the election, many conservatives were out saying 'We lost the base,' and none of the polling bears that out," the leadership aide said. The pollsters "don't agree on everything, but they do agree on that."

In fact, the trio of pollsters argued, Republicans turned away moderates and independent voters, some of which turned out in higher than expected numbers. For instance, the pollsters said in the 18-30 age demographic, more than 1.5 million additional votes were cast than in the previous midterm elections.

"That's huge," the aide said, adding that the Iraq War was the motivating issue. "It was overwhelmingly an anti-war vote."

DOJ_NMG_0123186

Iraq continues to be the issue looming over the Republican Party right now, as a potentially divisive and damaging vote for the GOP is headed to both the House and Senate floors to put Members on record on President Bush's Iraq War strategy. Democrats believe a significant number of Republicans will vote with them, sending a strong rebuke to the White House.

After the retreat, there were signs of hope from leadership that the party would be more united behind the Bush administration than anticipated. The president spent more than two hours behind closed doors with the approximately 160 Members in attendance and made a passionate case to commit to success in Iraq, according to Members and aides who were there.

No Member publicly challenged Bush on his war strategy at the session, where he fielded questions from approximately 15 lawmakers. "He seemed angry and determined," said one source. "But the anger was effective, I think, in getting Members to see how committed he is."

While in years past the retreat was largely centered on the legislative agenda, this year was focused more on message, strategy, politics and unity.

"It's not about policy anymore for us, it's about making [Democrats] take the tough votes and being focused in our politics," said another aide.

House Minority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.) and Chief Deputy Minority Whip Eric Cantor (Va.) made a presentation where they outlined their tactical strategy to make votes as difficult as possible for Democrats.

Blunt and Cantor are monitoring the voting records of the 61 Democrats representing Bush districts. "We're keeping track of how all of these Democrats vote," said another aide, noting that those districts will be the starting point for potentially competitive races in the 2008 cycle.

It also was the first major Conference event for the new leadership team, and Boehner said they would work "as a single unit."

"This retreat is about the future," he said.

Former Speaker Dennis Hastert (Ill.), former National Republican Congressional Committee Chairman Tom Reynolds (N.Y.) and former Republican Conference Vice Chairman Rep. Jack Kingston (Ga.) did not attend.

Are Democrats Surging Out West? Numbers Say No (RC)

By Stuart Rothenberg

Roll Call, January 29, 2007

More than a few journalists and political pontificators have noted recent Democratic gains in the Mountain West, which includes Wyoming, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Utah, Colorado, Arizona and New Mexico. Some see those gains in 2004 and 2006 as shattering a reliable Republican region, while others argue recent wins are only the beginning of a Democratic rally that will continue in 2008 and beyond.

After one of the best newspapers on the planet screamed "West Is Going Democrats' Direction" and "Political Shift in Mountain States" in headlines, I figured I'd look at the numbers myself to see how much of an opportunity Democrats have to turn the Mountain West blue, or at least purple.

After dissecting the historical data over the past 25 years and comparing it to election results from the past few cycles, it's very clear that not much is going on. I'm certainly not ruling out changes in 2008 or 2010, and I'm not saying that there have been no changes. But so far, the hype about a shift has overwhelmed the reality.

First, a bit of history. Democratic candidates have done pretty well in the Mountain West in the past couple of election cycles, but that's nothing new. Democrats have had significant successes in the region for many years, so portraying recent results as some sort of breakthrough is flat-out wrong.

Election returns since 1980 show that the Mountain West is really two or even three regions, not one. Utah, Wyoming and Idaho are reliably Republican in most cases, while New Mexico and Nevada are politically competitive. Arizona and Colorado definitely lean Republican in presidential politics but are much more competitive in other respects.

Former President Bill Clinton carried four Mountain States — Colorado, Montana, Nevada and New Mexico — in his 1992 election victory over then-President George H.W. Bush, and he won three states four years later: Arizona, Nevada and New Mexico. It's true that in the two elections since Clinton, Democratic presidential candidates have carried only a single state, New Mexico (very narrowly, in 2000), but that's more a statement about the party and its nominees than about the region's inherent competitiveness.

New Mexico and Nevada definitely are competitive in presidential contests, but only Idaho, Utah and Wyoming are beyond the Democrats' reach in those elections.

DOJ_NMG_0123187

Much of the hype about Democrats in the Mountain West stems from the party's victories in gubernatorial races. Democrats retained three governorships last year and added a new one (in Colorado). Democratic governors now sit in Montana, New Mexico, Colorado, Arizona and Wyoming — five of the region's eight states.

But that's nothing new in the region. I went back to 1980 and found that Democrats won five of the past seven gubernatorial elections in Colorado and Wyoming (yes, that's right, Wyoming), four of the past seven in both New Mexico and Nevada and three of the past seven in Montana and Arizona.

In attempting to drive home the point of a realignment, one journalist noted, "In 2000, all eight mountain states had Republican governors; now five governors are Democrats." But why use 2000 as the baseline? In 1984, seven of the eight states had Democratic governors. Using 1984 as the baseline, you could even say the region is moving toward the GOP!

Anyway, if gubernatorial results reflected fundamental partisan strength and the potential of carrying the state in 2008, then Wyoming would seem to be a reliably Democratic state in 2008. Obviously, it isn't.

How about Senate races? Democrats won a Senate race in Montana, as well as holding onto a seat in New Mexico. But again, winning Senate races in the region is nothing new for Democrats.

In three of the eight Mountain West states, Democrats have won a majority of all Senate elections since 1980. That's right, a majority. They've won six of nine in Montana, six of 10 in Nevada and five of nine in New Mexico. In Colorado, they have won a considerable four of the past nine. Even Arizona has elected Democrats to the Senate in two of the past nine elections.

Forget about that history. If you think Democrats' ability to knock off a politically damaged Republican in the worst Republican environment in 30 years tells you something about a state's or region's political trend, you are free to. Of course, you would be terribly wrong.

But what about Congress? Didn't Democrats make gains in the House in the Mountain West? Sure, but what kind of gains?

Democrats netted three House seats in November, one in Colorado and two in Arizona. The Colorado district was drawn to be politically competitive, but it was also referred to as the "Perlmutter district," after the Democratic legislator who was expected to run — and win — in 2002. Ed Perlmutter passed then, but he won the open seat last year.

One of the Arizona districts already was competitive, but became hard for the GOP when an anti-immigration bomb-thrower won the party's primary. In other words, if you focus only on the numbers, you will miss the story.

How about state legislatures in the region? Democrats made small gains in the Idaho, Colorado and Arizona state Houses. No chambers in the region switched control, however, except the Montana House, which went from a 50-50 tie to a one-seat GOP majority. Again, if there was a Democratic surge in 2006, you'll have to look under the rug to find it.

There were, of course, some Democratic gains in 2006. Much of the hype, I suspect, came from stronger than usual (though unsuccessful) Democratic efforts in House races in Idaho, Colorado, Nevada and Wyoming, as well as a lot of buzz about the Idaho gubernatorial race. But those showings occurred in a landslide year for Democrats, making the results more likely to be an aberration rather than a trend.

The Mountain West is not the South. It's less reliable than Dixie for Republicans, and it's less conservative on social/religious issues. Moreover, Democrats have had considerable success in the region over the past three decades, and the party's nominee could carry a few Mountain West states in the '08 presidential race, particularly if there is a nationwide trend toward their party. But the evidence strongly demonstrates that there has been no Democratic surge in the region, even if the hyperbole makes for a better news story.

Stuart Rothenberg is editor of the Rothenberg Political Report.

Kan. Governor Draws National Attention (AP)

By John Hanna, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 29, 2007

Most of the Kansans who've made a mark on national politics have been Republicans, like Dwight Eisenhower and Bob Dole. Another, Sen. Sam Brownback, is running for president.

But now a Kansas Democrat, Gov. Kathleen Sebelius, is generating some buzz with her 58 percent re-election margin, glowing write-ups in national magazines and political chatter about her place on short lists for Cabinet posts should Democrats recapture the White House next year.

Sebelius, who's made her fortune in Kansas politics by winning over moderate Republicans, has even popped up in speculation about potential vice presidential nominees. And this year, she's chairwoman of the Democratic Governors' Association.

"It's hard to imagine that her name's not going to appear on everybody's list," said Mark Mellman, a Democratic pollster in Washington. "You've got to say Kathleen Sebelius is in demand as a role model, as a political figure, as a governor."

DOJ_NMG_0123188

The 58-year-old governor is a self-described "aging rocker" who squeezed a ride in an Indy race car and a Rolling Stones concert into the same day last year. She runs nearly 15 miles a week and regularly attends college football and basketball games.

Her wit occasionally gets her into trouble, as during a 2002 gubernatorial debate when she said driving roads in neighboring Missouri was "much more terrifying to me than the attacks on the World Trade Center."

Her father, John Gilligan, a Democrat, was governor of Ohio in 1971-75, making them the only father-daughter governors in U.S. history. Her husband, Gary, a federal magistrate, was a son of the late Rep. Keith Sebelius, a western Kansas Republican.

After eight years in the Kansas House and two terms as insurance commissioner, she ran for governor in 2002, winning over moderate Republicans by portraying herself as pro-business and promising to make government more efficient.

She's continued the political mix this year, proposing that legislators draft a plan for eventually bringing universal health care coverage to Kansas while seeking tax cuts for businesses. She's also been a visible supporter of the military, going to Iraq in 2005 to visit National Guard troops.

During her first term, the state weathered its most severe fiscal crisis since the Great Depression and was forced by its highest court to dramatically increase spending on public schools. With the economy improving, both tasks were accomplished without a general tax increase — though Republicans note Sebelius proposed a swiftly rejected tax package for schools in 2004.

That year, Time named Sebelius one of four "rising stars from the heartland," and a year later it touted her as among the nation's five best governors. Newsweek identified Sebelius as "one to watch" this year.

Much of the attention focuses on her ability to draw moderate Republicans, a necessity for statewide office in Kansas. Only 27 percent of the state's 1.6 million voters are registered as Democrats, compared to 46 percent as Republicans, giving the GOP a 322,000-person advantage. No Democratic presidential candidate has carried the state since 1964.

Kansas has long been a springboard for Republicans, most notably Eisenhower, whose presidential library is in Abilene, about 160 miles west of Kansas City, Mo. Sen. Charles Curtis served as vice president in 1929-33. Gov. Alf Landon was the GOP nominee for president in 1936. Dole was Senate majority leader before his failed presidential bid in 1996.

Brownback is considered a long shot for the GOP presidential nomination in 2008, but he's got support from the religious right and conservative groups.

Some Republicans suggested Sebelius wouldn't serve out a second term as governor because she'd be tapped for a presidential ticket, and many believe she's eyeing a run in 2010 for the Senate seat now held by Brownback, who has said he won't seek re-election.

Sebelius dismisses such ideas, saying she likes her current job.

However, some Kansans wouldn't mind seeing her on the Democratic ticket next year.

"Anything's possible," said Rachel Camp, director of a church day care center in Topeka. "She shows a lot of good qualities that would be assets to our government. I'd probably vote for her."

___

On the Net:

Governor's office: http://www.ksgovernor.org/

Women Feeling Freer To Suggest 'Vote For Mom' (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 28 — Some women were struck by the politics of maternity practiced by Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton in recent weeks, the imagery and stagecraft that highlighted their roles as mothers and/or grandmothers.

For some, the issues were complicated: Is this a throwback, or a step forward? Is it politically smart?

For a long time women seeking high office, particularly executive office, were advised to play down their softer, domestic side, and play up their strength and qualifications. Focus groups often found voters questioning whether women were strong enough, tough enough, to lead.

Emily's List, the Democratic women's group, warned in an internal memo in 1988 that women must "fight throughout their campaigns to establish their qualifications, power, toughness and capacity to win."

Breakthrough candidates like Senator Dianne Feinstein, the California Democrat who campaigned unsuccessfully for governor under the slogan "tough and caring" in 1990, worked hard to ease those doubts.

DOJ_NMG_0123189

Some women embraced their outsider status. Senator Patty Murray, Democrat of Washington, campaigned in 1992 as "just a mom in tennis shoes," capitalizing on a dismissive comment once directed her way by a male politician. But the reservations of many voters were real 15 or 20 years ago.

Today, many political strategists say women no longer have to be so defensive. Voters have grown more accustomed to women in powerful positions. And women like Ms. Pelosi and Mrs. Clinton, whatever other problems they may have, have been on the public scene long enough and are familiar enough players in the architecture of power that they no longer have to prove their strength day in and day out.

In fact, strong leadership was seen as one of Mrs. Clinton's core attributes in a CBS News Poll, conducted Jan. 18-21. Sixty-four percent of the men surveyed, and 75 percent of the women, said Mrs. Clinton had strong qualities of leadership.

"It's a whole different world," said Bill Carrick, a Democratic strategist and a longtime Feinstein adviser. And the stereotypes are weakening as younger generations come along, Mr. Carrick added.

What this means, strategists say, is that motherhood and a focus on children can become one more political asset to be showcased — a way of humanizing a candidate and connecting with voters, especially other women.

Ms. Pelosi took the speaker's gavel, ordinarily a moment of raw legislative power, in a carefully structured tableau filled with children, some of them her own grandchildren. Mrs. Clinton held the first event of her presidential campaign surrounded by children at a health care clinic, where she announced her support for expanded health coverage for children.

Aides to both women object to the idea that this is in any way contrived. Ms. Pelosi did, in fact, raise five children before she ran for office, and Mrs. Clinton raised one and has been an advocate on children's issues since her days in law school.

But candidates decide how to tell their story — George W. Bush highlighted his bipartisan friendships and alliances when he ran in 2000 — and there are good political reasons for Ms. Pelosi and Mrs. Clinton to highlight the maternal.

For Ms. Pelosi, relentlessly caricatured by the Republicans last year as a hard-edged, tax-raising liberal, the image of mother and grandmother takes the edge off the ideological cartoon. As Karen O'Connor, director of the Women and Politics Institute at American University, puts it, "For Nancy Pelosi, it becomes, 'O.K., am I going to be the San Francisco liberal, or the woman who relates to all voting women, because I've raised five kids, I have several wonderful grandchildren and I can also run your House.' "

Kate O'Beirne, Washington editor of National Review and a conservative analyst, said she believed Ms. Pelosi's imagery "was probably effective." (Although she quickly added, "I don't see that as a welcome development.") Ms. O'Beirne said that "the optics" of a speaker assuming power surrounded by children signaled "a kinder, gentler, softer approach" to voters, particularly women, who are weary of a long and difficult war and the intense partisanship in Washington in recent years.

"I definitely think that's calculated," she said.

For Mrs. Clinton, highlighting the maternal is a way of building on what polls and strategists suggest are her clear advantages, like strength and intelligence, while compensating for what are widely considered her liabilities: a coolness, an excess of caution and a capacity to so polarize the electorate that many voters question her ability to win.

Several analysts said this softer approach also allowed Ms. Pelosi and Mrs. Clinton to offer a clear contrast with the leadership style of President Bush , which Democrats have asserted was a "my way or the highway" approach to governing.

Mrs. Clinton seemed to be underscoring that contrast in the video in which she announced her candidacy, delivered from an overstuffed chintz sofa. Mrs. Clinton, leaning against a needlepoint pillow, called for the start of "a dialogue about your ideas and mine. Because the conversation in Washington has been just a little one-sided lately, don't you think?"

Deborah Tannen, a professor of linguistics at Georgetown University and the author of "You Just Don't Understand: Women and Men in Conversation," said a "listening tour" was a classic way to communicate with (and among) women.

Democrats also seem less worried these days about the old charge of being the "mommy party," dedicated to domestic concerns while the Republicans, "the daddy party," are trusted with national security. Democratic women were often warned over the years that the stereotypes of party and sex reinforced each other.

National security remains a threshold issue for voters but is no longer such an automatic advantage for the Republicans because they have lost so much support on the war in Iraq, the polls suggest. And neither Ms. Pelosi nor Mrs. Clinton is neglecting these issues. On the campaign trail in Iowa on Saturday, Mrs. Clinton argued that all of this — security, maternity, affordable health care — was part of her potential-first-woman-president package.

"I'm going to be asking people to vote for me based on my entire life and experience," she said. "The fact that I'm a woman, the fact that I'm a mom, is part of who I am."

But there has been some debate in recent weeks about the uses of motherhood, on the left and the right. After Ms. Pelosi assumed the speakership, in a week of events that repeatedly highlighted children, Katrina vanden Heuvel, editor of The Nation, wrote on her blog, "I wonder why Pelosi, a woman I admire, seemed so keen to use her first day as speaker to portray herself as a traditional, family-first kind of woman."

DOJ_NMG_0123190

Ms. vanden Heuvel added, “Many of the women I spoke to worry that the photo fed into the image of woman as one-dimensional.”

The question flared anew in a recent exchange between Senator Barbara Boxer, also a California Democrat, and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Ms. Boxer noted in a hearing that members of her own family were either too old or too young for military service, and so she would not pay a personal price for the Iraq war. She added, of Ms. Rice, “You’re not going to pay a particular price, as I understand it, with an immediate family.”

Ms. Rice shot back later, “I thought you could still make good decisions on behalf of the country if you were single and didn’t have children.”

People Left Holding Bag When Policies Revoked (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, January 29, 2007

Denise Wheeler, an artist in Laguna Beach, Calif., thought she and her family had health insurance.

So did Tony Seals, a self-employed businessman in nearby Riverside. Across the country in Connecticut, Maria Locker and Linda Gaskill each bought short-term insurance policies to protect themselves against catastrophic costs.

But each was left with tens of thousands in unpaid medical bills when their insurers — all major companies — retroactively canceled their policies after they faced expensive health problems. "It's the most devastating thing that's ever happened to us," says Seals, 43.

Their stories illustrate a little-recognized fact about insurance purchased by individuals: Even after being approved, policyholders can see their coverage amended to exclude certain medical conditions or revoked entirely, sometimes long after the policies are issued.

"Insurers love to market the promise, 'We'll take care of you. Just sign here,' " says Karen Pollitz of the Institute for Health Care Research and Policy at Georgetown University. "Then there is all this opportunity for the insurer not to keep the promise, and you don't find out until it's too late."

Insurers say they rarely revoke policies, and generally do so only because of misleading or omitted information on applications. One large insurer, Blue Cross of California, says it revokes less than one-half of 1% of all individual policies each year. Requiring complete medical details and honesty on the part of applicants, insurers say, is necessary to control costs and weed out fraud.

"Our objective as an industry is to provide as affordable a product as possible," says Mohit Ghose of America's Health Insurance Plans, the industry association. "We have to rely on the medical record information supplied by the applicant."

Concern may grow as more people join the individual market, which now includes more than 16 million people nationwide. People buy individual policies because their employer doesn't offer health insurance — as is the case with about 39% of all employers; or because they retire before Medicare eligibility; or because they are self-employed, between jobs or jobless.

In California and Connecticut, high-profile disputes about after-the-fact cancellations are ongoing. The disputes come amid renewed interest in the uninsured in Washington, D.C., and in many states, as politicians from governors to President Bush call for ways to make it financially easier for people to buy insurance on the individual market.

'Gaming' the system?

But the individual market has hurdles that are not just financial: Insurers in most states can pick and choose whom to cover, often turning down those with medical problems in a process called underwriting. Even if they don't thoroughly check medical records before issuing a policy, insurers can "look back," sometimes for a decade or more, at a policyholder's records to check facts on the application.

Critics of the industry say the practice is overused.

"The newest tool insurers have found is to check into every sick person who files an expensive claim to see if there's an argument that they lied on their enrollment application," says Jamie Court of the Los Angeles-based advocacy group Foundation for Taxpayer & Consumer Rights.

Nationwide, data collected by the federal Agency for Health Care Research and Policy show that about 1% of people in the individual market have claims that total more than $30,000 in a given year.

More than 200 complaints about revocations — 189 of them since 2003 — have been filed with California's Department of Managed Health Care, which holds a public hearing today to consider new regulations. Dozens of lawsuits have been filed against insurers by patients; some have been settled. Organizations representing California's doctors and hospitals have each asked to join a class-action suit against the insurers. And two of the state's largest health plans, Kaiser Permanente and Blue Cross of California, have been hit with six-figure fines for revoking policies.

DOJ_NMG_0123191

Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal has asked the state's insurance commissioner to audit Assurant Health and consider "levying significant penalties" if it finds the insurer wrongfully revoked policies. And he has proposed legislation that would require all insurers to prove applicants had intentionally lied about their health before their policies could be revoked.

"The insurance companies are gaming and manipulating the system," Blumenthal says. "The effective way to protect individuals is to change the law."

Emergency surgery

Wheeler, 48, and her husband, Stephen, completed their application with the help of an insurance broker, seeking a policy for themselves and their three children. Stephen had left a corporate job that had insurance to start his own business. Court documents from a lawsuit the Wheelers filed Jan. 12 against their former insurer, Nationwide, show the policy was approved and went into effect on Dec. 1, 2005. Wheeler says the family paid $700 a month in premiums.

In May 2006, Wheeler was rushed to the hospital with a perforated ulcer. Wheeler says she was unaware of the ulcer until she collapsed after her youngest son's baseball game. "You get this hole in your stomach that erupts," she says. "Your body fills up with toxins, and it kills you."

Not long after the five-hour surgery, Wheeler got a letter from her insurer asking for more information about her health history. On her application, she had not told the insurer that she went to an emergency room and her OB/GYN three months before applying for her insurance policy in October 2005, court documents say.

The visits were for heavy menstrual periods, not her stomach, court documents say. Wheeler told the insurer that her doctor had said everything was normal for a woman of her age.

Her insurer, citing the omission of information about the doctor visits, rescinded her policy, leaving the family owing about $30,000 for her surgery. The insurers' letter said it would not have insured her had it known about the OB/GYN visits.

"What does this have to do with my stomach?" asks Wheeler, who remains uninsured.

A Nationwide spokesman said Thursday that the insurer had not yet been served with the lawsuit and therefore could not comment on the Wheeler case.

Policy canceled

Like the Wheelers, the Seals family bought coverage on the individual market after Tony Seals became self-employed. They applied online for an individual policy with Health Net on March 15, 2003. At the time, they had four children.

Seals answered all the questions, including one asking when his wife, Susan, had her last menstrual period. Insurers ask that question because most will not grant a policy to someone who is pregnant. The policy was approved and became effective April 1, 2003, according to court documents.

About mid-April, Seals says, they found out his wife was pregnant. The insurer approved all the prenatal visits and tests, he says. On Oct. 3, 2003, Susan Seals gave birth to their fifth child, Madeline, who has severe brain damage. "They had quite a bit of distress in delivery," Seals says. Their full-term baby had to be revived after birth. His wife spent almost three weeks in the hospital; his daughter, eight.

In April 2004, when Madeline was 6 months old, the insurer told them it had reviewed their application and "felt like we had not given them a correct date for my wife's last menstrual period, so would rescind the coverage," Seals says.

The insurer had looked at Seals' wife's OB/GYN records and found that she had told the doctor a date for her last period about two weeks' different than the one Seals had included on the application, Seals says.

Health Net spokesman Brad Kieffer said the insurer is "sorry to hear of the unfortunate situation the family is going through," but said it must rely on the information given in the insurance application.

"If we suspect misrepresentations have been made … state laws and regulations permit us to investigate to get the facts," Kieffer said. "If we determine that misrepresentation has occurred, the policy is rescinded. It is the responsibility of the applicant to be sure all information on an application is correct and complete."

The cancellation left the family with about $140,000 in unpaid bills from doctors, hospitals and other medical providers. Because the Sealses had brought a successful malpractice case stemming from his daughter's birth, they had money to pay $95,000 toward those bills, leaving them with $1 million in a trust fund that is to provide care for their daughter.

Madeline has severe cerebral palsy, is blind, can't roll over and will need care for the rest of her life, Seals said.

His wife has gone back to work, and her job provides the family with health insurance.

Short-term policies

In Connecticut, concern has centered on short-term health insurance policies, although Blumenthal says his office has also seen problems with longer-term policies.

Gaskill, a 63-year-old retiree, says she began buying policies from Assurant Health in 2005. After a six-month policy expired, she signed up for a new one with Assurant.

DOJ_NMG_0123192

Her new policy went into effect on Jan. 24, 2006, according to an Oct. 10 letter from Assurant Health to the Connecticut Insurance Department. Gaskill says she bought the six-month policies instead of more traditional insurance because they were what she could afford.

In March, she went to the doctor for a small lump under her ear. It had been there awhile, but it did not hurt or bother her so she did not make an appointment until it seemed a bit larger than before.

The doctor asked how long she had the lump.

"I said 'maybe a year,' " says Gaskill, who has since moved to St. Petersburg, Fla. "I never thought that would be held against me."

The lump turned out to be cancer. After checking her medical records, Assurant revoked her policy, leaving her with $30,000 in surgical bills.

In its letter to the insurance department, Assurant said it canceled the policy because "an ordinarily prudent person would seek diagnosis or treatment when a lump initially presents itself." Therefore, the lump was considered "pre-existing" and not covered under Gaskill's current six-month policy.

"I believe I'm a prudent person, but I didn't think I needed to see a doctor over this little thing," says Gaskill, who now has coverage through a state high-risk insurance pool.

Locker, a 61-year-old English teacher, also had a series of six-month policies with Assurant; she would re-apply each time one was about to expire.

Just days before one Assurant policy expired, Locker was diagnosed with a skin rash. Because she was tired and had lost some weight, her doctor also ordered a few lab tests, says a July 12 letter from Assurant to the Connecticut Attorney General's office.

The test results came back after her new six-month policy with Assurant went into effect. Those led to further tests, and, in the summer of 2005, she was diagnosed with lymphoma, a type of cancer. She received $100,000 worth of chemotherapy and other treatment. Assurant revoked her policy, leaving her with those bills, saying her condition pre-existed her current policy and that her doctor should have been able to diagnose the condition earlier.

But, even if he had "diagnosed (Locker) under her prior policy, it would still be considered a pre-existing condition under the policy in question," the insurer said in its letter. "Short-term plans are not renewable. … They are inexpensive gap insurance policies."

"I paid my bills in good faith every month with the understanding that if I were ever to have a catastrophic illness, I would not be without medical insurance," Locker says. "Then this is what I get?"

Locker has since been diagnosed with cancer in her liver and underwent a stem cell transplant this summer.

She now has a job teaching in a public school, which, unlike her former job at a private school, comes with health insurance, which covered the transplant.

Assurant Health, which also sells health insurance under the names Time Insurance, John Alden Life Insurance and Union Security Insurance, covers more than 1 million people nationwide.

A spokesman said the company would not comment on the Gaskill or Locker cases. In a written statement, Assurant said it is working with Connecticut's insurance department and attorney general's office: "While we can never discuss the details of individual cases, it is important to know that, when errors are found, we work with state regulatory agencies to rectify them quickly and efficiently."

Vigilant for fraud

Insurers say they have a detailed application process and the ability to rescind policies because they must be vigilant for fraud.

"We can only rely on what folks tell us," says Chris Ohman, president and CEO of the California Association of Health Plans, the industry lobby.

New regulations are not needed, says Ohman, pointing to the 200 complaints in the past several years — out of about 1.7 million policyholders statewide — filed against insurers on the issue of revoked policies. That indicates no widespread problem, he says.

Reasons for revocations vary. Most of the time, the decisions involve disputes over what the policyholder disclosed, or did not disclose, on the insurance application. Intentionally lying on an application is clearly a revocable offense, but not all disputes are that clear-cut.

In the Gaskill and Locker cases now before Connecticut regulators, the insurer does not say the policyholders misled the company, but it revoked the policies because the women should have known or suspected they had a disease, even without a diagnosis.

DOJ_NMG_0123193

In California, cancellations have occurred because applicants, such as the Wheelers, left out information about a symptom unrelated to a current medical problem or did not disclose that a diagnostic test had been performed, even though the test ruled out problems.

Insurers say they are operating well within the law and are taking action to protect all policyholders.

Blue Cross of California, one of several plans being sued in California, says that it rescinds an average of 1,000 policies each year out of about 260,000 new individual enrollments — less than one-half of 1%, says spokeswoman Shannon Troughton.

"The issue here is how infrequently this happens," Troughton says. "Rescission is an important tool to protect against fraud. Fraud drives up costs for members and the health system in general."

Such disputes generally do not affect people in group health policies offered by employers, because insurers do not bar new members from group policies based on their health status. State laws also limit the amount of time a pre-existing condition can be excluded from coverage. On the individual market, there are generally fewer protections against pre-existing condition exclusions.

Pollitz at Georgetown says the individual market has some very complicated rules that applicants and insurers can get caught up in. At the root of the problem, she says, is that the market works best for people who are healthy.

"You're eligible for insurance when you don't need health care and not eligible when you do," she says. "Are people gaming? Maybe they are. Why were they gaming to begin with? They lost other coverage and need new coverage."

A typical application form asks applicants to look back at least 10 years and list conditions for which treatment was received. Some forms ask applicants to list "signs or symptoms" of disease as well.

Questions can arise on how to fill out the forms: Was the visit to the doctor eight years ago for tension headaches a reportable condition? What if the doctor said there was nothing wrong? What's an "abnormal physical exam?"

Insurers say their customer service lines or insurance salespeople can help; attorneys question whether such sources are unbiased.

Pollitz says insurers go beyond the application form to review medical records before issuing a policy in 25% to 50% of cases. Some also buy information, such as prescription records, from national databanks to find out if an applicant is being treated for illnesses not disclosed on the forms. The onus is on the insurer to do the proper underwriting, she says.

Attorney William Shernoff, who represents Wheeler, Seals and some other patients involved in the California legal disputes, says the forms are designed to be unclear, giving insurers cover to cancel almost any policy.

"I would venture to say that anyone who fills one out would make a mistake," Shernoff says. "They have compound questions, confusing questions, ambiguous questions. There's no place to answer 'I don't remember' or 'I don't know.' "

Troughton, at Blue Cross, says the insurer is working with regulators and plaintiffs attorneys to develop a new application form.

The insurer also has created a committee to review all revocations and will employ an ombudsman to help policyholders who face rescission.

"Ultimately, we wish we didn't have to rescind any policies, which is why we are committed to making the process as thoughtful and rigorous as possible," Troughton says.

Rev. Robert Drinan, Ex-Congressman, Dies At 86 (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, January 29, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 28 (AP) — The Rev. Robert F. Drinan, a Jesuit who served in Congress for 10 years until stepping down in response to a papal order, died Sunday. He was 86 and lived here in housing for the Georgetown University Jesuit community.

A university statement Sunday night said Father Drinan had recently been ill with pneumonia and congestive heart failure.

An internationally known human rights advocate, Father Drinan represented Massachusetts in the House of Representatives for 10 years in the 1970s, stepping down only after a worldwide directive from Pope John Paul II barring priests from holding public office.

He was elected in 1970 as a Democrat, after defeating Representative Philip J. Philbin in a primary and again in the November election, when Mr. Philbin was a write-in candidate.

The only other priest to serve in Congress was a nonvoting delegate from Michigan in 1823.

Although a poll at the time showed that 30 percent of the voters in his district thought it was improper for a priest to run for office, Father Drinan considered politics a natural extension of his work in public affairs and human rights.

His bid for office came a year after he returned from a trip to Vietnam, where he said he discovered that the number of political prisoners being held in South Vietnam was rapidly increasing, contrary to State Department reports.

DOJ_NMG_0123194

In a book the next year, he urged the Catholic Church to condemn the war as “morally objectionable.”

Father Drinan ran for Congress on a platform of opposition to the Vietnam War. During his Congressional tenure, he continued to dress in the robes of his clerical order and lived in a simple room in the Jesuit community at Georgetown.

But Father Drinan wore his liberal views more prominently. He opposed the draft, worked to abolish mandatory retirement and raised eyebrows with his more moderate views on abortion and birth control.

And he became the first member of Congress to call for the impeachment of President Richard M. Nixon — although the call was not related to the Watergate scandal, but to what Father Drinan viewed as the administration’s undeclared war against Cambodia.

“Can we be silent about this flagrant violation of the Constitution?” Father Drinan asked. “Can we impeach a president for concealing a burglary but not for concealing a massive bombing?”

Decades later, at the invitation of Congress, he testified against the impeachment of another president, Bill Clinton. Father Drinan said Mr. Clinton’s misdeeds were not as serious as Nixon’s, and that impeachment should be for an official act, not a private one.

He told the Judiciary Committee members reviewing Mr. Clinton’s case that, in 1974, “the country knew there was extensive lawlessness in the White House.”

“The documentation of appalling crimes was known by everyone,” he continued. “Abuse of power and criminality were apparent to the American people.”

Father Drinan left office in 1980 — “with regret and pain” — finally yielding to the increased pressure from his superiors, including the pope.

But he continued to be active in political causes. He served as president of the Americans for Democratic Action, crisscrossing the country giving speeches on hunger, civil liberties and the perils of the arms race. He spoke out against President Ronald Reagan and President Bush, and lectured and wrote about gun control, world hunger and the war on terrorism’s impact on human rights.

He also took a post as professor of law at Georgetown University in 1981, where he taught courses on human rights, constitutional law, civil liberties, legislation, ethics and professional responsibility.

Battle Royal (WSJ)

By Michael Barone

The Wall Street Journal, January 29, 2007

Bush, Clinton, Bush, Clinton. It sounds like the Wars of the Roses: Lancaster, York, Lancaster, York.

To compare our political struggles to the conflicts between rival dynasties may be carrying it too far. But we have become, I think, a nation that is less small-r republican and more royalist than it used to be. Viscerally, this strikes me as a bad thing. But as I've thought about it, I've decided that something can be said for the increasing royalism of our politics. And whether you like it or not, you can't deny it's there. Not when the wife of the 42nd president is a leading candidate to succeed the 43rd president who in turn is the son of the 41st president. The two George Bushes are referred to in their family, we are told, as 41 and 43. If Hillary Clinton wins, will she and her husband call each other 42 and 44?

Evidence for my case comes from the recent set-to in the White House press room after reporters had learned that Laura Bush had made no public announcement when she had a skin cancer routinely removed. When Press Secretary Tony Snow said it was a private matter, reporters spun out theories why Mrs. Bush had a duty to disclose this minor surgery to the American public -- even though she is not a public official and even though the operation had no impact on the operation of government. But reporters instinctively sense that the doings of Mrs. Bush are as newsworthy as their British counterparts regard those of the royal family. And they have some reason to. Her husband started just about every campaign speech by praising his decision to "marry up." Her high approval ratings take some of the edge off his low ones.

"Royalty," wrote Walter Bagehot in his 1867 book "The English Constitution," "is a government in which the attention of the nation is concentrated in one person doing interesting actions. A Republic is a government in which attention is divided between many, who are all doing uninteresting things." He went on to note that the Monarchy (his capitals) was not just one person but several. "A family on the throne is an interesting idea also. It also brings down the pride of sovereignty to the level of petty life." So we have columnists writing that the current president's policies are a sort of oedipal rebellion against his father. And we have endless speculations on the dynamics of the Clintons' relationship. The personal has become the political. In Bagehot's England they were separate: The Monarchy was personal, the Palmerstons and Gladstones and Disraelis political. Now political reporters are getting ready to grind out pieces about the families of the 2008 presidential candidates.

There was always a risk of royalism under our Constitution, with the president both head of government and head of state. But for a long time politicians struggled against it. George Washington turned down a crown. John Adams did not make public the scintillating intellect of his wife Abigail. For half the time in the first 40 years of the 19th century there was no first lady at all: Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson and Martin Van Buren were widowers when they took office. After the Civil War, politics revolved so much around parties rather than presidents -- can you name all the presidents from Abraham Lincoln to Theodore Roosevelt? -- that in the 1880s the future President Woodrow Wilson wrote a book called "Congressional Government."

DOJ_NMG_0123195

The drift toward royalism is a 20th-century phenomenon. At first it was concealed. Theodore Roosevelt and William Howard Taft had strong-willed, intelligent wives and broods of children who went on to impressive achievements. But they didn't make much of this public. Woodrow Wilson's first wife, a Southerner who died early in his presidency, reportedly pushed for racial segregation in federal building cafeterias, while his second wife effectively ran the White House while he was incapacitated by a stroke -- neither something you'd want to talk about even now. Lou Henry Hoover, an engineering school classmate of her husband, directed her public energies to promoting the Girl Scouts. With Eleanor Roosevelt, we come to the first first lady with a political identity of her own. But she was just one of many courtiers in her husband's White House, and not necessarily the most influential.

Harry Truman did not bring Bess Truman to Potsdam; she spent much of his presidency at home in Independence with her elderly mother. Mamie Eisenhower said that "Ike runs the country and I turn the pork chops." But ever since John Kennedy made a point of bringing his French-speaking wife to Paris, where she charmed the seemingly uncharmable Charles de Gaulle, most presidents and presidential candidates have made a habit of showcasing their wives. And most of their wives have made a point of taking up some public cause or other, some of them controversial. First ladies increasingly became public figures and, given the considerable talents and charm of presidential wives since that time, political assets.

Now we have our first first lady to run for president. She brings to the race a formidable asset that few presidential candidates can claim: a first-hand knowledge of the operations of the White House. But then Queen Elizabeth II, who has had weekly audiences for 55 years with 10 prime ministers from Winston Churchill to Tony Blair, would probably be a pretty good prime minister were she eligible for the office. (She's not: By law, she can't set foot in the House of Commons.) Sen. Clinton was more involved in making public policy than any other first lady except possibly Sarah Childress Polk, who was her husband's chief secretary and worked alongside him in his office. But there is something bizarre -- something royal -- about the vision of the wife of a former president becoming president herself, although those of us who voted for George W. Bush are poorly positioned to complain about it.

And perhaps we shouldn't. Because the royalism of republican politics is not just an American phenomenon. You see it in other very large republics. India for 37 of the 42 years after independence had members of one family as head of government -- Jawaharlal Nehru, Indira Gandhi, Rajiv Gandhi, grandfather and daughter, mother and son. Rajiv Gandhi's widow is now head of the governing party. Indonesia elected as president the daughter of a former president. So did the Philippines. Maybe there is a reason for this. It's hard in a very large democracy for voters to judge a potential leader. They can gather some information on his or her positions on issues, but they rely on an inevitably imperfect (and often biased) media. If they are strongly on the side of one party, they can vote for that party's candidate; but in the United States at least they have some voice (at least if they live in Iowa or New Hampshire) in determining who that candidate is. They have a hard time ascertaining the ability and character of candidates. But in making judgments about those things, it helps if you know the family.

Not that anyone assumes that family members are all alike. It would not do for candidate Bush in 2000 and for candidate Clinton today to claim to be clones of his father and her husband. Rather, candidate Bush made comments about his mother's fearsomeness, and candidate Clinton's "let's chat" suggests that she is more of a listener and less of a nonstop talker than her husband. So the trend to royalism may not be all bad. It does give some candidates an unfair advantage over others. But let's face it: Only four of the 300 million living Americans has been president and probably only 10 or 12 more ever will be. We need as much knowledge of our presidential candidates as we can get and, if we get some of it by knowing their families as closely as we know the families of recent occupants of the White House, so be it. As Bagehot put it, "The best reason why Monarchy is a strong government is, that it is an intelligible government. The mass of mankind understand it, and they hardly anywhere in the world understand any other."

In any case, it's no sure thing that a Clinton will follow a Bush who followed a Clinton who followed a Bush. But keep the following in the back of your mind. George P. Bush will be eligible to run for president in 2012. Chelsea Clinton will be eligible to run for president in 2016. So will Jenna and Barbara Bush, who will turn 35 several days after the election. And Jeb Bush, who had a fine record in eight years as governor of Florida, will be younger in 2024 than John McCain will be in 2008 or Ronald Reagan was in 1984. Royalism may be here to stay.

Mr. Barone is a senior writer at U.S. News & World Report and coauthor of "The Almanac of American Politics" (National Journal Group).

Saudi King Urges Palestinians On Talks (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0123196

By Ibrahim Barzak And Sarah El Deeb

AP, January 29, 2007

Saudi Arabia's king urged Palestinian rival factions Sunday to hold talks in the holy city of Mecca as fighting between the Hamas and Fatah movements persisted in Gaza with no clear winner emerging.

Early Monday, Hamas fighters mobilized around the main Fatah stronghold, the Preventive Security headquarters, and threatened to attack. Information Minister Youssef Rizka of Hamas warned the two sides were close to civil war and called President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah to order his forces back to their bases.

The bitter rivals have been buying, smuggling and building weapons for months trying to gain an edge, but they have held back from all-out battle and find themselves in a stalemate.

That leaves many Palestinians with grim hopes that a power-sharing deal still can be worked out between the Islamic militants of Hamas and the more moderate Abbas of Fatah.

Saudi King Abdullah called the factional fighting a "shame" that has undermined the Palestinian cause and urged both sides to join talks mediated by his country, Saudi Arabia's official news agency reported.

"I urge them to hold an emergency meeting in Mecca to discuss the contentious matters without any intervention from outside," Abdullah told the Saudi Press Agency.

"Our hearts bleed for what is happening in the land of our Palestinian brothers," he said. "This great atrocity with all its unjustified and weak reasons has stained the Palestinian's honorable national struggle."

Both sides welcomed the Saudi king's offer but did not say when talks might be held. Ghazi Hamad, spokesman for the Hamas-led government, said the Islamic group was in talks with Egyptian mediators.

Bursts of violence have alternated with periods of tense calm since the factional fighting erupted in December following the collapse of Hamas-Fatah coalition talks and Abbas' threat to call early elections.

Clashes involving mortars, grenades, bombs and assault rifles have erupted spontaneously, without clear objectives or central command, raged for a few hours, then suddenly fizzled.

Experts expect the pattern to continue. "They are equal parties," analyst Nasser Al Lahham said. "No one can cancel the other out."

Thirty Palestinians, including two children, have died during the latest outburst of street fighting that began Thursday, raising the death toll to more than 60 since last month.

A battle erupted early Monday near the parliament building, where a Hamas fighter was killed, Hamas and hospital officials said.

Fatah gunmen killed a Hamas security force member early Monday and a Hamas activist in Khan Younis on Sunday. Another gunman, whose affiliation was not immediately known, and a 45-year-old civilian were also killed, hospital officials said.

Several kidnappings also were reported in the factional conflict. The most brazen was in the West Bank city of Nablus, where Fatah gunmen walked into a bank and dragged out a local Hamas leader.

Hot spots in the fighting include the headquarters of Abbas' security forces, Hamas-run mosques and the homes and offices of leaders from both sides, where guards hunker down behind concrete barriers and piles of sandbags.

Traffic jams are getting worse by the day in Gaza City's already crowded streets because more and more roads are being closed to motorists by the rival security forces.

Neither side is using all of its firepower because they are giving coalition talks another chance and because they fear risking defeat in an all-out confrontation, said Mouin Rabbani, a Jordan-based analyst for the International Crisis Group, an independent think tank.

Each side can count on thousands of armed men. Most members of Palestinian security forces are loyal to Abbas, while Hamas last year set up its own 5,600-man militia. Each also has a military wing — Fatah's Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades and Hamas' Izzedine Al Qassam Brigades.

Hamas is getting funds from Iran and other Islamic supporters worldwide, while the Bush administration has asked Congress to approve $85 million in aid for Abbas' troops.

Israeli analyst Shlomo Brom, a retired army general, said the U.S. shouldn't count on Abbas being able to defeat Hamas militarily. "That is not going to happen, because Hamas is a political movement that enjoys great support among the Palestinians," he said.

The Gaza muddle will likely continue, Brom added. "The probability of a full-scale war is low, because the two parties understand the consequences and they understand there will be no clear winner."

Both sides began preparing for the possibility of a big battle after Israel left the Gaza Strip in September 2005 and the arms race intensified after Hamas won legislative elections a year ago and took control of the Palestinian government.

DOJ_NMG_0123197

Rifles, missiles, ammunition and explosives have been pouring into Gaza through tunnels under the border with Egypt, reaching both Hamas and Fatah, security officials and weapons dealers say.

In a climate of increasing lawlessness, Gaza clans also have stocked up on weapons, two weapons dealers in the southern Gaza border town of Rafah said Sunday, speaking on condition of anonymity for fear of arrest.

Higher-quality Russian- and Iraqi-made Kalashnikov assault rifles are no longer available, and Egyptian or Chinese models sell for up to $2,300, almost double what they cost a year ago, the dealers said. Kalashnikov bullets now cost $3.30 apiece, up from $2.30, they said.

Abu Suoud, 32, a Fatah gunman in Rafah, said his group is hoarding ammunition, and no longer wasting bullets by firing into the air at weddings and funerals.

"We save each bullet for the battle," he said.

Saudi King Invites Palestinian Factions To Talks (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 28 — King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia called Sunday on the rival Palestinian factions to hold emergency talks in the holy city of Mecca in the latest bid to halt some of the worst ever Palestinian internal fighting.

As the two main factions, Hamas and Fatah, waged a fourth straight day of fighting in the Gaza Strip, leaders from both groups said they would take up the invitation by the Saudi monarch, though no date was set.

“I call on my brothers, the Palestinian people, represented by their leaders, to put an immediate end to this tragedy and to abide by righteousness,” the king said in an announcement carried by the official Saudi Press Agency.

Saudi Arabia does not have a tradition of such direct involvement in Palestinian affairs. But as one of the most important figures in the Arab world the king, by his decision to hold the talks in Mecca, could increase the pressure on the Palestinian leaders to find a compromise.

However, efforts by other Arab states have failed to stop the bloodshed. Egypt has been acting as a go-between for months, and earlier this month, Syria organized talks between Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian president and leader of the Fatah faction, and Khaled Meshal, the political leader in exile of the Islamic militant faction Hamas. But no breakthrough was achieved.

The feud between the factions has grown increasingly bitter since Hamas, the radical Islamic group, won parliamentary elections a year ago, unseating Fatah, the dominant Palestinian political movement for decades. Hamas controls the cabinet and the Legislature, but as president, Mr. Abbas has a range of powers, and many members of the security forces remain loyal to Fatah.

In Gaza on Sunday, Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, of Hamas, made a renewed plea to halt the fighting, but to no avail.

“We call on all the Palestinian people to protect national unity, to make the language of dialogue and reason prevail, to withdraw weapons from the streets,” Mr. Haniya told an emergency session of the Palestinian cabinet in Gaza City.

Gunmen from the two sides exchanged fire throughout the day in several Gaza City neighborhoods, prompting residents in some of the hardest-hit areas to flee to the homes of relatives in less volatile areas.

A bomb exploded outside the front door of a home belonging to a bodyguard for Muhammad Dahlan, a senior Fatah figure and an ally of Mr. Abbas. No one was hurt in the blast.

Also, Fatah blamed Hamas for mortar and antitank rounds that were fired at the police headquarters in Gaza City, which is controlled by Fatah.

Many shops were closed, and the streets were largely empty after the factions put up concrete barriers to block some roads. Both Hamas and Fatah said members of their own group had been kidnapped by the other side, a tactic that has become common, though many of those seized are later released unharmed.

The latest deaths included a 12-year-old boy fatally shot late Saturday, three Hamas fighters killed Sunday and one Fatah fighter who died of injuries sustained previously, Palestinian hospital officials said.

The violence spread to Nablus, the largest city in the West Bank, where several Hamas members were seized in separate kidnappings, one at the city’s Education Ministry and another at a bank, Palestinian security officials said. Most were later released.

The clashes, which have claimed more than 20 lives and wounded dozens since erupting on Thursday, also forced a breakdown in the latest round of talks to form a unity government.

The Palestinian factions have battled periodically in recent years, and there was a sharp rise in tensions after Hamas defeated Fatah in parliamentary elections a year ago.

DOJ_NMG_0123198

Months of negotiations failed to produce a unity government, and the internecine violence became an almost daily event in December. After a period of relative calm earlier this month, the gun battles broke out again this past week. More than 50 Palestinians have been killed in Gaza over the past two months, and there have also been sporadic clashes in the West Bank.

Mr. Abbas has said on several occasions that he will propose early elections if the factions cannot reach agreement on a unity government. But holding elections would be extremely difficult at a time when the Palestinian Authority is broke and political tensions are boiling over.

While Israel supports Mr. Abbas and refuses to deal with Hamas, Israel has sought to avoid direct involvement in the internal Palestinian fighting. However, some Israeli politicians are warning that the Palestinian infighting could create problems for Israel.

"We cannot allow anarchy such as this, because in the end what will come out of this could act as a boomerang on us," Zeev Boim, a cabinet minister, told Israeli Radio.

In Israeli politics, the cabinet approved the country's first Muslim Arab minister, Ghaleb Majadle, who said he would seek to help Arab citizens identify more with the state.

"The first step has been taken and this has given Israeli Arabs a feeling of belonging," Mr. Majadle, who will be a minister without a specific portfolio, said on Army Radio.

The center-left Labor Party nominated him for a cabinet post after one of its members quit the government. Some right-wing politicians have spoken out against bringing an Muslim Arab into the cabinet, but Mr. Majadle won overwhelming approval in a cabinet vote on Sunday.

Israeli Arabs account for about 1.2 million of Israel's seven million people.

Gaza Violence Threatens Peace Talks (FT)

By Sharmila Devi

Financial Times, January 29, 2007

Factional clashes that have killed at least 22 people in the past few days in the Gaza Strip threaten to overshadow a meeting this week of the international peacemaking Quartet.

Representatives of the United States, European Union, Russia and United Nations are due to meet in Washington on February 2 to discuss the stalled peace process.

But Palestinians have engaged in the fiercest infighting since a Hamas victory in parliamentary elections a year ago triggered a western aid embargo on the ruling Islamists.

Talks between Hamas and the Fatah faction on a national unity government were derailed by the Gaza violence amid appeals for calm.

"You have to put weapons away from streets and you have to end all forms of tensions," Ismail Haniyeh, the Hamas prime minister, said on Sunday.

He also made a direct attack on US plans to fund security forces loyal to Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian president and leader of Fatah. Mr Haniyeh criticised "troublemakers who are trying to veer away from the path of our people" by receiving "dirty American funding and arms".

Mr Abbas was away on a European trip, which included a stop at the World Economic Forum in the Swiss resort of Davos, where he met Tzipi Livni, Israeli foreign minister.

On Sunday in Gaza, a bomb blast damaged the home of a bodyguard of Mohamed Dahlan, a Fatah strongman. There were gun battles outside the headquarters of the Fatah-dominated Preventive Security Service and the Hamas-led police force.

In December, Mr Abbas called for early presidential and parliamentary elections after months of talks failed to produce a new government. Since then, at least 52 Palestinians have been killed in factional clashes. Meanwhile, Hamas could easily derail any new polls unless the group gave its assent.

Prospects for any renewed international peacemaking push remain bleak when set against the intra-Palestinian fighting.

In Israel, meanwhile, the cabinet on Sunday approved the appointment of the first Muslim minister in the country's history.

Raleb Majadele of the Labour party faces a Knesset vote on Monday to confirm him as minister without portfolio in the coalition government.

Arabs make up about 20 per cent of Israel's citizens and have long complained of discrimination.

US Mideast Policies 'radicalise' Moderates (FT)

By Quentin Peel

Financial Times, January 29, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123199

Moderate Muslim countries face a greater threat from terrorism than western countries, but all nations must urgently address the causes of that terrorism instead of concentrating on the symptoms, according to Abdullah Badawi, prime minister of Malaysia.

World Muslim opinion had been radicalised by western policies in the Middle East, including the failure to resolve the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians, and the invasion of Iraq.

"Trying to resolve terrorism without examining its root causes is like trying to fertilise the fruits and not the roots," he said.

Speaking as the leader of one of the most moderate Muslim countries, and as chairman of the 57-nation Organisation of the Islamic Conference, Mr Abdullah warned that governments in the Islamic world were being undermined by their failure to influence the US and the United Nations in enforcing resolutions calling for an end to Israeli occupation of Palestinian land.

"Is this an Islamic issue?" he asked. "No. It is an issue of the people, of Muslims, non-Muslims, Christians and Jews, who have a right to return to the homeland when people have been expelled. So we have to help them."

Yet the fact that UN resolutions on Israel were ignored stirred up a backlash against Muslim governments, not simply in the Middle East but across Asia.

"They want to react because [they think] their government is not reacting," he said. "That is the whole trouble. [They say]: 'You are not an Islamic government, so you have no feeling for the people, for the Muslims who have been attacked, who have been marginalised and treated unjustly by other countries.'

"What is happening now in the Middle East has made even the moderates angry. That is not good."

Mr Abdullah, whose mild language and less confrontational attitudes mark a stark contrast to the angry anti-western rhetoric of his predecessor, Mahathir Mohamad, spoke out against those Muslim radicals who demand that their governments should adopt an overtly Islamic label.

"Many Muslims aspire to set up an Islamic government," he said. "I don't think that Islam is the only way to solve all problems.

"A government that is just, a government that is trustworthy, that becomes people-centred, that is Islamic. We must see what a government professes, what the government does, and if it is good, that is Islamic. A government can have Islamic values, without the label Islamic.

"Between theatre and substance, I would declare more for the substance."

In a speech last week in London, Mr Abdullah rejected the idea that the world was split by a "clash of civilisations", although he admitted that "never before has the tension been as pervasive or as extensive" between the western and Muslim worlds. "They may mobilise themselves along ideological or religious lines," he said. "But at heart the conflicts are driven by the impulse for power, territory and resources, and by resistance to this. There is indeed a clash of fundamental interests."

Mr Abdullah, who was also attending the World Economic Forum at Davos, was more sanguine about the immediate prospects for the world economy and world trade. If the Doha round of trade negotiations broke down, "I don't say that failure would be a disaster. World trade will go on...If we cannot negotiate some kind of arrangement through the WTO then free trade will go on, bilaterally or regionally."

He admitted that Malaysia was getting caught in the competition for foreign investment by the rise of China, India and Vietnam. "We cannot any longer be a low cost producer," he said.

The Most Dangerous Terrorist--Besides Osama (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball, Maziar Bahari And Joanna Chen

Newsweek, January 29, 2007

Before Osama bin Laden, there was Imad Mughniyeh. The Lebanese terrorist from Hizbullah was considered the most dangerous in the world. Now the White House worries that he's back, after years of lying low. Four serving U.S. intel and counterterrorism officials, anonymous when discussing sensitive material, said Mughniyeh is prominent in recent reporting from the field about Hizbullah activity. Bruce Riedel, a veteran Mideast expert recently retired from the CIA, told NEWSWEEK there is "no question he is heavily involved in [formulating] terrorist contingency plans in case of a U.S.-Iran confrontation."

Mughniyeh has the résumé to be a potent threat. He was the alleged organizer of a series of devastating bombings and kidnappings against U.S. targets in Lebanon during the 1980s, including two bombings of the U.S. Embassy in Beirut. But Hizbullah later made a strategic decision to abandon attacks on American targets. Even now, U.S. intel officials stress that they don't believe Hizbullah will actually hit U.S. interests unless Washington strikes first—against either the movement or its key patron, Tehran.

So what is Mughniyeh up to? Two of the U.S. officials interviewed by NEWSWEEK said field reports indicate that he travels between Beirut, Damascus and Tehran. One official said that some reports also suggest he has visited Baghdad. (Hizbullah has allegedly been involved in training the Mahdi Army militia of Moqtada al-Sadr.) According to Riedel, Mughniyeh is Hizbullah's chief of "external operations," and keeps in touch with cells around the world. FBI and other counterterror officials have said they believe Hizbullah has recruitment and fund-raising cells in the United States. "He is the brain behind all Hizbullah's military activity," says Lt. Col. Guy Hazoot, operations officer of the Galilee Brigade on Israel's northern border.

DOJ_NMG_0123200

But the renewed focus on one man as a kind of Lebanese superterrorist may be folly. That's the view, anyway, of an Iranian official with close ties to Hizbullah. "Americans' interest in Mughniyeh shows their desperation for any insight into Hizbullah operations," says the official, who refused to be ID'd speaking on a sensitive subject. The official seemed amused to be asked about Mughniyeh. "To my knowledge, he hasn't been involved in any operation for the past decade. There's a new cadre of operatives in Hizbullah that Americans don't know anything about. And I'm not going to tell you about them, either."

State Dept. To Report On Israeli Strikes (USAT)

USA Today, January 29, 2007

The State Department has completed a preliminary report on whether Israel misused American-made cluster bombs in civilian areas of Lebanon during a 34-day war with Hezbollah militants last summer. The findings go to Congress today.

State Department spokesman Kurtis Cooper said the report doesn't make a final judgment.

The department is required to notify Congress of even preliminary findings of possible violations of the Arms Control Act.

Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said Sunday that he did not know of the State Department report.

When the United States has discussed Israel's use of cluster munitions in the past, he said, "we've been forthcoming, detailed and transparent."

A congressional investigation found Israel improperly used U.S.-made cluster bombs during its invasion of Lebanon in 1982. That resulted in a six-year ban on further U.S. sales of the weapons to Israel. The sanctions are largely symbolic since Israel also makes its own cluster munitions.

Racial profiling legislation a priority for Feingold

Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wis., who chairs the Judiciary subcommittee on the Constitution, said he will address the issue of racial profiling by law enforcement. Many minorities "live with the fear of being racially profiled as they go about their everyday lives," Feingold said.

In the last Congress, Feingold sponsored legislation that would have banned racial profiling. He said the issue will be a priority for him now that Democrats control Congress.

Feingold has yet to introduce a bill. His previous one would have banned federal, state and local law enforcement officials from "relying, to any degree, on race, ethnicity, national origin or religion" during investigations. It included an exemption for specific information that "links a person of a particular race, ethnicity, national origin or religion to an identified incident or scheme."

Steve Mustapha Elturk, an imam in Troy, Mich., said U.S. authorities have detained him four times since Sept. 11, 2001 — twice at the Canadian border and twice while traveling by air — even though he has done nothing wrong.

Some security-oriented groups are gearing up for a fight. "The 9/11 atrocity was committed by 19 young, single men from Arab nations," said Peter Gadiel of Kent, Conn., president of 9/11 Families for a Secure America. "We don't have to worry about 80-year-old ladies with bleach-blond hair and Southern accents."

Eric Blum, a Customs and Border Protection spokesman, said the agency does not use racial profiling.

Cheney says it's hardnot to criticize Sen. Hagel

Vice President Cheney said it's difficult not to criticize Sen. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, a Republican who has accused the Bush administration of playing "a ping-pong game with American lives" by sending more U.S. troops into Iraq.

"Let's say I believe firmly in Ronald Reagan's 11th commandment: Thou shalt not speak ill of a fellow Republican," Cheney said. "But it's very hard sometimes to adhere to that where Chuck Hagel is involved."

Hagel's "ping-pong" remark came Wednesday as the Senate Foreign Relations Committee debated a non-binding resolution that condemned Bush's troop buildup in Iraq. Hagel co-sponsored the measure, which the committee approved in a 12-9 vote. It is pending in the full Senate.

Cheney's comments came in an interview with Newsweek released Sunday.

Cheney also said he doesn't spend any time worrying about how the public or the media view him. When asked his reaction to personal criticisms of him from people with whom he has worked, Cheney said, "Well, I'm vice president, and they're not."

In First, Arab Muslim Joins Israeli Cabinet (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, January 29, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123201

JERUSALEM, Jan. 28 -- Israel's cabinet on Sunday approved the first Arab Muslim minister of the Jewish state, a milestone marked here mostly by bitter criticism of what many lawmakers viewed as a politically motivated selection.

Raleb Majadele, a Labor Party legislator, was approved by a wide margin as minister without portfolio in Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's cabinet. Only Avigdor Lieberman, minister of strategic affairs from the Israel Is Our Home party, voted against the nomination.

Majadele's appointment is "a significant, historic step toward equality and peace in the region," said Amir Peretz, the Labor leader, who chose Majadele for a cabinet post several weeks ago during an ongoing fight for the party leadership.

An Israeli Druze, Saleh Tarif, was appointed minister without portfolio in 2001. But many of Israel's roughly 100,000 Druze, members of a sect that broke with Islam centuries ago, do not identify themselves as Arabs and serve in Israel's army.

By contrast, Israel's approximately 1 million non-Druze Arab citizens, whose families remained in Israel after its founding in 1948 and make up almost a fifth of the population, do not serve in the military and face barriers to owning land and securing equal public services. Most of them are Muslim.

Balad, one of several Arab parties that denounced Majadele's appointment, said in a statement that his service in the cabinet "would give a seal of approval to the policy of racial discrimination against Arabs."

Majadele, a leader in the Histadrut trade union organization that Peretz once headed, is from the northern city of Baqa al-Gharbiya.

Peretz, who serves as defense minister, has watched his popularity plummet because of the inconclusive war against Hezbollah last summer and the army's inability to stop Palestinian rocket fire from the Gaza Strip. He also backtracked on a pledge to leave Olmert's government if Lieberman were made a minister, which occurred in October.

Lieberman has favored a proposal that would strip more than 150,000 Israeli Arabs of their citizenship by redrawing Israel's eastern boundary in a way that would leave them in the Palestinian-controlled West Bank. He has also called for the execution of Israeli Arab lawmakers who meet with officials from Hamas, the radical Islamic party elected to run the Palestinian Authority a year ago.

Peretz selected Majadele at a time when he is being challenged for leadership of the Labor party, a post that makes him Olmert's chief coalition partner. Many in the party viewed the move as a way to win back its more dovish elements.

Labor lawmaker Ophir Pines-Paz resigned in November as minister of science, culture and sport to protest Lieberman's cabinet appointment. Peretz initially named Majadele, 53, to fill that post. But he was made minister without portfolio pending what some lawmakers say is an imminent cabinet shuffle by Olmert to rejuvenate his unpopular government.

"I have no problem with an Arab minister, but it is not my job to help Amir Peretz with the primaries," Lieberman said after the cabinet vote.

In Gaza, meanwhile, violent clashes between the armed wings of the rival Fatah and Hamas movements continued for a fourth day. A member of the Hamas security force in Gaza was killed and eight others were wounded by gunfire, adding to the scores injured in recent days. Also, a senior commander of a branch of the Palestinian security services controlled by Fatah was abducted in Gaza.

Factional violence has erupted periodically since Hamas's parliamentary election victory, which ended Fatah's long monopoly on power. But the death toll since Thursday of at least 29 Palestinians, including several children, is the highest in months.

The clashes, limited largely to Gaza, have prompted Hamas to suspend talks with Fatah over the formation of a power-sharing government acceptable to international donors who cut off aid to the Palestinian Authority after Hamas's victory.

Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas, which does not recognize Israel's right to exist, asked for calm Sunday before an emergency cabinet meeting.

Meanwhile, Saudi Arabia invited the rival Palestinian leaders for urgent talks in Islam's holy city of Mecca, and officials of both Hamas and Fatah said Sunday that they had accepted the offer, [a] news agency reported.

In The Land Of The Lonely (TIME)

By Tim McGirk

Time, January 29, 2007

Deep inside Palestinian territory, the Jewish community of Migron sits, precariously, on the crown of a skull-white hill. On a winter day, the wind is so fierce it rocks the trailer homes, knocks over the kids' plastic tricycles in the muddy driveways and threatens to rip out the young fruit saplings planted by the 90 young settlers who call Migron home. A guard dog the size of a lion prowls the hilltop to scare off Arab prowlers--or terrorists. Migron is a hard and unforgiving place, especially these days.

Itai Harel, 32, founded the Migron settlement in 2002, on his honeymoon. Harel and his bride were fulfilling a dream: Jews repossessing the biblical land of Judea and Samaria, nearly 2,000 years after they were exiled. It matters little to Harel and the other Israelis who have settled in Migron that they are living on land that much of the world believes belongs to the Palestinians, in homes that many of their own countrymen would just as soon see abandoned. In fact, the residents of Migron seem to pride themselves on being among the biggest loners in the Middle East. "We're supposed to be a Jewish, democratic state," says Harel, a broad-shouldered ex-paratrooper still in the army reserves. "But if you ask me, it's more important that this be a Jewish state than a democratic one, and for us, Judaism is the land of biblical Israel. It's more here than in Tel Aviv."

DOJ_NMG_0123202

Settlers were once considered the golden pioneers of Zionism, the force behind the creation of Israel and, later, the occupation of territory seized after the 1967 war. But the future of the settlement movement, and the settlers themselves, has never seemed more uncertain. More than 270,000 Israelis live beyond the Green Line, as the old border is called, most in walled-in suburbs like Ma'aleh Adumim outside Jerusalem, which could be an estate of southern California condominiums if it weren't for the 300-year-old olive trees implanted in the traffic circles. The vast majority of Israelis living in the West Bank today do so less out of any ideological fervor than because the housing is cheap. But some 70,000 settlers are religious nationalists like Harel, who consider Palestinian land to be their Jewish birthright. They tend to live in remote outposts, surrounded by hostile Palestinians and occasionally harassed by Israeli authorities under pressure from the international community to evacuate the settlements. In 2005, Israel did just that, withdrawing 9,053 settlers from the Gaza Strip, the first time in more than two decades that Israel had voluntarily given back occupied territory.

The evacuation of Gaza was supposed to be the first step in Israel's "disengagement" from the Palestinians, followed by withdrawal from settlements in the more historically and strategically important West Bank. Those plans were shelved last year by Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, as conflicts with militants from Hizballah and Hamas soured many Israeli officials on the idea of giving up any more ground. But Olmert is weighing a pullout again. The Bush Administration has signaled a new determination to forge a comprehensive peace between Israel and the Palestinians. And the success of those negotiations will hinge in part on whether Olmert's government can sustain support for dismantling the West Bank settlements, more than 40% of which have been built illegally on private Palestinian land, according to Peace Now, an Israeli pacifist group.

It won't be easy. Polls show that a thin majority of Israelis want to get rid of settlements. But Olmert's dismal approval ratings have forced him into a marriage of convenience with the pro-settlement right wing. A large-scale campaign to evacuate Jewish settlers could produce more clashes like the one that erupted last January in an outpost called Amona, when an army effort to dislodge a few families left 200 soldiers and settlers injured. Another outbreak of violence could bring down Olmert's centrist government, which would probably hand power to hawkish parties who are in no mood to make peace with the Palestinians. As Gershom Gorenberg, an expert on the history of Israel's settlements, says, "Olmert's biggest fear is Jews fighting Jews, and that gives the settlers a stranglehold over the government."

The fate of the peace process, in other words, may be decided by what happens in places like Migron. As Israeli society has grown more secular and less attached to the vision of a greater Israel, ideological splits have emerged among the settlers. The most radical "hilltop youths" are ready to mobilize and resist the government's attempts to remove them. Many like Harel are second-generation settlers, the sons and daughters of older Zionists. They have grown up steeped in holy books and prophecy and see themselves as the first line of defense against the Arabs. They consider themselves divorced from the state and view the army and politicians, once their loudest cheerleaders, with distrust and suspicion. It has become a showdown of "Jews vs. Israelis," as Gorenberg puts it, and these extremists believe themselves to be the righteous Jews.

The family of Harel, the founder of Migron, embodies that divide. Harel's father Israel was among the early settlers who crossed into Jordanian territory after the 1967 war. He says that settlers like him were driven by a collective Zionism akin to socialism. "Our motivation wasn't religious," says the elder Harel. But younger settlers, like his son, seek more "divine reasons" for spreading into the Palestinian lands. "This transition into religious nationalism is unfortunate. It makes us into a sect," the elder Harel says. "And it doesn't represent what the majority of Israelis think."

Some radical settlers are hurting their own cause. Israeli television showed footage last week of a young settler, and her child, taunting a Palestinian girl in Hebron and cursing her as a "whore." Similar ugly scenes of Jewish settlers hacking down ancient Palestinian olive groves or beating up Arab schoolkids are just part of the reason why many Israelis have turned against them. Another is money: guarding and maintaining the settlements costs plenty. A study by the newspaper Ha'aretz reckons that since 1967, the bills run upwards of $10 billion, excluding military costs in the West Bank. According to Yaacov Shamir, a communications professor at Hebrew University in Jerusalem, recent polls show that 52% of Israelis are prepared to withdraw from settlements as part of a future peace deal with Palestinians.

But that number may slip if the instability in the Palestinian territories--fueled by disputes between the Hamas government and President Mahmoud Abbas--gets worse. Israelis thought that leaving Gaza would give them a breather from terrorists; instead it has accelerated a downpour of rockets into Israel from Palestinian militants in Gaza. For the most part, the Palestinians in the West Bank live like ghosts on the periphery of the Jewish settlements. The nearby Arab villages are usually walled off, and settler-only highways, guarded by army checkpoints and concrete walls, have turned Palestinian communities into islands. But in the gray zone of Israeli-Palestinian affairs, some Palestinians are grudgingly accepting of the settlements, because the settlers hire Palestinian workers. Modi'in Ilit, an ultra-Orthodox community of 35,000 along the Green Line, is growing so fast that 1,000 Palestinian construction workers are allowed in from nearby villages to build 10-story high-rise apartments. "Every week 40 babies are born here," says Mayor Yaakov Guterman, who predicts Modi'in Ilit will swell to 200,000 inhabitants in the next two decades, all on land purchased controversially inside the Palestinian territories. And nobody is stopping them.

DOJ_NMG_0123203

Taking the painful step of leaving the West Bank will require Israelis to accept what the country's founding father, David Ben-Gurion, recognized in 1949: that the longer Jews hold onto land seized from the Arabs, the more likely they are to become a minority in their own homeland. (There are currently 5.7 million Jews living in Israel and the occupied territories, in contrast to 5.4 million Palestinians.) The problem is less one of ideology than of political will. Too many Israeli politicians, including Olmert, owe their rise to the support of the settler communities, which are among the most active and well-organized forces in Israeli politics. Back at Migron, Itai Harel turns up the collar of his blue plaid jacket against the wind and points out the asphalt road, the electricity lines leading up the hill, the water tank--all built by the Israeli government. Harel says five Cabinet ministers have visited his hilltop and all pledged support. "They're helping us through the back door, with a wink," he says.

Harel envisions that someday 500 religious families will inhabit Migron. He speaks with the confidence of both a true believer and a pragmatist, one who knows that settlements like his have outlasted many previous attempts to uproot them. At his wintry outpost, Harel is not worried about Olmert pulling back the settlers. "The Israeli public will go wherever a strong leader takes them, but for now, we have no strong leaders," he says. That's good news for Harel--but hardly a solid foundation on which to build peace in the Middle East.

With reporting by Jamil Hamad / Hebron, Aaron J. Klein / Migron

Lebanon Faces Prospect Of Civil War (CSM)

By Scott Peterson

The Christian Science Monitor, January 29, 2007

It was a dispute in a university cafeteria that erupted into the worst sectarian violence in Lebanon in 15 years. How it started and who is to blame depends on which side tells the story.

But even as young Shiite and Sunni men on both sides armed themselves for a bloody face-off last Thursday, their parents begged them to stop – horrific images of Lebanon's 1975-90 civil war rekindling in their minds.

The political standoff between the government and opposition, simmering for two months, has taken an increasingly violent and sectarian turn in the past week, exposing long-dormant divisions between Lebanon's Sunnis and Shiites, and rival Christian factions.

At stake in the spiraling conflict is who will define the identity of Lebanon, a colonial-era construct that includes 18 confessions, and in recent decades has served as the proxy battlefield for broader regional struggles by Israel, Syria, Palestinians, and today, the US and Iran.

"My mother was crying ... and telephoned me to come back," says business student Alaa, a Sunni who dismissed his mother's pleas on Thursday, as black smoke from burning cars belched above the largely Sunni Tareq al-Jdideh neighborhood.

"They know about the civil war and they fear it again," says Alaa, speaking of his parents. "[But] if we do not do this and defend our homes, [Shiites] could come and invade and stay."

That battle pitted Sunni supporters of the Western-backed government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, who dominate the area around the Beirut Arab University, against Shiite Hizbullah and Amal loyalists who want to topple the government and who called in armed and helmeted reinforcements to back up their students.

The specter of renewed conflict could mar the ambitions of both Lebanese camps and jeopardize a transformation that has rebuilt Beirut from the ashes of civil war. Lebanon is still reeling from the 34-day war this summer, between Hizbullah and Israel, that devastated the nation's infrastructure. Donors in the Western camp met in Paris Thursday to pledge $7.6 billion to help.

"Only God can stop a civil war now," says a Christian father and former officer in the Lebanese Forces militia of Samir Geagea, a Christian leader once indicted for wartime killings. Two of his sons are in the Army, which has so far not been overwhelmed by the spasms of violence.

"We're between catastrophe and peace in Lebanon," he says. "The smallest accident could set it off, because blood is moving and is inflamed."

"For 15 years the TV and news showed there was peace," says another Christian, a militant who maintains a personal arsenal of two assault rifles, a pistol, and stocks of ammunition, hidden in cupboards and amid piles of clothes.

"But inside ourselves, we prepare for the next big fight. All groups have [prepared]," says the man, who asked not to be identified. "I don't believe we can all live together. There is too much religious racism, and hiding [of true feelings.]"

DOJ_NMG_0123204

Those mutual suspicions have been edging closer to the surface, driven by uncompromising politicians willing to take their differences to the street. Violence first broke out last Tuesday when the Hizbullah-led opposition shut down Beirut and other cities with flaming barricades and gangs of club-wielding men during a one-day nationwide strike.

The further eruption Thursday was more shocking to many Lebanese, because the spark was apparently so small. Afterward, leading politicians of all stripes called for calm and a withdrawal from the streets.

Though it was quiet over the weekend, many Lebanese spoke of mistrusting politicians and concern that tension is rising beyond their ability to control the street.

"I didn't get scared in the past war, but now I am worried," says Adel, a Sunni who lives with his family behind Beirut Arab University. "I felt like I was completely in a trance [during the fight]. We are concerned it could get worse, but we hope it will end here. No one is looking for war.

"I told my sons: 'Stay where you are [at home]. Don't look for trouble,' " adds Adel, who would only give his first name.

But on Thursday trouble found plenty of young men – including at least one of Adel's sons – who admitted knowing little about Lebanon's past civil war or how such strife as they are engaged in helped precipitate it.

Rabiah, a Sunni student, said his parents "were terrified" by the vicious street scenes. A chunk of thrown rubble cut the right side of Rabiah's face and eye: "They tried to stop me going out, but I ignored them. I ran away from the house."

Rabiah ran directly into a conflict that had been ratcheted up by politicians and their taunting rhetoric.

Hizbullah chief Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah said he had limited the strike to one day in the interest of peace, but declared that his Shiite party and its allies had the "strength to bring down the unconstitutional government tomorrow or the day after."

Michel Aoun, a former general whose Christian faction is allied to the Syrian- and Iran-backed Hizbullah, said after the strike that "surprises" were forthcoming: "You can't imagine what we have in store."

Then after the Thursday riots, which only came to an end when the Lebanese Army intervened, pro-government forces countered with their own warnings. Saad Hariri, the parliament majority leader and son of former Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, who was assassinated two years ago, said: "Everyone has reached the red line, and here we have to back up and return to dialogue."

In a speech Friday, Mr. Geagea, whose Christian faction is pro-government, told Nasrallah that Hizbullah could not "alter the balance of power" in Lebanon: "If you go beyond democratic means, that will lead you to civil war, in which you will also not achieve your declared objective."

At street level, some of the worst clashes last week were between Christian groups, in Beirut and the northern city of Tripoli. Maronite Patriarch Boutros Sfeir complained that "such a reality makes our heart cry," as he noted that no sect was without blame.

"We used to think that some Lebanese were better than others," the Christian religious leader said, "but we discovered that all of them were involved in clashes and there isn't any difference between one sect and another."

Still, Christians are as concerned as any at the surge in violence.

"When we sit with [Muslims], we are brothers," says the armed Christian militant, speaking of his fears at his home. "But when Christians sit alone, we talk badly of them. And when Muslims sit alone, they talk badly of us. They don't like us, and talk of war."

"We want to live in peace, but in our way – freedom," says this militant, who says he narrowly missed being shot with a pistol on Tuesday when he went to open a road closed by Aoun supporters, fellow Christians. "We don't want someone to shoot up a shop if it sells arak [liquor], or throw acid in the face of a girl if she does not wear a veil.

"I hope it continues, this Sunni-Shiite fighting, and they kill off each other," says the militant. "They will kill our children after."

Such strong views are gathering voice in Lebanon, as activists openly chant sectarian taunts for the first time in years. Many of those on the front lines were mere toddlers at the end of the last civil war.

"We are really scared," says Deem, a Sunni woman studying for a masters degree in finance at the university. "The situation has not been safe, and no one knows about the future."

"It is a nightmare. But what I saw [in Thursday's clashes] was the beginning," says Deem. "It is a civil war already, and somebody should do something, to defuse it fast. The Lebanese need to do something."

Thursday after the clashes was "fine, everyone went home," she says. "But what about tomorrow? Or the day after tomorrow?"

A NATO For The Middle East (TIME)

By Walter Isaacson
Time, January 29, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123205

When theÂ U.S. was faced with a new global threatÂ 60 years ago, the expansionism of Soviet communism, its leaders responded with an awesome burst of creativity. Among the institutions they launched were the World Bank, the Marshall Plan and, most important, the mutual-defense pact and military alliance NATO.

Now faced with a new global threat, that of terrorism from Islamist extremists, we could sure use some of that type of creative and bold thinking. What would George Marshall and Dean Acheson be doing now? At the top of their list, I suspect, would be forging a new version of NATO. They might call it MATO: the Mideast Antiterrorism Organization, a military, police, intelligence and security mutual-defense alliance between the West and our moderate allies in the Middle East.

This MATO alliance would include the countries that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, on her recent trip to the region, referred to as the "mainstream" and "moderate" Arab nations: Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and the gulf states. These nations are as threatened as we are by the rise of Iran and of Islamist radicalism.

Creating the alliance would present an opportunity disguised as a challenge: for it to be most effective, it should include Israel. That would require an Israeli peace with the Palestinians, which would permit Israel to escape from having to occupy the West Bank indefinitely. The opportunity is that Israel could (as the Saudi plan of 2002 suggested) then establish normal relations with the moderate Arab states, and the new military alliance could provide the security guarantees that could make any Israeli-Palestinian settlement work.

Another challenge would be to ensure that the new alliance does not inflame the sectarian divide in the Islamic world, which could happen if it is seen as a Sunni cabal against the Shi'ites. But if the new Iraqi government (the only Shi'ite-led one besides Iran in the region) joined, the new alliance could show that it was willing to protect both moderate Shi'ites as well as Sunnis. The alliance would then be able to help take over from the U.S. some of the security responsibility in Iraq, and it could wean the Shi'ite leaders in Baghdad from their ties to Tehran.

There is, however, one major philosophical objection to this approach. The so-called moderate Arab states, particularly Egypt and Saudi Arabia, are far from paragons of democracy.

Since Sept. 11, the Bush Administration has put a premium on an idealistic and neoconservative agenda of pushing hard for democracy in the region even at the risk of short-term destabilization. It would be nice to continue to say, as Secretary Rice used to declare frequently, that there is no conflict between pushing for more democracy and seeking greater stability in the Middle East. That may be true in the long run. But the real-world present is more complicated, and there are some real trade-offs. An unsettling fact about the Middle East, as the elections in the Palestinian territories and Iran have demonstrated, is that democracy does not always go hand in hand with moderation in the short term. Elections in Egypt and Saudi Arabia would surely show the same.

Rice's rhetoric has now changed. On previous trips to Egypt, she was firm in preaching the need for faster democratic reform. But that sermon was missing during her latest trip, when she instead spoke of America's "important strategic relationship" with Egypt in what she has called a struggle "between extremism on the one hand and mainstream states on the other."

In a recent editorial, the Washington Post warned that Bush should not sacrifice his democracy agenda in the Middle East. And indeed it would be perilous to abandon our ideals for the sake of short-term security.

So what would Marshall and Acheson do? They probably would have created, in addition to a NATO-like antiterrorism alliance, a worldwide coalition of true and free democracies, ranging from India to Turkey to Israel. This Concert of Democracies could work on ways to nurture and support our common ideals, even as the new antiterrorism military alliance could be used to protect our security interests. Washington could use both instruments, just as it now uses both NATO and the U.N., depending on the situation.

Perhaps such an approach could even begin to minimize the trade-offs that now seem to vex us. Membership in MATO, especially if it drains some of the bile from the Israeli-Palestinian dispute, could make the leaders and citizens in places such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia feel more secure. And that may make them more open to greater democracy and reform.

U.S., N. Korea To Resume Financial Talks (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, January 29, 2007

A senior Treasury official said the groundwork has been laid for U.S.-North Korea talks Tuesday on U.S. financial restrictions against the North's alleged smuggling and counterfeiting, which have angered Pyongyang and held up separate talks on scrapping its nuclear weapons program.

U.S. Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert M. Kimmitt said the talks will resume in Beijing at North Korea's request.

"I would say these talks are proceeding in a business-like fashion," he said in an interview Saturday on the sidelines of the World Economic Forum. "I think progress is being made on the technical understanding on both sides."

DOJ_NMG_0123206

"But these are a set of talks, from our perspective, designed to make clear that the action that we took was narrowly targeted, focused on illicit conduct — and the way to cure it is to foreswear such conduct, make restitution for what's been done in the past, and move forward," Kimmitt said.

In a sign of stepped-up diplomacy with Pyongyang, the U.S.-North Korea talks will be quickly followed in early February by another round of six-nation negotiations on the North's nuclear program. The nuclear talks involve the U.S., Russia, China, Japan and the two Koreas.

The U.S. Treasury said it notified all U.S. banks on Sept. 15, 2005 that they were banned from doing business with Banco Delta Asia SARL in Macau, which effectively barred the bank from operating in the world financial system. The United States initially alleged that North Korea was using the bank for cigarette smuggling and counterfeiting $100 bills. Later it alleged Banco Delta Asia was linked with a bank connected to the North's missile program.

The Treasury has not yet finalized the ban so banks are not legally banned from doing business with Banco Delta Asia — but all affected banks immediately cut off all business with the bank, U.S. officials said.

The U.S. action on Banco Delta Asia came four days before a Sept. 19, 2005 agreement at the six-nation talks in which North Korea agreed to abandon its nuclear program in exchange for security guarantees and aid. That accord has yet to be implemented. Upset and citing the U.S. restrictions, Pyongyang withdrew from further talks and then tested a nuclear bomb on Oct. 9, 2006.

Kimmitt said that at a meeting with the North Koreans in New York in March 2006, U.S. officials explained that the Treasury took action against the Macau bank as it has in many other places in the world where it discovered suspicious activity.

The U.S. made clear "this was not directed against North Korea as a country, it was directed against the conduct in which North Korea was engaged using that bank," he said.

The North Koreans agreed to return to the nuclear talks in December, saying there were no preconditions. But the talks ended with no apparent progress due to the dispute over the U.S. financial restrictions.

Another round of nuclear talks is expected to take place in Beijing in early February.

Diamonds In The Sky (TIME)

Time, January 26, 2007

China's successful antisatellite-missle test Jan. 11 carries potential implicationsÂ for the international community, which has collectively placed at least 316 satellites within the missile's proven range (528 more orbiters, such as GPS and early-warning satellites, fly even higher). At issue are military surveillance satellites--the very ones that detected Beijing's test--which represent only 6% of the total number but almost all of which fly within reach. Until now, only Russia and the U.S. have downed space objects, and despite Beijing's assurances that the test was not adversarial, the U.S. sees a threat to its spy satellites--and a possible catalyst to a space arms race. [This article consists of a complex diagram. Please see hardcopy of magazine.]

Former Salvadoran Foes Share Doubts On War (WP)

By Manuel Roig-Franzia

The Washington Post, January 29, 2007

SAN MIGUEL, El Salvador -- JosÃ© Wilfredo Salgado says he collected baby skulls as trophies in the 1980s, when he fought as a government soldier in El Salvador's civil war. They worked well as candleholders, he recalls, and better as good-luck charms.

In the most barbaric chapters of a conflict that cost more than 75,000 lives, he enthusiastically embraced the scorched-earth tactics of his army bosses, even massacres of children, the elderly, the sick -- entire villages.

It was all in the name of beating back communism, Salgado, now the mayor of San Miguel, said he remembers being told.

But as El Salvador commemorates the 15th anniversary of the war's end this month, Salgado is haunted by doubts about what he saw, what he did and even why he fought. A 12-year U.S.-backed war that was defined at the time as a battle over communism is now seen by former government soldiers such as Salgado, and by former guerrillas, as less a conflict about ideology and more a battle over poverty and basic human rights.

"We soldiers were tricked -- they told us the threat was communism," Salgado said as bodyguards with pistols tucked into their waistbands hovered nearby at his home, ringed by barbed wire. "But I look back and realize those weren't communists out there that we were fighting -- we were just poor country people killing poor country people."

Salgado said he once thought that the guerrillas dreamed of communism, but now that those same men are his colleagues in business and politics, he is learning that they wanted what he wanted: prosperity, a chance to move up in the world, freedom from repression.

DOJ_NMG_0123207

All of which makes what they see around them today even more heartbreaking and frustrating. For all their sacrifices, El Salvador is still among the poorest countries in the Western Hemisphere -- more than 40 percent of Salvadorans live on less than $2 a day, according to the United Nations. The country is still racked by violence, still scarred by corruption. For some the question remains: Was it all worth it?

"We gave our blood, we killed our friends and, in the end, things are still bad," said Salgado, who has served three terms as mayor of El Salvador's second-largest city. "Look at all this poverty, and look how the wealth is concentrated in just a few hands."

North of Salgado's home, the guerrillas he once fought live with the same doubts. Speeding along the curvy mountain roads near the onetime rebel stronghold of Perquin one recent afternoon, former guerrilla Benito Chica Argueta lamented that the future didn't turn out as he'd hoped.

Today, he scrapes together a living any way he can: Sometimes he sings at parties, sometimes he sells firewood. Zipping past a few sturdy masonry houses that appeared out of place alongside flimsy shacks, he quietly observed that such luxuries were beyond his reach.

"Those are people who get money sent from their relatives working in the United States," he said. "They're the only people around here who can afford a nice house."

Miles from those nice homes, he parked and hiked through a craggy ravine, grabbing vines to steady himself as he worked higher and higher up the Cacahuatique Mountains. At the end of the ravine, he reached a cave. Inside, bats skittered through the cool darkness that was his refuge as a scared young guerrilla. It still feels like a safe place to him.

Chica Argueta, who maintains the pencil-thin mustache he wore as a young rebel, once trudged through a shallow stream to get there, so that he wouldn't leave footprints that would give away the location of the guerrillas' Radio Venceremos -- Radio We Will Be Victorious. Now he'll take anyone there for a few dollars.

In a honeyed voice that once crooned revolutionary anthems, Chica Argueta, now 46, said his guided visits are part of an effort to build a tourist industry on the relics of El Salvador's civil war -- one of the first such endeavors in Central America. But something else is at work. He is trying to secure his guerrilla movement's place in history.

Even though some factions of the coalition of guerrilla armies that fought in El Salvador's civil war were Marxist, he said, ideology had nothing to do with his decision to take up arms and leave the farm where his father earned only a few colones for backbreaking work. Nor did ideology play a role in motivating his friends in the People's Revolutionary Army -- one of five guerrilla factions during the war -- that he served with in the northern Morazan region, he said. He remembers fighting "for a piece of land, for the chance that my children might someday get to go to the university."

The Reagan administration, fearing a communist uprising, built up El Salvador's military with weapons, training and hundreds of advisers to serve as a surrogate force against what it described as encroaching Soviet and Cuban influence in Central America. To this day, Chica Argueta seethes when he recalls the sight of U.S. planes, knowing that they were there to fight a communist threat that he believes was overblown.

The war's degeneration into senseless malice was seared into Chica Argueta's mind in a tiny mountain town called El Mozote. In December 1981, a U.S.-trained battalion of government troops tortured and executed about 500 villagers there; the names of dozens of victims -- many under the age of 2 -- are now etched on the wall of the rebuilt church.

Chica Argueta and his fellow guerrillas arrived in El Mozote several days after the massacre and, fearing a return of the soldiers, hurriedly buried the dead beneath a thin layer of adobe bricks. Salgada arrived months later, after rains had unearthed the corpses, and piled skulls into sacks as souvenirs. He had "lost his love of humanity," he recalled, but a kernel of doubt was forming. He was conflicted, as he is today.

Salgada kept the skulls for years. They were reminders of how deeply he had sunk into depravity, yet somehow they also represented his awakening, he said. Witnessing the aftermath of what his colleagues did in El Mozote and reflecting on those skulls changed his mind about how the war was being fought. He might still have the skulls, he said, if not for the new family and the new life he has forged.

"Could you imagine the nightmares my children would have if I kept them in the house?" he said.

Salgada's mentor, the vaunted Col. Domingo Monterrosa, ordered the attack in El Mozote, which Salgada said he now considers "a genocide." Yet Salgada displays a huge painting of himself and Monterrosa -- who was killed during the war -- in the foyer of San Miguel City Hall. Perhaps it will make people ask questions about the war, Salgada said, though he's sure "people hate me" for displaying it.

If Monterrosa had lived, Salgada said, he should have been prosecuted for "war crimes like a Hitler." But he tempered his historical indictment, saying that "those were different times."

The scars of what he and his compatriots did, of the horrors of their brand of war, linger. Just two years ago, on a bridge in San Miguel, Salgada encountered a former government soldier who appeared to believe the war was still underway. He saluted

DOJ_NMG_0123208

Salgada and told him he had secured the bridge so that rebels couldn't cross, even though the war had been over for more than a decade.

"These are old wounds," Salgada said. "These anniversaries just open them wider."

Salgada and Chica Argueta now share a point of view, a common phenomenon in El Salvador today, where former soldiers and guerrillas often work together and intermarry. Chica Argueta said he believes the intermingling of former enemies was made possible by peace accords signed in 1992 without declaring a loser, thus leaving the guerrillas and the government soldiers on an even plane.

While Salgada and Chica Argueta struggle with doubts about the war, El Salvador's ruling party, the Nationalist Republican Alliance, or ARENA, presents a less nuanced image. ARENA prides itself as a bulwark against communism. The party's official hymn, sung often at political and government gatherings, boasts that "El Salvador is the tomb of the red ones," a reference to communist sympathizers.

Walter Araujo, an ARENA stalwart who is president of El Salvador's Supreme Court and former head of the party, said in an interview that the civil war "put up a barrier against communist expansion. . . . To say communism wasn't a threat at that time would be to deny history."

Araujo is quick to point out that some rebel factions received support from Fidel Castro in Cuba and Daniel Ortega's Sandinista government in Nicaragua. And those countries might have played an outsize role in shaping El Salvador if the war had ended differently, Araujo said.

"We would have suffered the same fate as Nicaragua if there had been a victory by the left," Araujo said.

Today, Araujo and others describe what they portray as a similar threat -- the rise of populist socialist movements in Latin America -- and worry that El Salvador once again will be swept up in a bitter ideological fight.

"The risk has resurged," Araujo said.

A group of former guerrillas watched Araujo speak on television a few days before the Jan. 16 anniversary of the peace accords and scoffed at his comparisons between the present and the civil war era. On the patio of a small hotel in Perquin, where a civil war museum promotes the guerrilla version of history, they fretted that their struggle is still misunderstood.

The conversation drifted toward their disappointments about postwar El Salvador: the continued mass migration to the United States by Salvadorans who cannot find work at home, their fears about violence in a country with one of the highest murder rates in the world, their worries that the government isn't doing enough to address either problem.

"We have no historical memory here in El Salvador -- has everyone forgotten what we fought for?" said Adolfo Sanchez, a 47-year-old former guerrilla whose left arm is several inches shorter than his right because a bullet obliterated his elbow.

Then Sanchez paused. A smile grew on his face.

"You know," he said, "before the war we never could have sat here, right out in the open, and said such things."

Maybe, they all agreed, it had been worth it after all.

Zakaria: Preview Of A Post-U.S. World (NSWK)

By Fareed Zakaria

Newsweek, February 5, 2007

Two things were missing from this year's world Economic Forum at Davos: snow (which arrived eventually) and America-bashing (which did not). There were, of course, lots of American businessmen, activists and intellectuals filling the panels and halls of the conference. There were even a few senior American officials—though no star speaker. But, for the first time in my memory, America was somewhat peripheral. There were few demands, pleas, complaints or tantrums directed at the United States. In this small but significant global cocoon, people—for the moment at least—seemed to be moving beyond America.

"There has always been a talk by a senior American official as one of the centerpieces of the Forum," said a European who has advised the Forum for many years—and who asked to remain anonymous because of his relations with U.S. officials. "And in the past, people eagerly anticipated who that would be—Colin Powell, Dick Cheney, Condoleezza Rice. This year, almost no one inquired. We expected disappointment. But there was none. No one even noticed."

Part of the reason is that people are moving beyond George W. Bush. Europeans and Middle Easterners in particular used to rail against Bush. Now they think that their views about him and his policies—whether on Iraq, global warming or unilateralism—have all been vindicated, so why keep ranting? Besides, he's a lame-duck president, his weakness on full display in last week's plaintive State of the Union address.

But there may be a larger phenomenon at work here. This year's conference theme was titled "Shaping the Global Agenda: The Shifting Power Equation." The emphasis, and some of the talk at the conference, focused on that shift in power, with speakers foretelling the rise of Asia (and implicitly, the decline of America and Europe).

DOJ_NMG_0123209

We are certainly in a trough for America—with Bush in his last years, with the United States mired in Iraq, with hostility toward Washington still high almost everywhere. But if so, we might also be getting a glimpse of what a world without America would look like. It will be free of American domination, but perhaps also free of leadership—a world in which problems fester and the buck is endlessly passed, until problems explode.

Listen to the new powers. China, which in three years will likely become the world's biggest emitter of CO2, is determined not to be a leader in dealing with global environmental issues. "The ball is not in China's court," said Zhu Min, the executive vice president of the Bank of China and a former senior official in the government. "The ball is in everybody's court." India's brilliant planning czar, Montek Singh Alluwalliah, said that "every country should have the same per capita rights to pollution." In the abstract that's logical enough, but in the real world, if 2.3 billion people (the population of China plus India) pollute at average Western levels, you will have a global meltdown.

German Chancellor Angela Merkel called for a new round of trade talks and asked that everyone be "flexible." In fact, the United States has exhibited considerable flexibility, relaxing its position on many contentious issues, including agricultural subsidies. On the other hand, France, that eloquent critic of U.S. unilateralism, has refused to budge on its lavish subsidies for farmers. As a result, the European Union is fractured and paralyzed. For their part Brazil, China and India speak of flexibility in the abstract but have made no new proposals. The ball for every problem is in everybody's court, which means that it is in nobody's court.

The problem is that this free ride prob-ably can't last forever. The global system—economic, political, social—is not self-managing. Global economic growth has been a fantastic boon, but it produces stresses and strains that have to be handled. Without some coordination, or first mover—or, dare one say it, leader—such management is more difficult.

The world today bears some resemblance to the 1920s, when a newly globalized economy was booming, and science and technological change were utterly transforming life. (Think of the high-tech of the time—electricity, radio, movies and cars, among other recent inventions.) But with Britain declining and America isolationist, that was truly a world without political direction. Eventually protectionism, nationalism, xenophobia and war engulfed it.

In a provocative essay in Foreign Policy three years ago, the British historian Niall Ferguson speculated that the end of American hegemony might not fuel an orderly shift to a multipolar system but a descent into a world of highly fragmented powers, with no one exercising any global leader-ship. He called this "apolarity." "Apolarity could turn out to mean an anarchic new Dark Age," Ferguson wrote, "an era of waning empires and religious fanaticism, of economic plunder and pillage in the world's forgotten regions, of economic stagnation, and civilization's retreat into a few fortified enclaves." That might be a little farfetched. But for those who have been fondly waiting for the waning of American dominance—be careful what you wish for.

Boy Wonder (TIME)

By Catherine Mayer

Time, January 29, 2007

Britain's leader of the opposition isn't a typical alpha male. He's the kind of guy who pauses before biting into a muffin. "I really shouldn't," he says during a day of campaigning in Scotland. "I'm fat." That's not true, but like many an Englishman who ingested stodgy food at boarding school, David Cameron, 40, the leader of Britain's Conservative Party, lacks sharp angles. His telegenic appeal has propelled the Tories to a consistent lead in opinion polls for the first time since Tony Blair's 1997 victory. That has infused Britain's Conservatives with a sensation so unfamiliar, they barely recognize it: optimism. Giddy at this turn of fortune, some are already mythologizing the man behind it. Iain Dale, who writes a Conservative blog, speaks of Cameron's "Kennedyesque glamour." Cameron and his wife Samantha--the daughter of a baronet, who sports a tattoo of a dolphin on her ankle--are among London's most sought-after party guests. Says Gregory Barker, a Tory M.P. and member of Cameron's campaign team: "People sniff Camelot."

Actually, Cameron has more in common with a certain British pol than he does with J.F.K. Whether nodding sagely to recovering drug addicts at a rehab center north of Aberdeen or charming Scottish journalists on the serpentine train journey to Edinburgh, the person whom Cameron resembles more than any other is a young Blair. He has the same brow-furrowing desire not only to understand his interlocutors but to empathize with them; the same rootless accent that in Britain indicates an easy start in life (in his case, school days at Eton and a degree from Oxford). And like Blair a decade ago--when he was dumping his party's traditions to appeal to a wider constituency--Cameron inspires suspicion as well as excitement. One Labour Party campaign depicted the Tory leader as a chameleon.

Yet the time might be ripe for Cameron. Blair has said he'll step down before the fall. His presumptive successor, Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown, is saddled by a more leaden style, a darker visage and a government that is losing popularity, largely because of the mess in Iraq. But Brown does not have to call an election until 2010, so Cameron can't rely on the war to deliver 10 Downing Street to him. Every second week he makes a foray from what he calls "the Westminster bubble" to some farther-flung outpost of the kingdom, meeting as many people as possible. "Obviously," he says, "in politics, people want to have a look at you and understand who you are and what makes you tick."

DOJ_NMG_0123210

That's where the trouble begins. It's easy enough to locate Cameron's heart; that's with his family. He and Samantha have three children under 5--the eldest is severely disabled--and he says he spends most of his home life "knee-deep in nappies and wailing children." When his staff urged him to start his trip to Scotland early because of a forecast of gales, Cameron refused, insisting he had to put his children to bed.

The wellsprings of his political conviction are harder to trace. If a Kennedy inspires him, it's Bobby, the "wonderful orator," not his big brother. Unlike Blair and Brown, Cameron doesn't exude a strong affinity for the U.S. And in a departure from his predecessors, Cameron rarely invokes the name of the Tories' biggest icon: Margaret Thatcher. "To me, Mrs. Thatcher--it's all a long time in the past," says Cameron. "People are voting at the next election who were born after Mrs. Thatcher left office."

Many Tories of Cameron's generation believe that their party needs to reclaim the middle ground so brilliantly colonized by Blair and distance itself from the fiercely ideological course it charted during the Thatcher era. "We're seen as the nasty party," says Barker. To revamp that image, Cameron has engaged in conspicuously un-Tory-like behavior, traveling widely and posting a confessional blog at www.webcameron.org.uk He's promoting a doctrine he calls "modern, compassionate Conservatism," which is "about helping those people who can get left behind." In a nod to a nation where opposing global warming has become a semireligious duty, he claims to be more environmentally friendly than Labour. Cameron's slogan in local elections last May was "Vote blue, go green."

That sort of talk has worried some of the party faithful, but Cameron wants his big ideas to appeal across party lines. "You have to do what Bill Clinton did and build a big tent," says Dale, paying respect to a man whom an older generation of Conservatives dismissed as a pot-smoking, skirt-chasing lefty. But even Dale would like Cameron to signal to traditional Tories that "the old issues will be treated as seriously as the new ones." That might mean an overt reiteration of the Tories' traditional claim to be the party of low taxation. Or--always a favorite with the right wing--blaming the European Union for Britain's ills.

So far, though, Cameron has avoided making many explicit policy statements, relying instead on warm and fuzzy ideas like a belief in "social responsibility" that he says will empower business, individuals and local government. But in Britain's red-meat political and media landscape, warm and fuzzy is rarely enough. Popular attitudes to politicians are still set by the tabloids, which take no prisoners. And so far, the red tops aren't convinced. "I can't get to grips with Cameron, and I don't think the electorate can," says Trevor Kavanagh, the longtime political voice of the Sun. Here's a warning for the conservative comer: if the Sun thinks you're not substantial enough, that's a weight problem to worry about.

People's Investment Company (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 29, 2007

For Wall Street, the big news out of China this month is that the country will "actively explore and expand the channels and methods for using foreign-exchange reserves." The Communist Party might hive off a big chunk of its $1 trillion stash and invest abroad on behalf of its citizens, a la Singapore's Government Investment Corporation. That may be a boon for bankers, but it's not necessarily a smart idea for China.

This is yet another scene in the Party's balancing act between economic liberalization and state control. China's exchange-rate policy -- the catalyst for its huge foreign-exchange reserves -- is at the heart of the debate. By more or less pegging the renminbi to the dollar, Beijing accumulates foreign-exchange reserves when it mops up the incoming greenbacks. The policy has spurred an enormous boom, giving Chinese and foreigners the confidence to invest without worrying about price volatility.

This has also bought time for China to reform its broken financial sector -- a task that's far from finished. At the same financial conference at which the government investment idea was floated, Premier Wen Jiabao kicked off the reform of the Agricultural Bank of China, more than half of whose loan portfolio is rumored to be non-performing; it will take perhaps $100 billion or more to bail it out.

So why hive off foreign-exchange reserves into a Singapore-style fund? For one, China's policymakers may be frustrated that their efforts to encourage money to flow abroad aren't working quickly enough to offset the tide of incoming capital. The so-called Qualified Domestic Investor Initiative scheme, which lets Chinese investors buy bonds abroad, has attracted only a few billion dollars so far.

But there are good reasons for that. Today, Chinese investors see better prospects at home. The Shanghai stock market is up more than 110% over the past 12 months, and property prices are still healthy. Chinese investors probably aren't turned on by buying U.S Treasury bonds. If the Party were serious about opening their capital markets, they'd let investors buy General Electric on the New York Stock Exchange, or a vacation home in Thailand.

DOJ_NMG_0123211

It's more likely that Beijing likes the GIC-like setup because it would keep the Party's hands on the money. Singapore's fund hasn't released public accounts since its founding in 1981; its stated total under management, at $100 billion, hasn't changed in years. But at least Singapore has a reputation for clean governance; the same can't be said of China's bureaucracy.

Beijing's policymakers could also make political hay domestically by telling citizens that they will get more return for their renminbi -- which could then be invested in, say, education or health care. This is the "negative carry" argument -- the idea that foreign investors are receiving double-digit returns on their dollars, while China's central bank receives single-digit returns when it invests renminbi in U.S. T-bills.

But that's not the way it really works. Foreign-exchange reserves are liabilities on a central bank's balance sheet, not found money. Up to a certain point, reserves assure foreign investors that a country has ammunition to fight an attack on its currency, such as during the 1997-98 financial crisis. Once reserves accumulate beyond that point, more fundamental questions about government policy have to be raised. Instead of creating an opaque government institution to manage reserves, China would do better to tackle the root problem: the need for more capital freedom.

DOJ_NMG_0123212

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, January 29, 2007 8:15 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Sunday, January 28, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070128.pdf; agnb070128.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, JANUARY 28, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Professor Calls War On Terror A "Massive Overreaction." 2
Express-News Questions Surveillance Moves.....3

Homeland Response:

New Passport Rules Take Effect 3
D'Souza Says Bin Laden Targeted US For Its Assaults On Values 3
Charities Responsible For Most Of Katrina Reconstruction 3

War News:

Demonstrators Turn Out In Opposition To Iraq War.....3
Deliberations Over Iraq War Said To Color Response To Criticisms Of Iran.....5
Seven US Troops Killed; Bombers Strike Baghdad Market 6
Iraq's Shiite Vice President Ambivalent About Surge 7
War Raises Questions About Volunteer Military.....7
Iraqi Soldiers Still Reliant On US 8
Iraqi Government Cultivates Ties To US Democrats 8
Army Probes Contractor Fraud 8
Warner's Iraq Stance Affected By Vietnam 8
Ex-USAID Worker Remembers Work In Fallujah Before Injury.9
Taliban Threatens Summer Wave Of Suicide Bombers 9

Corporate Scandals:

Qwest May Face Dispute Over CEO's Legal Fees 9
Shareholders, Company Directors Urged To Rein In Executive Pay.....9

Criminal Law:

Libby Trial Reveals Lack Of Identity Protection For CIA Agents 9
Havesi Prosecutor Seeks "One Standard Of Justice." 10
Penalty Phase Of Criminal Trials Lays Bare All Secrets 10
Doubt Cast On Perception That Teen Girls Are Becoming More Violent 10
US Praised For Law Enforcement Aid To New Orleans 11

Civil Rights:

Mississippi Clerk Testifies To Inaction On Invalid Ballots 11
New Jersey Towns Mull Tougher Rules For Rental Housing Overcrowding 12
Police Departments Make Effort To Boost Minority Recruitment..... 12
Religious Issues Increasingly Debated In US Courts 13

Antitrust:

Microsoft Faces New EU Antitrust Questions With Vista 13

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Michigan Waste Treatment Firm Faces Dumping Charges.. 13
Energy Independence Could Be "Century Away" Under Bush Plan 14
Breakthrough Reported In Debate Over House Climate Change Committee..... 14
Communities Concerned Over Expiration Of Rural Law 14
Two Wolf Species To Lose Endangered Status 14
Tribe Oppose Bid To Alter Gaming Laws 14

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Battered Mexican Drug Cartel Said To Be On The Ropes 15
Brady Center Targets Gun Dealers 15

Immigration:

Minnesota Family Decries Mother's Deportation As Daughter Faces Medical Treatment..... 15
National Guard Soldiers On "Front Line" Of Immigration Debate 16

Tax:

Taxpayers Left In The Dark About IRS Bond Probes 16
NYTimes Says Bush Tax Credits Should Be Allowed To Expire 17

Congress-Administration:
New White House Counsel Seen Better Suited To Upcoming Challenges 17
Experts Warn Bush Health Plan Would End Employee Benefits 17
Reid Land Purchase, Ties To Lubricants Industry Examined 17
Schumer Says GOP Senators May Moderate Stances 18
Johnson's Continued Absence Felt On Capitol Hill 18
As Only Female, Ginsburg Feels Isolated On Court 18
Navy Calls Off Search For Missing Sailors 18
Will Criticizes Move To Give US Territories Vote In House 18
Bush Urged To Make Papers Public, Disclose Library Contributors 19

Other News:
Median Home Prices Dropping 19
Democrats Seek To Tap Into Economic Anxiety Of Swing Voters 19
Clinton Holds First Iowa Event Of Her Presidential Campaign 19
Giuliani Hits New Hampshire, But Stays Mum On Plans 21
Obama First Became "Political Sensation" At Harvard Law School 22
Novak Says Democrats Pleased By "Dour" McCain Interview 23
Romney Said To Be Winning Support Of Hastert, House GOP 23
McAuliffe Says GOP Candidates Will "Stay Away" From Bush 23
Six Politicians' Endorsements Could Impact Primaries 23
Successful "Dark Horse" Candidates Could Be Nearing Extinction 23
Cullen To Head New Hampshire GOP 23
Impact Of Possible California Primary Move Considered 23
Colorado Democrats Could Move Caucuses To February 5 .24
Chait Would Like To See Presidents Bush, Clinton To Face Off In 2008 24
Baker Weighing Challenge To Landrieu 24
Speech By Jeb Bush Energizes Conservative Gathering 24
US-European Missile Defense Cooperation Said To Face Local, Russian Resistance 25
WTO Doha Talk Resumption Will Seek Technical Agreements First 25
Three Killed In Third Day Of Fatah-Hamas Fighting 25
Israel May Have Violated Arms Export Control Act 26
NYTimes Says Dialogue With Syria Is Crucial To Stabilizing Lebanon 26
Saudis Said To Work To Keep Oil Prices Stable 26
Pelosi Leads Delegation To Discuss Security With Musharraf 26
Two Americans Killed By Carjackers In Kenya 27
Sudan's North-South Peace Accord "Endangered." 27
Hoagland Says Tutu Is Example For Bush, World 28
Mexican Efforts To Stem Central American Immigration Said To Falter 28
Karimov Said To Maintain Firm Control In Uzbekistan 28
Kerry Assails Bush Administration Foreign Policy 28

The Big Picture
Headlines From Today's Front Pages 28

Washington's Schedule
Today's Events In Washington 29

TERRORISM NEWS:

Professor Calls War On Terror A "Massive Overreaction." In a Los Angeles Times (1/28, 850K) op-ed, David Bell, a professor of history at Johns Hopkins University, questions whether the American reaction to the 9/11 attacks has "in fact been a massive overreaction." Bell says "it is no disrespect to the victims of 9/11, or to the men and women of our armed forces, to say that, by the standards of past wars, the war against terrorism has so far inflicted a very small human cost on the United States." The "people who attacked us in 2001 are indeed hate-filled fanatics who would like nothing better than to destroy this country," Bell concedes, but stresses that "desire is not the same thing as capacity, and although Islamist extremists can certainly do huge amounts of harm around the world, it is quite different to suggest that they can threaten the existence of the United States." Therefore, he suggests that the war against terrorism "has not yet been much of a war at all, let alone a war to end all wars," but rather "a messy, difficult, long-term struggle against exceptionally dangerous criminals." To fight them effectively, Bell says "we need coolness, resolve and stamina. But we also need to overcome long habit and remind ourselves that not every enemy is in fact a threat to our existence."

DOJ_NMG_0123215

Express-News Questions Surveillance Moves. The San Antonio Express-News (1/28) editorializes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the nation will be 'no less safe' now that the Bush administration has agreed to bring its warrantless surveillance program into line with provisions of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. … The effort to monitor international calls to or from terrorist suspects will now come under some sort of scrutiny from the secretive FISA court, specially created to review intelligence matters." The Express-News continues, "It is a curious reversal for the administration that raises an important question: If judicial review of the program doesn't impair national security, why didn't the White House adhere to this legal process from the beginning? … President Bush had maintained that as commander in chief, he is empowered in time of war to carry out such surveillance beyond the purview of the FISA court. Since the surveillance effort became known publicly in late 2005, he has strenuously argued that any changes to the program would imperil national security. … The new White House position still asserts this executive power — what Gonzales calls 'inherent authority.' But it accepts some sort of formal review process under FISA rules." The Express-News adds, "Other than a new majority in Congress, what has changed? No one really knows, because Gonzales' description of the process is as nebulous as the surveillance program itself. … Unfortunately, we don't know whether the program has changed or if the administration's interpretation of the law has changed. Bush's penchant for executive signing statements — Oval Office appendages to new laws that carve out exemptions for executive power — doesn't inspire confidence in the former."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New Passport Rules Take Effect. NBC Nightly News (1/27, story 9, 2:00, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "This week marked the beginning of a new era in air travel for Americans. In the old days if you were flying from Canada, Mexico or the Caribbean, all you needed to show at Customs was a birth certificate. Not any more. Some fear the new rules will spell trouble for American travelers."

D'Souza Says Bin Laden Targeted US For Its Assaults On Values. Dinesh D'Souza, author and fellow at the Hoover Institution, writes in the Washington Post (1/28, B1, 690K) that "contrary to the common liberal view, I don't believe that the 9/11 attacks were payback for US foreign policy. Bin Laden isn't upset because there are US troops in Mecca," nor is it "all about Israel. (Why hasn't al-Qaeda launched a single attack against Israel?)" D'Souza says, "Contrary to President Bush's view, they don't hate us for our freedom, either. Rather, they hate us for how we use our freedom." Instead, he asserts that it is the "assault on prevailing religious and traditional values" that angers the "sensibilities of many of the world's people." D'Souza says the US "cannot defeat terrorism without driving a wedge between radical Islam and traditional Islam, because the latter has been the main recruiting pool for the former."

Charities Responsible For Most Of Katrina Reconstruction. The Washington Post (1/28, A3, Whoriskey, 690K) reports, "While the national debate over the recovery has focused on the billions expected in federal aid and insurance, those sources have so far provided little for places…, and charity efforts have constituted more than 80 percent of the home rebuilding completed so far," local and charity officials on the Gulf Coast said. In Hancock County, Mississippi, "where nearly 11,000 homes were destroyed by the storm," the largest single home rebuilder is the local Habitat for Humanity project." The reason for the charity's "dominant role" in the rebuilding is that "little, if any, of the $3.2 billion in federal aid for Mississippi homeowners has reached anyone here -- it is tied up for now at the state level." As for insurance, "most residents of this rural community lacked any form of flood policy."

WAR NEWS:

Demonstrators Turn Out In Opposition To Iraq War. Saturday demonstrations against President Bush's Iraq policy receive heavy and generally sympathetic coverage on an otherwise slow news day, when the other big story was the early action in the presidential race. Reports on the protests concentrate on the disputed turnout numbers, the presence of film celebrities and several active-duty members of the military, and on the demonstrators' intention to impact Democrats in Congress more than the President.

NBC Nightly News (1/27, lead story, 2:55, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) led with the demonstrations, saying "tens of thousands of Americans converged on Washington, D.C., demonstrating against the war in Iraq, urging the US government to bring the troops home. The crowd gathered on the Washington Mall joined by politicians and celebrities like Jane Fonda delivering a message that was clearly intended for the President." NBC (Yang): "President Bush asked American people to give his plan for Iraq a chance. But the people who marched in the streets in Washington and other cities today were in no mood to be patient. The demonstrators' message: no more troops to Iraq and bring all the troops home. It was aimed at both President Bush and the new Democratic majority in Congress."

DOJ_NMG_0123216

The CBS Evening News (1/27, story 2, 3:00, Assuras, 7.66M) also ran the story near the top of the broadcast, saying "here at home, there were anti-war protests in Washington and other cities as well." CBS (Chen): "This was not the first, this was not the biggest protest of its type this city has seen. Still, organizers believe it will have a significant impact, mostly because it tried to change the direction of the debate over the war by changing the direction of the protest. The surge of protestors pushed off, led by faces you might expect -- activist Jesse Jackson, actor Sean Penn, and Jane Fonda, who admitted she avoided this soapbox since the days she was called Hanoi Jane. … But for all the tie-dye and familiar chants, the anti-war movement has moved on, and changed direction. Today's protest didn't go near the White House, instead leading tens of thousands up Constitution Avenue towards the Capitol, bearing a message for the new Congress, now controlled by Democrats."

ABC World News (1/27, story 5, 2:00, Weir, 8.78M) said the "steady drumbeat of death was on the minds of demonstrators from Washington, D.C., to the West Coast." ABC (Marquez): "The tens of thousands of protestors who gathered on both coasts today spoke with a single voice: They want the US out of Iraq. … Hollywood celebrities crowded the stage, including Jane Fonda, a controversial figure from the Vietnam antiwar movement." The Washington Post (1/28, D1, Weeks, 690K) details Fonda's re-emergence on the activist scene.

On its front page, the Washington Post (1/28, Ruane, Kunkle, 690K) reports, "A raucous and colorful multitude of protesters, led by some of the aging activists of the past, staged a series of rallies and a march on the Capitol yesterday to demand that the United States end its war in Iraq. ... They came from across the country and across the activist spectrum, with a wide array of grievances. Many seemed to be under 30, but there were others who said they had been at the famed war protests of the 1960s and '70s." The Washington Times (1/28, A1, Lively, 88K) reports, "Organizers said they exceeded their goal of 100,000 attendees. Police do not give official crowd estimates, but some officers said privately that the crowd appeared smaller."

The AP (1/28, Woodward, Margasak) called the march an "anti-war demonstration linking military families, ordinary people and an icon of the Vietnam protest movement in a spirited call to get out of Iraq." The New York Times (1/28, A21, Urbina, 1.16M) reports, "Tassi McKee, from Bastrop, La., who said she was a staff sergeant in the Air Force, was among a small contingent of about 20 active-duty service members who turned out." The Times says "police officials declined to provide crowd estimates, but Hany Khalil, a spokesman for United for Peace and Justice, said the protesters numbered about 400,000." An AP (1/28) article quotes two other active service members at the rally. BBC.com (1/27) reports the rally, saying, "The rally comes days before Congress is to discuss President George W Bush's new strategy for Iraq."

Students Fight Apathetic Image. The Washington Post (1/28, A8, Greenwell, 690K) reports, "Since the war began nearly four years ago, many Vietnam-era antiwar activists have publicly lamented what they see as apathy among today's college students. They wonder whether the absence of a draft and a culture of pop music and reality television have distracted young people from civic responsibilities. But among the hundreds of students on the Mall yesterday, dozens of whom drove all night to get to Washington for the protest, the prevailing sentiment was that their generation had been unfairly maligned and that the antiwar movement is growing stronger every day." Students at the rally found signs "of a building resistance to the war in Iraq and other U.S. foreign policy initiatives."

Deployment Resistor Watada Profiled. The CBS Evening News (1/27, story 4, 2:20, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "The Iraq war sparked demonstrations today; one man has waged his own protest for months now. He is the first Army officer to publicly refuse to fight in Iraq, and he may soon face court martial for his beliefs." CBS (Blackstone): "Ehren Watada sounds little different than any other war protestor. But his protest could send him to prison for six years; when his army unit shipped out last June, Lieutenant Watada refused to go to Iraq." Watada: "Just being a part of that would be adding more fuel to the fire instead of trying to put it out." Blackstone: "While Lt. Watada waits for his court martial, the Army still requires him to show up for work here at Fort Lewis every day. He admits he's probably the most unpopular soldier on the base, but that hasn't stopped him from continuing to speak out against the war."

DOJ_NMG_0123217

More Commentary On Iraq. In his Washington Post (1/28, B7, 690K), column, Robert Kagan writes that, besides Democrats, "Many conservatives and Republicans, including erstwhile supporters of the war, have thrown up their hands in anger at the Iraqi people or the Iraqi government. They, too, seem to believe that if American troops leave, because Iraqis don't 'deserve' our help, then somehow the whole mess will solve itself or simply fade away. ... Politicians in both parties should realize that success in this mission is in their interest, as well as the nation's. Here's a wild idea: Forget the political posturing, be responsible, and provide the moral and material support our forces need and expect."

In an op-ed for the New York Times (1/28, WK1, 1.16M), reporter Sabrina Tavernise writes, "A painful measure of just how much Iraq has changed in the four years since I started coming here is contained in my cellphone. Many numbers in the address book are for Iraqis who have either fled the country or been killed. ... Iraq is a different country now. ... Deeply damaged from years of abuse under Saddam Hussein, the Shiites who run the government have themselves turned into abusers." Tavernise predicts the failure of the new US plan in Iraq because "Abused under Mr. Hussein, [Shiites] still act like an oppressed class. That means Iraqis are looking into a future of war, at least in the near term."

In the New York Times (1/28, WK16, 1.16M), columnist David Brooks writes that, based on the experience of Bosnia, "The best answer [for Iraq], then, is soft partition: create a central government with a few key powers; reinforce strong regional governments; separate the sectarian groups as much as possible. ... logic, circumstances and politics are leading inexorably toward soft partition. The Bush administration has been slow to recognize its virtues because it is too dependent on the Green Zone Iraqis. The Iraqis talk about national unity but their behavior suggests they want decentralization."

Deliberations Over Iraq War Said To Color Response To Criticisms Of Iran. On its front page, the New York Times (1/28, A1, Sanger, 1.16M) notes the "haunting echoes" in Bush Administration statements about Iran. "As President Bush and his aides calibrate how directly to confront Iran, they are discovering that both their words and their strategy are haunted by the echoes of four years ago — when their warnings of terrorist activity and nuclear ambitions were clearly a prelude to war. This time, they insist, it is different." The Times continues, "To many in Washington, especially Mr. Bush's Democratic critics, the new approach to Iran has all the hallmarks of an administration once again spoiling for a fight. Some see an attempt to create a diversion, focusing the country's attention away from a war gone bad in Iraq, and toward a country that has exploited America's troubles to expand its influence. Others suspect an effort to shift the blame for the spiraling chaos in Iraq." Now, "as they present their evidence, some Bush administration officials concede they are confronting the bitter legacy of their prewar distortions of the intelligence in Iraq." While in the coming weeks, "more escalation is likely," the Times says "the debate over whether the United States should stick to diplomacy or take more forceful action is bound to begin right away, and will sound familiar. Democrats, even while accusing the administration of failing to engage with Iran, are positioning themselves to sound tough."

Iran Condemns Raids On Operatives. The AP (1/27) reports, "A top Iranian lawmaker denounced the United States on Saturday for allowing its troops to kill or capture Iranians in Iraq whom U.S. forces believe pose a threat." Alaeddin Boroujerdi, the head of Parliament's Foreign Policy and National Security Committee, called the policy "support for terrorism" on Iranian television. The AP adds, "The more aggressive policy — evolving over a period of months — was described as the result of mounting evidence that Iran is supporting terrorists inside Iraq and is a major supplier of bombs and other weapons used to target U.S. forces."

Ahmadinejad's Impact, Influence Examined. A 5,000-word piece in today's New York Times Magazine (1/28, Secor) analyzes President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's role in and impact on Iranian politics. "South Tehran is Ahmadinejad's heartland. It is here, in the less affluent neighborhoods of the city of 14 million where he was once mayor, that he rose from the obscure end of the seven-candidate roster in 2005, only to become one of the most popular figures in the Muslim world." However, the Times notes, his local candidate slate was "trounced" in recent voting. "The Iranian political system seems to be restoring its equilibrium by showing an extremist president the limits of his power. But is it an equilibrium that can hold? In part, last month's election results reflected the complexity of Ahmadinejad's skeptical, conditional and diverse constituency. They also demonstrated his isolation within the powerful conservative establishment, whose politics, however opaque, are determinative."

DOJ_NMG_0123218

Iranian Nuclear Official Denies Centrifuge Installation Plan. The AP (1/28, Dareini) notes Iranian Atomic Energy Organization official Hossein Simorgh "has denied claims made by a top lawmaker that the Islamic Republic had begun installing 3,000 centrifuges at an uranium enrichment plant" at Natanz. He is quoted saying, "No new centrifuges have been installed in Natanz." The AP notes comments yesterday by Alaeddin Boroujerdi that "Iran was currently installing the 3,000 centrifuges, underlining that the country would continue to develop its disputed nuclear program despite U.N. sanctions."

WPost Prods Administration To "Mix" Pressure And Engagement With Iran. In an editorial today, the Washington Post (1/28, B6, 690K) says the Administration's "recent steps against Iran" are "fortunately" causing "some influential people in Tehran" to become "nervous. … Some influential voices have begun publicly suggesting that flexibility as well as toughness is needed in dealing with the West," and "pressure is growing on radical President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad." Those "U.S. measures, compounded by a U.N. sanctions resolution, may be having an effect on the mullahs. If so, the impact is sorely needed," both on Iran and on Syria. While "it's too early to tell whether Iran will back off from [its] belligerent agenda," it is "not too soon for the Bush administration to begin working on the next stage of its strategy. That's because the pushback tactics, while necessary to change the atmosphere of hubris in Tehran, aren't likely by themselves to achieve the administration's goals." Now, "what's needed is a mix of pressure with avenues for moderation by Tehran." The Post concludes, "The most promising way of refining the current policy would be to return to a strategy that worked when the Bush administration tried it in 2001, which is engaging Iran in a regional forum. … To pursue such an initiative while simultaneously stepping up military and economic pressure on Iran, the Bush administration would have to forswear the Manichaeism it is so prone to in foreign affairs. But it might get better results."

Seven US Troops Killed; Bombers Strike Baghdad Market. ABC World News (1/27, story 4, :25, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "The military announced late today that seven US soldiers have been killed in a series of roadside bombings. Also today, two car bombs exploded, one after the other in a Baghdad marketplace, killing at least 13 people. And Iraqi police say 40 bodies have been found dumped around the capital, most showing signs of torture."

The CBS Evening News (1/27, story 2, 3:00, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "The battle for Iraq took another heavy toll of American lives today as the debate on the war spilled out on to US streets. The military today announced the death of seven more American soldiers in Iraq, bringing the total number of deaths to at least 3,075." NBC Nightly News (1/27, story 3, 2:00, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) called it "another deadly day for Americans and Iraqis." NBC (Arraf): "In Baghdad, today, even shopping is dangerous. A suicide car bomb detonated in this crowded outdoor market in the city; when people rushed to help, a second car bomb exploded. ... Immersed in this bewildering war, some soldiers on their second tour here pleaded for support back home, not protests."

The New York Times (1/28, A4, Santora, Cave, 1.16M) reports, "Shiite neighborhoods in Baghdad came under fierce assault once again on Saturday, following two weeks of violence that left at least 300 dead and many hundreds more wounded. Many of the recent attacks, nearly all of them in heavily Shiite areas, have occurred during the period of commemoration that leads to one of the holiest days for Shiites, an intense day of mourning known as Ashura that falls this year on Monday. ... The spate of recent attacks appear to have been intended not just to inflict the maximum amount of civilian suffering, but also to grind all aspects of daily life closer to a halt." The AP (1/27, Mroue) reports, "Death squads, believed to be primarily Shiite militiamen, continued their butchery on the other side of Iraq's deepening sectarian divide, with police reporting the discovery of 40 bodies dumped in Baghdad alone." The Washington Times (1/28, A1, Mroue, 88K) carries an abbreviated version of this story.

The Washington Post (1/28, A13, Londono, 690K) also reports the deaths of the seven soldiers, adding, "Violence in the capital and elsewhere continued to surge. ... Meanwhile, a prominent politician in the western city of Ramadi was kidnapped and killed, according to a physician at Ramadi Hospital. Saied Hussein al-Alwani, a council member, was abducted by suspected members of the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq; his body was discarded on a road an hour later." The Green Zone suffered its "second rocket attack this week," and the US consulate in Hilla was reportedly "attacked with mortars."

DOJ_NMG_0123219

The Los Angeles Times (1/28, Daragahi, 850K) reports that the troops' deaths came "amid a steady swirl of violence against American troops and Iraqi civilians." Describing a pair of suicide bombings, the Times notes, "Authorities suspect that many such bombers are young Sunni Arab men from other countries heeding religious calls to fight against the U.S. military and Iraq's Shiite government." CNN.com (1/27) reports on Saturday in Baghdad "gunmen dressed as Iraqi national police officers stormed a computer store, abducted seven people and sped off in three vehicles," Baghdad police said. CNN notes it is "not the first report of gunmen disguising themselves" wearing "Iraqi Army, national police and commando uniforms, as well as uniforms that resemble US military attire."

Contractor Death Toll In Iraq Nearing 800. The Houston Chronicle (1/28, Ivanovich, Clanton, 530K) reports, "Laboring in a war with no discernible front line, more than 770 civilian contractors have died in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion began in March 2003. Statistics kept by the Labor Department indicate fatalities among civilian contractors working for American firms escalated rapidly late last year, with at least 301 dying in Iraq in 2006 — including 124 in the final three months." The military had 818 deaths in 2006. The Chronicle adds, "[Contractors'] names are left off the Pentagon's Iraq casualty rolls. If they were counted, the U.S. military's official casualty figures — 3,063 as of Friday — would be 25 percent higher."

Iraq's Shiite Vice President Ambivalent About Surge. In the Washington Post (1/28, B1, 690K), Lally Weymouth interviews Iraq's Shiite vice president, Adel Abdul Mahdi. He refuses to explicitly endorse a surge of US troops to Baghdad, saying, "As Iraqis, we think we need more troops in Baghdad. It's up to the multinational forces to decide whether they need more troops. ... [The Americans] are there to succeed, not because they wish to be there. They came with plans, agendas and policies. If they want to succeed, we need more troops." When asked specifically about "the United States sending an additional 20,000 men," Mahdi replies, "I can't say if they need to deploy more troops in Baghdad."

Wife Of Soldier Contemplates Surge. NBC Nightly News (1/27, story 2, 3:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Now to the view of one military wife. Rebekah Sanderlin, whose husband is based in Fort Bragg, North Carolina. Part of the first wave deploying to Iraq this month, talks about how the surge in US forces affects military families at home." Rebekah Sanderlin, wife of soldier: "When we talk about the troops in Iraq, you know, 15 names or faces come to mind instantly. So a troop surge to us is not just my husband is going it is my husband is going to help his best friend. ... I lost quite a few friends. I don't want to lose my husband or lose any more friends. But I also realize that this is not a war that will end when we leave."

War Raises Questions About Volunteer Military. McClatchy (1/28, Brown) reports, "The war in Iraq marks the first time in modern history that the United States has fought an extended conflict with an all-volunteer military. The strain of fighting nearly four years in a two-front war has put unprecedented stress on the Army and the Marine Corps — which have borne the brunt of the fighting — and has raised serious questions about whether an all-volunteer force can be maintained over the long term. ... Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., wants to reinstate the draft. ... Many military officers, lawmakers and analysts oppose bringing back conscription, saying it would ruin the professionalism and quality that the all-volunteer force has built up over the last 34 years. ... Defense Secretary Robert Gates has outlined plans to call up the National Guard and Reserves more frequently. But the more the military relies on its citizen-soldiers to fight the war, the less attractive the Reserves become to those who don't want full-time military careers."

ABC World News (1/27, story 6, 2:10, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "In his State of the Union Address, President Bush warned that the war on terror will take generations, and a major military expansion to win. But the armed forces are already struggling to fill quotas. How will they enlist more recruits?" ABC (Hendron): "Recruiters admit the job is harder, but they are not soft pedaling the chances of going from boot camp to Baghdad." Staff Sgt. Douglas Haynesworth, Marine recruiter: "They see it on TV every day, and they know it's a chance. We don't hide it." Hendron: "After failing to meet goals in 2005, the Army let in more high school dropouts and more low test scores. In recent years, it's raised the maximum age from 35 to 42. It's raised the allowable body fat, and gave more waivers, recruiting soldiers who have criminal backgrounds. Among them was Stephen Green, who now stands accused of rape and multiple murders last year in an Iraqi town." ... Bill Carr, Deputy Under Secretary of Defense: "Recruiting is hard, but hard is what we do."

DOJ_NMG_0123220

Gates Seeks To Reduce Forced Extensions. The AP (1/28, Jelinek) reports, "In an action branded a backdoor draft by some critics, the military over the past several years has held tens of thousand of soldiers, sailors, airmen and Marines on the job and in war zones beyond their retirement dates or enlistment length. It is a widely disliked practice that the Pentagon, under new Defense Secretary Robert Gates, is trying to figure out how to cut back on." Gates has ordered that "stop loss" be "minimized" and "has asked the chief of each service branch for a plan by the end of February on how they would rely less on stop loss." The AP adds, "Pentagon officials provided no figures on how many people the policy has affected. Yet just in the Army, it is in the tens of thousands."

Iraqi Soldiers Still Reliant On US. The Los Angeles Times (1/28, Zavis, 850K) reports that a downpour in Diyala province "could have spelled the end of the offensive [for Iraqi forces]. When U.S. Humvees, Bradley fighting vehicles and tanks pushed ahead two days later, they had to tow the Iraqis to the fight. ... As pressure mounts here and at home for U.S. troops to start leaving, the assault in Diyala province this month showed how far the Iraqis must go before they can stand on their own." Iraqis still lack "more sophisticated equipment until [Americans] are confident the Iraqis can maintain and keep track of it" and are faulted by American troops as "not organized" and prone to "corruption." However, the Times adds that Iraqis "proved adept at spotting an out-of-place carpet concealing a hoard of guns or a bomb tucked among the reeds. It was also Iraqis who recognized three brothers identified as key members of a [insurgent] group known as the Council."

Iraqi Government Cultivates Ties To US Democrats. The Los Angeles Times (1/28, Daragahi, 850K) reports, "Representatives of Iraq's government are hedging their bets on America's political future, hoping to keep U.S. support for their country strong by building ties with a Democratic Party that now controls Congress and is closely scrutinizing President Bush's Iraq policy." Iraqi observers "concluded early that even the most staunchly antiwar Democrats would not abandon Iraq. ... Many pointed out advantages to the Democrats' increased sway over Iraq policy. Government officials said they had generally found the Democratic position on handing over security to Iraqi forces sooner rather than later closer to theirs. Almost all agree on Democratic Party initiatives, squashed when Republicans controlled Congress, to prevent the building of permanent U.S. bases here. They note news reports of Democrats acknowledging the suffering of the Iraqi population." They also "found Democratic visitors such as Pelosi, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois less parochial, more culturally sensitive and more willing to listen to Iraqi concerns than Republicans."

Army Probes Contractor Fraud. The AP (1/27) reports, "From high-dollar fraud to conspiracy to bribery and bid rigging, Army investigators have opened up to 50 criminal probes involving battlefield contractors in the war in Iraq and the U.S. fight against terrorism, the Associated Press has learned. Senior contracting officials, government employees, residents of other countries and, in some cases, U.S. military personnel have been implicated in millions of dollars of fraud allegations. ... The problems stem in part from the Pentagon's struggle to get a handle on the unprecedented number of contractors now helping run the nation's wars."

Warner's Iraq Stance Affected By Vietnam. On its front page, the Washington Post (1/28, Shear, 690K) reports on Sen. John Warner, who says, "I regret that I was not more outspoken" during the Vietnam War. Warner continues, "They thought they could win it. We kept surging in those years. It didn't work." The Post states, "More than 30 years after Vietnam, Warner is once again watching as generals propose additional troops. But this time, he's not staying silent. In a rebuke to President Bush, Warner is leading an effort to have the U.S. Senate declare a lack of confidence in the administration's plans to send 21,500 additional soldiers into the Iraqi war zone. ... to GOP loyalists, Warner is also a more-than-occasional irritant who seems willing to buck the party line with little regard for the political consequences to his Republican colleagues. ... Now he's at it again, delivering a new affront to Bush and offering nothing but a shrug when asked if he worries about that."

LATimes Notes How War Has Changed Political Fortunes. The Los Angeles Times (1/28, 850K) editorializes, "Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.) was once considered one of the Senate's foremost foreign policy experts," while Warner "was, well, not. Now, if you believe the Beltway buzz, their reputations have been reversed. ... It shows that the president isn't the only politician in Washington whose career has been hobbled by Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0123221

Ex-USAID Worker Remembers Work In Fallujah Before Injury. In the Washington Post (1/28, W18, 690K) Sunday magazine, author Kirk Johnson recalls in a 4,400-word article his work in Baghdad and Fallujah before a freak accident made his return to Iraq impossible: "I grew steadily more frustrated by the surreal isolation of palaces and swimming pools bobbing with drunken contractors and began to agitate for a job outside of the Emerald City. ... My work was exhausting, infrequently rewarding and drenched with a sense of urgency and importance. What little work we had finished, I discovered, was either ill-conceived or poorly executed." Johnson still cannot explain the accident in the Dominican Republic that injured him so badly he could not return to Iraq before his contract expired: "When people suggested, gingerly, that I might have been suffering from PTSD, I rejected it out of hand. I hadn't worn a uniform and didn't believe I had the right to group my injury with those who did. So many had it worse: Marines, soldiers, Iraqis -- so many Iraqis. I called a psychiatrist friend, who said that I probably had experienced a stress-prompted fugue state, which is characterized by dissociative amnesia and autopilot behavior."

Taliban Threatens Summer Wave Of Suicide Bombers. The Washington Times (1/28, 88K) reports, "The Taliban is gearing up for a massive summer offensive, with more than 2,000 suicide bombers ready for action and even more preparing, a senior Taliban commander said yesterday. The commander, Mullah Hayat Khan, issued his threat a day after a top U.S. diplomat warned that Afghanistan was in for a bloody and dangerous spring." Khan "said 2,000 suicide bombers were ready -- about 40 percent of the total suicide force -- adding that numbers were so high that it was sometimes hard to find enough explosives and targets."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Qwest May Face Dispute Over CEO's Legal Fees. The Denver Post (1/28, Vuong) reports, "CA Inc. is trying to recover the $14.9 million that the software company spent to defend former chief executive Sanjay Kumar against accounting-fraud charges. … A lawsuit by the Islandia, N.Y.-based company, formerly known as Computer Associates, has targeted Kumar's cars, home, yacht and bank accounts after he pleaded guilty to masterminding a multibillion-dollar fraud." The Post continues, "A similar court battle could be in line for Denver-based Qwest if former chief executive Joe Nacchio is convicted of criminal insider trading." The Post adds, "Qwest is footing Nacchio's legal bill, which could cost up to $75 million for both civil and criminal cases, according to experts. Nacchio has pleaded not guilty to 42 counts of illegal insider trading. His criminal trial is set to begin March 19. .. Bob Toevs, a Qwest spokesman, wouldn't say whether the company would seek reimbursement if Nacchio is convicted, but he said it has the right to. … Qwest and CA are just two of a large number of companies that pay legal fees for their current and former executives, experts say. … 'It's very, very common for almost any corporation, and certainly for large publicly traded companies, to have provisions and agreements that will actually require the corporation to advance defense costs up front,' said Lawrence Hamermesh, a corporate and business law professor at Widener University School of Law in Wilmington, Del. … Hamermesh said companies are not required to do so under state law in Delaware, which is where Qwest and many firms are incorporated. .. .Instead, experts say, most companies offer indemnification from legal proceedings and pay attorney fees in advance in order to attract officers and directors to their company."

Shareholders, Company Directors Urged To Rein In Executive Pay. In the New York Times (1/28, BU1, 1.16M), Gretchen Morgenson writes, "Congress has a new idea about how to rein in executive pay. Trouble is, the plan will squeeze midlevel workers, even as they need to save more money for retirement. And it won't even dent top executives' takes." Considering the "explosion in executive pay" Morgenson says it was "thoroughly predictable that Congress would jump into the fray." However, she says "legislators' past attempts to curtail executive pay have wound up fattening already rich packages." Therefore, she concludes that the US tax code "should not be used to legislate corporate governance. This is why it is so crucial now to bring shareholders and company directors together to discuss executive pay. And why it is foolish for companies to resist those dialogues."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Trial Reveals Lack Of Identity Protection For CIA Agents. The Los Angeles

DOJ_NMG_0123222

Times (1/28, Schmitt, 850K) reports, "From their earliest days, US intelligence agencies have made it an article of faith to protect the identity of their secret agents." But last week, as former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby went on trial, "it appeared that neither the CIA nor some other intelligence community insiders were all that tight-lipped about such supposedly sensitive matters." Valerie Plame's identity, the Times writes, "was often treated as not much more than water-cooler dishing or cocktail party chatter." The revelations thus far in Libby's trial "suggest that, though US officials -- especially within the Bush administration -- have publicly insisted that secrecy is crucial in national security matters, there is a backstage world inside the government where even the most basic rules for protecting sensitive information may be ignored."

Havesi Prosecutor Seeks "One Standard Of Justice." The New York Times (1/29, Hakim) reports, "P. David Soares, the Democratic district attorney here, has clashed at various points in his two years in office with the mayor, the police chief, the sheriff and the County Legislature. He has assailed the war on drugs as a failure that 'provides law enforcement officials with lucrative jobs' and called prison building an American 'economic development strategy.' … Now Mr. Soares, 37, is taking on one of the most durable political machines in America: the elected officials of Albany, where built-in incumbency and a 'pay-to-play' system have created a culture in which at least 10 state lawmakers have been investigated, indicted or convicted in recent years." The Times continues, "While Gov. Eliot Spitzer has been the most prominent voice calling for change, it was Mr. Soares who sent tremors through Albany by pressuring former State Comptroller Alan G. Hevesi, a fellow Democrat, to plead guilty to a single felony charge and to resign last month. Since then, Mr. Soares said his office has received numerous tips about wrongdoing in state government." The Times adds, "Perhaps most worrisome for the capital: his efforts to look into corruption are now being aided by a partnership with Attorney General Andrew M. Cuomo, creating what could be a potent check on legislative abuses in a newly reform-minded Albany. … Much of the groundwork for the Hevesi case was laid out by the State Ethics Commission and the attorney general's office, but it was Mr. Soares (pronounced soars) who decided to pursue it as a felony investigation. Mr. Soares's predecessor, Paul A. Clyne, prosecuted high-profile cases, but the more notable, including cases against former Assemblyman Roger L. Green and J. Michael Boxley, a former top Assembly aide, ended with misdemeanor pleas. … The Hevesi case reinforced Mr. Soares's pledge to bring 'one standard of justice' to the office."

Penalty Phase Of Criminal Trials Lays Bare All Secrets. The New York Times (1/28, Brick) reports, "In the federal court system of the United States of America, duly recorded and transcribed by professional stenographers, there exists testimony documenting the fact that one Ronell Wilson, 24, of Staten Island, wet the bed into his teenage years. … Kids might call that T.M.I., 'too much information.' The law calls it evidence of a 'mitigating factor' that could spare a defendant's life." The Times continues, "Mr. Wilson may or may not get the death penalty for killing two undercover detectives; jurors in Brooklyn will be asked to decide this week. But in two weeks of testimony to determine his sentence, he has already endured an unenviable ordeal. … The degree of scrutiny afforded a capital defendant is enough to mortify anyone who has ever been a child, dated a girl, gotten a haircut or tried to dress fashionably. This is the full probe. All your secrets revealed. Some defendants consider it either more agonizing than death, a sentence no federal jury in New York has prescribed for a half-century, or at least worth a big gamble to avoid." The Times adds, "In 2003, in the same court, a defendant named Emile Dixon took his chances, forbidding defense lawyers to call his relatives or dissect the circumstances of his upbringing. The strategy worked well for him, or as well as possible under the circumstances. Six jurors wrote on a verdict sheet that Mr. Dixon had impressively 'exhibited concern for the privacy and dignity of his family.' … He is serving a life term for dealing drugs and murdering two people, including another dealer who had become a government witness." The Times notes, "In theory, this adversarial process known as the penalty phase, coda to a capital murder trial, informs jurors of the broader circumstances of the case. Prosecutors argue that the convicted man is more rotten than other killers; defense lawyers suggest causes for mercy. In practice, it can produce some bizarre tableaus. After all, once it has been established that you murdered somebody, other biographical details can seem surreally picayune."

Doubt Cast On Perception That Teen Girls Are Becoming More Violent. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (1/28, Ove) reports on the national perception that

DOJ_NMG_0123223

American girls are becoming more violent. Citing recent incidents in Rhode Island, Pittsburgh, and South Carolina, the Post-Gazette reports, "Incidents like these are showing up in news media reports across the country, often to illustrate a common theme: American girls are becoming more violent. … But have girls really gone so wild?" The Post-Gazette continues, "A U.S. Justice Department report, under internal review and due out in about a month, will largely conclude that they haven't -- or at least that there's no data to support that they have. … 'We don't have good evidence that it is increasing. We think it's not getting worse,' said Margaret Zahn, lead investigator for the Girls Study Group, a panel of experts assembled by the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. 'The media [approach] is always, "If it bleeds, it leads." I do wish the media would be more careful about how these things are reported.'" The Post-Gazette adds, "But the drumbeat continues. Just last week, 'CBS Evening News' reported on a group of Long Island girls who videotaped vicious assaults and put them on the Internet. That story also featured commentary by James Garbarino, the author of an influential 2006 book, 'See Jane Hit: Why Girls Are Growing More Violent and What We Can Do About It.' … Yet the consensus of most criminologists is that the 'crisis' of girl violence is probably overblown, inflated by statistics gathered from reporting standards that didn't exist years ago -- such as zero tolerance policies in schools and increased reporting of domestic violence." The Post-Gazette notes, "The root of this debate is numbers. … Girls are definitely getting arrested for assault and aggravated assault more often than they used to, according to figures from the FBI's Uniform Crime Reports. … Although juvenile arrests for violent crime are down overall, girls represent a larger percentage of those arrests. … While the rate for boys declined 26 percent between 1980 and 2003, the female rate jumped 47 percent. Between those years, female assault arrests rose from about 200 for every 100,000 girls to 750." … Some analysts and media reports cite that fact in saying the 'gender gap' between boys and girls is closing. … But criminologists largely dismiss Mr. Garbarino's book, and others like it, as simplistic and alarmist."

US Praised For Law Enforcement Aid To New Orleans. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (1/28) editorializes, "With a rash of murders to begin the year and only one arrest in 14 cases, New Orleans police clearly needed help. They are getting it. … In the broadest law enforcement commitment yet from the federal government, FBI, U.S. Marshal, Drug Enforcement Administration and Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives agents will work the streets with police to make arrests, develop cases and reach out to residents in the city's most violent neighborhoods. … 'The goal is to detain, imprison, prosecute, convict and incarcerate these violent criminals, to take the pressure off the local criminal justice system,' said U.S. Attorney Jim Letten, who delivered Thursday's announcement for U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. Wherever possible, Mr. Letten said, cases will be handled in federal court. … Hallelujah." The Times-Picayune adds, "The federal system is functioning at a much higher level than the New Orleans Police Department and Orleans Parish district attorney's office. As for the city's criminal court judges, there are so many problems with evidence gathering and prosecution of cases that it's difficult to figure out how well the judges are handling their duties. There have been judges who went out of their way to set low bonds for violent offenders. But with Judge Charles Elloie off the bench that doesn't seem to be the problem that it was a year ago." The Times-Picayune concludes, "Federal intervention can only go so far. The cases Mr. Letten can prosecute are limited by law. Police, prosecutors and Criminal District Court must be equipped to handle their share of cases, and those are plentiful. … But New Orleanians weary of crime are surely thankful that the cavalry is on the way."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Mississippi Clerk Testifies To Inaction On Invalid Ballots. The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (1/28, Gates) reports, "Noxubee County Circuit Clerk Carl Miggins testified Friday his office took no action to find out why signatures on some absentee ballots in a 2003 election were different than the signatures on the applications for the ballots." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "A court ruled that 33 absentee ballots cast in a race between a black candidate and a white candidate in the race for sheriff were invalid. But the judge ruled the election results in which a black candidate was declared the winner would stand because the absentee ballots didn't affect the election's outcome. … In the first lawsuit of its kind in the United States, the Department of Justice is accusing black political leaders in majority-black Noxubee County of discriminating against white voters." The Clarion-Ledger adds, "Miggins, the last official witness called by the Justice Department, began his testimony late Friday. … He will complete his testimony Monday, when the trial in U.S. District Court in Jackson enters its third week. District Judge Tom S. Lee is presiding. … Defendants in the lawsuit are the Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee and its chairman, Ike Brown, and the county Election Commission." The Clarion-Ledger notes, "Miggins, who is black, and Noxubee County had been defendants but were removed after the county signed a federal consent decree to prevent any discrimination against voters. … Questioned Friday by Justice Department attorney Christopher Coates about the signatures being different, Miggins explained he took no action to find out why 'Because the judge and the Election Commission ruled on it. ... If a judge ruled on it, I feel it is behind us.' … Miggins said he personally doesn't make any determination on ballots cast the day of an election. He said it's up to poll workers to decide who can cast a ballot legally at the polls."

DOJ_NMG_0123224

New Jersey Towns Mull Tougher Rules For Rental Housing Overcrowding. The Bridgewater (NJ) Courier-News (1/28, Richardson) reports, "In the battle against illegal overcrowding in rental properties -- often called 'stacking' -- some Central Jersey communities are considering tougher laws, some of which require the registration of individual tenants and their landlords. … That's the case in Raritan Borough, for instance, where officials might require landlords to certify the number of tenants in each rental unit, Mayor Jo-Ann Liptak said. … 'We're going after the landlord who thinks he can exploit these people,' Liptak said of tenants who are stacked." The Courier-News continues, "Flemington, North Plainfield and Bernards also are considering stronger laws, although not everyone thinks they are necessary. … Tougher laws might also stir the debate over whether overcrowding laws inordinately penalize Hispanics." The Courier-News adds, "Not every community dealing with overcrowding laws is making them tougher. … When Bernardsville wanted to make sure its inspection practices were not discriminatory, it looked to Bound Brook, said Elaine Broyles, Bernardsville's Zoning Code Enforcement official, and adopted Bound Brook's revised guidelines. … In 2004, Bound Brook agreed to reform its inspection practices -- which the U.S. Justice Department said were designed to drive out Hispanics -- in order to end a federal lawsuit. … Among other reforms, Bound Brook translated its property maintenance code into Spanish, gave residents 24 hours notice to correct an illegal living situation and hired a bilingual coordinator to give residents information about housing, property maintenance and redevelopment."

Police Departments Make Effort To Boost Minority Recruitment. The New York Times (1/28, Richter) reports, "As part of an initial push to recruit minority officers to the Long Beach, N.Y., Police Department in 2004, the civil service exam was opened to nonresidents for the first time. That move, police officials said, led to the hiring of a Hispanic woman and an Asian-American man, both New York City police officers. … But the department was unable to hire a police officer who was black in that recruitment drive. 'We diversified but were still missing a part of the target population,' said Lt. Bruce Meyer, who heads the recruitment efforts for a department that had no black officers for almost four decades. 'At that point I said we have to do more.'" The Times continues, "Police departments in suburbs and towns across the region have been putting a new emphasis in recent years on bringing more black and Hispanic officers into their ranks as, census figures show, the white population in the suburbs has declined by 2.1 percent and minority populations have grown in the last five years. … The departments are using different tactics, with mixed success, including tweaking residency requirements and recruiting candidates who live beyond their borders. They are holding civil service tests more frequently, initiating new advertising campaigns and turning to the military for possible candidates." The Times adds, "Some police departments that have failed to increase the number of minority officers have come under scrutiny by the United States Justice Department, which has entered into consent decrees to help oversee the recruiting efforts of a number of departments, including those of both Nassau and Suffolk Counties. … Under such decrees, the Justice Department typically helps shape the content of civil service exams. But Steve Levy, the Suffolk County executive, said the department's input had done little to raise the number of minority officers. … In addition, Mr. Levy said the Justice Department vetoed his idea in 2005 to recruit police officers from Suffolk communities where crime was high. 'Unfortunately we have a Justice Department that tells us what we can't do,' he said, 'but doesn't tell us what we can do.' … Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said the consent decree with Suffolk County, agreed to in 1986, has resulted in a 'significant improvement' in police minority hiring. In 1983, when the Justice Department first lodged complaints of discrimination against the county, only 25 women, or less than 1 percent of the force, and only 59 blacks and Hispanics, or 2.3 percent, were on the county police force. … In 2005, there were 320 women, or 12.1 percent, and 262 blacks and Hispanics, or 9.9 percent. … 'Our contact with the county is through the county attorney, who has not conveyed to us any criticism regarding this department's input into the county's civil service examinations, or this department's monitoring of the consent decree we have with the county,' Ms. Magnuson said."

DOJ_NMG_0123225

Religious Issues Increasingly Debated In US Courts. On its front page, the Washington Times (1/28, Price, 88K) examines the history of so-called "separation of church and state" -- which "many American wrongly assume…are included in the Constitution" -- in US court rulings. According to the Times, US courts rule "about two times each week on cases involving whether prayers can be included in a high school graduation ceremony, an image of Jesus Christ can be displayed in a public school or a Ten Commandments monument can remain in a government building or public park." The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) "says such prayers and displays violate the principle of separation of church and state," but the Rev. Barry Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, "estimates the frequency of such rulings between 104 and 156 annually."

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Faces New EU Antitrust Questions With Vista. AFP (1/28) reports, "Microsoft risks a new showdown with EU regulators with the roll-out of its Vista operating system nearly three years after a landmark antitrust ruling against the US software giant, officials have said." AFP continues, 'After numerous delays, Microsoft's next-generation Windows Vista operating system is to make its debut with home computer users on January 30 after it was shipped to business clients in November. … While Microsoft readies to roll out its first revamped operating system in five years, rivals are preparing to do battle again with the IT colossus after already winning one victory in March 2004 with an EU antitrust ruling against the company. … 'With Vista, Microsoft has clearly chosen to ignore the fundamental principles of the commission's March 2004 decision,' said Simon Awde, the chairman of the ECIS trade association that opposes Microsoft in its antitrust troubles." AFP adds, "ECIS, which includes such tech giants as Oracle, IBM and Nokia, filed a complaint with EU regulators in February 2006 targeting Vista and Office and updated their action with details on Vista last month. … 'We are in the process of examining this complaint,' said European Commission spokesman for competition issues Jonathan Todd."

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Michigan Waste Treatment Firm Faces Dumping Charges. The Dearborn (MI) Press & Guide (1/28, Kis) reports, "A Dearborn waste treatment company and three former executives were indicted Wednesday and face charges of dumping untreated industrial waste into the Detroit sewer system." The P&G continues, "CESI, Comprehensive Environmental Solutions, Inc., a liquid industrial waste treatment and disposal facility at Ford and Wyoming, is accused of violating the Clean Water Act from March 2002 until the present. … A federal grand jury returned a 12-count indictment alleging the company bypassed treatment processes and discharged untreated wastes directly into sewers, in violation of the Clean Water Act and Detroit City Ordinance requirements." The P&G adds, "To conceal the misconduct, the indictment charges that employees made false statements and engaged in other surreptitious activities to cover up the violations. … 'The federal regime of environmental laws is in place to protect the public and prevent unlawful discharges into our water system,' said United States Attorney Stephen J. Murphy. '(Wednesday's) charges demonstrate the commitment of my office, U.S. EPA and the FBI to pursue possible violations of the environmental laws as well as attempts to conceal such violations.' … In addition to CESI, three company officials were also indicted. Former president and CEO Bryan S. J. Mallindine, 50, of Carlsbad, Calif.; former president, general manager and sales manager Michael G. Panyard, 44, of Pleasant Ridge, Mich.; and former plant and operations manager Charles D. Long, 41, of Brownstown Township are charged with conspiracy and Clean Water Act violations. … Mallindine is also charged with obstruction of justice and Panyard is facing seven false statement charges. … A fourth employee, former plant manager Donald A. Kaniowski, 37, of Dearborn, pleaded guilty to unlawfully bypassing treatment equipment and discharging untreated liquid wastes into the sewer system, in violation of the Clean Water Act."

DOJ_NMG_0123226

Energy Independence Could Be "Century Away" Under Bush Plan. In its "Week in Review" section, the New York Times (1/28, WK2, Wald, 1.16M) observes that President Bush "never used the phrase 'energy independence' in his State of the Union address last week, and it is just as well. His program for cutting gasoline demand is ambitious in scope, but modest in effect, according to experts." The reason, according to the Times, is that the United States "has fallen down a very deep well, and it's hard to get out." Even "at the rate of change suggested by the Bush plan," energy independence is "about a century away."

Breakthrough Reported In Debate Over House Climate Change Committee. The Politico (1/27, Hearn) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Energy and Commerce Chairman John Dingell may have reached an tentative agreement "in diffusing an escalating battle over the select committee on climate change" at a meeting following the Washington Auto Show. A Democratic aide close to Pelosi "suggested that the meeting," which also included Rep. Henry Waxman, had been "a turning point," saying, "We no longer anticipate a floor battle." However, Dingell, in a memo to his committee members, "noted progress in diffusing the dispute," but cautioned that he is "still keeping his firepower at the ready."

Communities Concerned Over Expiration Of Rural Law. The New York Times/AP (1/28, A16) reports, "he expiration of a federal law that provided $385 million for schools and roads last year in some of the nation's most scenic and rural areas has administrators in 41 states concerned. In 1908, President Theodore Roosevelt struck a bargain with rural America: In exchange for allowing the creation of national forests, counties would receive 25 percent of the receipts from logging and other resource sales. In return, the land would be off limits for development and could not be taxed by state and local governments." However, for years, financing "fluctuated with the price of timber." Recognizing the" stress these market fluctuations put on schools," Congress offered a short-term solution, the Secure Rural Schools and Community Self-Determination Act, a six-year financing plan that expired in December."

Two Wolf Species To Lose Endangered Status. The New York Times/AP (1/28, A19) reports, "Wolves in the Northern Rockies will be removed from the endangered species list within the next year," the Fish and Wildlife Service said Friday. The agency also will "remove from the list wolves in the Western Great Lakes region." Announcements on the two proposals are planned for Monday, said Sharon Rose, an agency spokeswoman. The action "caps a sharp turnaround for the wolf," which has been federally protected since 1974.

Tribe Oppose Bid To Alter Gaming Laws. The AP (1/28, Mitchell) reports from Atmore, AL, "The melodic bing-bing-bing on the electronic bingo machines at the always-open Poarch Creek entertainment center in south Alabama has kept players busy and the parking lot crowded. … Would they keep playing if the game took a little longer and required more players? Or would they head to gaming centers elsewhere, off tribal land? … These questions have poured into the National Indian Gaming Commission in response to its proposal to change such electronic games, a move that Indian tribal leaders in at least 10 states, including Texas and Alabama, fear could cause hundreds of millions of losses in annual revenues and hundreds of jobs. … 'These proposed rules are unnecessary and should be significantly revised to reduce new layers of federal bureaucracy,' Chadwick Smith, principal chief of the Cherokee Nation in Oklahoma, has told the NIGC." The AP adds, "With advances in technology, the NIGC says the line between Class II games, such as bingo, and Class III games, such as Vegas-style slot machines, has blurred. The commission, joined by the Justice Department, has proposed new uniform standards for Class II games that are widely used in Indian gaming centers. .. .Tribal leaders contend the change would cause bingo games to be less entertaining, played at half the current pace by requiring a two-second delay between each ball draw and, in one example, requiring a customer to wait for five additional players instead of the current one additional player. … An additional wait doesn't sit well with some players." The AP notes, "Nationwide, the new-rule scenario could reduce gaming revenue by $142.7 million, with an additional loss of $9.6 million in non-gaming revenue, according to an independent analysis of the proposal for the NGIC by Alan Meister of the Los Angeles-based Analysis Group, Inc. The analysis also says about 458 tribal member jobs would be lost. … In Alabama and other states without tribal-state compacts, Class III games are not allowed. Tribal leaders say the changes to Class II games will drive away players, leaving tribes with little recourse but to consider whether to continue operations."

DOJ_NMG_0123227

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Battered Mexican Drug Cartel Said To Be On The Ropes. The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/28, Caldwell) reports, "Mexico and the United States, working together, are steadily dismantling the murderous Tijuana drug cartel, the infamous Arellano Félix Organization. Once among the most powerful and feared criminal syndicates in Mexico, the AFO is now a shambles. Its top leaders are dead or in custody. Most if not all of the AFO leaders now behind bars face trial in the United States, where bribery cannot buy the criminal justice system and intimidation doesn't work." The Union-Tribune continues, "Mexico's extradition of 11 accused narco-traffickers to the United States a week ago wielded the weapon the cartel leaders fear most. If convicted, they will spend the rest of their lives locked away in maximum security federal prisons. The favors and preferential treatment, the illicit opportunities to continue running their drug empires, even the possibility of escape or early release that their money might buy in Mexico won't be available in the U.S. prison system." The Union-Tribune adds, "Here, the capos of Mexico's drug mafias will have 50 years or more to sit in their cells reflecting on the untold numbers of murders they ordered, the horrendous torture they routinely sanctioned and the millions of lives blighted or destroyed by their drugs. Under the terms of these extraditions, U.S. authorities must respect Mexico's prohibition on extradition of criminal suspects who would face sentences of death or explicitly stated life terms. Prison sentences of 50 or 60 years would substitute nicely for the latter … Mexico's extraditions – which included eight drug kingpins, among them two top AFO lieutenants and an AFO assassin, plus the former head of the Gulf cartel – sent the cartels another jarring signal. Mexico's new president, Felipe Calderón, is more determined than any past Mexican president to break the drug mafias that threaten to turn Mexico into a narco state. After just seven weeks in office, Calderón did what no other Mexican president has done – delivered Mexican drug traffickers en masse to the United States for trial."

Brady Center Targets Gun Dealers. The Wilmington (DE) News Journal (1/28, Brown) reports, "A national group fighting gun violence tied into a mayors conference to push for reform and more federal resources to cut illegal gun sales by 'corrupt dealers.'" The Journal continues, "The Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence unveiled its study called 'Shady Dealings: Illegal Gun Trafficking From Licensed Gun Dealers' last week in Philadelphia -- a city struggling with gun violence -- joined by the city's Police Commissioner Sylvester Johnson and others." The Journal adds, "The release of the study, which does not directly address Delaware, was timed to precede the start of the 75th winter meeting of the United States Conference of Mayors, running Wednesday through Friday in Washington. … The Brady center cited gun violence as a top issue for mayors across the country." The Journal notes, "The mayors group did not make a formal response to the Brady center study. … But crime already had surfaced as No. 2 in the mayors' 10-point legislative agenda on issues impacting cities and families. That agenda first was presented to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, then brought to the full mayors meeting headed by Conference President and Trenton Mayor Douglas H. Palmer. … The mayors are calling for a federal-local partnership to fight crime, including the creation of a federal trust fund that could fund law enforcement deployment, support of local innovations, fight domestic violence and pay for crime-fighting technology. They also back restoration of past federal block grants and policing funding. … The Brady study pointed more directly to the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives. The study concluded the bureau lacks enough resources to inspect licensed gun dealers and that laws should be changed to ease prosecution and increase penalties for gun-sale violations."

IMMIGRATION:

Minnesota Family Decries Mother's Deportation As Daughter Faces Medical Treatment. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (1/28, Rosario) reports, "The federal judge predicted this would happen. So did the doctor and nurse who have treated the little boy since birth. … But their warnings meant nothing. A legal system that proved stubbornly deaf to common sense brushed aside their concerns. All this could have been avoided. … Instead, 16 months after the federal government deported his mother, 3-year-old Cece Lamah finds himself facing months of difficult medical care — mostly on our dime." The Pioneer-Press continues, "Cece, hospitalized in Minneapolis, endures daily pain. One recent afternoon, he asked his dad to remove a needle and tube from his arm because they hurt so much. … Two years ago, U.S. District Judge Donovan Frank, Dr. Stephen Nelson and nurse Jane Hennessy of Children's Hospital in Minneapolis warned in court filings that deporting the boy's mother, Cynthia Lamah, would have a devastating domino effect." The Pioneer-Press adds, "Cece, a U.S. citizen, has sickle cell anemia, a condition that requires constant care and monitoring. His mother was his primary caretaker. … At the time, the boy's father, Daniel Lamah, a native of the Congo granted political asylum in the United States in 1999, worked as a tile setter and had health insurance benefits. … But Cynthia Lamah came here illegally from Germany with a falsified passport. She did so after her requests for a visiting visa and political asylum were denied. Federal officials ordered her deported. … Frank, who reviewed a last-minute request for a reprieve, concluded he had no legal standing to block a Justice Department immigration judge's deportation order. He nevertheless criticized the move on practical and moral grounds."

DOJ_NMG_0123228

National Guard Soldiers On "Front Line" Of Immigration Debate. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (1/28, Hopfensperger, 395K) reports that "across the nation's 1,300-mile border with Mexico…thousands of National Guard soldiers are now playing a front-line role in the divisive fight over illegal immigration." For example, Minnesota Guard members are "trying to stop the more than 1 million migrants who attempt or make illegal crossings each year -- a tide that's flowing up to Minnesota and bringing both benefits and burdens." The National Guard's assignment, dubbed "Operation Jump Start," is part of "a broad crackdown along the southwestern border" that President Bush initiated last year. Another "controversial" step is the construction of "a massive fence and other border barriers" that began last week. Meanwhile, in his State of the Union address, Bush "also revived his push for a guest-worker program and said that immigration reform is one of his priorities this year."

Study Finds "Light-Skinned" Immigrants Earning Higher Incomes. The New York Times/AP (1/28, A17) reports "light-skinned" immigrants in the United States "make more money on average than those with darker complexions, and the chief reason appears to be discrimination," a researcher says. Joni Hersch, a professor of law and economics at Vanderbilt University, "looked at a government survey of 2,084 legal immigrants to the United States from around the world and found that those with the lightest skin earned an average of 8 percent to 15 percent more than similar immigrants with much darker skin." Other researchers said the findings were "consistent with other studies on color and pointed to a skin-tone prejudice that went beyond race."

TAX:

Taxpayers Left In The Dark About IRS Bond Probes. Bloomberg (1/28) reports, "Cities and towns across the United States are being investigated by the Internal Revenue Service and keeping the investigations secret from taxpayers." Bloomberg continues, "The IRS sent more than 100 letters last year to local governments from California to Pennsylvania, saying bonds they sold may be subject to federal taxes, said Charles Anderson, who led the field operations for the IRS's tax-exempt bond division until this month. Fewer than a quarter of the municipalities disclosed the probes. … 'The entire market is hampered by that lack of information,' said Martha Haines, chief of the Securities and Exchange Commission's Office of Municipal Securities. With municipal bond sales averaging $30 million each, 100 letters indicates as much as $3 billion is under scrutiny." Bloomberg adds, "Bond audits cost taxpayer-funded agencies more than $100 million from 2001 to 2005, according to IRS data. Abuses first spotted by the agency led the Justice Department to issue more than a dozen subpoenas last year in the broadest probe to date of the municipal bond market. … The IRS has focused on whether municipalities paid banks inflated fees to invest proceeds from bond sales before the money was used for roads, schools, sewers, and other projects. Local governments are required to return most profits from investments as taxes, so higher payments to banks erode IRS revenue. US prosecutors are checking whether banks violated antitrust rules by fixing prices of the investment products. … State and local governments raise $400 billion a year in the municipal bond market, borrowing at lower rates than corporations or the federal government because debt payments are exempt from taxes."

DOJ_NMG_0123229

NYTimes Says Bush Tax Credits Should Be Allowed To Expire. In an editorial, the New York Times (1/28, WK15, 1.16M) writes, "In the State of the Union speech, President Bush said that the budget deficit had been cut in half from 2004 to 2006. Not quite." According to the Times, the deficit "declined, but not by half, from $412 billion to $248 billion." Then, Bush "greatly compounded his otherwise modest exaggeration by taking credit for the reduction, when the deficit really fell despite his policies, not because of them." Bush, it writes, "wants you to believe that tax cuts caused the economic recovery, and thus the budget improvement. If you follow that logic, the key to continued improvement would be continued tax cuts, and that is just what Mr. Bush called for last week." Therefore the Times urges Bush's tax cuts "should largely be allowed to expire. Facing that truth is not a fiscal challenge, it's a political one. Mr. Bush will not meet it. But a future president and Congress will have to."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

New White House Counsel Seen Better Suited To Upcoming Challenges. The Austin American-Statesman (1/28, Herman) reports, "White House Counsel Harriet Miers, President Bush's longtime go-to lawyer, is being replaced by a longtime Washington lawyer viewed as more suited for the rough-and-tumble of congressional investigations to come." The AAS continues, "For 13 years, Bush had turned to Miers when he needed a personal lawyer, a Texas Lottery Commission leader, a key White House aide and a Supreme Court nominee. … She retains the president's respect and friendship, but three cabinet members, all longtime friends of Miers', said the Democrats' rise contributed to Miers' demise." The AAS adds, "The nation's top diplomat put it diplomatically. 'Changed circumstances require changed talents,' Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said. … The changed circumstances include anticipated Democrat- led congressional investigations of the Bush White House. … When Miers leaves this week, Fred Fielding will become White House counsel, an office in which he worked during the Reagan and Nixon administrations, making him a veteran of the Watergate and Iran-Contra investigations. … Just what the president needs, some say." The AAS notes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, both longtime friends of Miers' dating back to their work for Bush in Texas, agreed that the new Washington reality contributed to the need for a new top White House lawyer. … Gonzales, who preceded Miers as White House counsel, said, 'There are others who have dealt with these kinds of issues before, people that have more experience with them than even I do.' … Bringing Fielding on board is part of making sure 'we have the best assets, the best tools, to deal with those challenges,' Gonzales said."

Experts Warn Bush Health Plan Would End Employee Benefits. The New York Times (1/28, A20, Pear, 1.16M) reports President Bush's proposed health plan "has touched off an impassioned debate over the future of the employer-based system that provides health insurance to more than half of all Americans." Paul Fronstin, director of health research at the Employee Benefit Research Institute, said: "The president's proposal would mean the end of employer-based benefits as we know them. It gives employers a way out of providing the benefits because their employees could get the same tax break on their own." Deputy White House chief of staff, Joel D. Kaplan, "acknowledged that the proposal could accelerate the trend of employers' dropping health benefits for employees." But he said more people "would be able to buy insurance in the individual market," so there would be "a net increase in the number of insured."

Rangel, New York City Officials Condemn Bush Medicaid Plan. The New York Times (1/28, A27, Rivera, 1.16M) reports Rep. Charles Rangel and "a number" of New York City officials "urged President Bush yesterday to reconsider a proposed change to Medicaid that could cost the city's public hospital network millions of dollars in annual financing." City Council speaker Christine C. Quinn said, "We want to make sure the president knows how damaging his health care proposal will be to our Health and Hospitals Corporation," referring to the agency that runs the city's 11 public hospitals and dozens of diagnostic centers and health clinics. Quinn joined Rangel "and more than a dozen other elected officials and health care representatives at City Hall yesterday to protest the president's proposal."

Reid Land Purchase, Ties To Lubricants Industry Examined. The Los Angeles Times (1/28, Neubauer, Hamburger, 850K) reports on its front page, "It's hard to buy undeveloped land in booming northern Arizona for

DOJ_NMG_0123230

$166 an acre. But now-Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid effectively did just that when a longtime friend decided to sell property owned by the employee pension fund that he controlled." Six months after the deal closed, Reid introduced legislation "to address the plight of lubricants dealers who had their supplies disrupted by the decisions of big oil companies." The Times notes the land deal is "a potential violation of congressional ethics standards for a member to accept anything of value -- including a real estate discount -- from a person with interests before Congress. In a statement, Reid's spokesman Jon Summers said that the transaction was "not a gift and that the price was due to the property's history and the fact that only a partial interest was sold." However, "Records and interviews show that beginning in the mid-1990s, Reid tried several times to push legislation that would have protected lubricants distributors from abrupt cancellations by their suppliers."

Schumer Says GOP Senators May Moderate Stances. In an interview with the New York Times Magazine (1/28, Solomon), Sen. Charles Schumer, asked whether he think the president will respond at all to the ideas of the new Democratic majority, said, "I don't have much hope that Bush will moderate, but many of the Republicans in Congress, having seen the handwriting on the wall, may moderate, and that will help us." For example, Schumer noted Sens. Dick Lugar, John Warner as "old-fashioned conservatives who know that this hard-right philosophy is wrong." Asked if Vice President Cheney will remain "as large an influence inside the White House in the wake of the Republican drubbing," Schumer said, "Unfortunately, yes, maybe more so, because in an odd way, the counter to Cheney was Karl Rove, and he has lost some credibility."

Johnson's Continued Absence Felt On Capitol Hill. The Washington Post (1/28, D1, Montgomery, 690K) has a 2,700-word story on Sen. Tim Johnson's recovery and the impact of his absence from the Senate. Everything in Johnson's office "is exactly how he left it last Dec. 13: The morning when words deserted him, and they rushed him, speechless, to the hospital. … His staff has left everything virtually untouched as a sign of respect, a sign of love, a sign of not knowing what else to do. It is an appeal to presence in the void of absence. The news from the hospital has been good, so far." Son Brendan Johnson said, "In talking to his physicians, we really feel optimistic and confident that he is going to make a full recovery. … He is making much faster progress than anyone anticipated." The Post says that "when a senator is absent for an extended period, two seemingly contradictory sides of Washington come into focus. There is an inevitable, almost ruthless, forward momentum that tarries for no senator. The people of South Dakota must be served, partisan interests must be advanced. Yet, there is also a human side, an instinct for decency, an acknowledgement that life can't fully go on as usual."

As Only Female, Ginsburg Feels Isolated On Court. The Washington Post (1/28, A2, 690K) reports Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said Friday that she dislikes being "all alone on the court" nearly a year after the retirement of Sandra Day O'Connor, leaving her as the only female. However, Ginsburg, speaking at Suffolk University Law School, said her "consolation" is that "if you look at the federal courts altogether, you get a much different picture than you do if you look only at the US Supreme Court."

Columnist Welcomes Justices' Public Discussions. Dahlia Lithwick of Slate magazine writes in the Washington Post (1/28, B2, 690K), "The justices of the Supreme Court have served hard time in the makeup chair in recent months" as "even some of the justices who are reluctant to talk on camera have been more amenable to speaking on the record lately." According to Lithwick, "What the justices have discussed in these interviews" has "opened the door to a more robust and nuanced national conversation about constitutional law and the role of the judiciary."

Navy Calls Off Search For Missing Sailors. The AP (1/28) reports, "The Navy called off a search Saturday for three missing crew members of a helicopter that crashed in the ocean about 50 miles off California's southern coast." Earlier, the CBS Evening News (1/27, story 5, :20, Assuras, 7.66M) had reported, "Three crew members of a Navy Seahawk helicopter are still missing tonight after their chopper went down off Southern California yesterday. ... A fourth sailor was killed."

Will Criticizes Move To Give US Territories Vote In House. The Washington Post's (1/28, B7) George Will writes House Democrats Wednesday "again voted to give the delegates to the House from Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands and the District of Columbia, and the resident commissioner from Puerto Rico, the right to vote in the House when it is sitting as the Committee of the Whole, which is how it sits almost all the time. It is in that status that almost all debate about and amending of legislation occurs." Will questions Speaker Nancy Pelosi about the "possible scope of [her] majoritarian abuse," given her "disregard of the unambiguous language and clear intent of Article I, Section 2 -- which uses the word 'state' eight times to designate the only entity from which a member of the House may be chosen."

DOJ_NMG_0123231

Bush Urged To Make Papers Public, Disclose Library Contributors. New York Times (1/28, WK15, 1.16M) editorial observer Dorothy Samuels writes as the Southern Methodist University in Dallas reportedly moves closer to reaching a deal to become the home to President Bush's presidential library, she hops "the university's president, R. Gerald Turner, and members of his board of trustees (presuming Laura Bush, the best-known trustee, has removed herself from the deliberations) can be persuaded to withhold a final go-ahead unless two basic conditions are met." First, she says the university "should insist that Mr. Bush rescind Executive Order 13233, his 2001 directive that reverses…the strong presumption of a public right of access to presidential papers embedded in the 1978 Presidential Records Act." Second, Samuels urges Bush and members of his library committee to disclose "the identity of presidential library donors, and the amounts they contribute," in order to "advance government integrity, and avoid entangling the university in potentially compromising secret fund-raising, by insisting on disclosure."

OTHER NEWS:

Median Home Prices Dropping. NBC Nightly News (1/27, story 7, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "After word home sales were down for 2006, a new report shows the median price for a home is dropping too: down 10% for the fourth quarter of last year. For many a drop in the homes value comes as mortgage payments go up, contributing to a huge increase in foreclosures across the country and in some areas, that is driving down prices further."

Democrats Seek To Tap Into Economic Anxiety Of Swing Voters. The New York Times (1/28, WK1, Leonhardt, 1.16M) reports, "As they plan their strategy on Capitol Hill and begin the 2008 presidential campaign, the leaders of the Democratic Party are betting that the temporary swings of the economic cycle no longer have the political power they once did." Instead, they say, the "economic shocks of recent years -- technological change, globalization, the decline of labor unions and business icons like Ford Motor Company -- have left many swing voters feeling anxious and insecure about the future." After years of "fighting losing battles against tax cuts," Democrats argue that this "economic anxiety has altered the political landscape, making swing voters open to a new role for government." With issues like energy policy, immigration and health care "having gone largely unaddressed in recent years," Democrats "see a way to define themselves as the party that can help Americans survive the 21st-century economy."

Clinton Holds First Iowa Event Of Her Presidential Campaign. Sen. Hillary Clinton's first foray into Iowa since declaring her plans to seek the presidency receives heavy coverage, even leading the broadcast on ABC World News (1/27, lead story, 3:00, Snow, 8.78M), which reported, "The high school basketball gym was crammed to capacity: more than 1,000 people, plus an overflow room down the hall. The first question out of the gate, about breaking the tradition of exclusively male presidents." Clinton: "Oh, I expect there will probably be more stories about my clothes and hair than some of the people running against me, and I just have accepted that. The fact that I'm a woman, the fact that I'm a mom, is part of who I am. But I'm going to ask people to vote for the person they believe will be the best president." The CBS Evening News (1/27, story 3, 2:50, Bowers, 7.66M) said Clinton "charmed the 1,500 or so Democrats gathered in a high school gym in Des Moines with her softer side…and drew heavy applause as she hammered away at familiar Democratic themes, such as the need for national health care, more money for education, and the Bush Administration." Clinton: "We may not have had good leadership the last six years, but we are still the best, most able, can-do country in the world!"

CNN (1/27, Crowley) reported, "In the national polls Hillary Clinton leads by a fairly large margin over Barack Obama. It's very different here in Iowa, where there have been a number of polls showing her running anywhere from second to fourth. The frontrunner is John Edwards. … So, she has some work to do here and certainly over the next couple of days, she'll probably make some inroads. There are five events in all, three different cities, so she has her work cut out for her, but a lot of people here think it just was a matter of showing up." NBC Nightly News (1/27, story 5, 3:20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) sad that "with so many other presidential candidates working hard and well established here, she has a lot of catching up to do."

DOJ_NMG_0123232

In a front-page story, the Washington Post (1/28, Kornblut, Balz, 690K) reports Clinton, "bursting onto the campaign trail," confronted "two looming questions about her presidential candidacy: whether voters are ready to elect a woman to the White House and how aggressively she would respond to Republican attacks if she were her party's nominee." Clinton "got just one question about Iraq, and she deflected it without answering it, speaking instead about health care for veterans. But at a morning session with Iowa Democratic Party officials, she was asked to address her vote for the 2002 congressional resolution authorizing President Bush to go to war. That vote, along with her reluctance until late last year to recant, has put her at odds with many antiwar activists in the party and is expected to be a factor as she begins to meet voters in a state with a strong antiwar tradition." Clinton said, "I've taken responsibility for my vote. But there are no do-overs in life. I wish there were. I acted on the best judgment I had at the time." The Washington Times (1/28, Hurt, 88K) also reports on its front page that "the dominant issue of the war in Iraq" was "absent" from the Des Moines event. On its Web site, USA Today (1/27, Lawrence, 2.27M) says "some 150 journalists from around the country and the world, including Japan, England, France, Germany, Italy and Switzerland," were on hand.

The Los Angeles Times (1/28, Finnegan, 850K) says Clinton "took on the full trappings of a presidential candidate" in Iowa, "where she defended her early support of the Iraq war and played up her chance to 'break a historic barrier' as the first woman to win the White House. Clinton's Iowa visit opened her yearlong courtship of Democratic voters in the state whose precinct caucuses launch the 2008 presidential nominating process. Clinton, who is leading her Democratic rivals in national polls but not in Iowa, sought above all to spur excitement over her status as the only major female candidate." Clinton said, "When people tell me, 'Well you know, I don't think a woman can be elected president,' I say, 'Well, I don't believe that, but we're going to find out.'" The Chicago Tribune (1/28, Quintanilla, 617K) writes Clinton raised "energy and health-care issues" while "remaining conspicuously silent on the war in Iraq. … 'You go, girl,' came a shout from the audience. 'You come with me,' Clinton replied, generating much applause." The AP (1/27, Glover) says Clinton said her husband "would have a role in the campaign but 'I'm the one running for president.'"

Newsday (1/28, Thrush) reports Clinton said she was "the best Democrat to take on 'bellicose' GOP opponents" such as Sen. John McCain and Rudy Giuliani. Clinton told the state committee members, "When you are attacked, you have to deck your opponent. I have been through the political wars longer than some of you have been alive. We've got to be prepared to hold our ground and fight back." The Des Moines Register (1/28, 160K) says Clinton told the party members, "I do seem to inspire strong feelings." The Politico (1/27) carries the pool report on the party meeting.

McAuliffe Says Nomination "Hers To Lose." Asked on CNN's Larry King Live (1/27) if the nomination is "Hillary's to lose," Clinton campaign chairman Terry McAuliffe said, "Clearly I would say she is the frontrunner. She's got the smarts. She's tough. … She's got the leadership skills. … Yes, it's hers to lose, and we've got to work hard, we've got to work for every single vote and get out there. People have to get to know Hillary Clinton."

Novak Says Obama Backers Expect Emanuel To Support Clinton. In his syndicated column, Robert Novak (1/27) writes, "Sources close to Sen. Barack Obama are sure that Rep. Rahm Emanuel will not support his fellow Illinois Democrat" but will instead back Clinton.

Corsi Joins Anti-Clinton Organization. In his syndicated column, Robert Novak (1/27) writes that Jerome Corsi, "co-author of the 2004 campaign book 'Unfit for Command' attacking Sen. John Kerry's war record, joined up Tuesday with the organization intended to similarly undermine" Clinton. Novak says "TheVanguard.org is intended to be a right-wing version of the leftist MoveOn.org."

Simon Says Clinton's Performance "Virtually Flawless." Roger Simon writes in The Politico (1/27), "In her first face-to-face meeting with voters since announcing for president, Hillary Clinton was asked about Iraq and ducked the question. … In the one-hour town meeting, Hillary did not mention Iraq a single time. She mentioned ethanol twice. … Except for that one moment regarding Iraq, Hillary gave a virtually flawless performance from the moment she walked into the overflowing gym."

Broder Chastises Clinton Over Petraeus Hearing Performance. In his Washington Post (1/28, B7, 690K) column, David Broder writes that during the Senate Armed Services Committee hearings on the confirmation of t. Gen. David Petraeus to lead US forces in Iraq, Clinton "used her time to make a speech about Iraq policy and did not ask a single question of the man who will be leading the military campaign." Broker offers three "possible explanations for her remarkable reluctance to probe the general's thinking. First, she has been treading a careful line from her early support of military action against Saddam Hussein to an increasingly sharp criticism of the war and calls for troop reductions. … Second, the hearing came only three days after she announced her presidential exploratory committee, and she may have decided it was a good opportunity to repeat her views on Iraq policy before TV cameras rather than share time with the general. … The third, less benign possibility is that Clinton is reverting to the mode of her ill-fated 1993-94 health-care initiative, when she gave members of Congress and other interested folks the impression that she thought she had all the answers -- so please just do as I say. … This month Clinton began her presidential campaign, as she did her first race for the Senate in New York, by saying that she wanted to do a lot of listening. She sure wasn't listening to Gen. Petraeus. She wasn't even asking."

DOJ_NMG_0123233

Rich Says Clinton "Cannot Rewrite Her Own History On Iraq." In his New York Times (1/28, WK16, 1.16M) column, Frank Rich writes, "Hillary Clinton has an answer to those who suspect that her 'I'm in to win' Webcast last weekend was forced by Barack Obama's Webcast of just four days earlier. 'I wanted to do it before the president's State of the Union,' she explained to Brian Williams on NBC, 'because I wanted to draw the contrast between what we've seen over the last six years, and the kind of leadership and experience that I would bring to the office.' She couldn't have set the bar any lower. … Clinton cannot rewrite her own history on Iraq to match Mr. Obama's early opposition to the war," or that of Sen. Jim Webb. She "was not prescient enough to see, as Mr. Webb wrote in The Washington Post back in September 2002, that 'unilateral wars designed to bring about regime change and a long-term occupation should be undertaken only when a nation's existence is clearly at stake.' But she's hardly alone in this failing, and the point now is not that she mimic John Edwards with a prostrate apology for her vote to authorize the war."

Gender Said To Not Be Enough For Clinton To Win. In a Washington Post (1/28, B1, 690K) "Outlook" piece, women's studies scholar Linda Hirshman writes, "Clinton sure got it right when she announced her candidacy for president while sitting on her living room couch. Her success may very well turn on the decisions of millions of women sitting on their living room couches." But "all the gender gap talk notwithstanding, there's no guarantee that Clinton would receive enough votes from women to be elected. I've studied women and women's politics for 20 years, and if there's one thing I know, it's that, except for possibly once in 1996, female voters have not by themselves put anyone in the White House. … If Clinton is going to stand a chance in 2008, her campaign may have to discredit the Republican nominee. … A suffering wife and mother whose campaign mysteriously unleashes attacks on her opponents? It's not the current game plan, no doubt. But I'm drawing on the lessons of history."

Giuliani Hits New Hampshire, But Stays Mum On Plans. ABC World News (1/27, story 2, 2:35, Weir, 8.78M) reported Rudy Giuliani "is on the Republican campaign trail" in New Hampshire, and "there are two big questions. Is he really in, and can he really win?" ABC (Morrell): "He has not officially joined the race, but working the lunch crowd at this Manchester diner with his wife this afternoon, Rudy Giuliani certainly looks like he's running for president. … The former mayor is on a two-day swing through the Granite State, arawing big crowds and hordes of reporters wherever he goes. … But at each stop, including the state Republican convention this morning, he refuses to say he's a candidate. … Conservative voters tend to dominate the primaries, and the twice-divorced Giuliani is moderate, some might say liberal, on social issues. … Still, our poll shows Giuliani leading John McCain by 12 points among conservatives. So if America's mayor, as they call him, jumps into this race, he will certainly be a force to be reckoned with."

Under the headline "Giuliani Is Sounding More Like A Candidate," the New York Times (1/28, A16, Perez-Pena, 1.16M) reports Giuliani "sounded nearer than ever to being a presidential candidate" in Manchester, "repeatedly talking about the prospect of running, and inviting voters to judge him by his record as mayor." While Giuliani "he has long been thought to be a presidential contender, he has fallen behind other candidates in declaring his intention, and the language he used on Saturday, while suggesting a run, also contained built-in escape hatches." Following on that theme, the Los Angeles Times (1/28, Barabak, 850K) headlines its report "Giuliani Plays It Close To The Vest," saying "the Rudy Giuliani Mystery Theater" rolled into town as the would-be candidate "gave away nothing about plans for a White House run."

DOJ_NMG_0123234

The Washington Times (1/28, Curl, 88K) says that "judging by the effusive greeting" Giuliani "received yesterday from Republican activists in the nation's first primary state, it seemed like the former New York City mayor was already running for president. But he isn't -- at least not yet. The man made famous by his steely resolve and decisive leadership after the 2001 terrorist attacks on his city said yesterday he has no idea when he will decide whether to run." Giuliani said, "Every day you get closer, but we don't have a timetable yet. The timetable is, when's the right time and when do you have the confidence and the sense that you have the whole organization. But most of it is about Judith and I deciding that there's a really unique contribution that we can make." The Politico (1/27) quotes Giuliani saying, "I have to make a decision about my exploratory committee and running, but ultimately the more important decision is what you make a year from now."

Giuliani "On A Hiring Tear." The Washington Post (1/28, A2, 690K) says Giuliani "is on a hiring tear of late, putting to rest speculation that he isn't serious about running for president. … His latest signing is Bill Stepien, who will be his national field director." Stepien "has his political roots in the Bush campaigns; he served as a New Hampshire field director in the president's reelection bid. Last cycle he directed the 72-Hour Project, the Republican National Committee's much-ballyhooed turnout apparatus."

Houston Giuliani Fundraiser Scheduled For Thursday. In his syndicated column, Robert Novak (1/27) writes, "Texas Republican contributors are being solicited to spend $30,000" for a February 1 Houston dinner with Giuliani. The "'private' dinner will follow a 6:30 to 8 p.m. cocktail reception, costing $2,100 a person and $4,200 for couples. The best-known host of Giuliani's Houston event is billionaire oilman T. Boone Pickens Jr., chairman of the private equity firm BP Capital Management. Also on Giuliani's Texas fund-raising team are Tom Hicks, whose company owns the Texas Rangers baseball team; oil industry executive Jim Lee; and lawyer Patrick C. Oxford."

Obama First Became "Political Sensation" At Harvard Law School. As the Los Angeles Times did on Saturday, two major newspapers, the New York Times (1/28, A1, Kantor, 1.16M) and the Boston Globe (1/28, Levenson, Saltzman, 413K), today have features on Sen. Barack Obama's time at Harvard Law school. The New York newspaper says that "in his two memoirs and the biographical video on his Web site, Senator Obama's legal education is barely a blip, one of the least known chapters of his life." But Harvard "was the place where he first became a political sensation. He arrived there as an unknown, Afro-wearing community organizer who had spent years searching for his identity; by the time he left, he had his first national news media exposure, a book contract and a shot of confidence from running the most powerful legal journal in the country." The Boston Globe (1/28, Levenson, Saltzman, 413K) says in its headline that Obama was "a unifying voice" at Harvard. While today, Obama "is the hot new candidate for the White House, trying to end the warring in Washington with a warm message of unity and optimism," years before he took "that message to the national political stage, he was defusing battles large and small from the sharp-elbowed basketball games to the cutthroat classrooms at Harvard Law School."

Obama's Unique Life Story Could Impact Campaign. The Times of London (1/28, Sheridan, Baxter) runs a story headlined "Secrets Of Obama Family Unlocked" that says Obama's "chances of winning the presidency depend to an unusual degree on his life story and character. The race is on to define the gifted but little-known senator," and "his heritage is far more diverse and astonishing than anything American voters have heard so far." He "has two half- sisters, one living in Britain, and five surviving half-brothers, the eldest of whom converted to Islam, and whose stories span the globe." The article details mother Ann Dunham's marriage to Kenyan student Barack Obama, her second marriage to Sen. Obama's Indonesian stepfather Lolo Soetoro, and "the estrangement between his mother and stepfather as Soetoro made compromises with Indonesia's power elite."

McAuliffe Says He Is "Not Shocked" Obama Is Running. Hillary Clinton campaign chairman Terry McAuliffe said of Obama on CNN's Larry King Live (1/27), "I'm not shocked that he's in the race. When that brass ring comes along, you've got to grab it. You can't win unless you're on the playing field, and if I were Barack Obama, I would have run myself."

WPost Slams Obama's "Slimers." The Washington Post (1/28, B6, 690K) editorializes, "It's become a fad among some conservatives to refer to the junior senator from Illinois by his full name: Barack Hussein Obama. This would be merely juvenile if it weren't so contemptible. … Insight magazine managed to further degrade the public discourse with a scurrilous 'report' alleging that Mr. Obama, as a child in Indonesia, attended a radical Islamic madrassa. … Obama's slimers seem to think such name-calling and Muslim-baiting can score points with the American people. On the contrary, Mr. Obama's multicultural background (his father was Kenyan, and he spent several years living in Indonesia with his mother and stepfather) ought to be viewed as a plus. A president with an understanding of Islam and the developing world would be welcomed by those who too often feel misunderstood and slighted by the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0123235

Novak Says Democrats Pleased By "Dour" McCain Interview. In his syndicated column, Robert Novak (1/27) writes that "Democratic strategists who had feared Sen. John McCain as the potentially unbeatable Republican candidate for president in 2008 were surprised and delighted by his dour appearance on NBC's 'Meet the Press' last Sunday. One Democratic leader referred to McCain's performance, in suggesting President Bush's additional 21,000 troops may be inadequate, as 'comatose.' A Republican adviser to McCain said it was one of the worst performances ever on 'Meet the Press.' The senator's defender said he could not be expected to be cheerful about a plan to send additional U.S. troops in harm's way."

Romney Said To Be Winning Support Of Hastert, House GOP. In his syndicated column, Robert Novak (1/27) says Mitt Romney "is picking up support for president among House Republicans, headed by former Speaker Dennis Hastert."

McAuliffe Says GOP Candidates Will "Stay Away" From Bush. Asked on CNN's Larry King Live (1/27) if he expects President Bush to campaign for Republicans in 2008, Hillary Clinton campaign chairman Terry McAuliffe said, "If he's at a 28% approval rating -- I mean, we saw in '06 that candidates, the gubernatorial candidate in Florida, the Republican candidate, wouldn't get anywhere near George Bush toward the end of the campaign, and it happened in other places around the country, and he was even higher approval rating than he has today. I think the candidates on the Republican side are going to do their best to stay away from George Bush."

Six Politicians' Endorsements Could Impact Primaries. The Washington Post (1/28, A2, Cillizza, Murray, 690K) considers six politicians' endorsements that could matter in the presidential primary races. On the Democratic side, Sen. Ted Kennedy is now a "sought-after free agent" with John Kerry out of the race. Kennedy "has ties to several of the candidates, although Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) stands to benefit most from an endorsement by the liberal icon." African-American Rep. Jim Clyburn represents the early state of South Carolina, and in New Hampshire, ex-Gov. Jeanne Shaheen "maintains an active political organization." Among Republicans, ex-Gov. Jeb Bush is influential in a big state that could vote early, and "also happens to be the president's brother." Rep. Steve King "represents the vast -- and overwhelmingly Republican -- 5th District in western Iowa." And South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford is one of the few statewide elected there who has yet to pick a candidate.

Successful "Dark Horse" Candidates Could Be Nearing Extinction. The New York Times (1/28, WK4, Zeleny, 1.16M) looks at whether the "Democratic stable" is "too full for a dark horse presidential candidate to emerge. … Perhaps more than any other presidential contest, 2008's could help determine whether the dark horse…is on the verge of extinction, particularly since the entry fee in the race for the White House has been raised yet again," since "the window will be narrow for a second-tier candidate."

Cullen To Head New Hampshire GOP. The New Hampshire Union Leader (1/28, Rayno) reports businessman Fergus Cullen was elected New Hampshire Republican state chairman Saturday. Cullen "calls himself 'a conservative in the mainstream conservative wing of the Republican Party.'"

Impact Of Possible California Primary Move Considered. An editorial and two op-eds about the California primary's possible jump to early February appear in the Los Angeles Times (1/28, 850K) today. The editorial supports the move, but says that while "Sacramento is right to want to make the state a player in presidential races," the "front-loading of each party's nomination process is not a healthy development. … Alas, the parties have not taken meaningful steps to curtail the front-loading of the nomination process. … So it's understandable for California to want to hold its primary on the first permissible date under party rules: Feb. 5, 2008. This would force candidates to come to the nation's most-populous state not merely to raise money for their battles elsewhere (centered on other regions' concerns) but to focus on issues important to Californians. And if a California vote in February, with its high costs, makes the primary process seem untenably front-loaded to the point that it forces party leaders to establish a more rational calendar, then the state will have provided the entire nation a worthy service."

DOJ_NMG_0123236

Clinton White House adviser Christopher Lehane is also sympathetic to the move in a Los Angeles Times (1/28, 850K) op-ed, saying it would give California "a well-deserved bigger say in the presidential campaign by moving up the state's primary. However, if Democrats really want to put the party in the strongest possible position to succeed in presidential elections, let's completely rethink the current primary system and replace it with a nominating process designed to pick the candidate best able to win." He suggests that, "along with a Midwestern Iowa and a Northeastern New Hampshire, let's have a state from the Southwest, South and West all voting on the same day," leading a primary season "spread over a longer time period."

In another Los Angeles Times (1/28, 850K) op-ed, San Jose State University Survey and Policy Research Institute director Philip Trounstine writes that while the move "would be a good thing" from California's perspective, "it's increasingly looking like California will not get to exercise its political weight unilaterally. Indeed, Feb. 5, 2008, may become Super-Duper Tuesday with, perhaps, Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Illinois, Missouri, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma and Utah voting on the same day. If Super-Duper Tuesday does occur, California would still represent the biggest bloc in what would be, in effect, a national primary. But as the law of unintended consequences is wont to do, all this may actually increase, rather than decrease, the importance of Iowa and New Hampshire (and perhaps Nevada and South Carolina), because winners in those states would have the only momentum heading into Super-Duper Tuesday. … The nominating process itself may screen the field, even before a single vote is cast. That's not necessarily good for the country."

Colorado Democrats Could Move Caucuses To February 5. The Denver Post (1/28, Crummy, 256K) reports Colorado Democrats "are considering moving up the state's caucuses to the first week of February 2008 in an effort to be politically relevant in the next presidential election. If Colorado moves its caucuses from the third week in March to Feb. 5, however, it would join more than a dozen other states that have either already moved their caucuses or primaries up to the same date, or are thinking about it. As a result, some political observers say, Colorado probably becomes insignificant."

Chait Would Like To See Presidents Bush, Clinton To Face Off In 2008. In his Los Angeles Times (1/28, 850K) column, Jonathan Chait argues for a repeal of the 22nd Amendment, saying the "Hillary Clinton campaign is a product of the fact that her husband can't run for reelection. … Indeed, Democratic presidential politics since Clinton has consisted largely of referendum-by-proxy on Clinton." As for Republicans, President Bush "is going to leave office deeply unpopular with the American public. But what do Republicans think? According to a recent poll, three-quarters of them still approve of Bush's performance. Because Bush can't run again, though, Republicans won't have to confront whether they want to stick with him or move in a different direction. … What this country really needs is to have Bill Clinton run against George W. Bush."

Baker Weighing Challenge To Landrieu. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (1/28, Alpert, Walsh) reports Rep. Richard Baker "isn't ruling out a run against Sen. Mary Landrieu." Baker spokesman Michael DiResto said, "Folks in D.C. have talked to him about it. Folks in Louisiana have talked to him about it. He's thinking about it." Baker "wasn't well-known outside his district until he proposed a community redevelopment plan for post-Katrina Louisiana that won accolades from state leaders, including Landrieu and Gov. Kathleen Blanco. It died when the Bush administration opposed it, but the effort boosted Baker's profile statewide."

Speech By Jeb Bush Energizes Conservative Gathering. The Washington Post (1/28, A4, Goldfarb, 690K) reports that "at a time when the conservative movement is looking bereft, humbled by midterm-election defeats and hungering for a presidential candidate to rally around, Jeb Bush delivered yesterday in Washington a resounding endorsement of conservative principles, bringing his audience repeatedly to its feet." Addressing the Conservative Summit, the former Florida governor "struck every conservative chord, blaming Republicans' defeat in November on the party's abandonment of tenets including limited government and fiscal restraint." His speech "prompted three standing ovations from the audience of hundreds."

DOJ_NMG_0123237

US-European Missile Defense Cooperation Said To Face Local, Russian Resistance. Under the headline, "U.S. Missiles in E. Europe Opposed by Locals, Russia," the Washington Post (1/28, A16, Konviser, 690K) notes an Administration "plan to deploy a missile defense shield in Eastern Europe is drawing protests from Russia and from residents who oppose hosting foreign military bases and fear the facilities might make their countries targets for attack." The Administration is seeking to place "about 10 interceptor missiles in Poland and a radar tracking station in the Czech Republic," a move the Kremlin says "would pose a 'clear threat' to Russia." A Foreign Ministry spokesman "underlined his government's opposition Friday, saying in an interview with the ITAR-Tass news agency that 'the creation of a U.S. European anti-missile base can only be regarded as a substantial reconfiguration of the American military presence in Europe.' He called the move 'a mistaken step with negative consequences for international security.'"

WTO Doha Talk Resumption Will Seek Technical Agreements First. The New York Times (1/28, A10, Dougherty, 1.16M) reports, "Leading trade ministers on Saturday embraced an unusual game plan for reviving trade talks, saying they would try to hash out details on technical issues, rather than first agreeing on the broad outlines of an accord." At the World Economic Forum in Davos, "officials from 30 countries including the United States, the European Union and emerging markets like India and Brazil vowed to move forward in the" WTO Doha Round. "To resuscitate the talks, the ministers endorsed a strategy that is highly unusual in these negotiations, but now appears to offer the only chance to conclude the trade round. Instead of creating a framework for agreement and then working out details on technical issues like tariffs and subsidies later, countries will aim to work out most specifics up front. Then, they will decide whether a final push is warranted at a meeting of all World Trade Organization members in Geneva." WTO Director-General Pascal Lamy "said the process would have to achieve a genuine breakthrough in 'months, not quarters,' for a meeting of all the group's members to occur."

Blair Backs G-8 Expansion To Include India, China. Under the headline, "Blair Says G-8 Should Expand, Disagrees With Merkel," Bloomberg (1/28, Fraher) notes British Prime Minister Tony Blair's speech yesterday in Davos. He "said the Group of Eight industrialized nations should eventually expand to include countries such as China and India, putting him at odds with current G-8 head Angela Merkel." Bloomberg explains, "Politicians from the G-8 are debating whether to allow some of the world's fastest growing economies into their club and grant them a top table presence on talks ranging from foreign exchange policy to development aid. While Blair argued for expansion, Merkel rejected the idea in her opening address on Jan. 24." In addition, Bloomberg reports, Blair "is running out of time to build a foreign policy legacy beyond the war in Iraq before he steps down later this year. He repeated a call made last May to fuse the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank to strengthen the influence of emerging economies."

Three Killed In Third Day Of Fatah-Hamas Fighting. The New York Times (1/28, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports, "At least three more Palestinians were killed Saturday in Gaza in continuing battles between fighters loyal to Fatah and Hamas, which has been celebrating its victory a year ago over Fatah in legislative elections." Yesterday's "fighting started near the Hamas Islamic University, the headquarters of the Fatah-dominated preventive security force in Gaza City and the Shifa Hospital a few blocks away." Noting the deaths of over 20 Palestinians in violence since Thursday, and the suspension of Fatah-Hamas unity government talks, the Times notes, "If the talks fail, [President Mahmoud] Abbas said he would move to make good on his Dec. 16 call for early presidential and parliamentary elections, despite Hamas' victory a year ago." Washington "is continuing to try to support Mr. Abbas and his loyal presidential guard with more than $80 million in what is supposed to be nonlethal aid."

A lengthy AP (1/28, Barzak) piece adds, "Gunmen from the rival Hamas and Fatah movements battled in Gaza City for a third straight day Saturday, firing mortars and grenades in clashes that killed seven people in the increasingly bloody power struggle over the Palestinian government." BBC.com (1/27) adds, "Clashes erupted in Gaza after weeks of relative calm and renewed efforts to form a national unity government. Both sides say they have suspended talks."

DOJ_NMG_0123238

Israel May Have Violated Arms Export Control Act. The New York Times (1/28, Cloud, Myre, 1.16M) reports a State Department statement that it "will inform Congress" tomorrow "that Israel may have violated agreements with the United States when it fired American-supplied cluster munitions into southern Lebanon during its fight with Hezbollah last summer." That "finding, though preliminary, has prompted a contentious debate within the administration over whether the United States should penalize Israel for its use of cluster munitions against towns and villages where Hezbollah had placed its rocket launchers. … Midlevel officials at the Pentagon and the State Department have argued that Israel violated American prohibitions on using cluster munitions against populated areas," while "other officials in both departments contend that Israel's use of the weapons was for self-defense and aimed at stopping the Hezbollah rocket attacks that killed 159 Israeli citizens and at worst was only a technical violation." The Los Angeles Times (1/28, 850K) adds the State Department "has completed a preliminary report on whether Israel misused American-made cluster bombs in civilian areas of Lebanon."

NYTimes Says Dialogue With Syria Is Crucial To Stabilizing Lebanon. An editorial in today's New York Times (1/28, 1.16M) praises international donors' $7.6 million pledge for rebuilding Lebanon. "The democratically elected government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora needs all the help it can get," and recent violence, "if not contained," might "even reignite Lebanon's catastrophic civil war." The country's "fundamental problem is the archaic and unfair political system that divides the country's top offices among rival and distrustful religious communities." Noting Hezbollah's simultaneous use of politics and violence to gain influence, the Times says "Any plan for stabilizing Lebanon has to face up to this dynamic. That's why the Bush administration needs to drop its stubborn resistance to diplomacy with Syria — and try to coax Damascus away from both Iran and Hezbollah." The Administration "must make clear that Lebanon's sovereignty is not negotiable." While Syria has sometimes "responded constructively" to dialogue, "it has always responded destructively to isolation. Engaging Syria may not work. But ignoring it all but guarantees that even $7.6 billion in aid will not be enough to stabilize Lebanon."

Saudis Said To Work To Keep Oil Prices Stable. A lengthy piece on the front page of the New York Times (1/28, Mouawad, 1.16M) reports Saudi officials have "sent signals in the past two weeks that" they are "committed to keeping oil at around $50 a barrel — down $27 a barrel from the summer peak that shook consumers across the developed world." Saudi Arabia, "which is by far the largest oil producer within OPEC and sets the cartel's agenda, is seeking to avoid a repeat of the dramatic rise in prices while trying to put a floor beneath them." Saudi leaders, the Times says, "appear to be rediscovering that painfully high energy prices take a profound toll on the global economy, which in turn reduces demand for their oil. But other motives seem to be at work, too, including the Saudis' desire to restrain Iran's ambitions in the region." While they "say their oil policy is based on market considerations and not political ones," recent events "led to renewed speculation that the kingdom might be tempted to dry out Iran's ambitions by pushing oil prices down."

Pelosi Leads Delegation To Discuss Security With Musharraf. The AP (1/27) notes House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "arrived in Pakistan Saturday for talks with the country's president expected to touch on cooperation against Taliban and al-Qaeda militants and U.S. aid to the South Asian country, officials said." None of the meeting participants were expected to make public comments. The AP notes the coincidence of the visit with the Congress' consideration of legislation "that would link American aid for Pakistan's military with its commitment to combating resurgent Taliban militants."

ABC World News (1/27, story 3, 1:50, Weir, 8.78M) reported Pelosi "is in Pakistan tonight for talks with one of America's biggest allies on the war on terror. Her visit, about fighting Al Qaeda and the Taliban, come on the same day as a major attack in Pakistan." Pelosi's delegation is "there to push [Musharraf] to crack down harder on the Taliban, and Al Qaeda sympathizers in Pakistan, and these explosions coming just one day after the other. At the very least, a wakeup call that he needs to do that."

Suicide Bomber Kills 15 In Northern Pakistan. The Washington Post/AP (1/28, A13, Khan) reports, "A suicide attacker detonated a bomb among police on guard near a Shiite mosque in this northern Pakistani city Saturday, killing at least 15 people and wounding more than 30, police said." The "explosion came as Pakistan's minority Shiites started to commemorate their most important religious festival, Ashura, often an impetus for sectarian violence. Paramilitary forces in armored vehicles were deployed to patrol Peshawar after the bombing." President Pervez Musharraf "condemned the 'terrorist attack' in Peshawar and ordered an immediate inquiry. … Most of the victims were police and municipal officials," and "there was no immediate assertion of responsibility, but suspicion was likely to fall on Sunni extremists." NBC Nightly News (1/27, story 4, :15, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) briefly reported on the attack.

DOJ_NMG_0123239

The New York Times (1/28, A4, Khan, 1.16M) adds, "At least 14 people were killed, most of them policemen, and several others were wounded Saturday in what appeared to be a suicide bombing here shortly before a Shiite religious procession was to come through, the police said." The Times says "security in Peshawar was already on alert after a suicide bombing outside a Marriott hotel in Islamabad on Friday and in preparation for Ashura," and a police source "said there was little any one could do to head off a determined suicide bomber." BBC.com (1/27) adds, "It is not clear whether the attack was aimed at the worshippers or the police. Power was cut in the city centre shortly after the blast, complicating rescue efforts."

The Los Angeles Times (1/28, Ali, King, 850K) calls Peshawar a "volatile frontier city," and says "scores of people were wounded in the powerful blast… Adding to the chaos, a power failure apparently caused by the explosion plunged the area into darkness. Rescuers groped in the dark, guided by the cries and moans of the injured." The Times also notes Pelosi's visit, saying her "delegation held discussions with Musharraf centering on Pakistan's role in fighting the insurgency in neighboring Afghanistan."

Two Americans Killed By Carjackers In Kenya. A brief item in today's New York Times (1/28, 1.16M) reports, "Two Americans, including an elderly woman, were shot to death on Saturday afternoon by carjackers in Nairobi." The wife and mother-in-law of an Embassy officer "were traveling in an embassy car with three other Americans when a truck cut them off, police officials said. Four men jumped out with Kalashnikov assault rifles and ordered the occupants out of their car." Police did not offer a reason for the shooting itself, "and American officials said they did not believe the attack was related to terrorism." The AP (1/27) reports, "Gunmen carjacked a U.S. Embassy vehicle on the outskirts [Nairobi] Saturday afternoon and killed two female relatives of an embassy employee, officials said. Police later killed two people involved in the carjacking."

Sudan's North-South Peace Accord "Endangered." Under the headline, "Sudan's Peace Deal, Seen As A Bush Success, Is Endangered," the Washington Post (1/28, A18, Kessler, 690K) reports, "A peace agreement that two years ago ended Africa's longest-running conflict -- and that the White House considers one of President Bush's signature achievements -- is in danger of unraveling because of inattention by top U.S. officials and growing tensions between Sudan's government and the former rebels who signed the deal, according to experts and congressional officials." The Administration "made [that] peace agreement one of its top diplomatic priorities," but "experts warn that the Khartoum government's unwillingness to abide by the terms of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) could lead to a new outbreak of war." Some "experts said the administration, distracted by war in the Middle East and an unrelated conflict in Sudan's Darfur region, has failed to recognize the peril lurking in the south." The Post includes criticism from Rep. Frank Wolf and Rep. Donald Payne, who "said the administration should appoint a special envoy specifically to make sure the north-south peace deal does not collapse."

Kristof Asks Bush To Do More To Stop Darfur Genocide. In his New York Times (1/28, 1.16M) column, Nicholas Kristof pans the idea of Sudan assuming the chair of the African Union. Calling President Omar al-Bashir "blood-drenched" and the "architect of the genocide in Darfur," Kristof says "it's mind-boggling that African countries would even consider selecting as their leader a man who has systematically dispatched militias that pick out babies on the basis of tribe and skin color and throw them into bonfires." With Africa "enjoying solid economic growth and improved leadership," he says, "this self-inflicted wound would sully Africa's image and make it far more difficult for African Union peacekeepers to save lives in Darfur. … For anyone who wants the best for Africa, it is repulsive to think of President Bashir as the duly elected spokesman for the continent." Noting that "the world doesn't seriously object" to Khartoum's actions, Kristof says "Europe is oblivious" and "President Bush has been better than most world leaders, but still pathetic: he mustered half a sentence in his State of the Union address. Perhaps this is because Mr. Bush regards the situation as tragic but hopeless, but in fact there is plenty he could do," including lobbying against Sudan in its bid to lead the AU.

DOJ_NMG_0123240

Hoagland Says Tutu Is Example For Bush, World. In his Washington Post (1/28, 690K) column, Jim Hoagland praises Archbishop Desmond Tutu's recent criticisms of South Africa's refusal to support a UN Security Council rebuke of the Burmese regime. "When Desmond Tutu speaks out about morality in politics and foreign policy, his nation and the rest of the world should listen. By criticizing the government he helped bring into being, the South African Nobel laureate raises in his own distinctive fashion some of the key issues of our time." Tutu "rightly suggests that because of its history, post-apartheid South Africa has a special responsibility to pursue a foreign policy that supports international action to help oppressed populations." He continues, "Just as South Africans should be guided by the recent past, Americans must recall their government's history with Iraq." President Bush "has failed to underpin his narrowly American approach to values with a persuasive appeal to international moral standards and conscience. Desmond Tutu's reproach to his own government is a cogent reminder of the perils and ignominy that such failure brings."

Mexican Efforts To Stem Central American Immigration Said To Falter. The New York Times (1/28, A12, McKinley, 1.16M) details Mexico's continuing efforts to slow Central American immigration. While Mexican President Felipe Calderon has "announced measures to slow the flow of illegal immigrants across Mexico's southern border and reduce crime in this lush but impoverished region,… much remains to be done to stop or deter the migrants, and for now the measures have had little effect. Social workers and volunteers who aid the migrants say they keep coming." The Times reports "corruption is rampant. Soldiers and police officers on the Mexican side extort money from the migrants but seldom turn them around, aid workers and migrants said." The "biggest deterrent, migrants say, is not federal authorities but armed thugs who waylay them along the railroad tracks or on paths through the countryside used to avoid the immigration posts along the main highway."

Karimov Said To Maintain Firm Control In Uzbekistan. An analysis piece by the AP (1/27, Bukharbayeva) notes, "Nearly a week after his term elapsed, the former Communist strongman who has kept a tight grip on Uzbekistan for more than 15 years shows no sign of vacating the presidential office." Islam Karimov's continuance in office past the expiration of his mandate is "a sign his hold on power remains strong and that he has no intention of leaving, analysts say." Citing analysts who believe Karimov will stand for election again in December, the AP adds, "Many observers fear that the Karimov government's oppressive control of the country could radicalize Islamic fundamentalists and lead to an explosion of violence in an already troubled part of the world."

Kerry Assails Bush Administration Foreign Policy. The Washington Times/AP (1/28) reports comments at the World Economic Forum by Sen. John Kerry, who "slammed the foreign policy of the Bush administration yesterday, saying it has caused the United States to become 'a sort of international pariah.'" Kerry "made the comment as he responded to a question about whether the U.S. government had failed to adequately engage Iran's government before the election of hard-liner Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in 2005. He said the Bush administration has failed to adequately address a number of foreign-policy issues." Kerry also "said the government needs to use diplomacy to improve national security."

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"The Vaccine Industry's Development Revival."
"A Deal In The Desert For Sen. Reid?"
"Bringing Home A New Islam."
"Waiting For The DDT Tide To Turn."

New York Times:

"Saudi Officials Seek To Temper The Price Of Oil."
"In Law School, Obama Found Political Voice."
"A Cleric's Journey Leads To A Suburban Frontier."
"On Iran, Bush Faces Haunting Echoes Of Iraq."
"After Times Of Grief And Doubt, A Tennis Ace Is Hungry Again."
"Atlantic City Casinos Reap Anti-Blight Funds."

Washington Post:

"Thousands Protest Bush Policy."
"Clinton Begins Her Run In Earnest."

DOJ_NMG_0123241

"Vietnam Shades Warner's Iraq Stand."
"Dinner, Movie -- And A Background Check -- For Online "
A Real-Life Sequel To 'Lorenzo's Oil.'"

Washington Times:
"Iraq War Foes Mass On Mall."
"Seven U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq."
"In Iowa, Hillary Off And Running."
"Church-State 'Wall' Coming Back Down?"
"Pope John Paul 'Escaped' To Hit Slopes, New Book Says."

Detroit Free Press:
"Gumbleton Not Ousted For Condemning Abuse, Archdiocese Says."
"Spartans, Neitzel Run Out Of Gas Against Ohio State."
"RV Enthusiasts Oooh And Ahhh At Ford Field."
"U-M Fades Again In Bloomington."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Escapee Arrested After S.E. Manhunt."
"Searchers Find Skeletal Remains."
"Bill Targets Eyewitness IDs."
"Thousands Protest War."
"Kidd To Lead State Dems."
"Man Surrenders After Standoff."
"Guilty Plea In Shaking Case."

Dallas Morning News:
"Surgeries Mend Twins' Tiny Hearts."
"Two DISD Principals Told To Resign -- Or Else."
"Bail Means Freedom, Lighter Terms For Many Suspects."
"D.C. Anti-War Demonstration Draws Tens Of Thousands."
"Schools Get Around 'No-Pass, No-Play' Law."
"Super Bowl Coaches Represent Winning Drive For Diversity."
"SMU Students Revisit Holocaust."
"Escapee Suspected Of Stealing Singer's Tour Bus."

Houston Chronicle:
"Contractor Deaths In Iraq Nearing 800."
"Houston Nightclub Sting Ends In Vice Raid, Arrests."
"Sketch Was Key To Houston Rape Suspect's Arrest."
"Parts Of Houston To Miss Air-Pollution Deadline."
"HISD Among Bonus-For-Performance Pioneers."
"Houston-Galveston Passenger Train Could Roll."
"'Green' Options Bloom At Houston Auto Show."
"Cuts In Texas Welfare Come At Cost."
"Pave The Way For Your PC To Handle Vista."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Clinton In Iowa; Giuliani In New Hampshire; Pelosi In Pakistan; Violence In Iraq; Antiwar Protests; Military Struggling To Enlist; Computer Chips; Retirees Move To Panama; Prince Charles; Community Service Vacations.
CBS: Computer Chips; Antiwar Protests; Clinton In Iowa; Officer Refuses To Go To Iraq; Sailors Missing After Crash; Prince Charles.
NBC: Antiwar Protests; Military Family View Of War; Violence In Iraq; Sectarian Violence In Pakistan; Clinton In Iowa; Presidential Campaign; Housing Market; Prince Charles; Passport Requirement; Apollo One; Diving In Everglades.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: Not in session

US House: Not in session.

Other: CONSERVATIVE SUMMIT _ The National Review Institute hosts its Conservative Summit. Topics include: Debates on the war in Iraq, the role of the Religious Right, immigration, and energy policy; panels on foreign policy, social issues, domestic policy, small government, and quotas, blacks, and the GOP. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave. NW. Contacts: Kristina Graboski, 703-683-5004 ext 132.

AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS _ The National Air Traffic Controllers Association (NATCA) National Legislative Committee holds a Washington conference. Location: Hyatt Regency on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW. Jan. 28-31.

SCHOOL BOARDS _ The National School Board Association holds its annual Federal Relations Network Conference. Location: Grand Hyatt Hotel, Independence A Room, 1000 H St. NW. Contacts: Linda Embrey, 703-838-6737.

ANTIWAR WORKSHOPS _ 9 a.m. - 12 p.m. United for Peace and Justice holds training sessions for those joining the Congressional Lobby Day on Monday, Jan. 29. Location: Bethesda-Chevy Chase High School, 4301 East-West Highway, Bethesda, Md. Contacts: ., 212-868-5545.

DOJ_NMG_0123242

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, JANUARY 28, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Professor Calls War On Terror A "Massive Overreaction." 2
Express-News Questions Surveillance Moves 2

Homeland Response:
New Passport Rules Take Effect 3
D'Souza Says Bin Laden Targeted US For Its Assaults On Values 3
Charities Responsible For Most Of Katrina Reconstruction 3

War News:
Demonstrators Turn Out In Opposition To Iraq War..... 3
Deliberations Over Iraq War Said To Color Response To Criticisms Of Iran 4
Seven US Troops Killed; Bombers Strike Baghdad Market 5
Iraq's Shiite Vice President Ambivalent About Surge 6
War Raises Questions About Volunteer Military..... 6
Iraqi Soldiers Still Reliant On US 7
Iraqi Government Cultivates Ties To US Democrats..... 7
Army Probes Contractor Fraud 7
Warner's Iraq Stance Affected By Vietnam 7
Ex-USAID Worker Remembers Work In Fallujah Before Injury 8
Taliban Threatens Summer Wave Of Suicide Bombers..... 8

Corporate Scandals:
Qwest May Face Dispute Over CEO's Legal Fees 8
Shareholders, Company Directors Urged To Rein In Executive Pay 8

Criminal Law:
Libby Trial Reveals Lack Of Identity Protection For CIA Agents ... 8
Havesi Prosecutor Seeks "One Standard Of Justice." 9
Penalty Phase Of Criminal Trials Lays Bare All Secrets 9
Doubt Cast On Perception That Teen Girls Are Becoming More Violent 9
US Praised For Law Enforcement Aid To New Orleans..... 10

Civil Rights:
Mississippi Clerk Testifies To Inaction On Invalid Ballots..... 10
New Jersey Towns Mull Tougher Rules For Rental Housing Overcrowding..... 10
Police Departments Make Effort To Boost Minority Recruitment 11
Religious Issues Increasingly Debated In US Courts 11

Antitrust:
Microsoft Faces New EU Antitrust Questions With Vista 11

Environment/Indian Affairs:
Michigan Waste Treatment Firm Faces Dumping Charges 12
Energy Independence Could Be "Century Away" Under Bush Plan 12
Breakthrough Reported In Debate Over House Climate Change Committee..... 12
Communities Concerned Over Expiration Of Rural Law 12
Two Wolf Species To Lose Endangered Status 12
Tribe Oppose Bid To Alter Gaming Laws 13

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Battered Mexican Drug Cartel Said To Be On The Ropes..... 13
Brady Center Targets Gun Dealers 13

Immigration:
Minnesota Family Decries Mother's Deportation As Daughter Faces Medical Treatment 14
National Guard Soldiers On "Front Line" Of Immigration Debate 14

Tax:
Taxpayers Left In The Dark About IRS Bond Probes..... 14
NYTimes Says Bush Tax Credits Should Be Allowed To Expire 15

Congress-Administration:
New White House Counsel Seen Better Suited To Upcoming Challenges 15
Experts Warn Bush Health Plan Would End Employee Benefits 15
Reid Land Purchase, Ties To Lubricants Industry Examined 15
Schumer Says GOP Senators May Moderate Stances 16
Johnson's Continued Absence Felt On Capitol Hill 16
As Only Female, Ginsburg Feels Isolated On Court 16
Navy Calls Off Search For Missing Sailors..... 16
Will Criticizes Move To Give US Territories Vote In House..... 16
Bush Urged To Make Papers Public, Disclose Library Contributors 16

Other News:
Median Home Prices Dropping..... 17
Democrats Seek To Tap Into Economic Anxiety Of Swing Voters17
Clinton Holds First Iowa Event Of Her Presidential Campaign.... 17
Giuliani Hits New Hampshire, But Stays Mum On Plans 19

Obama First Became "Political Sensation" At Harvard Law School ... 19
Novak Says Democrats Pleased By "Dour" McCain Interview ... 20
Romney Said To Be Winning Support Of Hastert, House GOP ... 20
McAuliffe Says GOP Candidates Will "Stay Away" From Bush ... 20
Six Politicians' Endorsements Could Impact Primaries ... 20
Successful "Dark Horse" Candidates Could Be Nearing Extinction ... 20
Cullen To Head New Hampshire GOP ... 21
Impact Of Possible California Primary Move Considered ... 21
Colorado Democrats Could Move Caucuses To February 5 ... 21
Chait Would Like To See Presidents Bush, Clinton To Face Off In 2008 ... 21
Baker Weighing Challenge To Landrieu ... 21
Speech By Jeb Bush Energizes Conservative Gathering ... 22
US-European Missile Defense Cooperation Said To Face Local, Russian Resistance ... 22
WTO Doha Talk Resumption Will Seek Technical Agreements First ... 22
Three Killed In Third Day Of Fatah-Hamas Fighting ... 22
Israel May Have Violated Arms Export Control Act ... 23
NYTimes Says Dialogue With Syria Is Crucial To Stabilizing Lebanon ... 23
Saudis Said To Work To Keep Oil Prices Stable ... 23
Pelosi Leads Delegation To Discuss Security With Musharraf ... 23
Two Americans Killed By Carjackers In Kenya ... 24
Sudan's North-South Peace Accord "Endangered." ... 24
Hoagland Says Tutu Is Example For Bush, World ... 24
Mexican Efforts To Stem Central American Immigration Said To Falter ... 25
Karimov Said To Maintain Firm Control In Uzbekistan ... 25
Kerry Assails Bush Administration Foreign Policy ... 25

The Big Picture

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 25

Washington's Schedule

Today's Events In Washington ... 26

TERRORISM NEWS:

Professor Calls War On Terror A "Massive Overreaction." In a Los Angeles Times (1/28, 850K) op-ed, David Bell, a professor of history at Johns Hopkins University, questions whether the American reaction to the 9/11 attacks has "in fact been a massive overreaction." Bell says "it is no disrespect to the victims of 9/11, or to the men and women of our armed forces, to say that, by the standards of past wars, the war against terrorism has so far inflicted a very small human cost on the United States." The "people who attacked us in 2001 are indeed hate-filled fanatics who would like nothing better than to destroy this country," Bell concedes, but stresses that "desire is not the same thing as capacity, and although Islamist extremists can certainly do huge amounts of harm around the world, it is quite different to suggest that they can threaten the existence of the United States." Therefore, he suggests that the war against terrorism "has not yet been much of a war at all, let alone a war to end all wars," but rather "a messy, difficult, long-term struggle against exceptionally dangerous criminals." To fight them effectively, Bell says "we need coolness, resolve and stamina. But we also need to overcome long habit and remind ourselves that not every enemy is in fact a threat to our existence."

Express-News Questions Surveillance Moves. The San Antonio Express-News (1/28) editorializes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the nation will be 'no less safe' now that the Bush administration has agreed to bring its warrantless surveillance program into line with provisions of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act. … The effort to monitor international calls to or from terrorist suspects will now come under some sort of scrutiny from the secretive FISA court, specially created to review intelligence matters." The Express-News continues, "It is a curious reversal for the administration that raises an important question: If judicial review of the program doesn't impair national security, why didn't the White House adhere to this legal process from the beginning? … President Bush had maintained that as commander in chief, he is empowered in time of war to carry out such surveillance beyond the purview of the FISA court. Since the surveillance effort became known publicly in late 2005, he has strenuously argued that any changes to the program would imperil national security. … The new White House position still asserts this executive power — what Gonzales calls 'inherent authority.' But it accepts some sort of formal review process under FISA rules." The Express-News adds, "Other than a new majority in Congress, what has changed? No one really knows, because Gonzales' description of the process is as nebulous as the surveillance program itself. … Unfortunately, we don't know whether the program has changed or if the administration's interpretation of the law has changed. Bush's penchant for executive signing statements — Oval Office appendages to new laws that carve out exemptions for executive power — doesn't inspire confidence in the former."

DOJ_NMG_0123245

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

New Passport Rules Take Effect. NBC Nightly News (1/27, story 9, 2:00, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "This week marked the beginning of a new era in air travel for Americans. In the old days if you were flying from Canada, Mexico or the Caribbean, all you needed to show at Customs was a birth certificate. Not any more. Some fear the new rules will spell trouble for American travelers."

D'Souza Says Bin Laden Targeted US For Its Assaults On Values. Dinesh D'Souza, author and fellow at the Hoover Institution, writes in the Washington Post (1/28, B1, 690K) that "contrary to the common liberal view, I don't believe that the 9/11 attacks were payback for US foreign policy. Bin Laden isn't upset because there are US troops in Mecca," nor is it "all about Israel. (Why hasn't al-Qaeda launched a single attack against Israel?)" D'Souza says, "Contrary to President Bush's view, they don't hate us for our freedom, either. Rather, they hate us for how we use our freedom." Instead, he asserts that it is the "assault on prevailing religious and traditional values" that angers the "sensibilities of many of the world's people." D'Souza says the US "cannot defeat terrorism without driving a wedge between radical Islam and traditional Islam, because the latter has been the main recruiting pool for the former."

Charities Responsible For Most Of Katrina Reconstruction. The Washington Post (1/28, A3, Whoriskey, 690K) reports, "While the national debate over the recovery has focused on the billions expected in federal aid and insurance, those sources have so far provided little for places…, and charity efforts have constituted more than 80 percent of the home rebuilding completed so far," local and charity officials on the Gulf Coast said. In Hancock County, Mississippi, "where nearly 11,000 homes were destroyed by the storm," the largest single home rebuilder is the local Habitat for Humanity project." The reason for the charity's "dominant role" in the rebuilding is that "little, if any, of the $3.2 billion in federal aid for Mississippi homeowners has reached anyone here -- it is tied up for now at the state level." As for insurance, "most residents of this rural community lacked any form of flood policy."

WAR NEWS:

Demonstrators Turn Out In Opposition To Iraq War. Saturday demonstrations against President Bush's Iraq policy receive heavy and generally sympathetic coverage on an otherwise slow news day, when the other big story was the early action in the presidential race. Reports on the protests concentrate on the disputed turnout numbers, the presence of film celebrities and several active-duty members of the military, and on the demonstrators' intention to impact Democrats in Congress more than the President.

NBC Nightly News (1/27, lead story, 2:55, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) led with the demonstrations, saying "tens of thousands of Americans converged on Washington, D.C., demonstrating against the war in Iraq, urging the US government to bring the troops home. The crowd gathered on the Washington Mall joined by politicians and celebrities like Jane Fonda delivering a message that was clearly intended for the President." NBC (Yang): "President Bush asked American people to give his plan for Iraq a chance. But the people who marched in the streets in Washington and other cities today were in no mood to be patient. The demonstrators' message: no more troops to Iraq and bring all the troops home. It was aimed at both President Bush and the new Democratic majority in Congress."

The CBS Evening News (1/27, story 2, 3:00, Assuras, 7.66M) also ran the story near the top of the broadcast, saying "here at home, there were anti-war protests in Washington and other cities as well." CBS (Chen): "This was not the first, this was not the biggest protest of its type this city has seen. Still, organizers believe it will have a significant impact, mostly because it tried to change the direction of the debate over the war by changing the direction of the protest. The surge of protestors pushed off, led by faces you might expect -- activist Jesse Jackson, actor Sean Penn, and Jane Fonda, who admitted she avoided this soapbox since the days she was called Hanoi Jane. … But for all the tie-dye and familiar chants, the anti-war movement has moved on, and changed direction. Today's protest didn't go near the White House, instead leading tens of thousands up Constitution Avenue towards the Capitol, bearing a message for the new Congress, now controlled by Democrats."

ABC World News (1/27, story 5, 2:00, Weir, 8.78M) said the "steady drumbeat of death was on the minds of demonstrators from Washington, D.C., to the West Coast." ABC (Marquez): "The tens of thousands of protestors who gathered on both coasts today spoke with a single voice: They want the US out of Iraq. … Hollywood celebrities crowded the stage, including Jane Fonda, a controversial figure from the Vietnam antiwar movement." The Washington Post (1/28, D1, Weeks, 690K) details Fonda's re-emergence on the activist scene.

On its front page, the Washington Post (1/28, Ruane, Kunkle, 690K) reports, "A raucous and colorful multitude of protesters, led by some of the aging activists of the past, staged a series of rallies and a march on the Capitol yesterday to demand that the United States end its war in Iraq. ... They came from across the country and across the activist spectrum, with a wide array of grievances. Many seemed to be under 30, but there were others who said they had been at the famed war protests of the 1960s and '70s." The Washington Times (1/28, A1, Lively, 88K) reports, "Organizers said they exceeded their goal of 100,000 attendees. Police do not give official crowd estimates, but some officers said privately that the crowd appeared smaller."

DOJ_NMG_0123246

The AP (1/28, Woodward, Margasak) called the march an "anti-war demonstration linking military families, ordinary people and an icon of the Vietnam protest movement in a spirited call to get out of Iraq." The New York Times (1/28, A21, Urbina, 1.16M) reports, "Tassi McKee, from Bastrop, La., who said she was a staff sergeant in the Air Force, was among a small contingent of about 20 active-duty service members who turned out." The Times says "police officials declined to provide crowd estimates, but Hany Khalil, a spokesman for United for Peace and Justice, said the protesters numbered about 400,000." An AP (1/28) article quotes two other active service members at the rally. BBC.com (1/27) reports the rally, saying, "The rally comes days before Congress is to discuss President George W Bush's new strategy for Iraq."

Students Fight Apathetic Image. The Washington Post (1/28, A8, Greenwell, 690K) reports, "Since the war began nearly four years ago, many Vietnam-era antiwar activists have publicly lamented what they see as apathy among today's college students. They wonder whether the absence of a draft and a culture of pop music and reality television have distracted young people from civic responsibilities. But among the hundreds of students on the Mall yesterday, dozens of whom drove all night to get to Washington for the protest, the prevailing sentiment was that their generation had been unfairly maligned and that the antiwar movement is growing stronger every day." Students at the rally found signs "of a building resistance to the war in Iraq and other U.S. foreign policy initiatives."

Deployment Resistor Watada Profiled. The CBS Evening News (1/27, story 4, 2:20, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "The Iraq war sparked demonstrations today; one man has waged his own protest for months now. He is the first Army officer to publicly refuse to fight in Iraq, and he may soon face court martial for his beliefs." CBS (Blackstone): "Ehren Watada sounds little different than any other war protestor. But his protest could send him to prison for six years; when his army unit shipped out last June, Lieutenant Watada refused to go to Iraq." Watada: "Just being a part of that would be adding more fuel to the fire instead of trying to put it out." Blackstone: "While Lt. Watada waits for his court martial, the Army still requires him to show up for work here at Fort Lewis every day. He admits he's probably the most unpopular soldier on the base, but that hasn't stopped him from continuing to speak out against the war."

More Commentary On Iraq. In his Washington Post (1/28, B7, 690K), column, Robert Kagan writes that, besides Democrats, "Many conservatives and Republicans, including erstwhile supporters of the war, have thrown up their hands in anger at the Iraqi people or the Iraqi government. They, too, seem to believe that if American troops leave, because Iraqis don't 'deserve' our help, then somehow the whole mess will solve itself or simply fade away. ... Politicians in both parties should realize that success in this mission is in their interest, as well as the nation's. Here's a wild idea: Forget the political posturing, be responsible, and provide the moral and material support our forces need and expect."

In an op-ed for the New York Times (1/28, WK1, 1.16M), reporter Sabrina Tavernise writes, "A painful measure of just how much Iraq has changed in the four years since I started coming here is contained in my cellphone. Many numbers in the address book are for Iraqis who have either fled the country or been killed. ... Iraq is a different country now. ... Deeply damaged from years of abuse under Saddam Hussein, the Shiites who run the government have themselves turned into abusers." Tavernise predicts the failure of the new US plan in Iraq because "Abused under Mr. Hussein, [Shiites] still act like an oppressed class. That means Iraqis are looking into a future of war, at least in the near term."

In the New York Times (1/28, WK16, 1.16M), columnist David Brooks writes that, based on the experience of Bosnia, "The best answer [for Iraq], then, is soft partition: create a central government with a few key powers; reinforce strong regional governments; separate the sectarian groups as much as possible. ... logic, circumstances and politics are leading inexorably toward soft partition. The Bush administration has been slow to recognize its virtues because it is too dependent on the Green Zone Iraqis. The Iraqis talk about national unity but their behavior suggests they want decentralization."

Deliberations Over Iraq War Said To Color Response To Criticisms Of Iran. On its front page, the New York Times (1/28, A1, Sanger, 1.16M) notes the "haunting echoes" in Bush Administration statements about Iran. "As President Bush and his aides calibrate how directly to confront Iran, they are discovering that both their words and their strategy are haunted by the echoes of four years ago — when their warnings of terrorist activity and nuclear ambitions were clearly a prelude to war. This time, they insist, it is different." The Times continues, "To many in Washington, especially Mr. Bush's Democratic critics, the new approach to Iran has all the hallmarks of an administration once again spoiling for a fight. Some see an attempt to create a diversion, focusing the country's attention away from a war gone bad in Iraq, and toward a country that has exploited America's troubles to expand its influence. Others suspect an effort to shift the blame for the spiraling chaos in Iraq." Now, "as they present their evidence, some Bush administration officials concede they are confronting the bitter legacy of their prewar distortions of the intelligence in Iraq." While in the coming weeks, "more escalation is likely," the Times says "the debate over whether the United States should stick to diplomacy or take more forceful action is bound to begin right away, and will sound familiar. Democrats, even while accusing the administration of failing to engage with Iran, are positioning themselves to sound tough."

DOJ_NMG_0123247

Iran Condemns Raids On Operatives. The AP (1/27) reports, "A top Iranian lawmaker denounced the United States on Saturday for allowing its troops to kill or capture Iranians in Iraq whom U.S. forces believe pose a threat." Alaeddin Boroujerdi, the head of Parliament's Foreign Policy and National Security Committee, called the policy "support for terrorism" on Iranian television. The AP adds, "The more aggressive policy — evolving over a period of months — was described as the result of mounting evidence that Iran is supporting terrorists inside Iraq and is a major supplier of bombs and other weapons used to target U.S. forces."

Ahmadinejad's Impact, Influence Examined. A 5,000-word piece in today's New York Times Magazine (1/28, Secor) analyzes President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's role in and impact on Iranian politics. "South Tehran is Ahmadinejad's heartland. It is here, in the less affluent neighborhoods of the city of 14 million where he was once mayor, that he rose from the obscure end of the seven-candidate roster in 2005, only to become one of the most popular figures in the Muslim world." However, the Times notes, his local candidate slate was "trounced" in recent voting. "The Iranian political system seems to be restoring its equilibrium by showing an extremist president the limits of his power. But is it an equilibrium that can hold? In part, last month's election results reflected the complexity of Ahmadinejad's skeptical, conditional and diverse constituency. They also demonstrated his isolation within the powerful conservative establishment, whose politics, however opaque, are determinative."

Iranian Nuclear Official Denies Centrifuge Installation Plan. The AP (1/28, Dareini) notes Iranian Atomic Energy Organization official Hossein Simorgh "has denied claims made by a top lawmaker that the Islamic Republic had begun installing 3,000 centrifuges at an uranium enrichment plant" at Natanz. He is quoted saying, "No new centrifuges have been installed in Natanz." The AP notes comments yesterday by Alaeddin Boroujerdi that "Iran was currently installing the 3,000 centrifuges, underlining that the country would continue to develop its disputed nuclear program despite U.N. sanctions."

WPost Prods Administration To "Mix" Pressure And Engagement With Iran. In an editorial today, the Washington Post (1/28, B6, 690K) says the Administration's "recent steps against Iran" are "fortunately" causing "some influential people in Tehran" to become "nervous. … Some influential voices have begun publicly suggesting that flexibility as well as toughness is needed in dealing with the West," and "pressure is growing on radical President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad." Those "U.S. measures, compounded by a U.N. sanctions resolution, may be having an effect on the mullahs. If so, the impact is sorely needed," both on Iran and on Syria. While "it's too early to tell whether Iran will back off from [its] belligerent agenda," it is "not too soon for the Bush administration to begin working on the next stage of its strategy. That's because the pushback tactics, while necessary to change the atmosphere of hubris in Tehran, aren't likely by themselves to achieve the administration's goals." Now, "what's needed is a mix of pressure with avenues for moderation by Tehran." The Post concludes, "The most promising way of refining the current policy would be to return to a strategy that worked when the Bush administration tried it in 2001, which is engaging Iran in a regional forum. … To pursue such an initiative while simultaneously stepping up military and economic pressure on Iran, the Bush administration would have to forswear the Manichaeism it is so prone to in foreign affairs. But it might get better results."

Seven US Troops Killed; Bombers Strike Baghdad Market. ABC World News (1/27, story 4, :25, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "The military announced late today that seven US soldiers have been killed in a series of roadside bombings. Also today, two car bombs exploded, one after the other in a Baghdad marketplace, killing at least 13 people. And Iraqi police say 40 bodies have been found dumped around the capital, most showing signs of torture."

The CBS Evening News (1/27, story 2, 3:00, Assuras, 7.66M) reported, "The battle for Iraq took another heavy toll of American lives today as the debate on the war spilled out on to US streets. The military today announced the death of seven more American soldiers in Iraq, bringing the total number of deaths to at least 3,075." NBC Nightly News (1/27, story 3, 2:00, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) called it "another deadly day for Americans and Iraqis." NBC (Arraf): "In Baghdad, today, even shopping is dangerous. A suicide car bomb detonated in this crowded outdoor market in the city; when people rushed to help, a second car bomb exploded. ... Immersed in this bewildering war, some soldiers on their second tour here pleaded for support back home, not protests."

The New York Times (1/28, A4, Santora, Cave, 1.16M) reports, "Shiite neighborhoods in Baghdad came under fierce assault once again on Saturday, following two weeks of violence that left at least 300 dead and many hundreds more wounded. Many of the recent attacks, nearly all of them in heavily Shiite areas, have occurred during the period of commemoration that leads to one of the holiest days for Shiites, an intense day of mourning known as Ashura that falls this year on Monday. ... The spate of recent attacks appear to have been intended not just to inflict the maximum amount of civilian suffering, but also to grind all aspects of daily life closer to a halt." The AP (1/27, Mroue) reports, "Death squads, believed to be primarily Shiite militiamen, continued their butchery on the other side of Iraq's deepening sectarian divide, with police reporting the discovery of 40 bodies dumped in Baghdad alone." The Washington Times (1/28, A1, Mroue, 88K) carries an abbreviated version of this story.

DOJ_NMG_0123248

The Washington Post (1/28, A13, Londono, 690K) also reports the deaths of the seven soldiers, adding, "Violence in the capital and elsewhere continued to surge. ... Meanwhile, a prominent politician in the western city of Ramadi was kidnapped and killed, according to a physician at Ramadi Hospital. Saied Hussein al-Alwani, a council member, was abducted by suspected members of the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq; his body was discarded on a road an hour later." The Green Zone suffered its "second rocket attack this week," and the US consulate in Hilla was reportedly "attacked with mortars."

The Los Angeles Times (1/28, Daragahi, 850K) reports that the troops' deaths came "amid a steady swirl of violence against American troops and Iraqi civilians." Describing a pair of suicide bombings, the Times notes, "Authorities suspect that many such bombers are young Sunni Arab men from other countries heeding religious calls to fight against the U.S. military and Iraq's Shiite government." CNN.com (1/27) reports on Saturday in Baghdad "gunmen dressed as Iraqi national police officers stormed a computer store, abducted seven people and sped off in three vehicles," Baghdad police said. CNN notes it is "not the first report of gunmen disguising themselves" wearing "Iraqi Army, national police and commando uniforms, as well as uniforms that resemble US military attire."

Contractor Death Toll In Iraq Nearing 800. The Houston Chronicle (1/28, Ivanovich, Clanton, 530K) reports, "Laboring in a war with no discernible front line, more than 770 civilian contractors have died in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion began in March 2003. Statistics kept by the Labor Department indicate fatalities among civilian contractors working for American firms escalated rapidly late last year, with at least 301 dying in Iraq in 2006 — including 124 in the final three months." The military had 818 deaths in 2006. The Chronicle adds, "[Contractors'] names are left off the Pentagon's Iraq casualty rolls. If they were counted, the U.S. military's official casualty figures — 3,063 as of Friday — would be 25 percent higher."

Iraq's Shiite Vice President Ambivalent About Surge. In the Washington Post (1/28, B1, 690K), Lally Weymouth interviews Iraq's Shiite vice president, Adel Abdul Mahdi. He refuses to explicitly endorse a surge of US troops to Baghdad, saying, "As Iraqis, we think we need more troops in Baghdad. It's up to the multinational forces to decide whether they need more troops. ... [The Americans] are there to succeed, not because they wish to be there. They came with plans, agendas and policies. If they want to succeed, we need more troops." When asked specifically about "the United States sending an additional 20,000 men," Mahdi replies, "I can't say if they need to deploy more troops in Baghdad."

Wife Of Soldier Contemplates Surge. NBC Nightly News (1/27, story 2, 3:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "Now to the view of one military wife. Rebekah Sanderlin, whose husband is based in Fort Bragg, North Carolina. Part of the first wave deploying to Iraq this month, talks about how the surge in US forces affects military families at home." Rebekah Sanderlin, wife of soldier: "When we talk about the troops in Iraq, you know, 15 names or faces come to mind instantly. So a troop surge to us is not just my husband is going it is my husband is going to help his best friend. ... I lost quite a few friends. I don't want to lose my husband or lose any more friends. But I also realize that this is not a war that will end when we leave."

War Raises Questions About Volunteer Military. McClatchy (1/28, Brown) reports, "The war in Iraq marks the first time in modern history that the United States has fought an extended conflict with an all-volunteer military. The strain of fighting nearly four years in a two-front war has put unprecedented stress on the Army and the Marine Corps — which have borne the brunt of the fighting — and has raised serious questions about whether an all-volunteer force can be maintained over the long term. ... Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., wants to reinstate the draft. ... Many military officers, lawmakers and analysts oppose bringing back conscription, saying it would ruin the professionalism and quality that the all-volunteer force has built up over the last 34 years. ... Defense Secretary Robert Gates has outlined plans to call up the National Guard and Reserves more frequently. But the more the military relies on its citizen-soldiers to fight the war, the less attractive the Reserves become to those who don't want full-time military careers."

ABC World News (1/27, story 6, 2:10, Weir, 8.78M) reported, "In his State of the Union Address, President Bush warned that the war on terror will take generations, and a major military expansion to win. But the armed forces are already struggling to fill quotas. How will they enlist more recruits?" ABC (Hendron): "Recruiters admit the job is harder, but they are not soft pedaling the chances of going from boot camp to Baghdad." Staff Sgt. Douglas Haynesworth, Marine recruiter: "They see it on TV every day, and they know it's a chance. We don't hide it." Hendron: "After failing to meet goals in 2005, the Army let in more high school dropouts and more low test scores. In recent years, it's raised the maximum age from 35 to 42. It's raised the allowable body fat, and gave more waivers, recruiting soldiers who have criminal backgrounds. Among them was Stephen Green, who now stands accused of rape and multiple murders last year in an Iraqi town." ... Bill Carr, Deputy Under Secretary of Defense: "Recruiting is hard, but hard is what we do."

DOJ_NMG_0123249

Gates Seeks To Reduce Forced Extensions. The AP (1/28, Jelinek) reports, "In an action branded a backdoor draft by some critics, the military over the past several years has held tens of thousand of soldiers, sailors, airmen and Marines on the job and in war zones beyond their retirement dates or enlistment length. It is a widely disliked practice that the Pentagon, under new Defense Secretary Robert Gates, is trying to figure out how to cut back on." Gates has ordered that "stop loss" be "minimized" and "has asked the chief of each service branch for a plan by the end of February on how they would rely less on stop loss." The AP adds, "Pentagon officials provided no figures on how many people the policy has affected. Yet just in the Army, it is in the tens of thousands."

Iraqi Soldiers Still Reliant On US. The Los Angeles Times (1/28, Zavis, 850K) reports that a downpour in Diyala province "could have spelled the end of the offensive [for Iraqi forces]. When U.S. Humvees, Bradley fighting vehicles and tanks pushed ahead two days later, they had to tow the Iraqis to the fight. ... As pressure mounts here and at home for U.S. troops to start leaving, the assault in Diyala province this month showed how far the Iraqis must go before they can stand on their own." Iraqis still lack "more sophisticated equipment until [Americans] are confident the Iraqis can maintain and keep track of it" and are faulted by American troops as "not organized" and prone to "corruption." However, the Times adds that Iraqis "proved adept at spotting an out-of-place carpet concealing a hoard of guns or a bomb tucked among the reeds. It was also Iraqis who recognized three brothers identified as key members of a [insurgent] group known as the Council."

Iraqi Government Cultivates Ties To US Democrats. The Los Angeles Times (1/28, Daragahi, 850K) reports, "Representatives of Iraq's government are hedging their bets on America's political future, hoping to keep U.S. support for their country strong by building ties with a Democratic Party that now controls Congress and is closely scrutinizing President Bush's Iraq policy." Iraqi observers "concluded early that even the most staunchly antiwar Democrats would not abandon Iraq. ... Many pointed out advantages to the Democrats' increased sway over Iraq policy. Government officials said they had generally found the Democratic position on handing over security to Iraqi forces sooner rather than later closer to theirs. Almost all agree on Democratic Party initiatives, squashed when Republicans controlled Congress, to prevent the building of permanent U.S. bases here. They note news reports of Democrats acknowledging the suffering of the Iraqi population." They also "found Democratic visitors such as Pelosi, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois less parochial, more culturally sensitive and more willing to listen to Iraqi concerns than Republicans."

Army Probes Contractor Fraud. The AP (1/27) reports, "From high-dollar fraud to conspiracy to bribery and bid rigging, Army investigators have opened up to 50 criminal probes involving battlefield contractors in the war in Iraq and the U.S. fight against terrorism, the Associated Press has learned. Senior contracting officials, government employees, residents of other countries and, in some cases, U.S. military personnel have been implicated in millions of dollars of fraud allegations. ... The problems stem in part from the Pentagon's struggle to get a handle on the unprecedented number of contractors now helping run the nation's wars."

Warner's Iraq Stance Affected By Vietnam. On its front page, the Washington Post (1/28, Shear, 690K) reports on Sen. John Warner, who says, "I regret that I was not more outspoken" during the Vietnam War. Warner continues, "They thought they could win it. We kept surging in those years. It didn't work." The Post states, "More than 30 years after Vietnam, Warner is once again watching as generals propose additional troops. But this time, he's not staying silent. In a rebuke to President Bush, Warner is leading an effort to have the U.S. Senate declare a lack of confidence in the administration's plans to send 21,500 additional soldiers into the Iraqi war zone. ... to GOP loyalists, Warner is also a more-than-occasional irritant who seems willing to buck the party line with little regard for the political consequences to his Republican colleagues. ... Now he's at it again, delivering a new affront to Bush and offering nothing but a shrug when asked if he worries about that."

LATimes Notes How War Has Changed Political Fortunes. The Los Angeles Times (1/28, 850K) editorializes, "Sen. Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.) was once considered one of the Senate's foremost foreign policy experts," while Warner "was, well, not. Now, if you believe the Beltway buzz, their reputations have been reversed. ... It shows that the president isn't the only politician in Washington whose career has been hobbled by Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0123250

Ex-USAID Worker Remembers Work In Fallujah Before Injury. In the Washington Post (1/28, W18, 690K) Sunday magazine, author Kirk Johnson recalls in a 4,400-word article his work in Baghdad and Fallujah before a freak accident made his return to Iraq impossible: "I grew steadily more frustrated by the surreal isolation of palaces and swimming pools bobbing with drunken contractors and began to agitate for a job outside of the Emerald City. ... My work was exhausting, infrequently rewarding and drenched with a sense of urgency and importance. What little work we had finished, I discovered, was either ill-conceived or poorly executed." Johnson still cannot explain the accident in the Dominican Republic that injured him so badly he could not return to Iraq before his contract expired: "When people suggested, gingerly, that I might have been suffering from PTSD, I rejected it out of hand. I hadn't worn a uniform and didn't believe I had the right to group my injury with those who did. So many had it worse: Marines, soldiers, Iraqis -- so many Iraqis. I called a psychiatrist friend, who said that I probably had experienced a stress-prompted fugue state, which is characterized by dissociative amnesia and autopilot behavior."

Taliban Threatens Summer Wave Of Suicide Bombers. The Washington Times (1/28, 88K) reports, "The Taliban is gearing up for a massive summer offensive, with more than 2,000 suicide bombers ready for action and even more preparing, a senior Taliban commander said yesterday. The commander, Mullah Hayat Khan, issued his threat a day after a top U.S. diplomat warned that Afghanistan was in for a bloody and dangerous spring." Khan "said 2,000 suicide bombers were ready -- about 40 percent of the total suicide force -- adding that numbers were so high that it was sometimes hard to find enough explosives and targets."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Qwest May Face Dispute Over CEO's Legal Fees. The Denver Post (1/28, Vuong) reports, "CA Inc. is trying to recover the $14.9 million that the software company spent to defend former chief executive Sanjay Kumar against accounting-fraud charges. … A lawsuit by the Islandia, N.Y.-based company, formerly known as Computer Associates, has targeted Kumar's cars, home, yacht and bank accounts after he pleaded guilty to masterminding a multibillion-dollar fraud." The Post continues, "A similar court battle could be in line for Denver-based Qwest if former chief executive Joe Nacchio is convicted of criminal insider trading." The Post adds, "Qwest is footing Nacchio's legal bill, which could cost up to $75 million for both civil and criminal cases, according to experts. Nacchio has pleaded not guilty to 42 counts of illegal insider trading. His criminal trial is set to begin March 19. .. Bob Toevs, a Qwest spokesman, wouldn't say whether the company would seek reimbursement if Nacchio is convicted, but he said it has the right to. … Qwest and CA are just two of a large number of companies that pay legal fees for their current and former executives, experts say. … 'It's very, very common for almost any corporation, and certainly for large publicly traded companies, to have provisions and agreements that will actually require the corporation to advance defense costs up front,' said Lawrence Hamermesh, a corporate and business law professor at Widener University School of Law in Wilmington, Del. … Hamermesh said companies are not required to do so under state law in Delaware, which is where Qwest and many firms are incorporated. .. .Instead, experts say, most companies offer indemnification from legal proceedings and pay attorney fees in advance in order to attract officers and directors to their company."

Shareholders, Company Directors Urged To Rein In Executive Pay. In the New York Times (1/28, BU1, 1.16M), Gretchen Morgenson writes, "Congress has a new idea about how to rein in executive pay. Trouble is, the plan will squeeze midlevel workers, even as they need to save more money for retirement. And it won't even dent top executives' takes." Considering the "explosion in executive pay" Morgenson says it was "thoroughly predictable that Congress would jump into the fray." However, she says "legislators' past attempts to curtail executive pay have wound up fattening already rich packages." Therefore, she concludes that the US tax code "should not be used to legislate corporate governance. This is why it is so crucial now to bring shareholders and company directors together to discuss executive pay. And why it is foolish for companies to resist those dialogues."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Trial Reveals Lack Of Identity Protection For CIA Agents. The Los Angeles Times (1/28, Schmitt, 850K) reports, "From their earliest days, US intelligence agencies have made it an article of faith to protect the identity of their secret agents." But last week, as former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby went on trial, "it appeared that neither the CIA nor some other intelligence community insiders were all that tight-lipped about such supposedly sensitive matters." Valerie Plame's identity, the Times writes, "was often treated as not much more than water-cooler dishing or cocktail party chatter." The revelations thus far in Libby's trial "suggest that, though US officials -- especially within the Bush administration -- have publicly insisted that secrecy is crucial in national security matters, there is a backstage world inside the government where even the most basic rules for protecting sensitive information may be ignored."

DOJ_NMG_0123251

Havesi Prosecutor Seeks "One Standard Of Justice." The New York Times (1/29, Hakim) reports, "P. David Soares, the Democratic district attorney here, has clashed at various points in his two years in office with the mayor, the police chief, the sheriff and the County Legislature. He has assailed the war on drugs as a failure that 'provides law enforcement officials with lucrative jobs' and called prison building an American 'economic development strategy.' … Now Mr. Soares, 37, is taking on one of the most durable political machines in America: the elected officials of Albany, where built-in incumbency and a 'pay-to-play' system have created a culture in which at least 10 state lawmakers have been investigated, indicted or convicted in recent years." The Times continues, "While Gov. Eliot Spitzer has been the most prominent voice calling for change, it was Mr. Soares who sent tremors through Albany by pressuring former State Comptroller Alan G. Hevesi, a fellow Democrat, to plead guilty to a single felony charge and to resign last month. Since then, Mr. Soares said his office has received numerous tips about wrongdoing in state government." The Times adds, "Perhaps most worrisome for the capital: his efforts to look into corruption are now being aided by a partnership with Attorney General Andrew M. Cuomo, creating what could be a potent check on legislative abuses in a newly reform-minded Albany. … Much of the groundwork for the Hevesi case was laid out by the State Ethics Commission and the attorney general's office, but it was Mr. Soares (pronounced soars) who decided to pursue it as a felony investigation. Mr. Soares's predecessor, Paul A. Clyne, prosecuted high-profile cases, but the more notable, including cases against former Assemblyman Roger L. Green and J. Michael Boxley, a former top Assembly aide, ended with misdemeanor pleas. … The Hevesi case reinforced Mr. Soares's pledge to bring 'one standard of justice' to the office."

Penalty Phase Of Criminal Trials Lays Bare All Secrets. The New York Times (1/28, Brick) reports, "In the federal court system of the United States of America, duly recorded and transcribed by professional stenographers, there exists testimony documenting the fact that one Ronell Wilson, 24, of Staten Island, wet the bed into his teenage years. … Kids might call that T.M.I., 'too much information.' The law calls it evidence of a 'mitigating factor' that could spare a defendant's life." The Times continues, "Mr. Wilson may or may not get the death penalty for killing two undercover detectives; jurors in Brooklyn will be asked to decide this week. But in two weeks of testimony to determine his sentence, he has already endured an unenviable ordeal. … The degree of scrutiny afforded a capital defendant is enough to mortify anyone who has ever been a child, dated a girl, gotten a haircut or tried to dress fashionably. This is the full probe. All your secrets revealed. Some defendants consider it either more agonizing than death, a sentence no federal jury in New York has prescribed for a half-century, or at least worth a big gamble to avoid." The Times adds, "In 2003, in the same court, a defendant named Emile Dixon took his chances, forbidding defense lawyers to call his relatives or dissect the circumstances of his upbringing. The strategy worked well for him, or as well as possible under the circumstances. Six jurors wrote on a verdict sheet that Mr. Dixon had impressively 'exhibited concern for the privacy and dignity of his family.' … He is serving a life term for dealing drugs and murdering two people, including another dealer who had become a government witness." The Times notes, "In theory, this adversarial process known as the penalty phase, coda to a capital murder trial, informs jurors of the broader circumstances of the case. Prosecutors argue that the convicted man is more rotten than other killers; defense lawyers suggest causes for mercy. In practice, it can produce some bizarre tableaus. After all, once it has been established that you murdered somebody, other biographical details can seem surreally picayune."

Doubt Cast On Perception That Teen Girls Are Becoming More Violent. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (1/28, Ove) reports on the national perception that American girls are becoming more violent. Citing recent incidents in Rhode Island, Pittsburgh, and South Carolina, the Post-Gazette reports, "Incidents like these are showing up in news media reports across the country, often to illustrate a common theme: American girls are becoming more violent. … But have girls really gone so wild?" The Post-Gazette continues, "A U.S. Justice Department report, under internal review and due out in about a month, will largely conclude that they haven't -- or at least that there's no data to support that they have. … 'We don't have good evidence that it is increasing. We think it's not getting worse,' said Margaret Zahn, lead investigator for the Girls Study Group, a panel of experts assembled by the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. 'The media [approach] is always, "If it bleeds, it leads." I do wish the media would be more careful about how these things are reported.'" The Post-Gazette adds, "But the drumbeat continues. Just last week, 'CBS Evening News' reported on a group of Long Island girls who videotaped vicious assaults and put them on the Internet. That story also featured commentary by James Garbarino, the author of an influential 2006 book, 'See Jane Hit: Why Girls Are Growing More Violent and What We Can Do About

DOJ_NMG_0123252

It.' … Yet the consensus of most criminologists is that the 'crisis' of girl violence is probably overblown, inflated by statistics gathered from reporting standards that didn't exist years ago -- such as zero tolerance policies in schools and increased reporting of domestic violence." The Post-Gazette notes, "The root of this debate is numbers. … Girls are definitely getting arrested for assault and aggravated assault more often than they used to, according to figures from the FBI's Uniform Crime Reports. … Although juvenile arrests for violent crime are down overall, girls represent a larger percentage of those arrests. … While the rate for boys declined 26 percent between 1980 and 2003, the female rate jumped 47 percent. Between those years, female assault arrests rose from about 200 for every 100,000 girls to 750." … Some analysts and media reports cite that fact in saying the 'gender gap' between boys and girls is closing. … But criminologists largely dismiss Mr. Garbarino's book, and others like it, as simplistic and alarmist."

US Praised For Law Enforcement Aid To New Orleans. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (1/28) editorializes, "With a rash of murders to begin the year and only one arrest in 14 cases, New Orleans police clearly needed help. They are getting it. … In the broadest law enforcement commitment yet from the federal government, FBI, U.S. Marshal, Drug Enforcement Administration and Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives agents will work the streets with police to make arrests, develop cases and reach out to residents in the city's most violent neighborhoods. … 'The goal is to detain, imprison, prosecute, convict and incarcerate these violent criminals, to take the pressure off the local criminal justice system,' said U.S. Attorney Jim Letten, who delivered Thursday's announcement for U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. Wherever possible, Mr. Letten said, cases will be handled in federal court. … Hallelujah." The Times-Picayune adds, "The federal system is functioning at a much higher level than the New Orleans Police Department and Orleans Parish district attorney's office. As for the city's criminal court judges, there are so many problems with evidence gathering and prosecution of cases that it's difficult to figure out how well the judges are handling their duties. There have been judges who went out of their way to set low bonds for violent offenders. But with Judge Charles Elloie off the bench that doesn't seem to be the problem that it was a year ago." The Times-Picayune concludes, "Federal intervention can only go so far. The cases Mr. Letten can prosecute are limited by law. Police, prosecutors and Criminal District Court must be equipped to handle their share of cases, and those are plentiful. … But New Orleanians weary of crime are surely thankful that the cavalry is on the way."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Mississippi Clerk Testifies To Inaction On Invalid Ballots. The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (1/28, Gates) reports, "Noxubee County Circuit Clerk Carl Miggins testified Friday his office took no action to find out why signatures on some absentee ballots in a 2003 election were different than the signatures on the applications for the ballots." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "A court ruled that 33 absentee ballots cast in a race between a black candidate and a white candidate in the race for sheriff were invalid. But the judge ruled the election results in which a black candidate was declared the winner would stand because the absentee ballots didn't affect the election's outcome. … In the first lawsuit of its kind in the United States, the Department of Justice is accusing black political leaders in majority-black Noxubee County of discriminating against white voters." The Clarion-Ledger adds, "Miggins, the last official witness called by the Justice Department, began his testimony late Friday. … He will complete his testimony Monday, when the trial in U.S. District Court in Jackson enters its third week. District Judge Tom S. Lee is presiding. … Defendants in the lawsuit are the Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee and its chairman, Ike Brown, and the county Election Commission." The Clarion-Ledger notes, "Miggins, who is black, and Noxubee County had been defendants but were removed after the county signed a federal consent decree to prevent any discrimination against voters. … Questioned Friday by Justice Department attorney Christopher Coates about the signatures being different, Miggins explained he took no action to find out why 'Because the judge and the Election Commission ruled on it. ... If a judge ruled on it, I feel it is behind us.' … Miggins said he personally doesn't make any determination on ballots cast the day of an election. He said it's up to poll workers to decide who can cast a ballot legally at the polls."

New Jersey Towns Mull Tougher Rules For Rental Housing Overcrowding. The Bridgewater (NJ) Courier-News (1/28, Richardson) reports, "In the battle against illegal overcrowding in rental properties -- often called 'stacking' -- some Central Jersey communities are considering tougher laws, some of which require the registration of individual tenants and their landlords. … That's the case in Raritan Borough, for instance, where officials might require landlords to certify the number of tenants in each rental unit, Mayor Jo-Ann Liptak said. … 'We're going after the landlord who thinks he can exploit these people,' Liptak said of tenants who are stacked." The Courier-News continues, "Flemington, North Plainfield and Bernards also are considering stronger laws, although not everyone thinks they are necessary. … Tougher laws might also stir the debate over whether overcrowding laws inordinately penalize Hispanics." The Courier-News adds, "Not every community dealing with overcrowding laws is making them tougher. … When Bernardsville wanted to make sure its inspection practices were not discriminatory, it looked to Bound Brook, said Elaine Broyles, Bernardsville's Zoning Code Enforcement official, and adopted Bound Brook's revised guidelines. … In 2004, Bound Brook agreed to reform its inspection practices -- which the U.S. Justice Department said were designed to drive out Hispanics -- in order to end a federal lawsuit. … Among other reforms, Bound Brook translated its property maintenance code into Spanish, gave residents 24 hours notice to correct an illegal living situation and hired a bilingual coordinator to give residents information about housing, property maintenance and redevelopment."

DOJ_NMG_0123253

Police Departments Make Effort To Boost Minority Recruitment. The New York Times (1/28, Richter) reports, "As part of an initial push to recruit minority officers to the Long Beach, N.Y., Police Department in 2004, the civil service exam was opened to nonresidents for the first time. That move, police officials said, led to the hiring of a Hispanic woman and an Asian-American man, both New York City police officers. … But the department was unable to hire a police officer who was black in that recruitment drive. 'We diversified but were still missing a part of the target population,' said Lt. Bruce Meyer, who heads the recruitment efforts for a department that had no black officers for almost four decades. 'At that point I said we have to do more.'" The Times continues, "Police departments in suburbs and towns across the region have been putting a new emphasis in recent years on bringing more black and Hispanic officers into their ranks as, census figures show, the white population in the suburbs has declined by 2.1 percent and minority populations have grown in the last five years. … The departments are using different tactics, with mixed success, including tweaking residency requirements and recruiting candidates who live beyond their borders. They are holding civil service tests more frequently, initiating new advertising campaigns and turning to the military for possible candidates." The Times adds, "Some police departments that have failed to increase the number of minority officers have come under scrutiny by the United States Justice Department, which has entered into consent decrees to help oversee the recruiting efforts of a number of departments, including those of both Nassau and Suffolk Counties. … Under such decrees, the Justice Department typically helps shape the content of civil service exams. But Steve Levy, the Suffolk County executive, said the department's input had done little to raise the number of minority officers. … In addition, Mr. Levy said the Justice Department vetoed his idea in 2005 to recruit police officers from Suffolk communities where crime was high. 'Unfortunately we have a Justice Department that tells us what we can't do,' he said, 'but doesn't tell us what we can do.' … Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said the consent decree with Suffolk County, agreed to in 1986, has resulted in a 'significant improvement' in police minority hiring. In 1983, when the Justice Department first lodged complaints of discrimination against the county, only 25 women, or less than 1 percent of the force, and only 59 blacks and Hispanics, or 2.3 percent, were on the county police force. … In 2005, there were 320 women, or 12.1 percent, and 262 blacks and Hispanics, or 9.9 percent. … 'Our contact with the county is through the county attorney, who has not conveyed to us any criticism regarding this department's input into the county's civil service examinations, or this department's monitoring of the consent decree we have with the county,' Ms. Magnuson said."

Religious Issues Increasingly Debated In US Courts. On its front page, the Washington Times (1/28, Price, 88K) examines the history of so-called "separation of church and state" -- which "many American wrongly assume…are included in the Constitution" -- in US court rulings. According to the Times, US courts rule "about two times each week on cases involving whether prayers can be included in a high school graduation ceremony, an image of Jesus Christ can be displayed in a public school or a Ten Commandments monument can remain in a government building or public park." The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) "says such prayers and displays violate the principle of separation of church and state," but the Rev. Barry Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, "estimates the frequency of such rulings between 104 and 156 annually."

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Faces New EU Antitrust Questions With Vista. AFP (1/28) reports, "Microsoft risks a new showdown with EU regulators with the roll-out of its Vista operating system nearly three years after a landmark antitrust ruling against the US software giant, officials have said." AFP continues, 'After numerous delays, Microsoft's next-generation Windows Vista operating system is to make its debut with home computer users on January 30 after it was shipped to business clients in November. … While Microsoft readies to roll out its first revamped operating system in five years, rivals are preparing to do battle again with the IT colossus after already winning one victory in March 2004 with an EU antitrust ruling against the company. … 'With Vista, Microsoft has clearly chosen to ignore the fundamental principles of the commission's March 2004 decision,' said Simon Awde, the chairman of the ECIS trade association that opposes Microsoft in its antitrust troubles." AFP adds, "ECIS, which includes such tech giants as Oracle, IBM and Nokia, filed a complaint with EU regulators in February 2006 targeting Vista and Office and updated their action with details on Vista last month. … 'We are in the process of examining this complaint,' said European Commission spokesman for competition issues Jonathan Todd."

DOJ_NMG_0123254

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Michigan Waste Treatment Firm Faces Dumping Charges. The Dearborn (MI) Press & Guide (1/28, Kis) reports, "A Dearborn waste treatment company and three former executives were indicted Wednesday and face charges of dumping untreated industrial waste into the Detroit sewer system." The P&G continues, "CESI, Comprehensive Environmental Solutions, Inc., a liquid industrial waste treatment and disposal facility at Ford and Wyoming, is accused of violating the Clean Water Act from March 2002 until the present. … A federal grand jury returned a 12-count indictment alleging the company bypassed treatment processes and discharged untreated wastes directly into sewers, in violation of the Clean Water Act and Detroit City Ordinance requirements." The P&G adds, "To conceal the misconduct, the indictment charges that employees made false statements and engaged in other surreptitious activities to cover up the violations. … 'The federal regime of environmental laws is in place to protect the public and prevent unlawful discharges into our water system,' said United States Attorney Stephen J. Murphy. '(Wednesday's) charges demonstrate the commitment of my office, U.S. EPA and the FBI to pursue possible violations of the environmental laws as well as attempts to conceal such violations.' … In addition to CESI, three company officials were also indicted. Former president and CEO Bryan S. J. Mallindine, 50, of Carlsbad, Calif.; former president, general manager and sales manager Michael G. Panyard, 44, of Pleasant Ridge, Mich.; and former plant and operations manager Charles D. Long, 41, of Brownstown Township are charged with conspiracy and Clean Water Act violations. … Mallindine is also charged with obstruction of justice and Panyard is facing seven false statement charges. … A fourth employee, former plant manager Donald A. Kaniowski, 37, of Dearborn, pleaded guilty to unlawfully bypassing treatment equipment and discharging untreated liquid wastes into the sewer system, in violation of the Clean Water Act."

Energy Independence Could Be "Century Away" Under Bush Plan. In its "Week in Review" section, the New York Times (1/28, WK2, Wald, 1.16M) observes that President Bush "never used the phrase 'energy independence' in his State of the Union address last week, and it is just as well. His program for cutting gasoline demand is ambitious in scope, but modest in effect, according to experts." The reason, according to the Times, is that the United States "has fallen down a very deep well, and it's hard to get out." Even "at the rate of change suggested by the Bush plan," energy independence is "about a century away."

Breakthrough Reported In Debate Over House Climate Change Committee. The Politico (1/27, Hearn) reports House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and Energy and Commerce Chairman John Dingell may have reached an tentative agreement "in diffusing an escalating battle over the select committee on climate change" at a meeting following the Washington Auto Show. A Democratic aide close to Pelosi "suggested that the meeting," which also included Rep. Henry Waxman, had been "a turning point," saying, "We no longer anticipate a floor battle." However, Dingell, in a memo to his committee members, "noted progress in diffusing the dispute," but cautioned that he is "still keeping his firepower at the ready."

Communities Concerned Over Expiration Of Rural Law. The New York Times/AP (1/28, A16) reports, "he expiration of a federal law that provided $385 million for schools and roads last year in some of the nation's most scenic and rural areas has administrators in 41 states concerned. In 1908, President Theodore Roosevelt struck a bargain with rural America: In exchange for allowing the creation of national forests, counties would receive 25 percent of the receipts from logging and other resource sales. In return, the land would be off limits for development and could not be taxed by state and local governments." However, for years, financing "fluctuated with the price of timber." Recognizing the" stress these market fluctuations put on schools," Congress offered a short-term solution, the Secure Rural Schools and Community Self-Determination Act, a six-year financing plan that expired in December."

Two Wolf Species To Lose Endangered Status. The New York Times/AP (1/28, A19) reports, "Wolves in the Northern Rockies will be removed from the endangered species list within the next year," the Fish and Wildlife Service said Friday. The agency also will "remove from the list wolves in the Western Great Lakes region." Announcements on the two proposals are planned for Monday, said Sharon Rose, an agency spokeswoman. The action "caps a sharp turnaround for the wolf," which has been federally protected since 1974.

DOJ_NMG_0123255

Tribe Oppose Bid To Alter Gaming Laws. The AP (1/28, Mitchell) reports from Atmore, AL, "The melodic bing-bing-bing on the electronic bingo machines at the always-open Poarch Creek entertainment center in south Alabama has kept players busy and the parking lot crowded. … Would they keep playing if the game took a little longer and required more players? Or would they head to gaming centers elsewhere, off tribal land? … These questions have poured into the National Indian Gaming Commission in response to its proposal to change such electronic games, a move that Indian tribal leaders in at least 10 states, including Texas and Alabama, fear could cause hundreds of millions of losses in annual revenues and hundreds of jobs. … 'These proposed rules are unnecessary and should be significantly revised to reduce new layers of federal bureaucracy,' Chadwick Smith, principal chief of the Cherokee Nation in Oklahoma, has told the NIGC." The AP adds, "With advances in technology, the NIGC says the line between Class II games, such as bingo, and Class III games, such as Vegas-style slot machines, has blurred. The commission, joined by the Justice Department, has proposed new uniform standards for Class II games that are widely used in Indian gaming centers. .. .Tribal leaders contend the change would cause bingo games to be less entertaining, played at half the current pace by requiring a two-second delay between each ball draw and, in one example, requiring a customer to wait for five additional players instead of the current one additional player. … An additional wait doesn't sit well with some players." The AP notes, "Nationwide, the new-rule scenario could reduce gaming revenue by $142.7 million, with an additional loss of $9.6 million in non-gaming revenue, according to an independent analysis of the proposal for the NGIC by Alan Meister of the Los Angeles-based Analysis Group, Inc. The analysis also says about 458 tribal member jobs would be lost. … In Alabama and other states without tribal-state compacts, Class III games are not allowed. Tribal leaders say the changes to Class II games will drive away players, leaving tribes with little recourse but to consider whether to continue operations."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Battered Mexican Drug Cartel Said To Be On The Ropes. The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/28, Caldwell) reports, "Mexico and the United States, working together, are steadily dismantling the murderous Tijuana drug cartel, the infamous Arellano Félix Organization. Once among the most powerful and feared criminal syndicates in Mexico, the AFO is now a shambles. Its top leaders are dead or in custody. Most if not all of the AFO leaders now behind bars face trial in the United States, where bribery cannot buy the criminal justice system and intimidation doesn't work." The Union-Tribune continues, "Mexico's extradition of 11 accused narco-traffickers to the United States a week ago wielded the weapon the cartel leaders fear most. If convicted, they will spend the rest of their lives locked away in maximum security federal prisons. The favors and preferential treatment, the illicit opportunities to continue running their drug empires, even the possibility of escape or early release that their money might buy in Mexico won't be available in the U.S. prison system." The Union-Tribune adds, "Here, the capos of Mexico's drug mafias will have 50 years or more to sit in their cells reflecting on the untold numbers of murders they ordered, the horrendous torture they routinely sanctioned and the millions of lives blighted or destroyed by their drugs. Under the terms of these extraditions, U.S. authorities must respect Mexico's prohibition on extradition of criminal suspects who would face sentences of death or explicitly stated life terms. Prison sentences of 50 or 60 years would substitute nicely for the latter … Mexico's extraditions – which included eight drug kingpins, among them two top AFO lieutenants and an AFO assassin, plus the former head of the Gulf cartel – sent the cartels another jarring signal. Mexico's new president, Felipe Calderón, is more determined than any past Mexican president to break the drug mafias that threaten to turn Mexico into a narco state. After just seven weeks in office, Calderón did what no other Mexican president has done – delivered Mexican drug traffickers en masse to the United States for trial."

Brady Center Targets Gun Dealers. The Wilmington (DE) News Journal (1/28, Brown) reports, "A national group fighting gun violence tied into a mayors conference to push for reform and more federal resources to cut illegal gun sales by 'corrupt dealers.'" The Journal continues, "The Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence unveiled its study called 'Shady Dealings: Illegal Gun Trafficking From Licensed Gun Dealers' last week in Philadelphia -- a city struggling with gun violence -- joined by the city's Police Commissioner Sylvester Johnson and others." The Journal adds, "The release of the study, which does not directly address Delaware, was timed to precede the start of the 75th winter meeting of the United States Conference of Mayors, running Wednesday through Friday in Washington. … The Brady center cited gun violence as a top issue for mayors across the country." The Journal notes, "The mayors group did not make a formal response to the Brady center study. … But crime already had surfaced as No. 2 in the mayors' 10-point legislative agenda on issues impacting cities and families. That agenda first was presented to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, then brought to the full mayors meeting headed by Conference President and Trenton Mayor Douglas H. Palmer. … The mayors are calling for a federal-local partnership to fight crime, including the creation of a federal trust fund that could fund law enforcement deployment, support of local innovations, fight domestic violence and pay for crime-fighting technology. They also back restoration of past federal block grants and policing funding. … The Brady study pointed more directly to the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives. The study concluded the bureau lacks enough resources to inspect licensed gun dealers and that laws should be changed to ease prosecution and increase penalties for gun-sale violations."

DOJ_NMG_0123256

IMMIGRATION:

Minnesota Family Decries Mother's Deportation As Daughter Faces Medical Treatment. The St. Paul Pioneer-Press (1/28, Rosario) reports, "The federal judge predicted this would happen. So did the doctor and nurse who have treated the little boy since birth. … But their warnings meant nothing. A legal system that proved stubbornly deaf to common sense brushed aside their concerns. All this could have been avoided. … Instead, 16 months after the federal government deported his mother, 3-year-old Cece Lamah finds himself facing months of difficult medical care — mostly on our dime." The Pioneer-Press continues, "Cece, hospitalized in Minneapolis, endures daily pain. One recent afternoon, he asked his dad to remove a needle and tube from his arm because they hurt so much. … Two years ago, U.S. District Judge Donovan Frank, Dr. Stephen Nelson and nurse Jane Hennessy of Children's Hospital in Minneapolis warned in court filings that deporting the boy's mother, Cynthia Lamah, would have a devastating domino effect." The Pioneer-Press adds, "Cece, a U.S. citizen, has sickle cell anemia, a condition that requires constant care and monitoring. His mother was his primary caretaker. … At the time, the boy's father, Daniel Lamah, a native of the Congo granted political asylum in the United States in 1999, worked as a tile setter and had health insurance benefits. … But Cynthia Lamah came here illegally from Germany with a falsified passport. She did so after her requests for a visiting visa and political asylum were denied. Federal officials ordered her deported. … Frank, who reviewed a last-minute request for a reprieve, concluded he had no legal standing to block a Justice Department immigration judge's deportation order. He nevertheless criticized the move on practical and moral grounds."

National Guard Soldiers On "Front Line" Of Immigration Debate. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (1/28, Hopfensperger, 395K) reports that "across the nation's 1,300-mile border with Mexico…thousands of National Guard soldiers are now playing a front-line role in the divisive fight over illegal immigration." For example, Minnesota Guard members are "trying to stop the more than 1 million migrants who attempt or make illegal crossings each year -- a tide that's flowing up to Minnesota and bringing both benefits and burdens." The National Guard's assignment, dubbed "Operation Jump Start," is part of "a broad crackdown along the southwestern border" that President Bush initiated last year. Another "controversial" step is the construction of "a massive fence and other border barriers" that began last week. Meanwhile, in his State of the Union address, Bush "also revived his push for a guest-worker program and said that immigration reform is one of his priorities this year."

Study Finds "Light-Skinned" Immigrants Earning Higher Incomes. The New York Times/AP (1/28, A17) reports "light-skinned" immigrants in the United States "make more money on average than those with darker complexions, and the chief reason appears to be discrimination," a researcher says. Joni Hersch, a professor of law and economics at Vanderbilt University, "looked at a government survey of 2,084 legal immigrants to the United States from around the world and found that those with the lightest skin earned an average of 8 percent to 15 percent more than similar immigrants with much darker skin." Other researchers said the findings were "consistent with other studies on color and pointed to a skin-tone prejudice that went beyond race."

TAX:

Taxpayers Left In The Dark About IRS Bond Probes. Bloomberg (1/28) reports, "Cities and towns across the United States are being investigated by the Internal Revenue Service and keeping the investigations secret from taxpayers." Bloomberg continues, "The IRS sent more than 100 letters last year to local governments from California to Pennsylvania, saying bonds they sold may be subject to federal taxes, said Charles Anderson, who led the field operations for the IRS's tax-exempt bond division until this month. Fewer than a quarter of the municipalities disclosed the probes. … 'The entire market is hampered by that lack of information,' said Martha Haines, chief of the Securities and Exchange Commission's Office of Municipal Securities. With municipal bond sales averaging $30 million each, 100 letters indicates as much as $3 billion is under scrutiny." Bloomberg adds, "Bond audits cost taxpayer-funded agencies more than $100 million from 2001 to 2005, according to IRS data. Abuses first spotted by the agency led the Justice Department to issue more than a dozen subpoenas last year in the broadest probe to date of the municipal bond market. … The IRS has focused on whether municipalities paid banks inflated fees to invest proceeds from bond sales before the money was used for roads, schools, sewers, and other projects. Local governments are required to return most profits from investments as taxes, so higher payments to banks erode IRS revenue. US prosecutors are checking whether banks violated antitrust rules by fixing prices of the investment products. … State and local governments raise $400 billion a year in the municipal bond market, borrowing at lower rates than corporations or the federal government because debt payments are exempt from taxes."

DOJ_NMG_0123257

NYTimes Says Bush Tax Credits Should Be Allowed To Expire. In an editorial, the New York Times (1/28, WK15, 1.16M) writes, "In the State of the Union speech, President Bush said that the budget deficit had been cut in half from 2004 to 2006. Not quite." According to the Times, the deficit "declined, but not by half, from $412 billion to $248 billion." Then, Bush "greatly compounded his otherwise modest exaggeration by taking credit for the reduction, when the deficit really fell despite his policies, not because of them." Bush, it writes, "wants you to believe that tax cuts caused the economic recovery, and thus the budget improvement. If you follow that logic, the key to continued improvement would be continued tax cuts, and that is just what Mr. Bush called for last week." Therefore the Times urges Bush's tax cuts "should largely be allowed to expire. Facing that truth is not a fiscal challenge, it's a political one. Mr. Bush will not meet it. But a future president and Congress will have to."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

New White House Counsel Seen Better Suited To Upcoming Challenges. The Austin American-Statesman (1/28, Herman) reports, "White House Counsel Harriet Miers, President Bush's longtime go-to lawyer, is being replaced by a longtime Washington lawyer viewed as more suited for the rough-and-tumble of congressional investigations to come." The AAS continues, "For 13 years, Bush had turned to Miers when he needed a personal lawyer, a Texas Lottery Commission leader, a key White House aide and a Supreme Court nominee. … She retains the president's respect and friendship, but three cabinet members, all longtime friends of Miers', said the Democrats' rise contributed to Miers' demise." The AAS adds, "The nation's top diplomat put it diplomatically. 'Changed circumstances require changed talents,' Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said. … The changed circumstances include anticipated Democrat- led congressional investigations of the Bush White House. … When Miers leaves this week, Fred Fielding will become White House counsel, an office in which he worked during the Reagan and Nixon administrations, making him a veteran of the Watergate and Iran-Contra investigations. … Just what the president needs, some say." The AAS notes, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, both longtime friends of Miers' dating back to their work for Bush in Texas, agreed that the new Washington reality contributed to the need for a new top White House lawyer. … Gonzales, who preceded Miers as White House counsel, said, 'There are others who have dealt with these kinds of issues before, people that have more experience with them than even I do.' … Bringing Fielding on board is part of making sure 'we have the best assets, the best tools, to deal with those challenges,' Gonzales said."

Experts Warn Bush Health Plan Would End Employee Benefits. The New York Times (1/28, A20, Pear, 1.16M) reports President Bush's proposed health plan "has touched off an impassioned debate over the future of the employer-based system that provides health insurance to more than half of all Americans." Paul Fronstin, director of health research at the Employee Benefit Research Institute, said: "The president's proposal would mean the end of employer-based benefits as we know them. It gives employers a way out of providing the benefits because their employees could get the same tax break on their own." Deputy White House chief of staff, Joel D. Kaplan, "acknowledged that the proposal could accelerate the trend of employers' dropping health benefits for employees." But he said more people "would be able to buy insurance in the individual market," so there would be "a net increase in the number of insured."

Rangel, New York City Officials Condemn Bush Medicaid Plan. The New York Times (1/28, A27, Rivera, 1.16M) reports Rep. Charles Rangel and "a number" of New York City officials "urged President Bush yesterday to reconsider a proposed change to Medicaid that could cost the city's public hospital network millions of dollars in annual financing." City Council speaker Christine C. Quinn said, "We want to make sure the president knows how damaging his health care proposal will be to our Health and Hospitals Corporation," referring to the agency that runs the city's 11 public hospitals and dozens of diagnostic centers and health clinics. Quinn joined Rangel "and more than a dozen other elected officials and health care representatives at City Hall yesterday to protest the president's proposal."

Reid Land Purchase, Ties To Lubricants Industry Examined. The Los Angeles Times (1/28, Neubauer, Hamburger, 850K) reports on its front page, "It's hard to buy undeveloped land in booming northern Arizona for $166 an acre. But now-Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid effectively did just that when a longtime friend decided to sell property owned by the employee pension fund that he controlled." Six months after the deal closed, Reid introduced legislation "to address the plight of lubricants dealers who had their supplies disrupted by the decisions of big oil companies." The Times notes the land deal is "a potential violation of congressional ethics standards for a member to accept anything of value -- including a real estate discount -- from a person with interests before Congress. In a statement, Reid's spokesman Jon Summers said that the transaction was "not a gift and that the price was due to the property's history and the fact that only a partial interest was sold." However, "Records and interviews show that beginning in the mid-1990s, Reid tried several times to push legislation that would have protected lubricants distributors from abrupt cancellations by their suppliers."

DOJ_NMG_0123258

Schumer Says GOP Senators May Moderate Stances. In an interview with the New York Times Magazine (1/28, Solomon), Sen. Charles Schumer, asked whether he think the president will respond at all to the ideas of the new Democratic majority, said, "I don't have much hope that Bush will moderate, but many of the Republicans in Congress, having seen the handwriting on the wall, may moderate, and that will help us." For example, Schumer noted Sens. Dick Lugar, John Warner as "old-fashioned conservatives who know that this hard-right philosophy is wrong." Asked if Vice President Cheney will remain "as large an influence inside the White House in the wake of the Republican drubbing," Schumer said, "Unfortunately, yes, maybe more so, because in an odd way, the counter to Cheney was Karl Rove, and he has lost some credibility."

Johnson's Continued Absence Felt On Capitol Hill. The Washington Post (1/28, D1, Montgomery, 690K) has a 2,700-word story on Sen. Tim Johnson's recovery and the impact of his absence from the Senate. Everything in Johnson's office "is exactly how he left it last Dec. 13: The morning when words deserted him, and they rushed him, speechless, to the hospital. … His staff has left everything virtually untouched as a sign of respect, a sign of love, a sign of not knowing what else to do. It is an appeal to presence in the void of absence. The news from the hospital has been good, so far." Son Brendan Johnson said, "In talking to his physicians, we really feel optimistic and confident that he is going to make a full recovery. … He is making much faster progress than anyone anticipated." The Post says that "when a senator is absent for an extended period, two seemingly contradictory sides of Washington come into focus. There is an inevitable, almost ruthless, forward momentum that tarries for no senator. The people of South Dakota must be served, partisan interests must be advanced. Yet, there is also a human side, an instinct for decency, an acknowledgement that life can't fully go on as usual."

As Only Female, Ginsburg Feels Isolated On Court. The Washington Post (1/28, A2, 690K) reports Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said Friday that she dislikes being "all alone on the court" nearly a year after the retirement of Sandra Day O'Connor, leaving her as the only female. However, Ginsburg, speaking at Suffolk University Law School, said her "consolation" is that "if you look at the federal courts altogether, you get a much different picture than you do if you look only at the US Supreme Court."

Columnist Welcomes Justices' Public Discussions. Dahlia Lithwick of Slate magazine writes in the Washington Post (1/28, B2, 690K), "The justices of the Supreme Court have served hard time in the makeup chair in recent months" as "even some of the justices who are reluctant to talk on camera have been more amenable to speaking on the record lately." According to Lithwick, "What the justices have discussed in these interviews" has "opened the door to a more robust and nuanced national conversation about constitutional law and the role of the judiciary."

Navy Calls Off Search For Missing Sailors. The AP (1/28) reports, "The Navy called off a search Saturday for three missing crew members of a helicopter that crashed in the ocean about 50 miles off California's southern coast." Earlier, the CBS Evening News (1/27, story 5, :20, Assuras, 7.66M) had reported, "Three crew members of a Navy Seahawk helicopter are still missing tonight after their chopper went down off Southern California yesterday. ... A fourth sailor was killed."

Will Criticizes Move To Give US Territories Vote In House. The Washington Post's (1/28, B7) George Will writes House Democrats Wednesday "again voted to give the delegates to the House from Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands and the District of Columbia, and the resident commissioner from Puerto Rico, the right to vote in the House when it is sitting as the Committee of the Whole, which is how it sits almost all the time. It is in that status that almost all debate about and amending of legislation occurs." Will questions Speaker Nancy Pelosi about the "possible scope of [her] majoritarian abuse," given her "disregard of the unambiguous language and clear intent of Article I, Section 2 -- which uses the word 'state' eight times to designate the only entity from which a member of the House may be chosen."

Bush Urged To Make Papers Public, Disclose Library Contributors. New York Times (1/28, WK15, 1.16M) editorial observer Dorothy Samuels writes as the Southern Methodist University in Dallas reportedly moves closer to reaching a deal to become the home to President Bush's presidential library, she hops "the university's president, R. Gerald Turner, and members of his board of trustees (presuming Laura Bush, the best-known trustee, has removed herself from the deliberations) can be persuaded to withhold a final go-ahead unless two basic conditions are met." First, she says the university "should insist that Mr. Bush rescind Executive Order 13233, his 2001 directive that reverses…the strong presumption of a public right of access to presidential papers embedded in the 1978 Presidential Records Act." Second, Samuels urges Bush and members of his library committee to disclose "the identity of presidential library donors, and the amounts they contribute," in order to "advance government integrity, and avoid entangling the university in potentially compromising secret fund-raising, by insisting on disclosure."

DOJ_NMG_0123259

OTHER NEWS:

Median Home Prices Dropping. NBC Nightly News (1/27, story 7, 2:30, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) reported, "After word home sales were down for 2006, a new report shows the median price for a home is dropping too: down 10% for the fourth quarter of last year. For many a drop in the homes value comes as mortgage payments go up, contributing to a huge increase in foreclosures across the country and in some areas, that is driving down prices further."

Democrats Seek To Tap Into Economic Anxiety Of Swing Voters. The New York Times (1/28, WK1, Leonhardt, 1.16M) reports, "As they plan their strategy on Capitol Hill and begin the 2008 presidential campaign, the leaders of the Democratic Party are betting that the temporary swings of the economic cycle no longer have the political power they once did." Instead, they say, the "economic shocks of recent years -- technological change, globalization, the decline of labor unions and business icons like Ford Motor Company -- have left many swing voters feeling anxious and insecure about the future." After years of "fighting losing battles against tax cuts," Democrats argue that this "economic anxiety has altered the political landscape, making swing voters open to a new role for government." With issues like energy policy, immigration and health care "having gone largely unaddressed in recent years," Democrats "see a way to define themselves as the party that can help Americans survive the 21st-century economy."

Clinton Holds First Iowa Event Of Her Presidential Campaign. Sen. Hillary Clinton's first foray into Iowa since declaring her plans to seek the presidency receives heavy coverage, even leading the broadcast on ABC World News (1/27, lead story, 3:00, Snow, 8.78M), which reported, "The high school basketball gym was crammed to capacity: more than 1,000 people, plus an overflow room down the hall. The first question out of the gate, about breaking the tradition of exclusively male presidents." Clinton: "Oh, I expect there will probably be more stories about my clothes and hair than some of the people running against me, and I just have accepted that. The fact that I'm a woman, the fact that I'm a mom, is part of who I am. But I'm going to ask people to vote for the person they believe will be the best president." The CBS Evening News (1/27, story 3, 2:50, Bowers, 7.66M) said Clinton "charmed the 1,500 or so Democrats gathered in a high school gym in Des Moines with her softer side…and drew heavy applause as she hammered away at familiar Democratic themes, such as the need for national health care, more money for education, and the Bush Administration." Clinton: "We may not have had good leadership the last six years, but we are still the best, most able, can-do country in the world!"

CNN (1/27, Crowley) reported, "In the national polls Hillary Clinton leads by a fairly large margin over Barack Obama. It's very different here in Iowa, where there have been a number of polls showing her running anywhere from second to fourth. The frontrunner is John Edwards. … So, she has some work to do here and certainly over the next couple of days, she'll probably make some inroads. There are five events in all, three different cities, so she has her work cut out for her, but a lot of people here think it just was a matter of showing up." NBC Nightly News (1/27, story 5, 3:20, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) sad that "with so many other presidential candidates working hard and well established here, she has a lot of catching up to do."

In a front-page story, the Washington Post (1/28, Kornblut, Balz, 690K) reports Clinton, "bursting onto the campaign trail," confronted "two looming questions about her presidential candidacy: whether voters are ready to elect a woman to the White House and how aggressively she would respond to Republican attacks if she were her party's nominee." Clinton "got just one question about Iraq, and she deflected it without answering it, speaking instead about health care for veterans. But at a morning session with Iowa Democratic Party officials, she was asked to address her vote for the 2002 congressional resolution authorizing President Bush to go to war. That vote, along with her reluctance until late last year to recant, has put her at odds with many antiwar activists in the party and is expected to be a factor as she begins to meet voters in a state with a strong antiwar tradition." Clinton said, "I've taken responsibility for my vote. But there are no do-overs in life. I wish there were. I acted on the best judgment I had at the time." The Washington Times (1/28, Hurt, 88K) also reports on its front page that "the dominant issue of the war in Iraq" was "absent" from the Des Moines event. On its Web site, USA Today (1/27, Lawrence, 2.27M) says "some 150 journalists from around the country and the world, including Japan, England, France, Germany, Italy and Switzerland," were on hand.

DOJ_NMG_0123260

The Los Angeles Times (1/28, Finnegan, 850K) says Clinton "took on the full trappings of a presidential candidate" in Iowa, "where she defended her early support of the Iraq war and played up her chance to 'break a historic barrier' as the first woman to win the White House. Clinton's Iowa visit opened her yearlong courtship of Democratic voters in the state whose precinct caucuses launch the 2008 presidential nominating process. Clinton, who is leading her Democratic rivals in national polls but not in Iowa, sought above all to spur excitement over her status as the only major female candidate." Clinton said, "When people tell me, 'Well you know, I don't think a woman can be elected president,' I say, 'Well, I don't believe that, but we're going to find out.'" The Chicago Tribune (1/28, Quintanilla, 617K) writes Clinton raised "energy and health-care issues" while "remaining conspicuously silent on the war in Iraq. … 'You go, girl,' came a shout from the audience. 'You come with me,' Clinton replied, generating much applause." The AP (1/27, Glover) says Clinton said her husband "would have a role in the campaign but 'I'm the one running for president.'"

Newsday (1/28, Thrush) reports Clinton said she was "the best Democrat to take on 'bellicose' GOP opponents" such as Sen. John McCain and Rudy Giuliani. Clinton told the state committee members, "When you are attacked, you have to deck your opponent. I have been through the political wars longer than some of you have been alive. We've got to be prepared to hold our ground and fight back." The Des Moines Register (1/28, 160K) says Clinton told the party members, "I do seem to inspire strong feelings." The Politico (1/27) carries the pool report on the party meeting.

McAuliffe Says Nomination "Hers To Lose." Asked on CNN's Larry King Live (1/27) if the nomination is "Hillary's to lose," Clinton campaign chairman Terry McAuliffe said, "Clearly I would say she is the frontrunner. She's got the smarts. She's tough. … She's got the leadership skills. … Yes, it's hers to lose, and we've got to work hard, we've got to work for every single vote and get out there. People have to get to know Hillary Clinton."

Novak Says Obama Backers Expect Emanuel To Support Clinton. In his syndicated column, Robert Novak (1/27) writes, "Sources close to Sen. Barack Obama are sure that Rep. Rahm Emanuel will not support his fellow Illinois Democrat" but will instead back Clinton.

Corsi Joins Anti-Clinton Organization. In his syndicated column, Robert Novak (1/27) writes that Jerome Corsi, "co-author of the 2004 campaign book 'Unfit for Command' attacking Sen. John Kerry's war record, joined up Tuesday with the organization intended to similarly undermine" Clinton. Novak says "TheVanguard.org is intended to be a right-wing version of the leftist MoveOn.org."

Simon Says Clinton's Performance "Virtually Flawless." Roger Simon writes in The Politico (1/27), "In her first face-to-face meeting with voters since announcing for president, Hillary Clinton was asked about Iraq and ducked the question. … In the one-hour town meeting, Hillary did not mention Iraq a single time. She mentioned ethanol twice. … Except for that one moment regarding Iraq, Hillary gave a virtually flawless performance from the moment she walked into the overflowing gym."

Broder Chastises Clinton Over Petraeus Hearing Performance. In his Washington Post (1/28, B7, 690K) column, David Broder writes that during the Senate Armed Services Committee hearings on the confirmation of t. Gen. David Petraeus to lead US forces in Iraq, Clinton "used her time to make a speech about Iraq policy and did not ask a single question of the man who will be leading the military campaign." Broker offers three "possible explanations for her remarkable reluctance to probe the general's thinking. First, she has been treading a careful line from her early support of military action against Saddam Hussein to an increasingly sharp criticism of the war and calls for troop reductions. … Second, the hearing came only three days after she announced her presidential exploratory committee, and she may have decided it was a good opportunity to repeat her views on Iraq policy before TV cameras rather than share time with the general. … The third, less benign possibility is that Clinton is reverting to the mode of her ill-fated 1993-94 health-care initiative, when she gave members of Congress and other interested folks the impression that she thought she had all the answers -- so please just do as I say. … This month Clinton began her presidential campaign, as she did her first race for the Senate in New York, by saying that she wanted to do a lot of listening. She sure wasn't listening to Gen. Petraeus. She wasn't even asking."

Rich Says Clinton "Cannot Rewrite Her Own History On Iraq." In his New York Times (1/28, WK16, 1.16M) column, Frank Rich writes, "Hillary Clinton has an answer to those who suspect that her 'I'm in to win' Webcast last weekend was forced by Barack Obama's Webcast of just four days earlier. 'I wanted to do it before the president's State of the Union,' she explained to Brian Williams on NBC, 'because I wanted to draw the contrast between what we've seen over the last six years, and the kind of leadership and experience that I would bring to the office.' She couldn't have set the bar any lower. … Clinton cannot rewrite her own history on Iraq to match Mr. Obama's early opposition to the war," or that of Sen. Jim Webb. She "was not prescient enough to see, as Mr. Webb wrote in The Washington Post back in September 2002, that 'unilateral wars designed to bring about regime change and a long-term occupation should be undertaken only when a nation's existence is clearly at stake.' But she's hardly alone in this failing, and the point now is not that she mimic John Edwards with a prostrate apology for her vote to authorize the war."

Gender Said To Not Be Enough For Clinton To Win. In a Washington Post (1/28, B1, 690K) "Outlook" piece, women's studies scholar Linda Hirshman writes, "Clinton sure got it right when she announced her candidacy for president while sitting on her living room couch. Her success may very well turn on the decisions of millions of women sitting on their living room couches." But "all the gender gap talk notwithstanding, there's no guarantee that Clinton would receive enough votes from women to be elected. I've studied women and women's politics for 20 years, and if there's one thing I know, it's that, except for possibly once in 1996, female voters have not by themselves put anyone in the White House. … If Clinton is going to stand a chance in 2008, her campaign may have to discredit the Republican nominee. … A suffering wife and mother whose campaign mysteriously unleashes attacks on her opponents? It's not the current game plan, no doubt. But I'm drawing on the lessons of history."

DOJ_NMG_0123261

Giuliani Hits New Hampshire, But Stays Mum On Plans. ABC World News (1/27, story 2, 2:35, Weir, 8.78M) reported Rudy Giuliani "is on the Republican campaign trail" in New Hampshire, and "there are two big questions. Is he really in, and can he really win?" ABC (Morrell): "He has not officially joined the race, but working the lunch crowd at this Manchester diner with his wife this afternoon, Rudy Giuliani certainly looks like he's running for president. … The former mayor is on a two-day swing through the Granite State, arawing big crowds and hordes of reporters wherever he goes. … But at each stop, including the state Republican convention this morning, he refuses to say he's a candidate. … Conservative voters tend to dominate the primaries, and the twice-divorced Giuliani is moderate, some might say liberal, on social issues. … Still, our poll shows Giuliani leading John McCain by 12 points among conservatives. So if America's mayor, as they call him, jumps into this race, he will certainly be a force to be reckoned with."

Under the headline "Giuliani Is Sounding More Like A Candidate," the New York Times (1/28, A16, Perez-Pena, 1.16M) reports Giuliani "sounded nearer than ever to being a presidential candidate" in Manchester, "repeatedly talking about the prospect of running, and inviting voters to judge him by his record as mayor." While Giuliani "he has long been thought to be a presidential contender, he has fallen behind other candidates in declaring his intention, and the language he used on Saturday, while suggesting a run, also contained built-in escape hatches." Following on that theme, the Los Angeles Times (1/28, Barabak, 850K) headlines its report "Giuliani Plays It Close To The Vest," saying "the Rudy Giuliani Mystery Theater" rolled into town as the would-be candidate "gave away nothing about plans for a White House run."

The Washington Times (1/28, Curl, 88K) says that "judging by the effusive greeting" Giuliani "received yesterday from Republican activists in the nation's first primary state, it seemed like the former New York City mayor was already running for president. But he isn't -- at least not yet. The man made famous by his steely resolve and decisive leadership after the 2001 terrorist attacks on his city said yesterday he has no idea when he will decide whether to run." Giuliani said, "Every day you get closer, but we don't have a timetable yet. The timetable is, when's the right time and when do you have the confidence and the sense that you have the whole organization. But most of it is about Judith and I deciding that there's a really unique contribution that we can make." The Politico (1/27) quotes Giuliani saying, "I have to make a decision about my exploratory committee and running, but ultimately the more important decision is what you make a year from now."

Giuliani "On A Hiring Tear." The Washington Post (1/28, A2, 690K) says Giuliani "is on a hiring tear of late, putting to rest speculation that he isn't serious about running for president. … His latest signing is Bill Stepien, who will be his national field director." Stepien "has his political roots in the Bush campaigns; he served as a New Hampshire field director in the president's reelection bid. Last cycle he directed the 72-Hour Project, the Republican National Committee's much-ballyhooed turnout apparatus."

Houston Giuliani Fundraiser Scheduled For Thursday. In his syndicated column, Robert Novak (1/27) writes, "Texas Republican contributors are being solicited to spend $30,000" for a February 1 Houston dinner with Giuliani. The "'private' dinner will follow a 6:30 to 8 p.m. cocktail reception, costing $2,100 a person and $4,200 for couples. The best-known host of Giuliani's Houston event is billionaire oilman T. Boone Pickens Jr., chairman of the private equity firm BP Capital Management. Also on Giuliani's Texas fund-raising team are Tom Hicks, whose company owns the Texas Rangers baseball team; oil industry executive Jim Lee; and lawyer Patrick C. Oxford."

Obama First Became "Political Sensation" At Harvard Law School. As the Los Angeles Times did on Saturday, two major newspapers, the New York Times (1/28, A1, Kantor, 1.16M) and the Boston Globe (1/28, Levenson, Saltzman, 413K), today have features on Sen. Barack Obama's time at Harvard Law school. The New York newspaper says that "in his two memoirs and the biographical video on his Web site, Senator Obama's legal education is barely a blip, one of the least known chapters of his life." But Harvard "was the place where he first became a political sensation. He arrived there as an unknown, Afro-wearing community organizer who had spent years searching for his identity; by the time he left, he had his first national news media exposure, a book contract and a shot of confidence from running the most powerful legal journal in the country." The Boston Globe (1/28, Levenson, Saltzman, 413K) says in its headline that Obama was "a unifying voice" at Harvard. While today, Obama "is the hot new candidate for the White House, trying to end the warring in Washington with a warm message of unity and optimism," years before he took "that message to the national political stage, he was defusing battles large and small from the sharp-elbowed basketball games to the cutthroat classrooms at Harvard Law School."

DOJ_NMG_0123262

Obama's Unique Life Story Could Impact Campaign. The Times of London (1/28, Sheridan, Baxter) runs a story headlined "Secrets Of Obama Family Unlocked" that says Obama's "chances of winning the presidency depend to an unusual degree on his life story and character. The race is on to define the gifted but little-known senator," and "his heritage is far more diverse and astonishing than anything American voters have heard so far." He "has two half- sisters, one living in Britain, and five surviving half-brothers, the eldest of whom converted to Islam, and whose stories span the globe." The article details mother Ann Dunham's marriage to Kenyan student Barack Obama, her second marriage to Sen. Obama's Indonesian stepfather Lolo Soetoro, and "the estrangement between his mother and stepfather as Soetoro made compromises with Indonesia's power elite."

McAuliffe Says He Is "Not Shocked" Obama Is Running. Hillary Clinton campaign chairman Terry McAuliffe said of Obama on CNN's Larry King Live (1/27), "I'm not shocked that he's in the race. When that brass ring comes along, you've got to grab it. You can't win unless you're on the playing field, and if I were Barack Obama, I would have run myself."

WPost Slams Obama's "Slimers." The Washington Post (1/28, B6, 690K) editorializes, "It's become a fad among some conservatives to refer to the junior senator from Illinois by his full name: Barack Hussein Obama. This would be merely juvenile if it weren't so contemptible. … Insight magazine managed to further degrade the public discourse with a scurrilous 'report' alleging that Mr. Obama, as a child in Indonesia, attended a radical Islamic madrassa. … Obama's slimers seem to think such name-calling and Muslim-baiting can score points with the American people. On the contrary, Mr. Obama's multicultural background (his father was Kenyan, and he spent several years living in Indonesia with his mother and stepfather) ought to be viewed as a plus. A president with an understanding of Islam and the developing world would be welcomed by those who too often feel misunderstood and slighted by the United States."

Novak Says Democrats Pleased By "Dour" McCain Interview. In his syndicated column, Robert Novak (1/27) writes that "Democratic strategists who had feared Sen. John McCain as the potentially unbeatable Republican candidate for president in 2008 were surprised and delighted by his dour appearance on NBC's 'Meet the Press' last Sunday. One Democratic leader referred to McCain's performance, in suggesting President Bush's additional 21,000 troops may be inadequate, as 'comatose.' A Republican adviser to McCain said it was one of the worst performances ever on 'Meet the Press.' The senator's defender said he could not be expected to be cheerful about a plan to send additional U.S. troops in harm's way."

Romney Said To Be Winning Support Of Hastert, House GOP. In his syndicated column, Robert Novak (1/27) says Mitt Romney "is picking up support for president among House Republicans, headed by former Speaker Dennis Hastert."

McAuliffe Says GOP Candidates Will "Stay Away" From Bush. Asked on CNN's Larry King Live (1/27) if he expects President Bush to campaign for Republicans in 2008, Hillary Clinton campaign chairman Terry McAuliffe said, "If he's at a 28% approval rating -- I mean, we saw in '06 that candidates, the gubernatorial candidate in Florida, the Republican candidate, wouldn't get anywhere near George Bush toward the end of the campaign, and it happened in other places around the country, and he was even higher approval rating than he has today. I think the candidates on the Republican side are going to do their best to stay away from George Bush."

Six Politicians' Endorsements Could Impact Primaries. The Washington Post (1/28, A2, Cillizza, Murray, 690K) considers six politicians' endorsements that could matter in the presidential primary races. On the Democratic side, Sen. Ted Kennedy is now a "sought-after free agent" with John Kerry out of the race. Kennedy "has ties to several of the candidates, although Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) stands to benefit most from an endorsement by the liberal icon." African-American Rep. Jim Clyburn represents the early state of South Carolina, and in New Hampshire, ex-Gov. Jeanne Shaheen "maintains an active political organization." Among Republicans, ex-Gov. Jeb Bush is influential in a big state that could vote early, and "also happens to be the president's brother." Rep. Steve King "represents the vast -- and overwhelmingly Republican -- 5th District in western Iowa." And South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford is one of the few statewide elected there who has yet to pick a candidate.

Successful "Dark Horse" Candidates Could Be Nearing Extinction. The New York Times (1/28, WK4, Zeleny, 1.16M) looks at whether the "Democratic stable" is "too full for a dark horse presidential candidate to emerge. … Perhaps more than any other presidential contest, 2008's could help determine whether the dark horse…is on the verge of extinction, particularly since the entry fee in the race for the White House has been raised yet again," since "the window will be narrow for a second-tier candidate."

DOJ_NMG_0123263

Cullen To Head New Hampshire GOP. The New Hampshire Union Leader (1/28, Rayno) reports businessman Fergus Cullen was elected New Hampshire Republican state chairman Saturday. Cullen "calls himself 'a conservative in the mainstream conservative wing of the Republican Party.'"

Impact Of Possible California Primary Move Considered. An editorial and two op-eds about the California primary's possible jump to early February appear in the Los Angeles Times (1/28, 850K) today. The editorial supports the move, but says that while "Sacramento is right to want to make the state a player in presidential races," the "front-loading of each party's nomination process is not a healthy development. … Alas, the parties have not taken meaningful steps to curtail the front-loading of the nomination process. … So it's understandable for California to want to hold its primary on the first permissible date under party rules: Feb. 5, 2008. This would force candidates to come to the nation's most-populous state not merely to raise money for their battles elsewhere (centered on other regions' concerns) but to focus on issues important to Californians. And if a California vote in February, with its high costs, makes the primary process seem untenably front-loaded to the point that it forces party leaders to establish a more rational calendar, then the state will have provided the entire nation a worthy service."

Clinton White House adviser Christopher Lehane is also sympathetic to the move in a Los Angeles Times (1/28, 850K) op-ed, saying it would give California "a well-deserved bigger say in the presidential campaign by moving up the state's primary. However, if Democrats really want to put the party in the strongest possible position to succeed in presidential elections, let's completely rethink the current primary system and replace it with a nominating process designed to pick the candidate best able to win." He suggests that, "along with a Midwestern Iowa and a Northeastern New Hampshire, let's have a state from the Southwest, South and West all voting on the same day," leading a primary season "spread over a longer time period."

In another Los Angeles Times (1/28, 850K) op-ed, San Jose State University Survey and Policy Research Institute director Philip Trounstine writes that while the move "would be a good thing" from California's perspective, "it's increasingly looking like California will not get to exercise its political weight unilaterally. Indeed, Feb. 5, 2008, may become Super-Duper Tuesday with, perhaps, Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Illinois, Missouri, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma and Utah voting on the same day. If Super-Duper Tuesday does occur, California would still represent the biggest bloc in what would be, in effect, a national primary. But as the law of unintended consequences is wont to do, all this may actually increase, rather than decrease, the importance of Iowa and New Hampshire (and perhaps Nevada and South Carolina), because winners in those states would have the only momentum heading into Super-Duper Tuesday. … The nominating process itself may screen the field, even before a single vote is cast. That's not necessarily good for the country."

Colorado Democrats Could Move Caucuses To February 5. The Denver Post (1/28, Crummy, 256K) reports Colorado Democrats "are considering moving up the state's caucuses to the first week of February 2008 in an effort to be politically relevant in the next presidential election. If Colorado moves its caucuses from the third week in March to Feb. 5, however, it would join more than a dozen other states that have either already moved their caucuses or primaries up to the same date, or are thinking about it. As a result, some political observers say, Colorado probably becomes insignificant."

Chait Would Like To See Presidents Bush, Clinton To Face Off In 2008. In his Los Angeles Times (1/28, 850K) column, Jonathan Chait argues for a repeal of the 22nd Amendment, saying the "Hillary Clinton campaign is a product of the fact that her husband can't run for reelection. … Indeed, Democratic presidential politics since Clinton has consisted largely of referendum-by-proxy on Clinton." As for Republicans, President Bush "is going to leave office deeply unpopular with the American public. But what do Republicans think? According to a recent poll, three-quarters of them still approve of Bush's performance. Because Bush can't run again, though, Republicans won't have to confront whether they want to stick with him or move in a different direction. … What this country really needs is to have Bill Clinton run against George W. Bush."

Baker Weighing Challenge To Landrieu. The New Orleans Times-Picayune (1/28, Alpert, Walsh) reports Rep. Richard Baker "isn't ruling out a run against Sen. Mary Landrieu." Baker spokesman Michael DiResto said, "Folks in D.C. have talked to him about it. Folks in Louisiana have talked to him about it. He's thinking about it." Baker "wasn't well-known outside his district until he proposed a community redevelopment plan for post-Katrina Louisiana that won accolades from state leaders, including Landrieu and Gov.

DOJ_NMG_0123264

Kathleen Blanco. It died when the Bush administration opposed it, but the effort boosted Baker's profile statewide."

Speech By Jeb Bush Energizes Conservative Gathering. The Washington Post (1/28, A4, Goldfarb, 690K) reports that "at a time when the conservative movement is looking bereft, humbled by midterm-election defeats and hungering for a presidential candidate to rally around, Jeb Bush delivered yesterday in Washington a resounding endorsement of conservative principles, bringing his audience repeatedly to its feet." Addressing the Conservative Summit, the former Florida governor "struck every conservative chord, blaming Republicans' defeat in November on the party's abandonment of tenets including limited government and fiscal restraint." His speech "prompted three standing ovations from the audience of hundreds."

US-European Missile Defense Cooperation Said To Face Local, Russian Resistance. Under the headline, "U.S. Missiles in E. Europe Opposed by Locals, Russia," the Washington Post (1/28, A16, Konviser, 690K) notes an Administration "plan to deploy a missile defense shield in Eastern Europe is drawing protests from Russia and from residents who oppose hosting foreign military bases and fear the facilities might make their countries targets for attack." The Administration is seeking to place "about 10 interceptor missiles in Poland and a radar tracking station in the Czech Republic," a move the Kremlin says "would pose a 'clear threat' to Russia." A Foreign Ministry spokesman "underlined his government's opposition Friday, saying in an interview with the ITAR-Tass news agency that 'the creation of a U.S. European anti-missile base can only be regarded as a substantial reconfiguration of the American military presence in Europe.' He called the move 'a mistaken step with negative consequences for international security.'"

WTO Doha Talk Resumption Will Seek Technical Agreements First. The New York Times (1/28, A10, Dougherty, 1.16M) reports, "Leading trade ministers on Saturday embraced an unusual game plan for reviving trade talks, saying they would try to hash out details on technical issues, rather than first agreeing on the broad outlines of an accord." At the World Economic Forum in Davos, "officials from 30 countries including the United States, the European Union and emerging markets like India and Brazil vowed to move forward in the" WTO Doha Round. "To resuscitate the talks, the ministers endorsed a strategy that is highly unusual in these negotiations, but now appears to offer the only chance to conclude the trade round. Instead of creating a framework for agreement and then working out details on technical issues like tariffs and subsidies later, countries will aim to work out most specifics up front. Then, they will decide whether a final push is warranted at a meeting of all World Trade Organization members in Geneva." WTO Director-General Pascal Lamy "said the process would have to achieve a genuine breakthrough in 'months, not quarters,' for a meeting of all the group's members to occur."

Blair Backs G-8 Expansion To Include India, China. Under the headline, "Blair Says G-8 Should Expand, Disagrees With Merkel," Bloomberg (1/28, Fraher) notes British Prime Minister Tony Blair's speech yesterday in Davos. He "said the Group of Eight industrialized nations should eventually expand to include countries such as China and India, putting him at odds with current G-8 head Angela Merkel." Bloomberg explains, "Politicians from the G-8 are debating whether to allow some of the world's fastest growing economies into their club and grant them a top table presence on talks ranging from foreign exchange policy to development aid. While Blair argued for expansion, Merkel rejected the idea in her opening address on Jan. 24." In addition, Bloomberg reports, Blair "is running out of time to build a foreign policy legacy beyond the war in Iraq before he steps down later this year. He repeated a call made last May to fuse the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank to strengthen the influence of emerging economies."

Three Killed In Third Day Of Fatah-Hamas Fighting. The New York Times (1/28, Erlanger, 1.16M) reports, "At least three more Palestinians were killed Saturday in Gaza in continuing battles between fighters loyal to Fatah and Hamas, which has been celebrating its victory a year ago over Fatah in legislative elections." Yesterday's "fighting started near the Hamas Islamic University, the headquarters of the Fatah-dominated preventive security force in Gaza City and the Shifa Hospital a few blocks away." Noting the deaths of over 20 Palestinians in violence since Thursday, and the suspension of Fatah-Hamas unity government talks, the Times notes, "If the talks fail, [President Mahmoud] Abbas said he would move to make good on his Dec. 16 call for early presidential and parliamentary elections, despite Hamas' victory a year ago." Washington "is continuing to try to support Mr. Abbas and his loyal presidential guard with more than $80 million in what is supposed to be nonlethal aid."

A lengthy AP (1/28, Barzak) piece adds, "Gunmen from the rival Hamas and Fatah movements battled in Gaza City for a third straight day Saturday, firing mortars and grenades in clashes that killed seven people in the increasingly bloody power struggle over the Palestinian government." BBC.com (1/27) adds, "Clashes erupted in Gaza after weeks of relative calm and renewed efforts to form a national unity government. Both sides say they have suspended talks."

DOJ_NMG_0123265

Israel May Have Violated Arms Export Control Act. The New York Times (1/28, Cloud, Myre, 1.16M) reports a State Department statement that it "will inform Congress" tomorrow "that Israel may have violated agreements with the United States when it fired American-supplied cluster munitions into southern Lebanon during its fight with Hezbollah last summer." That "finding, though preliminary, has prompted a contentious debate within the administration over whether the United States should penalize Israel for its use of cluster munitions against towns and villages where Hezbollah had placed its rocket launchers. … Midlevel officials at the Pentagon and the State Department have argued that Israel violated American prohibitions on using cluster munitions against populated areas," while "other officials in both departments contend that Israel's use of the weapons was for self-defense and aimed at stopping the Hezbollah rocket attacks that killed 159 Israeli citizens and at worst was only a technical violation." The Los Angeles Times (1/28, 850K) adds the State Department "has completed a preliminary report on whether Israel misused American-made cluster bombs in civilian areas of Lebanon."

NYTimes Says Dialogue With Syria Is Crucial To Stabilizing Lebanon. An editorial in today's New York Times (1/28, 1.16M) praises international donors' $7.6 million pledge for rebuilding Lebanon. "The democratically elected government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora needs all the help it can get," and recent violence, "if not contained," might "even reignite Lebanon's catastrophic civil war." The country's "fundamental problem is the archaic and unfair political system that divides the country's top offices among rival and distrustful religious communities." Noting Hezbollah's simultaneous use of politics and violence to gain influence, the Times says "Any plan for stabilizing Lebanon has to face up to this dynamic. That's why the Bush administration needs to drop its stubborn resistance to diplomacy with Syria — and try to coax Damascus away from both Iran and Hezbollah." The Administration "must make clear that Lebanon's sovereignty is not negotiable." While Syria has sometimes "responded constructively" to dialogue, "it has always responded destructively to isolation. Engaging Syria may not work. But ignoring it all but guarantees that even $7.6 billion in aid will not be enough to stabilize Lebanon."

Saudis Said To Work To Keep Oil Prices Stable. A lengthy piece on the front page of the New York Times (1/28, Mouawad, 1.16M) reports Saudi officials have "sent signals in the past two weeks that" they are "committed to keeping oil at around $50 a barrel — down $27 a barrel from the summer peak that shook consumers across the developed world." Saudi Arabia, "which is by far the largest oil producer within OPEC and sets the cartel's agenda, is seeking to avoid a repeat of the dramatic rise in prices while trying to put a floor beneath them." Saudi leaders, the Times says, "appear to be rediscovering that painfully high energy prices take a profound toll on the global economy, which in turn reduces demand for their oil. But other motives seem to be at work, too, including the Saudis' desire to restrain Iran's ambitions in the region." While they "say their oil policy is based on market considerations and not political ones," recent events "led to renewed speculation that the kingdom might be tempted to dry out Iran's ambitions by pushing oil prices down."

Pelosi Leads Delegation To Discuss Security With Musharraf. The AP (1/27) notes House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "arrived in Pakistan Saturday for talks with the country's president expected to touch on cooperation against Taliban and al-Qaeda militants and U.S. aid to the South Asian country, officials said." None of the meeting participants were expected to make public comments. The AP notes the coincidence of the visit with the Congress' consideration of legislation "that would link American aid for Pakistan's military with its commitment to combating resurgent Taliban militants."

ABC World News (1/27, story 3, 1:50, Weir, 8.78M) reported Pelosi "is in Pakistan tonight for talks with one of America's biggest allies on the war on terror. Her visit, about fighting Al Qaeda and the Taliban, come on the same day as a major attack in Pakistan." Pelosi's delegation is "there to push [Musharraf] to crack down harder on the Taliban, and Al Qaeda sympathizers in Pakistan, and these explosions coming just one day after the other. At the very least, a wakeup call that he needs to do that."

Suicide Bomber Kills 15 In Northern Pakistan. The Washington Post/AP (1/28, A13, Khan) reports, "A suicide attacker detonated a bomb among police on guard near a Shiite mosque in this northern Pakistani city Saturday, killing at least 15 people and wounding more than 30, police said." The "explosion came as Pakistan's minority Shiites started to commemorate their most important religious festival, Ashura, often an impetus for sectarian violence. Paramilitary forces in armored vehicles were deployed to patrol Peshawar after the bombing." President Pervez Musharraf "condemned the 'terrorist attack' in Peshawar and ordered an immediate inquiry. … Most of the victims were police and municipal officials," and "there was no immediate assertion of responsibility, but suspicion was likely to fall on Sunni extremists." NBC Nightly News (1/27, story 4, :15, Seigenthaler, 9.87M) briefly reported on the attack.

The New York Times (1/28, A4, Khan, 1.16M) adds, "At least 14 people were killed, most of them policemen, and several others were wounded Saturday in what appeared to be a suicide bombing here shortly before a Shiite religious procession was to come through, the police said." The Times says "security in Peshawar was already on alert after a suicide bombing outside a Marriott hotel in Islamabad on Friday and in preparation for Ashura," and a police source "said there was little any one could do to head off a determined suicide bomber." BBC.com (1/27) adds, "It is not clear whether the attack was aimed at the worshippers or the police. Power was cut in the city centre shortly after the blast, complicating rescue efforts."

DOJ_NMG_0123266

The Los Angeles Times (1/28, Ali, King, 850K) calls Peshawar a "volatile frontier city," and says "scores of people were wounded in the powerful blast… Adding to the chaos, a power failure apparently caused by the explosion plunged the area into darkness. Rescuers groped in the dark, guided by the cries and moans of the injured." The Times also notes Pelosi's visit, saying her "delegation held discussions with Musharraf centering on Pakistan's role in fighting the insurgency in neighboring Afghanistan."

Two Americans Killed By Carjackers In Kenya. A brief item in today's New York Times (1/28, 1.16M) reports, "Two Americans, including an elderly woman, were shot to death on Saturday afternoon by carjackers in Nairobi." The wife and mother-in-law of an Embassy officer "were traveling in an embassy car with three other Americans when a truck cut them off, police officials said. Four men jumped out with Kalashnikov assault rifles and ordered the occupants out of their car." Police did not offer a reason for the shooting itself, "and American officials said they did not believe the attack was related to terrorism." The AP (1/27) reports, "Gunmen carjacked a U.S. Embassy vehicle on the outskirts [Nairobi] Saturday afternoon and killed two female relatives of an embassy employee, officials said. Police later killed two people involved in the carjacking."

Sudan's North-South Peace Accord "Endangered." Under the headline, "Sudan's Peace Deal, Seen As A Bush Success, Is Endangered," the Washington Post (1/28, A18, Kessler, 690K) reports, "A peace agreement that two years ago ended Africa's longest-running conflict -- and that the White House considers one of President Bush's signature achievements -- is in danger of unraveling because of inattention by top U.S. officials and growing tensions between Sudan's government and the former rebels who signed the deal, according to experts and congressional officials." The Administration "made [that] peace agreement one of its top diplomatic priorities," but "experts warn that the Khartoum government's unwillingness to abide by the terms of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) could lead to a new outbreak of war." Some "experts said the administration, distracted by war in the Middle East and an unrelated conflict in Sudan's Darfur region, has failed to recognize the peril lurking in the south." The Post includes criticism from Rep. Frank Wolf and Rep. Donald Payne, who "said the administration should appoint a special envoy specifically to make sure the north-south peace deal does not collapse."

Kristof Asks Bush To Do More To Stop Darfur Genocide. In his New York Times (1/28, 1.16M) column, Nicholas Kristof pans the idea of Sudan assuming the chair of the African Union. Calling President Omar al-Bashir "blood-drenched" and the "architect of the genocide in Darfur," Kristof says "it's mind-boggling that African countries would even consider selecting as their leader a man who has systematically dispatched militias that pick out babies on the basis of tribe and skin color and throw them into bonfires." With Africa "enjoying solid economic growth and improved leadership," he says, "this self-inflicted wound would sully Africa's image and make it far more difficult for African Union peacekeepers to save lives in Darfur. … For anyone who wants the best for Africa, it is repulsive to think of President Bashir as the duly elected spokesman for the continent." Noting that "the world doesn't seriously object" to Khartoum's actions, Kristof says "Europe is oblivious" and "President Bush has been better than most world leaders, but still pathetic: he mustered half a sentence in his State of the Union address. Perhaps this is because Mr. Bush regards the situation as tragic but hopeless, but in fact there is plenty he could do," including lobbying against Sudan in its bid to lead the AU.

Hoagland Says Tutu Is Example For Bush, World. In his Washington Post (1/28, 690K) column, Jim Hoagland praises Archbishop Desmond Tutu's recent criticisms of South Africa's refusal to support a UN Security Council rebuke of the Burmese regime. "When Desmond Tutu speaks out about morality in politics and foreign policy, his nation and the rest of the world should listen. By criticizing the government he helped bring into being, the South African Nobel laureate raises in his own distinctive fashion some of the key issues of our time." Tutu "rightly suggests that because of its history, post-apartheid South Africa has a special responsibility to pursue a foreign policy that supports international action to help oppressed populations." He continues, "Just as South Africans should be guided by the recent past, Americans must recall their government's history with Iraq." President Bush "has failed to underpin his narrowly American approach to values with a persuasive appeal to international moral standards and conscience. Desmond Tutu's reproach to his own government is a cogent reminder of the perils and ignominy that such failure brings."

DOJ_NMG_0123267

Mexican Efforts To Stem Central American Immigration Said To Falter. The New York Times (1/28, A12, McKinley, 1.16M) details Mexico's continuing efforts to slow Central American immigration. While Mexican President Felipe Calderon has "announced measures to slow the flow of illegal immigrants across Mexico's southern border and reduce crime in this lush but impoverished region,… much remains to be done to stop or deter the migrants, and for now the measures have had little effect. Social workers and volunteers who aid the migrants say they keep coming." The Times reports "corruption is rampant. Soldiers and police officers on the Mexican side extort money from the migrants but seldom turn them around, aid workers and migrants said." The "biggest deterrent, migrants say, is not federal authorities but armed thugs who waylay them along the railroad tracks or on paths through the countryside used to avoid the immigration posts along the main highway."

Karimov Said To Maintain Firm Control In Uzbekistan. An analysis piece by the AP (1/27, Bukharbayeva) notes, "Nearly a week after his term elapsed, the former Communist strongman who has kept a tight grip on Uzbekistan for more than 15 years shows no sign of vacating the presidential office." Islam Karimov's continuance in office past the expiration of his mandate is "a sign his hold on power remains strong and that he has no intention of leaving, analysts say." Citing analysts who believe Karimov will stand for election again in December, the AP adds, "Many observers fear that the Karimov government's oppressive control of the country could radicalize Islamic fundamentalists and lead to an explosion of violence in an already troubled part of the world."

Kerry Assails Bush Administration Foreign Policy. The Washington Times/AP (1/28) reports comments at the World Economic Forum by Sen. John Kerry, who "slammed the foreign policy of the Bush administration yesterday, saying it has caused the United States to become 'a sort of international pariah.'" Kerry "made the comment as he responded to a question about whether the U.S. government had failed to adequately engage Iran's government before the election of hard-liner Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in 2005. He said the Bush administration has failed to adequately address a number of foreign-policy issues." Kerry also "said the government needs to use diplomacy to improve national security."

THE BIG PICTURE

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"The Vaccine Industry's Development Revival."
"A Deal In The Desert For Sen. Reid?"
"Bringing Home A New Islam."
"Waiting For The DDT Tide To Turn."

New York Times:
"Saudi Officials Seek To Temper The Price Of Oil."
"In Law School, Obama Found Political Voice."
"A Cleric's Journey Leads To A Suburban Frontier."
"On Iran, Bush Faces Haunting Echoes Of Iraq."
"After Times Of Grief And Doubt, A Tennis Ace Is Hungry Again."
"Atlantic City Casinos Reap Anti-Blight Funds."

Washington Post:
"Thousands Protest Bush Policy."
"Clinton Begins Her Run In Earnest."
"Vietnam Shades Warner's Iraq Stand."
"Dinner, Movie -- And A Background Check -- For Online "
A Real-Life Sequel To 'Lorenzo's Oil.'"

Washington Times:
"Iraq War Foes Mass On Mall."
"Seven U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq."
"In Iowa, Hillary Off And Running."
"Church-State 'Wall' Coming Back Down?"
"Pope John Paul 'Escaped' To Hit Slopes, New Book Says."

Detroit Free Press:
"Gumbleton Not Ousted For Condemning Abuse, Archdiocese Says."
"Spartans, Neitzel Run Out Of Gas Against Ohio State."
"RV Enthusiasts Oooh And Ahhh At Ford Field."
"U-M Fades Again In Bloomington."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Escapee Arrested After S.E. Manhunt."
"Searchers Find Skeletal Remains."
"Bill Targets Eyewitness IDs."
"Thousands Protest War."
"Kidd To Lead State Dems."
"Man Surrenders After Standoff."
"Guilty Plea In Shaking Case."

Dallas Morning News:
"Surgeries Mend Twins' Tiny Hearts."
"Two DISD Principals Told To Resign -- Or Else."
"Bail Means Freedom, Lighter Terms For Many Suspects."
"D.C. Anti-War Demonstration Draws Tens Of Thousands."
"Schools Get Around 'No-Pass, No-Play' Law."
"Super Bowl Coaches Represent Winning Drive For Diversity."
"SMU Students Revisit Holocaust."
"Escapee Suspected Of Stealing Singer's Tour Bus."

DOJ_NMG_0123268

Houston Chronicle:
"Contractor Deaths In Iraq Nearing 800."
"Houston Nightclub Sting Ends In Vice Raid, Arrests."
"Sketch Was Key To Houston Rape Suspect's Arrest."
"Parts Of Houston To Miss Air-Pollution Deadline."
"HISD Among Bonus-For-Performance Pioneers."
"Houston-Galveston Passenger Train Could Roll."
"'Green' Options Bloom At Houston Auto Show."
"Cuts In Texas Welfare Come At Cost."
"Pave The Way For Your PC To Handle Vista."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Clinton In Iowa; Giuliani In New Hampshire; Pelosi In Pakistan; Violence In Iraq; Antiwar Protests; Military Struggling To Enlist; Computer Chips; Retirees Move To Panama; Prince Charles; Community Service Vacations.
CBS: Computer Chips; Antiwar Protests; Clinton In Iowa; Officer Refuses To Go To Iraq; Sailors Missing After Crash; Prince Charles.
NBC: Antiwar Protests; Military Family View Of War; Violence In Iraq; Sectarian Violence In Pakistan; Clinton In Iowa; Presidential Campaign; Housing Market; Prince Charles; Passport Requirement; Apollo One; Diving In Everglades.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:
PRESIDENT BUSH — No public schedule.
VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: Not in session

US House: Not in session.

Other: CONSERVATIVE SUMMIT _ The National Review Institute hosts its Conservative Summit. Topics include: Debates on the war in Iraq, the role of the Religious Right, immigration, and energy policy; panels on foreign policy, social issues, domestic policy, small government, and quotas, blacks, and the GOP. Location: JW Marriott, 1331 Pennsylvania Ave. NW. Contacts: Kristina Graboski, 703-683-5004 ext 132.

AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS _ The National Air Traffic Controllers Association (NATCA) National Legislative Committee holds a Washington conference. Location: Hyatt Regency on Capitol Hill, 400 New Jersey Ave. NW. Jan. 28-31.

SCHOOL BOARDS _ The National School Board Association holds its annual Federal Relations Network Conference. Location: Grand Hyatt Hotel, Independence A Room, 1000 H St. NW. Contacts: Linda Embrey, 703-838-6737.

ANTIWAR WORKSHOPS _ 9 a.m. - 12 p.m. United for Peace and Justice holds training sessions for those joining the Congressional Lobby Day on Monday, Jan. 29. Location: Bethesda-Chevy Chase High School, 4301 East-West Highway, Bethesda, Md. Contacts: ., 212-868-5545.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

DOJ_NMG_0123269

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Monday, January 29, 2007 8:16 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Sunday, January 28, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070128.pdf; dojclips070128.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, JANUARY 28, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Was 9/11 Really That Bad? (LAT) 4
Editorial: Bush's Mysterious Surveillance Moves (SAEN) 5

Homeland Response:

Bin Laden, The Left And Me (WP) 6
As Aid Lags, Volunteers Shoulder Rebuilding On Gulf Coast (WP) 8

War News:

Fonda Reprises A Famous Role At Peace Rally (WP) 10
Thousands Protest Bush Policy (WP) 11
Iraq War Foes Mass On Mall (WT) 13
Crowds On Both Coasts Protest Iraq War (AP) 14
Protest Focuses On Iraq Troop Increase (NYT) 16
Celebrities Pack D.C. War Protest (AP) 18
Mass US Protest Against Iraq War (BBC) 19
Student Protesters, Fighting Image Of Apathy, Call For A Cohesive Movement (WP) 20
Grand Delusion (WP) 21
It Has Unraveled So Quickly (NYT) 22
Parting Ways In Iraq (NYT) 24
On Iran, Bush Faces Haunting Echoes Of Iraq (NYT) 25
Iran Condemns U.S. Raids Against Its Operatives (AP) 27
Whose Iran? (NYT) 27
Report: Iran Denies Centrifuge Work (AP) 33
Cracks In Iran (WP) 34
20 Killed In Baghdad On Eve Of Holiday (NYT) 34
U.S. Troop Deaths Cap Iraq's Bloody Week (AP) 36
Seven U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq (WT/AP) 37
Seven U.S. Soldiers Killed In Iraq Over Three Days (WP) 37
60 Civilians, 7 U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq (LAT) 38
Bombs At Baghdad Market Kill 15; 7 U.S. Troops Die (CNN) 39
Contractor Deaths In Iraq Nearing 800 (HC) 41
A Conversation Wtih Adel Abdul Mahdi (WP) 43
Pentagon Seeks New Ways To Recruit (MCT) 45
Gates Aims To Lessen Forced Extensions (BSH/AP) 48
Iraqi Soldiers Still Rely Heavily On U.S. (LAT) 48
Iraq Cultivates Ties To Democrats (LAT) 51
Army Probes War Contractor Fraud (AP) 52
Vietnam Shades Warner's Iraq Stand (WP) 53
How Iraq Affects D.C. Reputations (LAT) 55
After The Fall (WP) 55
Taliban Vows Summer Wave Of Suicide Bombers (WT) 60

Corporate Scandals:

Qwest May Face Fight For Money (DENP) 61
Is The Fix Worse Than The Problem? (NYT) 62

Criminal Law:

Libby Trial Shows Unsealed Lips In CIA (LAT) 64
For Hevesi Prosecutor, 'One Standard Of Justice' (NYT) 66
In The Penalty Phase, All One's Secrets Revealed (NYT) 68
It Only Looks Like The Girls Have Gone Wild (PPG) 69
EDITORIAL: The Cavalry Is Coming (NOTP) 72

Civil Rights:

Noxubee Clerk: No Inquiry Into Invalid Ballots (JCL) 73
Rental Housing Under Scrutiny (BRCN) 74
Matching The Police To The Populace (NYT) 75
Church-state "Wall" Coming Back Down? (WT) 76

Antitrust:

Microsoft Faces New Antitrust Clash With Vista (AFP) 79

Environment/Indian Affairs:

Dearborn Waste Treatment Company Execs Face Myriad Of Dumping Charges (DEARPG) 80
The Long Road To Energy Independence (NYT) 81
Top Democrats Still Divided? (POL) 81
Worry Over Expiration Of U.S. Law That Helped Rural Areas (NYT/AP) 82
2 Wolf Groups To Lose Endangered Status (NYT/AP) 83

Tribes In Texas, Elsewhere, Oppose Bid To Change Gaming (AP) ... 83

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Drug War Victories (SDUT) ... 85
Gun-safety Center Targets 'corrupt Dealers' (WILNJ) ... 86

Immigration:

A Family Apart, A Child In Pain. For What? (STPPP) ... 87
Minnesota's Guard: Eyes On The Border (MINNST) ... 89
Study Of Immigrants Links Lighter Skin And Higher Income (NYT/AP) ... 91

Tax:

Communities Quiet On Bond Probes (BLOOM) ... 92
The Budget Illusion (NYT) ... 92

Congress-Administration:

Lawyer Suited For Tough Inquiries To Replace Harriet Miers (AAS) ... 93
Experts See Peril In Bush Health Proposal (NYT) ... 94
Rangel And Others Condemn Bush Medicaid Plan (NYT) ... 96
A Deal In The Desert For Sen. Reid? (LAT) ... 97
You Listening To Me? (NYT) ... 99
At Roll Call, An Uneasy Silence (WP) ... 100
Ginsburg Feels Isolated On Court (WP/AP) ... 104
Supreme Court TV (WP) ... 104
Search Ends For 3 In Calif. Copter Crash (AP) ... 105
Voting Rights Chicanery (WP) ... 106
The George W. Bush Library: Scholarly Mecca Or $500 Million Oxymoron? (NYT) ... 107

Other News:

Looking For The Angry Populists In Suburbia (NYT) ... 108
Clinton Begins Her Run In Earnest (WP) ... 109
In Iowa, Hillary Off And Running (WT) ... 111
Clinton Hits Campaign Trail In Iowa (USAT) ... 112
Sen. Clinton Woos Voters In Iowa (LAT) ... 113
Clinton Begins Journey To White House (CHIT) ... 115
Clinton Explains Role In Authorizing War (AP) ... 116
In First Iowa Foray, Clinton Vows To Be Tough (NSDY) ... 117
Clinton In DM: "No Do-overs" On Iraq (DMR) ... 118
Pool Report 1: Sen. Clinton At Iowa Democratic Party Central Committee Meeting (POL) ... 120
Dour McCain (NOVAK) ... 121
Hillary Pushes Personality, Ducks Iraq (POL) ... 122
Clinton's Presidential Posturing (WP) ... 123
Hillary Clinton's Mission Unaccomplished (NYT) ... 124
You've Come A Long Way, Maybe (WP) ... 126
Giuliani Is Sounding More Like A Candidate (NYT) ... 129
Giuliani Plays It Close To The Vest (LAT) ... 130
In N.H., Activists Embrace Giuliani (WT) ... 131
Giuliani Inches His Way To The White House (POL) ... 131
Building A Serious Staff (WP) ... 133
In Law School, Obama Found Political Voice (NYT) ... 133
At Harvard Law, A Unifying Voice (BOS) ... 135
Secrets Of Obama Family Unlocked (LONT) ... 138
Sticks, Stones And Mr. Obama (WP) ... 140
In A Sea Of Political Endorsements, Six That Could Make Waves (WP) ... 141
The Faint Hoofbeats? That's The Dark Horse (NYT) ... 141
Cullen Elected State GOP Chairman (NHUL) ... 143
Move Up The California Primary (LAT) ... 143
How Dems Can Use California To Win In '08 (LAT) ... 144
How California Can Spoil The '08 Election (LAT) ... 145
Dems Aim To Lift State's Stature In Presidential Race (DENP) ... 147
Bill Clinton In '08! (LAT) ... 147
On The Hill (NOTP) ... 148
Jeb Bush Rallies Conservatives At Summit (WP) ... 150
U.S. Missiles In E. Europe Opposed By Locals, Russia (WP) 151
Plan To Revive Trade Talks Is Offered In Davos (NYT) ... 152
Blair Says G-8 Should Expand, Disagrees With Merkel (BLOOM) ... 153
3 Killed As Hamas And Fatah Fight On (NYT) ... 153
7 Dead On Day 3 Of Hamas-Fatah Conflict (AP) ... 155
Death Toll Mounts In Gaza Battles (BBC) ... 156
Israel May Have Violated Arms Pact, U.S. Officials Say (NYT) 157
U.S. State Dept. Report To Address Possible Arms Violations By Israel (LAT/AP) ... 158
Saving Lebanon (NYT) ... 159
Saudi Officials Seek To Temper The Price Of Oil (NYT) ... 159
Pelosi, U.S. Congressional Delegation Meets President Musharraf In Pakistan (AP) ... 161
15 Die In Blast Near Pakistani Shiite Mosque (WP/AP) ... 162
Bombing Kills 14 Pakistanis (NYT) ... 162
Pakistan Bombing Kills 14 People (BBC) ... 163
Pakistan Mosque Bombing Kills Police Chief, Officers (LAT) 163
U.S. Citizens Killed In Kenya (NYT) ... 164
Police: Carjackers Fatally Shoot 2 Women In U.S. Embassy Car In Kenya (AP) ... 164
Sudan's Peace Deal, Seen As A Bush Success, Is Endangered (WP) ... 165
A Choice For Darfur (NYT) ... 166
A Useful Rebuke On Rights (WP) ... 167

DOJ_NMG_0123272

Despite Crackdown, Migrants Stream Into South Mexico
(NYT) 168
Uzbek Leader Shows No Signs Of Vacating (AP) 170
U.S. A "Pariah" From Bush Policies, Kerry Says (WT/AP) 171

TERRORISM NEWS:

Was 9/11 Really That Bad? (LAT)

By David A. Bell

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

IMAGINE THAT on 9/11, six hours after the assault on the twin towers and the Pentagon, terrorists had carried out a second wave of attacks on the United States, taking an additional 3,000 lives. Imagine that six hours after that, there had been yet another wave. Now imagine that the attacks had continued, every six hours, for another four years, until nearly 20 million Americans were dead. This is roughly what the Soviet Union suffered during World War II, and contemplating these numbers may help put in perspective what the United States has so far experienced during the war against terrorism.

It also raises several questions. Has the American reaction to the attacks in fact been a massive overreaction? Is the widespread belief that 9/11 plunged us into one of the deadliest struggles of our time simply wrong? If we did overreact, why did we do so? Does history provide any insight?

Certainly, if we look at nothing but our enemies' objectives, it is hard to see any indication of an overreaction. The people who attacked us in 2001 are indeed hate-filled fanatics who would like nothing better than to destroy this country. But desire is not the same thing as capacity, and although Islamist extremists can certainly do huge amounts of harm around the world, it is quite different to suggest that they can threaten the existence of the United States.

Yet a great many Americans, particularly on the right, have failed to make this distinction. For them, the "Islamo-fascist" enemy has inherited not just Adolf Hitler's implacable hatreds but his capacity to destroy. The conservative author Norman Podhoretz has gone so far as to say that we are fighting World War IV (No. III being the Cold War).

But it is no disrespect to the victims of 9/11, or to the men and women of our armed forces, to say that, by the standards of past wars, the war against terrorism has so far inflicted a very small human cost on the United States. As an instance of mass murder, the attacks were unspeakable, but they still pale in comparison with any number of military assaults on civilian targets of the recent past, from Hiroshima on down.

Even if one counts our dead in Iraq and Afghanistan as casualties of the war against terrorism, which brings us to about 6,500, we should remember that roughly the same number of Americans die every two months in automobile accidents.

Of course, the 9/11 attacks also conjured up the possibility of far deadlier attacks to come. But then, we were hardly ignorant of these threats before, as a glance at just about any thriller from the 1990s will testify. And despite the even more nightmarish fantasies of the post-9/11 era (e.g. the TV show "24's" nuclear attack on Los Angeles), Islamist terrorists have not come close to deploying weapons other than knives, guns and conventional explosives. A war it may be, but does it really deserve comparison to World War II and its 50 million dead? Not every adversary is an apocalyptic threat.

So why has there been such an overreaction? Unfortunately, the commentators who detect one have generally explained it in a tired, predictably ideological way: calling the United States a uniquely paranoid aggressor that always overreacts to provocation.

In a recent book, for instance, political scientist John Mueller evaluated the threat that terrorists pose to the United States and convincingly concluded that it has been, to quote his title, "Overblown." But he undercut his own argument by adding that the United States has overreacted to every threat in its recent history, including even Pearl Harbor (rather than trying to defeat Japan, he argued, we should have tried containment!).

Seeing international conflict in apocalyptic terms — viewing every threat as existential — is hardly a uniquely American habit. To a certain degree, it is a universal human one. But it is also, more specifically, a Western one, which paradoxically has its origins in one of the most optimistic periods of human history: the 18th century Enlightenment.

DOJ_NMG_0123274

Until this period, most people in the West took warfare for granted as an utterly unavoidable part of the social order. Western states fought constantly and devoted most of their disposable resources to this purpose; during the 1700s, no more than six or seven years passed without at least one major European power at war.

The Enlightenment, however, popularized the notion that war was a barbaric relic of mankind's infancy, an anachronism that should soon vanish from the Earth. Human societies, wrote the influential thinkers of the time, followed a common path of historical evolution from savage beginnings toward ever-greater levels of peaceful civilization, politeness and commercial exchange.

The unexpected consequence of this change was that those who considered themselves "enlightened," but who still thought they needed to go to war, found it hard to justify war as anything other than an apocalyptic struggle for survival against an irredeemably evil enemy. In such struggles, of course, there could be no reason to practice restraint or to treat the enemy as an honorable opponent.

Ever since, the enlightened dream of perpetual peace and the nightmare of modern total war have been bound closely to each other in the West. Precisely when the Enlightenment hopes glowed most brightly, wars often took on an especially hideous character.

The Enlightenment was followed by the French Revolution and the Napoleonic wars, which touched every European state, sparked vicious guerrilla conflicts across the Continent and killed millions (including, probably, a higher proportion of young Frenchmen than died from 1914 to 1918).

During the hopeful early years of the 20th century, journalist Norman Angell's huge bestseller, "The Great Illusion," argued that wars had become too expensive to fight. Then came the unspeakable horrors of World War I. And the end of the Cold War, which seemed to promise the worldwide triumph of peace and democracy in a more stable unipolar world, has been followed by the wars in the Balkans, the Persian Gulf War and the present global upheaval. In each of these conflicts, the United States has justified the use of force by labeling its foe a new Hitler, not only in evil intentions but in potential capacity.

Yet as the comparison with the Soviet experience should remind us, the war against terrorism has not yet been much of a war at all, let alone a war to end all wars. It is a messy, difficult, long-term struggle against exceptionally dangerous criminals who actually like nothing better than being put on the same level of historical importance as Hitler — can you imagine a better recruiting tool? To fight them effectively, we need coolness, resolve and stamina. But we also need to overcome long habit and remind ourselves that not every enemy is in fact a threat to our existence.

David A. Bell Is A Professor Of History At Johns Hopkins University

Editorial: Bush's Mysterious Surveillance Moves (SAEN)

San Antonio Express-News, January 28, 2007

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the nation will be "no less safe" now that the Bush administration has agreed to bring its warrantless surveillance program into line with provisions of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

The effort to monitor international calls to or from terrorist suspects will now come under some sort of scrutiny from the secretive FISA court, specially created to review intelligence matters.

It is a curious reversal for the administration that raises an important question: If judicial review of the program doesn't impair national security, why didn't the White House adhere to this legal process from the beginning?

President Bush had maintained that as commander in chief, he is empowered in time of war to carry out such surveillance beyond the purview of the FISA court. Since the surveillance effort became known publicly in late 2005, he has strenuously argued that any changes to the program would imperil national security.

The new White House position still asserts this executive power — what Gonzales calls "inherent authority." But it accepts some sort of formal review process under FISA rules.

Other than a new majority in Congress, what has changed? No one really knows, because Gonzales' description of the process is as nebulous as the surveillance program itself.

DOJ_NMG_0123275

Unfortunately, we don't know whether the program has changed or if the administration's interpretation of the law has changed. Bush's penchant for executive signing statements — Oval Office appendages to new laws that carve out exemptions for executive power — doesn't inspire confidence in the former.

Bush added one of those statements to a postal reform bill on Dec. 20. Civil liberties watchdogs contend the signing would allow officials to circumvent FISA warrants to open mail in emergency and foreign intelligence cases. The White House says the statement is, legally speaking, nothing new.

When the FISA controversy broke one year ago, this editorial page argued that if FISA requirements placed unreasonable restraints on efforts to defend the nation against terrorist attack, the Bush administration should work with Congress to amend the law, not ignore the law. That's still the case today.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bin Laden, The Left And Me (WP)

By Dinesh D'Souza

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

As a conservative author, I'm used to a little controversy. Even so, the reaction to my new book, "The Enemy at Home," has felt, well, a little hysterical.

"Ratfink writes new book," James Wolcott, cultural critic for Vanity Fair, declares in his blog. He goes on to call my book a "sleazy, shameless, ignorant, ahistorical, tendentious, meretricious lie."

In the pages of Esquire, Mark Warren charges that I "hate America" and have "taken to heart" Osama bin Laden's view of the United States. (Warren also challenged me to a fight and threatened to put me in the hospital.) In his New York Times review of my book last week, Alan Wolfe calls my work "a national disgrace . . . either self-delusional or dishonest." I am "a childish thinker" with "no sense of shame," he argues. "D'Souza writes like a lover spurned; despite all his efforts to reach out to Bin Laden, the man insists on joining forces with the Satanists."

It goes on. The Washington Post's Warren Bass writes that I think Jerry Falwell was "on to something" when he blamed the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, on pagans, gays and the ACLU. Slate's Timothy Noah diagnoses "Mullah envy," while the Nation's Katha Pollitt calls me a "surrender monkey" and the headline to her article brands me "Ayatollah D'Souza." And in my recent appearance on Comedy Central's "The Colbert Report," I had to fend off the insistent host. "But you agree with the Islamic radicals, don't you?" Stephen Colbert asked again and again.

Why the onslaught? Just this: In my book, published this month, I argue that the American left bears a measure of responsibility for the volcano of anger from the Muslim world that produced the 9/11 attacks. President Jimmy Carter's withdrawal of support for the shah of Iran, for example, helped Ayatollah Khomeini's regime come to power in Iran, thus giving radical Islamists control of a major state; and President Bill Clinton's failure to respond to Islamic attacks confirmed bin Laden's perceptions of U.S. weakness and emboldened him to strike on 9/11. I also argue that the policies that U.S. "progressives" promote around the world -- including abortion rights, contraception for teenagers and gay rights -- are viewed as an assault on traditional values by many cultures, and have contributed to the blowback of Islamic rage.

The reaction I'm eliciting is not entirely new to me. As a college student in the early 1980s, I edited the politically incorrect Dartmouth Review and was frequently accosted by left-wing students and faculty. They called me names back then, too. And at the time I didn't care. I often informed them that taking on our iconoclastic paper was like wrestling a pig: Not only does it get everyone dirty but the pig likes it.

One of my earlier books, "The End of Racism," explored why nonwhite immigrants to the United States (like me) tend to succeed academically and economically compared with African Americans who are born here. I received lots of abuse for playing down racism -- as a "person of color," no less -- and taking sides with the white man. Some of my fellow immigrants from India advised me to "decolonize" my mind.

But the personal attacks have reached new heights with "The Enemy at Home." So much so, in fact, that I feel compelled to explain why I wrote this book, what it does and doesn't say and why I think it prompts people to threaten me with hospitalization.

DOJ_NMG_0123276

First, and I feel silly having to say it: I don't hate America. My last book was called "What's So Great About America," and there is no question mark in the title. If I hated this country, why would I have left my family and friends in India and moved to the United States, married an American and become a U.S. citizen? I came here because the United States gives me the freedom to make the life that I could not have made in India. And just last week a Midwestern chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution offered to award me its annual "Patriot of the Year" prize -- an honor that I presume is not typically bestowed upon people who hate America.

If I am a patriot, however, I am a rational patriot. I don't believe in "my country right or wrong." Mine is not the patriotism of David Warren, who says he tasted the dust of 9/11 and places my criticism of the American left in the same category as those who say "Death to America." Rather, I uphold Edmund Burke's view: "To make us love our country, our country ought to be lovely."

Immediately following 9/11, there was a wondrous moment of national unity in which the American tribe came together. "Why do they hate us?" some wondered, but no one wanted to comprehend the enemy -- only to annihilate him. And I shared this view.

But five years later, that unity has dissolved amid a furious national debate over the war in Iraq and the war on terrorism. I thought it was time to go back and reconsider 9/11; in so doing, I concluded that the prevailing conservative and liberal theories explaining Muslim rage were wrong.

Contrary to the common liberal view, I don't believe that the 9/11 attacks were payback for U.S. foreign policy. Bin Laden isn't upset because there are U.S. troops in Mecca, as liberals are fond of saying. (There are no U.S. troops in Mecca.) He isn't upset because Washington is allied with despotic regimes in the region. Israel aside, what other regimes are there in the Middle East? It isn't all about Israel. (Why hasn't al-Qaeda launched a single attack against Israel?) The thrust of the radical Muslim critique of America is that Islam is under attack from the global forces of atheism and immorality -- and that the United States is leading that attack.

Contrary to President Bush's view, they don't hate us for our freedom, either. Rather, they hate us for how we use our freedom. When Planned Parenthood International opens clinics in non-Western countries and dispenses contraceptives to unmarried girls, many see it as an assault on prevailing religious and traditional values. When human rights groups use their interpretation of international law to pressure non-Western countries to overturn laws against abortion or to liberalize laws regarding homosexuality, the traditional sensibilities of many of the world's people are violated.

This argument has nothing to do with Falwell's suggestion that 9/11 was God's judgment on the ACLU and the feminists for their sins. I pose a simple question: Why did the terrorists do it? In a 2003 statement, bin Laden said that to him, the World Trade Center resembled the idols that the prophet Muhammad removed from Mecca. In other words, bin Laden believes that the United States represents the pagan depravity that Muslims have a duty to resist. The literature of radical Islam, such as the works of Egyptian writer Sayyid Qutb, resonates with these themes. One radical sheik even told a European television station a few years ago that although Europe is more decadent than America, the United States is the more vital target because it is U.S. culture -- not Swedish culture or French culture -- that is spreading throughout the world.

What would motivate Muslims in faraway countries to volunteer for martyrdom? The fact that Palestinians don't have a state? I don't think so. It's more likely that they would do it if they feared their values and way of life were threatened. Even as the cultural left accuses Bush of imperialism in invading Iraq, it deflects attention from its own cultural imperialism aimed at secularizing Muslim society and undermining its patriarchal and traditional values. The liberal "solution" to Islamic fundamentalism is itself a source of Islamic hostility to America.

Contrary to the accusations of Alan Wolfe and others, I have no sympathy for bin Laden or the Islamic radicals. But I do respect the concerns of traditional Muslims, the majority in the Muslim world. In fact, the United States cannot defeat terrorism without driving a wedge between radical Islam and traditional Islam, because the latter has been the main recruiting pool for the former.

All my arguments can be disputed, but they are neither extreme nor absurd. So why has "The Enemy at Home" been so intemperately excoriated? I can imagine only two reasons. The first is given by James Wolcott himself. I am not, as he says, an unqualified right-wing hack. Rather, I am a scholar at the Hoover Institution at Stanford University, so Wolcott fears that I will be taken seriously.

DOJ_NMG_0123277

The second reason can be gleaned from the common theme in the reviews: that mine is a dangerous book. But if a book says things that are obviously untrue and can be disproved, then it is not dangerous -- it is merely fiction and should be ignored. A book is dangerous only if it exposes something in the culture that some people are eager to keep hidden.

And what is that? It is that the far left seems to hate Bush nearly as much as it hates bin Laden. Bin Laden may want sharia, or Islamic law, in Baghdad, they reason, but Bush wants sharia in Boston. Indeed, leftists routinely portray Bush's war on terrorism as a battle of competing fundamentalisms, Islamic vs. Christian. It is Bush, more than bin Laden, they say, who threatens abortion rights and same-sex marriage and the entire social liberal agenda in the United States. So leftist activists such as Michael Moore and Howard Zinn and Cindy Sheehan seem willing to let the enemy win in Iraq so they can use that defeat in 2008 to rout Bush -- their enemy at home.

When I began writing my new book, this concern was largely theoretical, because the left was outside the corridors of power. Now I fear that the extreme cultural left is whispering into the ears of the Democratic Congress. Cut off the funding. Block the increase in troops. Shut down Guantanamo Bay. Lose the war on terrorism -- and blame Bush.

Pointing this out is what makes me dangerous.

Dinesh D'Souza, a fellow at the Hoover Institution, is author of "The Enemy at Home" (Doubleday).

As Aid Lags, Volunteers Shoulder Rebuilding On Gulf Coast (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

PEARLINGTON, Miss. -- The two-by-fours inside the walls of George and Margaret Ladner's new home are inscribed with biblical verses, each written by one of the Alabama schoolchildren who raised money to buy the lumber.

The framing work on the house was done by a Christian from Pennsylvania, the exterior planking was put up by people from Texarkana, Tex., and a group from Destin, Fla., worked on other details.

"This home was built by the hands of God," Margaret Ladner, 75, said from the couch of her new living room last week.

In this small rural community, as in much of the hurricane-ravaged Mississippi Gulf Coast, this kind of motley charity effort accounts for the vast bulk of what halting progress has been made in the immense task of rebuilding.

While the national debate over the recovery has focused on the billions expected in federal aid and insurance, those sources have so far provided little for places such as Pearlington, and charity efforts have constituted more than 80 percent of the home rebuilding completed so far, local and charity officials said.

Fewer than one in five families here are back in their homes, but nearly all of them have relied to some extent on charity groups. The waves of volunteers typically come down for a week or two, work during the day and at night sleep on cots and bunks set up in places such as the old school library and huts on the community's football field.

"Without the volunteers and the donations, we'd still be in the mud," said Rocky Pullman, a tugboat captain who represents the Pearlington area on the Hancock County Commission.

In a county where nearly 11,000 homes were destroyed by the storm, the largest single home rebuilder is the local Habitat for Humanity project, which is undertaking the construction of 19 homes in the area, according to an official with the governor's commission on recovery. Other groups are aiming at similar numbers.

The reason for the charity's dominant role in the rebuilding is that little, if any, of the $3.2 billion in federal aid for Mississippi homeowners has reached anyone here -- it is tied up for now at the state level. As for insurance, most residents of this rural community lacked any form of flood policy. People say there just hadn't been a flood in recent memory, and of those who did have coverage, most had too little.

"If it wasn't for the good American citizens coming here, we'd be in a world of hurt," said Chuck Benvenutti, Hancock County representative on the Governor's Commission on Recovery, Rebuilding, Renewal.

The fact that now, 17 months after Hurricane Katrina, only a small fraction of the home rebuilding has been completed and that most of it has been done by charity groups is viewed here as both wonderful and disappointing -- wonderful that so many strangers have arrived to help, but disappointing that the federal aid and insurance payouts have proved, for now, so unavailable.

DOJ_NMG_0123278

The charitable groups and residents also say they sometimes worry that as the rest of the country forgets about their plight, the flow of volunteers that they have relied upon could shrink.

Several expressed outrage that there was no mention of the hurricane recovery in President Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday.

"We still look like a bomb hit us, and then the president in his national address doesn't even mention us?" said Larry Randall, a retired boat captain and a coordinator of relief efforts at the Pearlington Recovery Center. "That really hurt."

Katrina made a nearly direct hit on this modest community, which once had about 1,700 people, about 77 percent of them white, about 20 percent black, census figures show. Most maintained houses -- a typical one sold for about $50,000 before the storm -- and the rest had mobile homes.

Katrina pushed ashore a surge of water that simply washed many homes away and filled others with as much as 10 feet of water, according to recovery officials. Eight local people died. Several rode out the storm by climbing tall trees and resting in their branches; others jumped from rooftops into boats.

Now the vast majority of the residents who have returned live in FEMA trailers, the skinny, 27-foot-long homes on wheels provided by the Federal Emergency Management Agency that house families in cramped quarters. Along the woodsy roadsides, hand-painted plywood signs offer community encouragement -- "Keep Hope Alive" and "Katrina Was Big, God Was Bigger." Stray dogs roam.

Every week, scores of volunteers descend on this community to fill the cots at the school library or the parsonage at the local Baptist Church or a camp run by Presbyterians. Last week there were more than 80 here, but at other times there have been as many as 200.

By day, they go out in work crews, framing houses, putting up drywall, installing doors. At night, some have prayer meetings.

This past week, at various sites one could run into Amish from Pennsylvania, Catholics from Massachusetts, Methodists from Illinois, Baptists from Mississippi and a Florida church group. The Amish crews, clad in their distinctive suspenders and wide-brimmed hats, have a non-Amish driver who takes them to work sites.

"Many of us were born with a hammer in our hands," said Sam Stoltzfus, 41, part of an Amish crew from the Williamsport, Pa., area. "This is fun. Yes, we're supposed to help people, but it's not like a chain around our necks."

Russell Geeraerts, 38, a general contractor from Helena, Mont., said he came down after the hurricane "for all the wrong reasons." He was going to volunteer for a couple of weeks and then come back with his own work crew to make some money.

"But then I asked myself, 'How could you?' " he said last week after lunch at a local kitchen, which like the various camps was set up to serve volunteers. "Just look at this place."

The $3.2 billion in federal aid disbursed by the Mississippi program has largely been untouchable by people in Pearlington.

The program's first phase doles out money to people who were flooded but did not live in the federally designated flood zone.

Most people in Pearlington live in the flood zone and must wait for the second phase to begin. Under its guidelines, families of low and moderate income will be eligible for as much as $100,000, less any insurance and FEMA rebuilding payments they have received.

In the meantime, not knowing whether they will receive aid, many families here say they have accepted, sometimes reluctantly, the help of the charity groups in the rebuilding.

Many put what they have into building a foundation, getting the home started. Then the charitable groups, which provide materials and work crews, do the rest.

Even so, many feel uncomfortable about receiving the help.

Frank Bello and his wife, for example, are raising five children. He worked in maintenance at the local elementary school. She is a nurse.

Last week, an Amish crew was putting together the frame on a new house for the family.

Just before Christmas, when Bello was hauling three loads of dirt to his home site, it began to rain. He told the volunteer work crew that he was sorry that they had to work in such conditions.

DOJ_NMG_0123279

"They said, 'Don't worry, we're glad to do it,' and that made me feel better," Bello said. "But I still feel bad about it. Personally, myself, I like to be doing that sort of thing for other people, not having them do it for me. But now that's the way it is."

WAR NEWS:

Fonda Reprises A Famous Role At Peace Rally (WP)

By Linton Weeks

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

For her next act, Jane Fonda has entered the war against the Iraq war. At the tail-end of yesterday's on-the-Mall rally, organized by United for Peace and Justice, Fonda stood onstage with the Capitol behind her and addressed the sun-drenched thousands. "I haven't spoken at an antiwar rally in 34 years," she said. But, "Silence is no longer an option."

The first time Fonda, 69, spoke out for peace, the country was soul-deep in the Vietnam War. In the ensuing decades, as the nation has gone through a slew of changes, so has Fonda.

As a young woman, the daughter of actor Henry Fonda was an actress, a feminist and anti-Vietnam War activist. She morphed into a workout maven, post-feminist arm candy for billionaire media magnate Ted Turner, a vocal Christian and an autobiographer. With 2005's "Monster-in-Law," she defibrillated her movie career.

Yesterday, with her daughter, Vanessa Vadim, and two grandchildren nearby, she was again front and center as actress, feminist and opponent of war.

Her life has come full circle.

She thanked the tens of thousands of protesters for standing up to a "mean-spirited, vengeful administration" and she said she was glad to discover that the soul of America "is alive and well." One huge difference between protests then and now, she told the crowd, is military families and active service people in the present-day movement.

Children in tie-dyed shirts, grandmothers in flowered hats, kids with frizzy hair and muddy jeans danced and hoisted signs and chanted against the war and for impeachment. Despite her showbiz elegance -- blond hair, sunglasses, camel's hair coat and dark over-the-knee boots -- Fonda seemed to fit right in.

She was first known for campy movies such as "Barbarella," which was directed by first husband Roger Vadim, then for higher-shelf films such as "Klute" and "Coming Home," for which she won Best Actress Oscars. She became involved in the political world in the late 1960s, an involvement that continued with her second husband, activist Tom Hayden.

As a vocal opponent of the Vietnam War, she cut a controversial figure. She spoke at protest rallies and, in 1972, posed for a photograph with a North Vietnamese antiaircraft gun. The act was viewed by many as unpatriotic, even treasonous, and some called her "Hanoi Jane."

She has since apologized.

"Those people who would try to undermine her credibility will fail. We welcome her back to the peace community," said Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.), chairman of the Out of Iraq congressional caucus.

"She's a high-profile, outspoken American," said actor Sean Penn, while smoking a cigarette before the rally. What she means to the antiwar movement "is the same thing any of the rest of us mean to it. She's one more voting American with a conscience who is against this war."

Getting her to speak at the massive rally was a breeze, organizers said. Leslie Cagan, who works for United for Peace and Justice and is a longtime friend, e-mailed an invitation. Fonda said yes. Fonda has spoken out against the Iraq war at smaller events such as a Canadian lecture series, book signings and the recent National Conference for Media Reform in Memphis. United for Peace spokesman Hany Khalil said yesterday's rally was "one of the first times she has appeared on the national stage."

Kathy Engel, another United for Peace and Justice spokeswoman, said Fonda is important to the cause because through the years, she has been on the wave-crest of women's rights "and a myriad of issues concerning the health of our country. She's a long-distance runner."

DOJ_NMG_0123280

Before the march, Fonda spoke briefly to a few hundred people at the Navy Memorial. The event was sponsored by Code Pink, an antiwar group started by women. On the other side of Pennsylvania Avenue, three dozen protesters organized by the conservative Web site Free Republic held up signs calling protesters traitors and terrorist sympathizers.

"Jaaaaannnneeeee Fonda has blood on her hands!" chanted one man with a megaphone.

"Thank you so much for being here," Fonda told the Code Pink folks over the noise. "We're going to get it done." Afterward, she hugged civil-rights activist Dick Gregory.

Asked whether she believed her presence might cause more harm than good to this antiwar movement, she snapped, "No." Then laughed. And was spirited away by handlers to the rally on the Mall.

She was one of the last people to speak at the midday rally. As she waited for her cue, she chatted with Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio). She shook hands with the Raging Grannies, a group of senior citizens who sang onstage, while the Rev. Jesse Jackson, Sean Penn and actor-couple Susan Sarandon and Tim Robbins milled about nearby.

Vietnam War veteran Orin "Spike" Tyson, 56, motored through the crowd on a Golden Companion Scooter with a U.S. flag flapping on the back. Tyson, a Lansing, Mich., resident who was wounded by shrapnel and a land mine, said he hasn't always agreed with Fonda, "but she has the right to say whatever she wants to say."

It's that freedom, he said, that he fought for.

Thousands Protest Bush Policy (WP)

By Michael Ruane, Fredrick Kunkle

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

A raucous and colorful multitude of protesters, led by some of the aging activists of the past, staged a series of rallies and a march on the Capitol yesterday to demand that the United States end its war in Iraq.

Under a blue sky with a pale midday moon, tens of thousands of people angry about the war and other policies of the Bush administration danced, sang, shouted and chanted their opposition.

They came from across the country and across the activist spectrum, with a wide array of grievances. Many seemed to be under 30, but there were others who said they had been at the famed war protests of the 1960s and '70s.

They came to Washington at what they said was a moment of opportunity to push the new Congress to take action against the war, even as the Bush administration is accelerating plans to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq. This week, the Senate will begin debating a resolution of disapproval of the president's Iraq policy, setting up a dramatic confrontation with the White House.

Some protesters plan to stay and lobby their representatives in Congress. Other antiwar activists intend to barnstorm states this week urging senators to oppose the troop escalation.

Yesterday's crowd was large and vociferous, but its size was unclear because there was no official crowd estimate. It was filled with longtime opponents of the conflict and of the administration.

"Its primary value is that it keeps up the pressure," said former Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota. "There is a sense that by summer, a march like this will be two or three times as large."

The demonstrators were garbed in many colors and T-shirts and buttons of many sentiments. "Think," read one shirt. "It's not illegal yet." A button read: "Kill your lawn." Read another: "Trees Hate You."

But the overriding complaint was the U.S. prosecution of the war in Iraq.

"Peace is controversial," civil rights and community activist Jesse Jackson, 65, said in a rousing address to the crowd gathered at the east end of the Mall. "But so is war. The fruit of peace is so much sweeter."

Some came for relatives in the service. A New York woman came on behalf of her younger brother, who she said was about to be deployed to Iraq. She had a framed picture of him in a knapsack. An Akron, Ohio, woman came with her infant son, saying his father, in the Navy in Kuwait, had yet to see him.

Oriana Futrell, 21, of Spokane, Wash., came with a sign that said: "Bring my husband home now." She said her husband, Dan, an Army lieutenant, was in Baghdad. They were married in April. She said she was weary of attending military funerals.

DOJ_NMG_0123281

Among the celebrities who appeared was Jane Fonda, the 69-year-old actress and activist who was criticized for sympathizing with the North Vietnamese during the Vietnam War. She told the crowd that this was the first time she had spoken at an antiwar rally in 34 years.

"I've been afraid that because of the lies that have been and continue to be spread about me and that war, that they would be used to hurt this new antiwar movement," she told the crowd. "But silence is no longer an option."

Fonda said she was attending with her daughter and two grandchildren. "I'm very proud that they're here, but I'm so sad that we still have to do this, that we did not learn the lessons from the Vietnam War," she said.

She concluded by saying, "God bless." And someone in the crowd yelled: "All right, Janey!"

But Fonda's presence drew counter protesters. Members of the Free Republic group picketed an antiwar rally at the Navy Memorial where Fonda spoke earlier in the day. "Hanoi Jane," one of the conservative group's signs read. "Wrong then, wrong now."

The day's events unfolded peacefully. And after a cold morning with temperatures in the mid-20s, the day quickly warmed, and protesters were unzipping jackets as the mercury topped 50 degrees.

The crowd, while exuberant, seemed significantly smaller than the half-million people organizers said were present and may not have matched similar protests in September 2005 and January 2003. The throng filled much of the Mall between Third and Fourth streets NW but thinned toward Seventh Street.

It was big enough, though, that the march that followed the rallies stretched the length of the route from the Mall, up Constitution Avenue to the east front of the Capitol and back to the Mall.

The day's events were organized chiefly by United for Peace and Justice, which describes itself as a coalition of 1,400 local and national organizations. Among them are the National Organization for Women, United Church of Christ, the American Friends Service Committee, True Majority, Military Families Speak Out, Iraq Veterans Against the War, Farms Not Arms, CODEPINK, MoveOn.org and September 11th Families for Peaceful Tomorrows.

The day began with a 10 a.m. rally at the Navy Memorial sponsored by the peace group CODEPINK. There, several thousand activists heard speeches by actor Sean Penn, presidential candidate and U.S. Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich (D-Ohio), and Reps. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.) and Lynne Woolsey (D-Calif.), and a brief greeting from Fonda.

But the most moving words were Futrell's.

"My husband deployed last June to Iraq," she said. "He is an Army infantry officer currently patrolling the streets of Baghdad. And I just have to say I'm sick of attending the funerals of my friends. I have seen the weeping majors. I have seen the weeping colonels. I am sick of the death."

"I don't know what else to say, other than: 'Bring them home,' " she said. "It is time. We need to bring them home where they can be safe."

The main rally began at 11 a.m. on the Mall and featured more speeches and a crowd that seemed to grow as the weather warmed.

In addition to Fonda and Jackson, actors Susan Sarandon and Tim Robbins addressed the protesters.

Robbins mocked President Bush, urging Congress to impeach him.

"Let's get him out of office before he's ruling from a bunker," Robbins said.

"Impeach Bush!" the crowd began to chant, interspersed with a few shouts of "And Cheney!"

"Richard Nixon talked to the walls," Robbins continued. "But George Bush is talking to God. But it is not a God I recognize. This God seems to be giving Bush a pass" on some commandments.

Colin Fallon, who works at the Government Accountability Office, and his wife, Melinda, a history professor at George Mason University, came to the demonstration from Fairfax with their three children.

Melinda Fallon guided her son through the crowd, talking about Americans. "They can say when they don't agree with what's going on," she told him.

"We're looking at more or less a 30-years-war here," Colin Fallon said. "All the indications are bad. I think about these kids. If they were asked to fight, would I think they would be able to help the situation as soldiers? I don't think so. I think it has become something of a war of attrition."

DOJ_NMG_0123282

Laura Sinderbrand, 79, and her husband, Alvin, 84, of New York, said they attended dozens of Washington protests against the Vietnam War during the 1960s and early '70s.

"The biggest difference back then, of course, was the draft," said Alvin Sinderbrand, a retired patent lawyer. "That made everything much more emotional. There was a sense that everybody was vulnerable."

The Sinderbrands were opposed to involvement in Iraq from the beginning, they said, and attended a 2003 protest here. Yesterday, the couple rode down on the train and planned to return home in the evening.

"We're doing it with the hope that it's going to be the last time we need to protest this," said Laura Sinderbrand, a retired museum director.

Kim Brenegar, 46, of the Capitol Hill neighborhood attended with her son Julian, 12.

"Of late, I've become very numb to the front-page reporting of deaths," she said. "And that's kind of problem for me. We've all become so used to it, it's the norm. I hope today's event will wake up a lot of people and demonstrate that this doesn't have to go on, we can stop this."

Julian added: "I don't like the war. I just think it's so stupid that we're there and it's pointless."

As the events went on, Johnny "Satchmo" T., of Northeast Washington, sat on a plastic bucket at Seventh Street and Constitution Avenue -- his regular spot -- and played a haunting version of "When Johnny Comes Marching Home" on his bent trumpet.

"They're lucky that they can do stuff" like that, he said of the protesters. "Some countries don't even let people do stuff like that."

Iraq War Foes Mass On Mall (WT)

By Tarron Lively

The Washington Times, January 28, 2007

Tens of thousands of anti-war protesters led by several Hollywood celebrities converged on Capitol Hill yesterday and railed against President Bush and his plan to send thousands of additional troops to Iraq.

The demonstrators descended on the Mall for one of the largest demonstrations since the Iraq war began in March 2003.

Organizers said they exceeded their goal of 100,000 attendees. Police do not give official crowd estimates, but some officers said privately that the crowd appeared smaller.

Dozens of politicians, civil rights leaders, military family members and celebrities spoke in opposition to the Bush administration's policy in Iraq and the president's recent decision to deploy 21,500 additional troops to Iraq.

Among the speakers was Jane Fonda, the actress and Vietnam-era protester, who participated in her first anti-war demonstration in 34 years.

"Thank you so much for the courage to stand up against this mean-spirited, vengeful administration," Miss Fonda said. "Your ongoing commitment to ending this war allows people in other parts of the world to remain hopeful that America has the stuff to become again a country that they can love and respect."

In addition to Miss Fonda, Hollywood liberals at the forefront of the event included Sean Penn, Tim Robbins, Susan Sarandon and Rhea Perlman.

"I'm so sad that we still have to do this, that we did not learn the lessons from the Vietnam War," said Miss Fonda, whose public protest of the Vietnam War included a trip to Hanoi in 1972, during which she was photographed seated on an anti-aircraft battery.

Miss Fonda, 69, said she had been silent on the subject of the Iraq war because she thought she would be a distraction to the anti-war cause.

"Silence is no longer an option," she said to cheers.

Her presence at an earlier demonstration at Seventh Street and Pennsylvania Avenue NW prompted jeers from a few dozen counterdemonstrators, some of whom held signs that expressed support for the troops in Iraq and disparaged Miss Fonda personally. Some objected to her presence at the site of the Navy Memorial. The sides exchanged hostile and obscenity-laced taunts, but police kept the groups separate.

DOJ_NMG_0123283

Among the participants were soldiers being treated at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

Army Cpl. Joshua Sparling, who lost a leg to a roadside bomb in November 2005 in Ramadi, Iraq, said the anti-war protesters, especially those who are veterans or who are currently on active duty, "need to remember the sacrifice we have made and what our fallen comrades would say if they were alive."

Cpl. Sparling, 25, is based at Fort Bragg, N.C.

Meanwhile at the White House, spokesman Gordon Johndroe gave Mr. Bush's reaction to the protest: "The president ... understands that Americans want to see a conclusion to the war in Iraq and the new strategy is designed to do just that."

Yesterday's protest preceded an upcoming vote in the Senate on a nonbinding resolution condemning the new Iraq strategy.

The main rally, sponsored by the umbrella group United for Peace and Justice, began at 11 a.m. with a rally on the Mall. Protesters chanted and banged drums as they peacefully marched halfway around the Capitol and back.

Police said they recorded no arrests during the demonstration.

"Everything went fine. We had a large turnout, but no problems," said U.S. Park Police spokesman Lt. Scott Fear.

About 300 protesters attempted to rush the front steps of the Capitol, but they were rebuffed by police without injury or arrest.

U.S. Capitol Police spokeswoman Sgt. Kimberly Schneider also said the event was incident-free.

"I think everything went pretty peacefully," she said.

Rep. John Conyers Jr., Michigan Democrat, was one of several legislators who spoke at the rally.

"George Bush has a habit of firing military leaders who tell him the Iraq war is failing," Mr. Conyers said. "He can't fire you. He can't fire us. But we can fire him."

Rep. Lynn Woolsey, California Democrat, said Mr. Bush's request for additional troops is a waste of taxpayers' money for his own personal cause.

"We all know it's not about winning or losing," she said. "It's about doing the right thing. Everybody knows this except the president .... They say the definition of insanity is doing the same thing and expecting different results."

Dennis Rosser, 50, a speechwriter from the District, called Mr. Bush a "despot who won't follow the desires of the American people."

"He's doomed for failure," Mr. Rosser said. "[White House spokesman] Tony Snow said the other day, 'The president doesn't always listen to the people.' Now as president, would you have said that?"

Mike Sherkin, 29, software engineer from the District, said that yesterday was his birthday, but he decided to come out in support of the rally.

"This war has been going on too long. It needs to end," Mr. Sherkin said. "Innocent people are dying."

Ilonka Wloch, 36, an editor from Ithaca, N.Y., said it was "very profound" to see so many protesters.

"I wholeheartedly believe in change, and I believe that at heart we as humans all want the same things -- safety, love and cooperation," she said.

Crowds On Both Coasts Protest Iraq War (AP)

By Calvin Woodward And Larry Margasak,

AP, January 28, 2007

Convinced this is their moment, tens of thousands marched Saturday in an anti-war demonstration linking military families, ordinary people and an icon of the Vietnam protest movement in a spirited call to get out of Iraq.

Celebrities, a half-dozen lawmakers and protesters from distant states rallied in the capital under a sunny sky, seizing an opportunity to press their cause with a Congress restive on the war and a country that has turned against the conflict.

Marching with them was Jane Fonda, in what she said was her first anti-war demonstration in 34 years.

"Silence is no longer an option," Fonda said to cheers from the stage on the National Mall. The actress once derided as "Hanoi Jane" by conservatives for her stance on Vietnam said she had held back from activism so as not to be a distraction for the Iraq anti-war movement, but needed to speak out now.

DOJ_NMG_0123284

The rally on the Mall unfolded peacefully, although about 300 protesters tried to rush the Capitol, running up the grassy lawn to the front of the building. Police on motorcycles tried to stop them, scuffling with some and barricading entrances.

Protesters chanted "Our Congress" as their numbers grew and police faced off against them. Demonstrators later joined the masses marching from the Mall, around Capitol Hill and back.

About 50 demonstrators blocked a street near the Capitol for about 30 minutes, but they were dispersed without arrests.

United for Peace and Justice, a coalition group sponsoring the protest, had hoped 100,000 would come. They claimed even more afterward, but police, who no longer give official estimates, said privately the crowd was smaller than 100,000.

In California, smaller rallies were held in San Francisco, Los Angeles and Sacramento.

At the rally, 12-year-old Moriah Arnold stood on her toes to reach the microphone and tell the crowd: "Now we know our leaders either lied to us or hid the truth. Because of our actions, the rest of the world sees us as a bully and a liar."

The sixth-grader from Harvard, Mass., organized a petition drive at her school against the war that has killed more than 3,000 U.S. service-members, including seven whose deaths were reported Saturday.

More Hollywood celebrities showed up at the demonstration than buttoned-down Washington typically sees in a month.

Actor Sean Penn said lawmakers will pay a price in the 2008 elections if they do not take firmer action than to pass a nonbinding resolution against the war, the course Congress is now taking.

"If they don't stand up and make a resolution as binding as the death toll, we're not going to be behind those politicians," he said. Actors Susan Sarandon and Tim Robbins also spoke.

Fonda was a lightning rod in the Vietnam era for her outspoken opposition to that war and her advocacy from Hanoi at the height of that conflict. Sensitive to the old wounds, she made it a point to thank the active-duty service-members, veterans and Gold Star mothers who attended the rally.

She drew parallels to the Vietnam War, citing "blindness to realities on the ground, hubris ... thoughtlessness in our approach to rebuilding a country we've destroyed." But she noted that this time, veterans, soldiers and their families increasingly and vocally are against the Iraq war.

The House Judiciary Committee chairman, Rep. John Conyers, threatened to use congressional spending power to try to stop the war. "George Bush has a habit of firing military leaders who tell him the Iraq war is failing," he said, looking out at the masses. "He can't fire you." Referring to Congress, the Michigan Democrat added: "He can't fire us.

"The founders of our country gave our Congress the power of the purse because they envisioned a scenario exactly like we find ourselves in today. Not only is it in our power, it is our obligation to stop Bush."

White House spokesman Trey Bohn responded that Conyers "needs to learn the difference between fact and fable, between a soundbite and a slur." He said Conyers' "assertion that the president fires generals with whom he disagrees is flat wrong."

On the stage rested a coffin covered with a U.S. flag and a pair of military boots, symbolizing American war dead. On the Mall stood a large bin filled with tags bearing the names of Iraqis who have died.

A small contingent of active-duty service members attended the rally, wearing civilian clothes because military rules forbid them from protesting in uniform.

Air Force Staff Sgt. Tassi McKee, 26, an intelligence specialist at Fort Meade, Md., said she joined the Air Force because of patriotism, travel and money for college. "After we went to Iraq, I began to see through the lies," she said.

In the crowd, signs recalled the November elections that defeated the Republican congressional majority in part because of President Bush's Iraq policy. "I voted for peace," one said.

"I've just gotten tired of seeing widows, tired of seeing dead Marines," said Vincent DiMezza, 32, wearing a dress Marine uniform from his years as a sergeant. A Marine aircraft mechanic from 1997 to 2002, he did not serve in Iraq or Afghanistan.

About 40 people staged a counter-protest, including Army Cpl. Joshua Sparling, 25, who lost his leg to a bomb in Iraq.

He said the anti-war protesters, especially those who are veterans or who are on active duty, "need to remember the sacrifice we have made and what our fallen comrades would say if they were alive."

Bush reaffirmed his commitment to his planned troop increase in a phone conversation Saturday with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. The president was in Washington for the weekend. He is often is out of town during big protest days.

DOJ_NMG_0123285

"He understands that Americans want to see a conclusion to the war in Iraq and the new strategy is designed to do just that," said Gordon Johndroe, a spokesman for the National Security Council.

Protest organizers said the crowd included people who came on 300 buses from 40 states.

___

Associated Press writers Stephen Manning and Kasie Hunt contributed to this report.

___

On the Net:

United for Peace and Justice: http://www.unitedforpeace.org/

Protest Focuses On Iraq Troop Increase (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 27 — Tens of thousands of protesters converged on the National Mall on Saturday to oppose President Bush's plan for a troop increase in Iraq in what organizers hoped would be one of the largest shows of antiwar sentiment in the nation's capital since the war began.

The event drew demonstrators from across the country, and many said that in addition to taking their discontent to the streets they planned to press members of Congress to oppose the war.

"When we voted it was a directive to bring our troops home now," said the Rev. Graylan S. Hagler of Plymouth Congregational United Church of Christ in Washington, referring to the November elections when Democrats won control of Congress.

Demonstrators listened to speeches from a roster of politicians and entertainment figures including the Rev. Jesse Jackson; Representative Dennis J. Kucinich, Democrat of Ohio and a candidate for the presidency in 2008; and Representative Maxine Waters, Democrat of California. The actors Jane Fonda, Susan Sarandon and Tim Robbins also addressed the crowd.

"We need to be talking not just about defunding the war but also about funding the vets," Ms. Sarandon said, adding that more than 50,000 had sought treatment through the Department of Veterans Affairs while benefits for them continue to be cut.

With Mr. Bush facing low approval ratings and Congress continuing to debate the terms of a nonbinding resolution opposing the troop increase, elderly people in wheelchairs, housewives pushing strollers, seasoned dissenters in tie-dye and veterans in uniform turned out to protest.

"I grew up during the Vietnam War, but I never protested it and never had my lottery number called to go fight," said David Quinly, a 54-year-old carpenter from Prairie Village, Kan., who arrived here Friday night with about 50 others after a 23-hour bus ride.

"In my view, this one is a war of choice and a war for profit against a culture and people we don't understand," Mr. Quinly said. "I knew I had to speak up this time."

Along the north side of the Mall, teenagers in T-shirts featuring sinister depictions of Mr. Bush chanted, "End the lunacy; end it now." A man wearing prison stripes carried a sign with the likeness of Vice President Dick Cheney. A man on 30-inch stilts, dressed as Abraham Lincoln, carried a sign quoting him: "But you can't fool all of the people all of the time." A tall, clear plastic column stood overflowing with thousands of shoes symbolizing the civilians killed in the war.

"I've got a son who just got out of the military and another still in," said Jackie Smith, 65, from Sunapee, N.H., whose sign read "Bush Bin Lyin." "And I'm here because this is all I can do to try to help them."

Tassi McKee, from Bastrop, La., who said she was a staff sergeant in the Air Force, was among a small contingent of about 20 active-duty service members who turned out. "I believe this has become a civil war, and we are being hurt and making matters worse by staying in the middle of it," Sergeant McKee said.

She said that it was not illegal for active-duty members to attend protests but that it was strongly discouraged.

Veterans were more numerous among the crowd.

Dressed in the olive green, military-issued flight jacket that he said he wore during the invasion of Iraq while serving as a Marine sergeant, Jack Teller, 26, said he joined a caravan from Greenville, N.C., because he felt that it was his duty.

DOJ_NMG_0123286

"I don't like wearing the jacket because it reminds me that I participated in an immoral and illegal war," said Mr. Teller, who had "Iraq Veterans Against the War" stenciled on the back of his jacket. "But it's important to make a political statement."

Fernando Braga, a 24-year-old Bronx native who is a member of the Army National Guard, said that he was skeptical of the war before it started. Mr. Braga said his views hardened into opposition while he served in Iraq from March 2004 through January 2005.

"My own commander told us when we arrived that if we thought we were there for any reason other than oil then we had another think coming," he said. "I realized even commanding officers were against it but following orders."

Michael McPhearson, executive director of Veterans for Peace, said more than 100 veterans from the Iraq war participated in the march, and several hundred veterans from previous wars attended as well.

Robert Watada, 67, of Honolulu, a retired executive with the State of Hawaii who said his son, First Lt. Ehren K. Watada, was to be court-martialed next month for refusing to deploy to Iraq, said: "So many thousands of our own have died and hundreds of thousands of Iraqis and for what? And still we are having to push Congress to block the president."

At least 3,065 American military personnel have been killed and at least 22,834 have been wounded since the start of the war in March 2003, according to Iraq Coalition Casualty Count, a Web site that tracks Department of Defense numbers. The United Nations has estimated that at least 35,000 Iraqis have been killed each year since the war started.

President Bush, who often spends weekends at Camp David, was in Washington on Saturday but had no public events scheduled. He spent part of the morning on his weekly bicycle ride at a Secret Service training facility in Beltsville, Md.

The White House issued a statement in response to the demonstration. "The president believes that the right to free speech is one of the greatest freedoms in our country," said Gordon D. Johndroe, a White House spokesman. "He understands that Americans want to see a conclusion to the war in Iraq, and the new strategy is designed to do just that," referring to Mr. Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq.

The protest was largely organized by the group United for Peace and Justice, a coalition of 1,400 local and national organizations.

"This war has been going on longer than she has been alive, and Cheney says it will be a 50-year war," said Annie Yanowitz, a housewife from Amherst, Mass., pointing to her 2-year-old daughter, Amira.

"I find that totally inappropriate that our children may grow up with this war continuing," Ms. Yanowitz said.

Police officials declined to provide crowd estimates, but Hany Khalil, a spokesman for United for Peace and Justice, said the protesters numbered about 400,000. Smaller antiwar protests took place on Saturday in other cities, including San Francisco, Los Angeles and Sacramento.

In Washington, counterprotesters also converged on the mall in smaller numbers, but the antiwar demonstration was largely peaceful.

There were a few tense moments, however, including an encounter involving Joshua Sparling, 25, who was on crutches and who said he was a corporal with the 82nd Airborne Division and lost his right leg below the knee in Ramadi, Iraq. Mr. Sparling spoke at a smaller rally held earlier in the day at the United States Navy Memorial, and voiced his support for the administration's policies in Iraq.

Later, as antiwar protesters passed where he and his group were standing, words were exchanged and one of the antiwar protestors spit at the ground near Mr. Sparling; he spit back.

Capitol police made the antiwar protestors walk farther away from the counterprotesters.

"These are not Americans as far as I'm concerned," Mr. Sparling said.

Another counterprotester, Larry Stark, 71, a retired Navy officer who fought in Vietnam for five years and was a prisoner of war, said, "We never lost a battle in Vietnam but we lost the war, and the same is going to be true in Iraq if these protesters have their way."

The protesters on Saturday were undermining troop morale, Mr. Stark said, and increasing the likelihood of a premature withdrawal.

"It's like we never learn from the past," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0123287

Celebrities Pack D.C. War Protest (AP)

AP, January 28, 2007

More Hollywood celebrities sparkled the dais than button-down Washington typically sees in a month.

Oscar-award winner Sean Penn had a warning for politicians on the ballot in 2008. "If they don't stand up and make a resolution as binding as the death toll, we are not going to be behind those politicians," he said.

With a reporter's credential, Penn visited Iraq in November 2003 and recently traveled to Iran.

The husband and wife anti-war duo, Susan Sarandon and Tim Robbins, also spoke.

"This past November the American people sent a resounding signal to Washington, D.C., and the world. We want change. We want this war to end. And how did Bush respond? Twenty-one thousand, five hundred more will risk their lives for his misguided war. Is impeachment still off the table? Let's get him out of office," Robbins said.

The crowd responded, "Impeach Bush, impeach Bush, impeach Bush!"

Jane Fonda, who recently wrapped a film with Lindsay Lohan, brought along her daughter and grandchildren. Fonda said she used to take her daughter to anti-war protests in the 1970s. "I'm proud they're here but I'm so sad we still have to do this," she said. Fonda was married to anti-war activist Tom Hayden during the Vietnam war.

___

There were a few tense moments outside the Capitol when several hundred protesters tried to rush the building. Police scuffled and wrestled with some and eventually set up barricades and a police line to keep them at bay. The protesters shouted "Our Congress!" and some carried riot shields with the slogan "U.S. out of everywhere."

Many of the protesters belonged to Students for a Democratic Society, an activist group founded in the 1960s by Tom Hayden (once married to Fonda) and others.

John Cronan, 23, from the Pace University chapter, said they were trying to send a different message than the main march. "These peace rallies really don't get anything done. With Congress historically, you have to force them to do something," he said.

The crowd eventually drifted away and many joined the larger march.

_By Steve Manning

___

Dressed in civilian clothing, a few active-duty members of the military quietly lodged their opposition against a war that has cost the lives of more than 3,000 of their comrades.

Jeffrey Fitting, 24, a senior airman from Camp Hill, Pa., is a chaplain's assistant at Dover Air Force Base in Delaware, where he helps families waiting to receive the bodies of their loved ones. The bodies of dead soldiers are prepared at a mortuary on the base before they are returned to the families.

"When we have military members, their families and civilians for the same cause, we're united" against the war in Iraq, Fitting said. He asked his commander if he could attend the rally and was told he had the right to do so.

Marc Train, 19, an Army private stationed at Fort Stewart, Ga., asked not to be sent with his 3rd Infantry Division unit to Iraq. He said the Army has initiated proceedings to have him discharged.

Train said his specialty is intelligence analysis and believes that was a factor in the Army's decision to seek his discharge.

"When I joined, I was indifferent. I talked to people in my unit who have been there three or four times. They didn't feel like they were accomplishing anything," Train said.

Air Force Staff Sgt. Tassi McKee, stationed at Fort Meade and a specialist in intelligence, said, "I don't believe the war is being managed correctly."

McKee, 26, originally from Bastrop, La., said she joined the Air Force because of patriotism, travel and to save money for college.

_By Larry Margasak

___

About 40 counterprotesters lofted "Support our troops" signs in front of the Navy Memorial, a few blocks from the main demonstration. Among the participants were soldiers being treated at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

DOJ_NMG_0123288

Army Cpl. Joshua Sparling, who lost his leg to a roadside bomb in November 2005 in Ramadi, said the anti-war protesters, especially those who are veterans or who are currently on active duty, "need to remember the sacrifice we have made and what our fallen comrades would say if they are alive." Sparling, 25, is based at Fort Bragg, N.C.

The counterdemonstration vilified Fonda's appearance at the rally. They set up a fake Fonda doll hanging from a noose and taped a sign to it that read "Jane Fonda American Traitor."

_By Kasie Hunt.

___

Mothers of soldiers made a poignant presence at the march. One woman held a sign with a picture of her son as a young boy, reading "Cpl. Nicholas Ziolkowski, born April 21, 1982, Baltimore, KIA Nov. 14, 2004, Falluja." Ziolkowski, a Marine, was killed by a sniper's bullet.

Peggy Gray, 51, of West Hartford, Conn., said her son Shane recently returned from Iraq after an 18-month tour. Gray, a grandmother and state employee for the Connecticut comptroller's office, said she has protested wars since Vietnam. The difference between then and now is that people support the troops even if they oppose the war, she said.

"In Vietnam, we blamed the troops. Now, we see a lot of support for the troops from those opposed to the Iraq war," she said. She held one end of a banner that said, "Military Families Speak Out," a Boston-based organization of people opposed to the war.

_By Larry Margasak.

___

WASHINGTON (AP) — He stood out in the crowd because of his Air Force flight jacket.

Holding a sign that said, "Mad cowboy disease," Theodore Seman said he was a former Air Force captain and retired FBI agent.

"I was 100 percent behind our government up until we invaded Iraq. I never thought as a former military officer in command of nuclear weapons that I would see the United States of American make a pre-emptive strike on another nation."

Seman said he was not only protesting the war, but also President Bush's warrantless surveillance policies. Seman said he swore out many warrants as an FBI agent and finds it hard to believe the government would conduct surveillance without first going to a court.

"If voices are not heard, nothing will be done," he said.

Seman said he was a radar control officer in an interceptor that had nuclear weapons and was an FBI agent in Tampa, Fla.

_By Larry Margasak.

Mass US Protest Against Iraq War (BBC)

BBC.com, January 27, 2007

Tens of thousands of protesters have demonstrated in Washington to demand the withdrawal of US troops from Iraq.

The rally comes days before Congress is to discuss President George W Bush's new strategy for Iraq - including the despatch of 21,500 additional troops.

The protesters, chanting "Bring the troops home", were joined by Vietnam War-era protester, actress Jane Fonda.

Violence continued in Iraq on Saturday, with at least 15 killed in a suicide bomb attack in a Baghdad market.

The BBC's James Coomarasamy in Washington says this anti-war rally at the foot of the US Capitol was a marked shift away from the White House and on to Congress.

The protesters want Congress, now run by the Democrats, to block funding for the president's new strategy, our correspondent says.

Resolution

Jane Fonda, the Hollywood actress who angered many Americans by visiting Hanoi in 1972 during the Vietnam War, told the crowd: "I haven't spoken at an anti-war rally for 34 years. But silence is no longer an option."

She added: "I'm so sad that we still have to do this, that we did not learn the lessons from the Vietnam War."

DOJ_NMG_0123289

Fonda was joined by fellow actors Sean Penn and Tim Robbins.

Robbins said: "What we need is courage, courage and conviction and we need people to represent the voice of the American people, a very clear voice last November, a voice that said: 'We're done with this war'."

The Democrats took control of both Houses in November's mid-term election, sparking Mr Bush's decision to form a new strategy for Iraq.

But our correspondent says Congress has so far balked at using the power of funding and only a handful of staunch anti-war Congressmen were present at the rally.

A man brings a child to hospital after Saturday's Baghdad bombing

Although nearly all Democrats and a growing numbers of Republicans oppose the president's plans, he says, senators have not been able to agree yet on a single non-binding resolution expressing their concerns.

At the rally a coffin covered with a US flag and a pair of military boots was put on display.

Organisers also filled a large bin with tags bearing the names of Iraqis who have died.

More than a dozen veterans, anti-war activists, religious heads and actors addressed the crowd.

A small counter-protest held up a Fonda doll with the sign "Jane Fonda American Traitor".

Mr Bush reportedly reaffirmed his commitment to the troop increase in a phone call with Iraqi PM Nouri Maliki on Saturday.

White House national security adviser spokesman Gordon Johndroe said: "Americans want to see a conclusion to the war in Iraq and the new strategy is designed to do just that."

Student Protesters, Fighting Image Of Apathy, Call For A Cohesive Movement (WP)

By Megan Greenwell

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

As the bulk of war protesters chanted "this is what democracy looks like" on the Mall yesterday, a few hundred gathered separately on the south edge of the Mall.

Members of the College Democrats of America mingled with the more radical Students for a Democratic Society and the Communist Youth Movement. Many held signs proclaiming themselves "another future leader against the war." Some danced. Some clapped. Others passed around a joint. Disparate in their affiliations, they were united in their chants: "College, not combat."

Since the war began nearly four years ago, many Vietnam-era antiwar activists have publicly lamented what they see as apathy among today's college students. They wonder whether the absence of a draft and a culture of pop music and reality television have distracted young people from civic responsibilities.

But among the hundreds of students on the Mall yesterday, dozens of whom drove all night to get to Washington for the protest, the prevailing sentiment was that their generation had been unfairly maligned and that the antiwar movement is growing stronger every day.

"I do think we're misrepresented as being lazy, ignorant and unaware of current events," said Sarah Searle, 19, a sophomore at the University of Virginia. "There's no huge movement going on like during Vietnam, but that doesn't mean we're apathetic."

The students at yesterday's protest noted that their efforts have not had the iconic touchstones of the late 1960s and early 1970s, when shootings at Kent State and the student takeover at Columbia University stirred U.S. consciousness. Still, there are signs, they said, of a building resistance to the war in Iraq and other U.S. foreign policy initiatives.

"Whenever you have inequality dragging on the way it is now, that's always resulted at some point in a rise in mass resistance," said David Judd, a Columbia junior who celebrated his 21st birthday yesterday by traveling with 150 classmates to Washington for the protest. "Obviously, that's not going to happen tomorrow, but there's good reason to believe that at some point it will, and the work that we do beforehand in preparing for that and getting people involved in activism is important."

Many students mentioned the case of Ehren Watada -- the U.S. Army lieutenant facing a court martial for refusing to deploy to Iraq -- as an important step in building a cohesive antiwar movement. Watada's father spoke from the main stage at the protest while student speakers at a side rally organized by the Campus Antiwar Network hailed the young man as a hero and said the war will not end until other soldiers make the same decision.

DOJ_NMG_0123290

Mark Rudd, the 1960s radical who gained notoriety as the leader of the Columbia protests and as a member of the revolutionary group the Weathermen, said he has noticed increased antiwar activity among college students over the past year, which he attributed in part to Watada's public refusal to deploy in June. Students for a Democratic Society, the largest student activist group during Vietnam, has reemerged, holding its first convention since 1969 last year and gaining a presence on a growing number of college campuses.

"There's been a 35-year break where there hasn't been a mass movement, so students haven't had a natural model for how to do it," Rudd said, laying some of the blame on the Weathermen for breaking apart the larger student movement in the push to be more radical. "I hope they'll learn from our shameful history and learn how not to screw things up like we did."

Students agreed that ending the war will require building a coalition across political lines. University of Maryland senior Alan Wright, 21, said political moderates have been alienated from the antiwar movement by radicals.

"We might all be against the war, but there's no consensus about what we should do now," Wright said. "If we can all come together, we will be able to have more of an impact."

Grand Delusion (WP)

By Robert Kagan

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

It's quite a juxtaposition. In Iraq, American soldiers are finally beginning the hard job of establishing a measure of peace, security and order in critical sections of Baghdad -- the essential prerequisite for the lasting political solution everyone claims to want. They've launched attacks on Sunni insurgent strongholds and begun reining in Moqtada al-Sadr's militia. And they've embarked on these operations with the expectation that reinforcements will soon be on the way: the more than 20,000 troops President Bush has ordered to Iraq and the new commander he has appointed to fight the insurgency as it has not been fought since the war began.

Back in Washington, however, Democratic and Republican members of Congress are looking for a different kind of political solution: the solution to their problems in presidential primaries and elections almost two years off. Resolutions disapproving the troop increase have proliferated on both sides of the aisle. Many of their proponents frankly, even proudly, admit they are responding to the current public mood, as if that is what they were put in office to do. Those who think they were elected sometimes to lead rather than follow seem to be in a minority.

The most popular resolutions simply oppose the troop increase without offering much useful guidance on what to do instead, other than perhaps go back to the Baker-Hamilton commission's vague plan for a gradual withdrawal. Sen. Hillary Clinton wants to cap the number of troops in Iraq at 137,500. No one explains why this is the right number, why it shouldn't be 20,000 troops lower or higher. But that's not really the point, is it?

Other critics claim that these are political cop-outs, which they are. These supposedly braver critics demand a cutoff of funds for the war and the start of a withdrawal within months. But they're not honest either, since they refuse to answer the most obvious and necessary questions: What do they propose the United States do when, as a result of withdrawal, Iraq explodes and ethnic cleansing on a truly horrific scale begins? What do they propose our response should be when the entire region becomes a war zone, when al-Qaeda and other terrorist organizations establish bases in Iraq from which to attack neighboring states as well as the United States? Even the Iraq Study Group acknowledged that these are likely consequences of precipitate withdrawal.

Those who call for an "end to the war" don't want to talk about the fact that the war in Iraq and in the region will not end but will only grow more dangerous. Do they recommend that we then do nothing, regardless of the consequences? Or are they willing to say publicly, right now, that they would favor sending U.S. troops back into Iraq to confront those new dangers? Answering those questions really would be honest and brave.

Of course, most of the discussion of Iraq isn't about Iraq at all. The war has become a political abstraction, a means of positioning oneself at home.

DOJ_NMG_0123291

To the extent that people think about Iraq, many seem to believe it is a problem that can be made to go away. Once American forces depart, Iraq will no longer be our problem. Joseph Biden, one of the smartest foreign policy hands in the Senate, recently accused President Bush of sending more troops so that he could pass the Iraq war on to his successor. Biden must assume that if the president took his advice and canceled the troop increase, then somehow Iraq would no longer be a serious crisis when President Biden entered the White House in 2009.

This is a delusion, but it is by no means only a Democratic delusion. Many conservatives and Republicans, including erstwhile supporters of the war, have thrown up their hands in anger at the Iraqi people or the Iraqi government. They, too, seem to believe that if American troops leave, because Iraqis don't "deserve" our help, then somehow the whole mess will solve itself or simply fade away. Talk about a fantasy. The fact is, the United States cannot escape the Iraq crisis, or the Middle East crisis of which it is a part, and will not be able to escape it for years. And if Iraq does collapse, it will not be the end of our problems but the beginning of a new and much bigger set of problems.

I would think that anyone wanting to be president in January 2009 would be hoping and praying that the troop increase works. The United States will be dealing with Iraq one way or another in 2009, no matter what anyone says or does today. The only question is whether it is an Iraq that is salvageable or an Iraq sinking further into chaos and destruction and dragging America along with it.

A big part of the answer will come soon in the battle for Baghdad. Politicians in both parties should realize that success in this mission is in their interest, as well as the nation's. Here's a wild idea: Forget the political posturing, be responsible, and provide the moral and material support our forces need and expect. The next president will thank you.

Robert Kagan, a senior associate at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and transatlantic fellow at the German Marshall Fund, writes a monthly column for The Post. His latest book is "Dangerous Nation," a history of American foreign policy.

It Has Unraveled So Quickly (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

A PAINFUL measure of just how much Iraq has changed in the four years since I started coming here is contained in my cellphone. Many numbers in the address book are for Iraqis who have either fled the country or been killed. One of the first Sunni politicians: gunned down. A Shiite baker: missing. A Sunni family: moved to Syria.

I first came to Iraq in April 2003, at the end of the looting several weeks after the American invasion. In all, I have spent 22 months here, time enough for the place, its people and their ever-evolving tragedy to fix itself firmly in my heart.

Now, as I am leaving Iraq, a new American plan is unfolding in the capital. It feels as if we have come back to the beginning. Boots are on the ground again. Boxy Humvees move in the streets. Baghdad fell in 2003 and we are still trying to pick it back up. But Iraq is a different country now.

The moderates are mostly gone. My phone includes at least a dozen entries for middle-class families who have given up and moved away. They were supposed to build democracy here. Instead they work odd jobs in Syria and Jordan. Even the moderate political leaders have left. I have three numbers for Adnan Pachachi, the distinguished Iraqi statesman; none have Iraqi country codes.

Neighborhoods I used to visit a year ago with my armed guards and my black abaya are off limits. Most were Sunni and had been merely dangerous. Now they are dead. A neighborhood that used to be Baghdad's Upper East Side has the dilapidated, broken feel of a city just hit by a hurricane.

The Iraqi government and the political process, which seemed to have great promise a year ago, have soured. Deeply damaged from years of abuse under Saddam Hussein, the Shiites who run the government have themselves turned into abusers.

Never having covered a civil war before, I learned about it together with my Iraqi friends. It is a bit like watching a slow-motion train wreck. Broken bodies fly past. Faces freeze in one's memory in the moments before impact. Passengers grab handles and doorframes that simply tear off or uselessly collapse.

DOJ_NMG_0123292

I learned how much violence changes people, and how trust is chipped away, leaving society a thin layer of moth-eaten fabric that tears easily. It has unraveled so quickly. A year ago, my interviews were peppered with phrases like "Iraqis are all brothers." The subjects would get angry when you asked their sect. Now some of them introduce themselves that way.

I met Raad Jassim, a 38-year-old Shiite refugee, in a largely empty house, recently owned by Sunnis, where he now lives in western Baghdad. He moved there in the fall, after Sunni militants killed his brother and his nephew and confiscated his large chicken farm north of Baghdad. He had lived with Sunnis his whole life, but after what happened, a hatred spread through him like a disease.

"The word Sunni, it hurts me," he said, sitting on the floor in a bare room, his 7-year-old boy on his lap. "All that I have lost came from this word. I try to avoid mixing with them."

"A volcano of revenge" has built up inside him, he said. "I want to rip them up with my teeth."

In another measure of just how much things have changed, Mr. Jassim's Shiite neighborhood is relatively safe. The area is now largely free of Sunnis, after Shiite militias swept it last year, and it runs smoothly on a complex network of relationships among the local militias, the police and a powerful local council. His street is dotted with fruit stands. Boys in uniforms roughhouse. Men sit in teahouses sipping from tiny glass cups.

Just to the south, the Sunni neighborhood of Dawoodi is ghostly at almost any time of day. Wide boulevards trimmed with palm trees used to connect luxury homes. Now giant piles of trash go uncollected in the median.

A serious problem is dead bodies. They began to appear several times a week last summer on the railroad tracks that run through the neighborhood. But when residents call the police to pick up the bodies, they do not come. The police are Shiite and afraid of the area.

"Entering a Sunni area for them is a risk," said Yasir, a 40-year-old Sunni whose house is close to the dumping ground.

A few weeks ago, a woman's body appeared. It was raining. Yasir said he covered her with blankets and called the police. A day later the police arrived. They peeked under the waterlogged blanket and drove away. It was another day before they collected the body. They took it at night, turning off their headlights and inching toward the area like thieves.

For those eager to write off Iraq as lost, one fact bears remembering. A great many Shiites and Kurds, who together make up 80 percent of the population, will tell you that in spite of all the mistakes the Americans have made here, the single act of removing Saddam Hussein was worth it. And the new American plan, despite all the obstacles, may have a chance to work. With an Iraqi colleague, I have been studying a neighborhood in northern Baghdad that has become a dumping ground for bodies. There, after American troops conducted sweeps, the number of corpses dropped by a third in September. The new plan is built around that kind of tactic. But the odds are stacked against the corps of bright young officers charged with making the plan work, particularly because their Iraqi partner — the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki — seems to be on an entirely different page. When American officials were debating whether to send more troops in December, I went to see an Iraqi government official. The prospect of more troops infuriated him. More Americans would simply prolong the war, he said.

"If you don't allow the minority to lose, you will carry on forever," he said.

The remarks struck me as a powerful insight into the Shiites' thinking. Abused under Mr. Hussein, they still act like an oppressed class. That means Iraqis are looking into a future of war, at least in the near term. As one young Shiite in Sadr City said to me: "This just has to burn itself out."

Hazim al-Aaraji, a disciple of the renegade Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, understands this. A cleric himself, he is looking for foot soldiers for the war. On a warm October afternoon, as he bustled around his mosque in western Baghdad, he said the ideal disciples would have "an empty mind," and a weapon. Surprised by the word choice, an Iraqi friend I was with stopped him, to clarify his intent. Once again, he used the word "empty."

The frank remark spoke of a new power balance, in which radicals rule and moderates have no voice. For many families I have become attached to here, the country is no longer recognizable.

I met Haifa and her husband, Hassan, both teachers, in a driveway in western Baghdad. They had just found the body of their 12-year-old son, who had been kidnapped and brutally killed, and were frantic with grief. They finally decided to leave Iraq, but its violence tormented them to the end. They paid a man to drive them to Jordan, but he was working with Sunni militants in western Iraq, and pointed out Hassan, a Shiite, to a Sunni gang that stopped the car. Over the next several hours, Haifa waved a tiny Koran at men in masks, pleading for her husband's release, her two remaining children in tow.

DOJ_NMG_0123293

Hassan, meanwhile, knelt in a small room, his hands behind his back. His captors shot a man next to him in the neck. Haifa, a Sunni, eventually prevailed on them to let him go. The family returned to Baghdad, then borrowed money to fly to Jordan.

Now they live there, in a tiny basement apartment without windows in a white stone housing project on the side of a hill. Like many Iraqis there, they live in hiding. Residency permits cost $100,000, far beyond their means. Hassan cannot work, nor even risk leaving the house during the day for fear the Jordanian police will deport him.

He tries not to talk to people, afraid someone will recognize his Iraqi accent. He doesn't bargain in the vegetable market. He accepts mean remarks by Jordanian cabdrivers wordlessly.

Most of all, he wants to go home. "But death is waiting for us there," he tells me. "We are homeless. Please help us."

Parting Ways In Iraq (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

During the summer of 1995, Edward Joseph was serving as a U.N. peacekeeper in Bosnia. He was asked to help Muslim women and children flee from an area near Srebrenica, where 7,000 Muslims had already been slaughtered by Serb forces.

It was a controversial mission. The U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees refused to participate, believing the evacuation would just complete the ethnic cleansing. But the high commissioner didn't see the crowds of Muslim women shrieking in terror as Serb jeeps rolled by. Joseph did. It might seem high-minded to preach ethnic reconciliation from afar, Joseph now says, but in a civil war, when you can't protect people, it's immoral to leave them to be killed.

Gradually, leaders on all sides of the Bosnian fight came to see it was in their interest to separate their peoples. And once the ethnic groups were given sanctuary, it became possible to negotiate a peace that was imperfect, but which was better than the reverberating splashes of blood.

Today, many of the people active in Bosnia believe they have a model that could help stabilize Iraq. They acknowledge the many differences between the two places, but Iraq, they note, is a disintegrating nation. Ethnic cleansing is dividing Baghdad, millions are moving, thousands are dying and the future looks horrific.

The best answer, then, is soft partition: create a central government with a few key powers; reinforce strong regional governments; separate the sectarian groups as much as possible.

In practice, that means, first, modifying the Iraqi Constitution.

As Joe Biden points out, the Constitution already goes a long way toward decentralizing power. It gives the provinces the power to have their own security services, to send ambassadors to foreign countries, to join together to form regions. Decentralization is not an American imposition, it's an Iraqi idea.

But, he adds, so far the Constitution doesn't yet have legislation that would do things like equitably share oil and gas revenue. The Sunnis will never be content with a strip of sand unless they're constitutionally guaranteed 20 percent of the nation's wealth.

The second step is getting implicit consent from all sects that separation and federalism are in their interest. The Shiites would have to accept that there never will be a stable Iraq if the Sunnis are reduced to helot status. The Kurds would have to accept that peace and stability are worth territorial compromise in Kirkuk. The Sunnis would have to accept that they're never going to run Iraq again, and having a strong Sunni region is better than living under a Shiite jackboot.

As Les Gelb says, unless the thirst for vengeance has driven the leaders in Iraq beyond the realm of reason, it should be possible to persuade them to see where their best interests lie.

The third step in a soft partition would be the relocation of peoples. This would mean using U.S. or Iraqi troops to shepherd people who want to flee toward areas where they feel safe. It would mean providing humanitarian assistance so they can get back on their feet.

DOJ_NMG_0123294

As Edward Joseph and Michael O'Hanlon note, in this kind of operation, timing is everything. Move people in a certain neighborhood too early, and militias could perceive a vacuum and accelerate the violence. Move too late and you could be moving corpses.

The fourth step is getting Iraq's neighbors to buy into the arrangement. Presumably neither Iran nor Saudi Arabia really relishes complete chaos in Iraq and a proxy war with each other after the U.S. withdraws. The Turks would have to be reassured that this plan means no independent Kurdistan will ever come into being.

The most serious objection to soft partition is that the Sunni and Shiite populations are too intermingled in Baghdad and elsewhere to really separate. This objection, sadly, becomes less of a problem every day. But it would still be necessary to maintain peacekeepers in the mixed neighborhoods, be open to creative sovereignty structures, and hope that the detoxification of the situation nationally might reduce violence where diverse groups touch.

In short, logic, circumstances and politics are leading inexorably toward soft partition. The Bush administration has been slow to recognize its virtues because it is too dependent on the Green Zone Iraqis. The Iraqis talk about national unity but their behavior suggests they want decentralization. Sooner or later, everybody will settle on this sensible policy, having exhausted all the alternatives.

On Iran, Bush Faces Haunting Echoes Of Iraq (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 27 — As President Bush and his aides calibrate how directly to confront Iran, they are discovering that both their words and their strategy are haunted by the echoes of four years ago — when their warnings of terrorist activity and nuclear ambitions were clearly a prelude to war.

This time, they insist, it is different.

"We're not looking for a fight with Iran," R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for policy and the chief negotiator on Iranian issues, said in an interview on Friday evening, just a few hours after Mr. Bush had repeated his warnings to Iran to halt "killing our soldiers" and to stop its drive for nuclear fuel.

Mr. Burns, citing the president's words, insisted that Washington was committed to "a diplomatic path" — even as it executed a far more aggressive strategy, seizing Iranians in Iraq and attempting to starve Iran of the money it needs to revitalize a precious asset, its oil industry.

Mr. Burns argues that those are defensive steps that are not intended to provoke Iran, though there has been a vigorous behind-the-scenes debate in the administration over whether the more aggressive policy could provoke Iran to strike back. The State Department has tended to counsel caution, while some more hawkish aides in the Pentagon and the White House say the increase in American forces in Iraq could be neutered unless the American military forcefully pushes back against the Iranian aid to the militias.

To many in Washington, especially Mr. Bush's Democratic critics, the new approach to Iran has all the hallmarks of an administration once again spoiling for a fight.

Some see an attempt to create a diversion, focusing the country's attention away from a war gone bad in Iraq, and toward a country that has exploited America's troubles to expand its influence. Others suspect an effort to shift the blame for the spiraling chaos in Iraq, as a steady flow of officials, from the C.I.A. director to the new secretary of defense, cite intelligence that Iranians are smuggling into Iraq sophisticated explosive devices and detailed plans to wipe out Sunni neighborhoods. So far, they have disclosed no evidence. Next week, American military officials are expected to make their most comprehensive case — based on materials seized in recent raids — that Iran's elite Quds force is behind many of the most lethal attacks.

But as they present their evidence, some Bush administration officials concede they are confronting the bitter legacy of their prewar distortions of the intelligence in Iraq. When speaking under the condition of anonymity, they say the administration's credibility has been deeply damaged, which would cast doubt on any attempt by Mr. Bush, for example, to back up his claim that Iran's uranium enrichment program is intended for bomb production.

DOJ_NMG_0123295

"It's never stated explicitly, but clearly we can't make the case about Iran's intentions," said a senior strategist for the Bush administration who joined it long after evidence surfaced that Iraq had none of the illicit weapons that the administration cited as a reason to go to war.

It has not helped that even as the administration is making its case against Iran, the perjury trial of I. Lewis Libby Jr., Vice President Dick Cheney's former chief of staff, was opening just a few blocks away.

The early testimony in that trial has laid bare again how Mr. Cheney, among others, carefully selected intelligence for use in a political campaign to make the case against Iraq. Now, several years later, the administration is paying the price in dealing with a country whose ability to project power and to build a sophisticated nuclear program is far greater than Saddam Hussein's was in 2003.

The administration does not have definitive evidence that Iran is moving toward producing a nuclear bomb, but next week it will unveil what officials say is evidence of Iran's meddling in Iraq.

In interviews over the past several weeks, officials from the Pentagon to the State Department to the White House insist that Mr. Bush's goal in Iran is not to depose a government, Iraq-style, but rather to throw a series of brushback pitches.

Officials familiar with the intelligence prepared for Mr. Bush say American assessments conclude that Iran sees itself at the head of an alliance to drive the United States out of Iraq, and ultimately out of the Middle East. Other briefings have included assessments that Russia and China will never join meaningful economic sanctions against a country that they do business with, so if Mr. Bush wants to apply military and economic pressure, he must do so outside the United Nations.

One result was a strategy that Mr. Bush approved in the fall to push back on all fronts and to force Iran to recalculate what administration officials call its cost-benefit analysis for challenging the United States. The effort to stop European and Japanese banks from lending money to Iran's oil sector is part of the equation. So is pushing down the price of oil, though administration officials grow silent when asked whether Mr. Cheney or others have discussed with Saudi Arabia the benefits of pumping enough oil to push the price down and deprive Iran of revenues.

But it is the military component of the strategy that carries the biggest risks. Two aircraft carriers and their accompanying battle groups were sent into the Persian Gulf, a senior military official said, "to remind the Iranians that we can focus on them, too." American military forces in Iraq were authorized to move against Iranian operatives, though it is unclear what kind of evidence is needed, if any, that they are conspiring against American forces before military action is authorized.

American officials describe those measures as purely defensive. "We are definitely looking to protect our interests in the gulf, in Iraq itself, and to protect the lives of our soldiers," said Mr. Burns, who insisted that there was no effort to stop Iran from ordinary exchanges with Iraq.

Yet administration officials clearly worry that the Iranians may not back down, and that a confrontation could build up — especially if a midlevel American commander or a member of Iran's military or paramilitary forces in Iraq miscalculated. Both Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates have warned against that risk, officials say.

Administration officials say that while all of Mr. Bush's advisers have signed on to the strategy of more forceful confrontation with Tehran, there is considerable debate about how far to push it. Some Iran experts at the State Department have warned that encounters between Americans and Iranians inside Iraq could strengthen the hand of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad by allowing him to change the subject from his failure to produce jobs and the rising cost of nuclear defiance.

Over the longer run, there is a continuing debate about whether military action may some day be necessary to set back Iran's nuclear activities. For now American officials say they do not believe they have a good set of targets or the ability to contain Iran's reaction. "It's not a question of ideology," one senior military official said, refusing to talk on the record about military planning. "We simply don't have the forces to deal with the reaction. They're busy."

At the Pentagon, military officials say there are still arguments over the rules for confronting Iranian operatives. Are they legitimate targets simply because they are identified as part of Iran's military? Or do American forces need evidence that they are importing weapons or sowing chaos? Publicly, officials say the answers to those questions are classified. Privately, a senior official said, "It's all still a matter of debate."

DOJ_NMG_0123296

In coming weeks, administration officials say, more escalation is likely. The Iranians have told the International Atomic Energy Agency that they will announce in February that they are beginning industrial-scale efforts to produce uranium. It will probably be years before they can produce enough fuel for a bomb.

But the debate over whether the United States should stick to diplomacy or take more forceful action is bound to begin right away, and will sound familiar. Democrats, even while accusing the administration of failing to engage with Iran, are positioning themselves to sound tough.

"To ensure that Iran never gets nuclear weapons, we need to keep all options on the table," former Senator John Edwards recently told an Israeli security conference. "Let me reiterate — all options."

For Mr. Bush, this is not only about options but about legacy. Already bloodied in Iraq, he will come under increasing pressure to show that he has not left the United States weakened in the Middle East. He does not want to be remembered for leaving Iran more powerful than he found it when he came to office.

Iran Condemns U.S. Raids Against Its Operatives (AP)

AP, January 27, 2007

TEHRAN, Iran - A top Iranian lawmaker denounced the United States on Saturday for allowing its troops to kill or capture Iranians in Iraq whom U.S. forces believe pose a threat.

"This is support for terrorism. It is against all recognized international treaties to order the death of nationals of another country in a foreign land," Alaeddin Boroujerdi, the head of Parliament's Foreign Policy and National Security Committee, said on state television.

On Friday, Defense Secretary Robert Gates said U.S. forces "are authorized to go after those who are trying to kill them."

The more aggressive policy — evolving over a period of months — was described as the result of mounting evidence that Iran is supporting terrorists inside Iraq and is a major supplier of bombs and other weapons used to target U.S. forces.

Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki told journalists Saturday that "bullying and threatening" were part of the U.S. strategy in Iraq and said Iran was a "part of resolving Iraq's problems, not a part of the problem itself."

At least eight Iranians have been detained in Iraq recently, including two diplomats in a Dec. 21 roundup. They were interrogated and released to Iranian officials eight days later.

The six others were captured Jan. 11 at an Iranian liaison office in the northern city of Irbil. One was released and five are still believed in U.S. custody.

The U.S. ambassador to Iraq said last week that one of the detained Iranians was the director of operations for Iran's Revolutionary Guard Quds faction, the organization responsible for funding and arming Iraqi militants.

Whose Iran? (NYT)

By Laura Secor

The New York Times Magazine, January 28, 2007

The Mahestan mall in South Tehran is sometimes called "the honeycomb" of the Basij, the Iranian youth militia, because it is here that Basijis, as the militia members are known, buy and sell banners for the Shiite festival of Ashura, as well as religious books and posters. Somber, bearded young men in collarless shirts linger over tea behind stands selling tapes of religious singers — cult celebrities who belt out tear-jerking laments for the martyrdom of Hussein and make a small fortune performing at memorial services. Omid Malekian, a 28-year-old employee of a Tehran petrochemical refinery and the son of a carpenter, was shopping at Mahestan on Dec. 16, the day after Iran's elections for city councils and for the Assembly of Experts, the 86-member clerical board that will select the next supreme leader should anything happen to the current leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. In the 2005 presidential election, Malekian voted for the winner, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, and when I asked if he was happy with the president, he answered frankly.

"Sometimes I am analyzing myself and thinking, Oh, we have done wrong," he mused. "He is very popular and friendly with the people, but sometimes when he is expressing his ideas, he doesn't think about the future or the consequences. He is a simple man."

DOJ_NMG_0123297

In particular, Malekian suggested that Ahmadinejad had been incautious in his promises to improve the economy — promises he has yet to keep. There was another area, too, in which Ahmadinejad had faltered: "About the Holocaust," he said. "I don't know much about it, but from the reaction of the world, it seems he should have said something different."

Still, Malekian said that he voted for the most severe fundamentalist among the candidates running for the clerical Assembly of Experts. The campaign turned on the competition between two incumbents, Ayatollah Taqi Mesbah-Yazdi — widely reputed to be Ahmadinejad's spiritual leader — and Ayatollah Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, the pragmatic former president who lost the presidential race to Ahmadinejad in 2005. Each hoped to increase his share of the vote and thus his power on the assembly.

South Tehran is Ahmadinejad's heartland. It is here, in the less affluent neighborhoods of the city of 14 million where he was once mayor, that he rose from the obscure end of the seven-candidate roster in 2005, only to become one of the most popular figures in the Muslim world. Because liberal-minded Iranians boycotted the 2005 presidential election, and because Ahmadinejad so adeptly played the populist card, the militants, the unemployed and the cultural conservatives of neighborhoods like this one were in the driver's seat, steering the politics of this crucial nation while their opponents warned of their presumed doctrinaire views and political naïveté.

Early on, Ahmadinejad's faction was expected to win last month's elections handily. But the results contradicted the conventional wisdom about the Iranian electorate. The president put forward his own slate of candidates for the city councils. It was trounced. By some reckonings, reformists won two-fifths of the council seats and even dominated in some cities, including Kerman and Arak. Some conservative city-council candidates did well, particularly in Tehran, but they were not the conservatives associated with Ahmadinejad: rather, they belonged to the rival conservative faction of the current Tehran mayor, Mohammad Baqer Qalibaf. And most significant, the vote for Rafsanjani for the Assembly of Experts dwarfed that of Mesbah-Yazdi by nearly two to one. By mid-January, Ahmadinejad's isolation even within his own faction was complete: 150 of 290 members of parliament, including many of Ahmadinejad's onetime allies, signed a letter criticizing the president's economic policies for failing to stanch unemployment and inflation. A smaller group also blamed Ahmadinejad's inflammatory foreign-policy rhetoric for the United Nations Security Council resolution imposing sanctions on Iran. As if that were not enough, an editorial in Jomhouri Eslami, a newspaper that reflects the views of the supreme leader, accused the president of using the nuclear issue to distract the public from his failed policies. Ahmadinejad's behavior was diminishing popular support for the nuclear program, the editorial warned. The Iranian political system seems to be restoring its equilibrium by showing an extremist president the limits of his power. But is it an equilibrium that can hold?

In part, last month's election results reflected the complexity of Ahmadinejad's skeptical, conditional and diverse constituency. They also demonstrated his isolation within the powerful conservative establishment, whose politics, however opaque, are determinative. At its center, Khamenei commands a faction known as the traditional conservatives. No elected leader can serve, let alone execute a policy agenda, without the acquiescence of the supreme leader and his associates. But was Ahmadinejad one of the leader's associates? Or was he, like his predecessor, Khatami, something of a political rival? The answer to this question should determine the extent to which Ahmadinejad's foreign-policy extremism and authoritarian tendencies are taken seriously as a political program. But it is a puzzle that has vexed political analysts since the president took office in August 2005, bringing with him a faction that was largely new to the post-revolutionary political scene. Composed partly of military and paramilitary elements, partly of extremist clerics like Mesbah-Yazdi and partly of inexperienced new conservative politicians, those in Ahmadinejad's faction are often called "neoconservatives." But to the extent that they have an ideology, it is less new than old, harking back to the early days of the Islamic republic. Since that time, the same elite has largely run Iranian politics, though it has divided itself into competing factions, and the act of wielding power has mellowed many hard-liners into pragmatists. Ahmadinejad's faction, on the other hand, came into power speaking the language of the past but with the zeal of the untried.

In 2005, many analysts believed that Ahmadinejad's elevation to the presidency must have been sanctioned by the supreme leader — indeed, that it reflected a hardening agenda among the traditional conservatives. He would be the "secretary" of Khamenei, a number of reformists said to me that summer in Tehran. But the way Ahmadinejad governed was nothing if not divisive. He undertook the most far-reaching governmental housecleaning since the revolution itself, reportedly replacing as many as 20,000 bureaucrats. And when it came time for the elections last month, he offered his own slates of candidates, disdaining to ally himself with the traditional conservatives or with anyone else. For the Assembly of Experts, Ahmadinejad endorsed a ticket of scholars from what is known as the Haqqani circle, a group of clerics who cleave strongly to the notion of the divine state and disdain popular sovereignty and democracy.

DOJ_NMG_0123298

The senior figure in this circle, Mesbah-Yazdi, already belonged to the assembly. But in the fall of 2006, buoyed by association with the populist president, his group put forward a wave of candidates in a bid to transform the assembly. Even after the Guardian Council — an appointed body that answers to the supreme leader and that vets candidates and legislation — had disqualified almost half the proposed candidates, including most of the reformists and a large number of Mesbah-Yazdi's students, clerics associated with Mesbah-Yazdi still stood a reasonable chance of winning dozens of the 86 seats. It was here that the ideological contest of the Ahmadinejad presidency was starkest. Were the public and the leadership ready to accept Mesbah-Yazdi's brand of extremism along with the populism Ahmadinejad had served up? And what did it mean if they were not?

The 97-mile stretch of highway from Tehran southwest to Qom passes through a cratered landscape of magnificent desolation to the basin between a salt marsh and a desert at the foot of the Zagros Mountains. Middle-class, educated Tehranis often scorn and even fear Qom as the center of religious Puritanism and political repression. But for pious Shiites in Iran and elsewhere, the city is a pilgrimage destination, home to one of the holiest Shiite shrines, most of the living Shiite marjas (senior religious figures, literally "sources of imitation") and more than 50 seminaries, institutions that long pre-existed universities in Iran and where the works of the Greek philosophers have for centuries been studied alongside religious texts. Students, who number some 40,000, enter Qom at an average age of 17. Some of them continue their studies for decades, as Shiite religious learning has no set end point. Since the Islamic revolution, the seminary city has thrived as the government has spent lavishly on mosques and dormitories, nearly all with the same pale brick and blue tile facades. In recent years, Qom has absorbed waves of Shiite immigrants from Afghanistan and Iraq. There is an Iraqi bazaar not far from the holy shrine, and the sight of men in Arab dishdashas is commonplace.

Mesbah-Yazdi has a major presence here in the form of the Imam Khomeini Institute, the enormous seminary of which Mesbah-Yazdi is the head scholar. It holds Iran's most extensive library of scholarly books in English, totaling 11,200 volumes. It is the envy of the universities in Tehran. Mesbah-Yazdi, a fellow cleric told me, believed that it was important to understand Western ideas to better resist and refute them.

Born in 1934, Mesbah-Yazdi is an éminence grise among the ayatollahs of Qom, but age has not mellowed him. In the last decade he has become famous less for his learned philosophical exegeses (he posts his entry in the Routledge Encyclopedia of Philosophy on his Web site) than for his jeremiads at Friday prayers against popular sovereignty, free speech, women's rights and Islamic reform. Public execution and flogging are "a basic principle of Islam," Mesbah-Yazdi has said, and the government should regulate the content of speech "just as it checks the distribution of adulterated or contaminated foodstuffs." Because "Mesbah" sounds like the Farsi word for crocodile, he is known by his critics as Ayatollah Crocodile. (A cartoonist was once imprisoned for depicting him as a reptile, shedding crocodile tears as he strangled a dissident writer with his tail.)

At Ahmadinejad's invitation, members of Mesbah-Yazdi's Haqqani circle occupy several key government posts. But before Ahmadinejad came to power, they had been pushed mostly to the margins of Iranian politics, where they complained bitterly about the efforts of the reformist Khatami and his colleagues to advance their agenda through the elected branches of government. To the Haqqani scholars, it seemed that the reformists were challenging the doctrine of velayat-i-faqih, which is based on the sovereign power of the chief jurist, the supreme leader. "We shall wait to see what place these foxes who claim to be the supporters of reform will occupy in hell," Mesbah-Yazdi proclaimed. If Iranians believed in their supreme leader as the agent of God, second-guessing his judgment through elections was tantamount to holding a referendum on whether or not Damavand was the highest peak in Iran. What if 51 percent of the public said that it was not? "It doesn't matter what the people think," Mesbah-Yazdi was quoted as saying. "The people are ignorant sheep." He has also said, "Islam was the government of God, not the government of the people."

Mesbah-Yazdi's most open and media-friendly acolyte, Ayatollah Mohsen Gharavian, did not put the matter quite so strongly when, draped in the encompassing Iranian chador, I met with him in an unadorned office at a small seminary on one of Qom's dusty side streets.

DOJ_NMG_0123299

"In the name of God, the beneficent and merciful," Gharavian intoned, "before coming to the main question and answer, I want to know where you got this chador. Is it from the United States or Iran?"

From Iran, I told him.

"Congratulations on seeing you in a very Islamic manner," Gharavian replied.

For a cleric who had been quoted as saying that despotism was not all bad and that public opinion was meaningless, Gharavian, who teaches philosophy at the Imam Khomeini Institute, did not have a severe presence. Rather, he was a big, courteous man of 54 with a reddish beard. The election to the Assembly of Experts was just a day away, and Gharavian was the hard-line candidate for the hard-line city of Qom. Still, he expected to lose, and he did lose. Amiably, he remarked that he had run and lost before, and that to win would have required a financial outlay of which he disapproved.

When it came to politics, he spoke mostly in evasions and platitudes. Democracy, he explained, was acceptable within the boundaries of Islam, and human rights were contained within Islam, but such rights should not include freedom of worship or freedom to believe things that are untrue or unwise. (His examples were the misguided beliefs of Nietzsche and Machiavelli.) The Islamic penal code required no modification in the modern era; its harshest punishments, he asserted, were no more violent than some American and European spectator sports. He appeared shocked by the suggestion that Iran held political prisoners and demanded an example. I offered the journalist Akbar Ganji, imprisoned for six years on account of his critical writings. Gharavian replied: "Did you read Mr. Ganji's manifesto? He questioned the whole establishment." Freedom of expression, he explained, did not include the freedom to "breach the peace of the society." He demanded, "Don't you have prisoners in your country?"

Mesbah-Yazdi's statements on most of these matters were a matter of public record, and they were even blunter. "If someone tells you he has a new interpretation of Islam, hit him in the mouth," he said in 2000. Two years later, he said, "The prophets of God did not believe in pluralism. They believed that only one idea was right." On Sept. 4, 1999, he said: "Killing hypocrites does not require a court order, as it is a duty imposed by the Shariah on all genuine Muslims. The order of Islam is to throw them down from a high mountain and kill them outright." He spoke the following month of the need to break the unnecessary taboo on violence.

If such a taboo existed in the Islamic republic, it had been broken. That year, a string of dissidents were murdered under suspicious circumstances. In the writings that led to his prison sentence, Ganji accused Mesbah-Yazdi of sanctifying such actions with whispered fatwas and members of the Haqqani circle of direct involvement in the murders. A member of the shadowy vigilante group Ansar-e Hezbollah, which had violently attacked student demonstrators in July 1999, lent credence to Ganji's claims with videotaped testimony in which he said that Mesbah-Yazdi had encouraged the group to assassinate a reformist politician. "Now, on the issue of whether I authorized the assassination of individuals," Mesbah-Yazdi declared unapologetically in March 2001, "I must say that Imam Khomeini, may God be satisfied with him, issued a decree saying that shedding Salman Rushdie's blood was a religious obligation and, therefore, he advocated resorting to violence as well."

Why Ahmadinejad would ally himself with these clerics remains something of a mystery. Contrary to popular belief, says Nasser Hadian, a political scientist at Tehran University and a childhood friend of the president, Ahmadinejad never expounded a particularly conservative moral or social agenda. Rather, says Hadian, Ahmadinejad was and continues to be inspired above all by Ali Shariati, the mid-20th-century theorist of radical Islamic egalitarianism. The president's agenda is redistributionist and anti-imperialist, Hadian says. That doesn't make him a democrat. Nonetheless, "he is basically using Mesbah," Hadian says. It is an alliance of political convenience.

Alireza Haghighi, a political scientist who teaches at the University of Toronto at Mississauga, agrees that the association between Ahmadinejad and Mesbah-Yazdi has been overstated. But in an article he wrote with his colleague Victoria Tahmasebi in International Journal, Haghighi documented yet another Ahmadinejad genesis story. Young Ahmadinejad led a politically and religiously conservative Islamist student group during the Islamic Revolution, the writers claim. When the leftist Islamist students proposed seizing the American Embassy in 1979, Ahmadinejad opposed the action as imprudent, but he suggested that if they went ahead with it, they should seize the Soviet Embassy as well. His plan rejected, Ahmadinejad found himself excluded from historic events and spurned by the Islamic left, which was at that time a powerful faction within the regime. His opposition to that faction ossified into a vendetta.

DOJ_NMG_0123300

Soon after Khomeini's death, the Islamic left lost the factional battle for dominance. Its members wandered eight years in the political wilderness before returning as the reform movement. That, too, Ahmadinejad was anxious to crush. In that aspiration he would have found ample common ground with the Haqqani circle.

As president, Ahmadinejad looked to the extreme right rather than seeking allies among the traditional conservatives, and in so doing, he exposed himself politically. "They were very arrogant," Hadian said of Ahmadinejad and his camp. "They didn't want to make any compromises. He has stood against the entire political structure in Iran, not inviting any of them, even the conservatives, to be partners. You don't see them in the cabinet; you don't see them in political positions."

And for that there was a price to be paid. This fall, Rafsanjani, who had suffered a humiliating defeat at Ahmadinejad's hands in the presidential election of 2005, was reportedly persuaded to run again for the Assembly of Experts by the supreme leader or people close to him. Rafsanjani is a divisive figure in Iranian politics. He is widely perceived as a kingmaker, the power behind the rise of Khamenei to the position of supreme leader and that of Khatami to the presidency. But though he remains highly respected among clerics, Rafsanjani is not a beloved figure in Iranian public life. During his presidency, he adopted an economic liberalization program that involved extremely unpopular austerity measures; meanwhile, through pistachio exports, he had himself become one of the richest men in Iran. Political and social repression did not ease until Khatami, his successor, came into office.

Nonetheless, in the Assembly of Experts elections in December, Rafsanjani emerged as the compromise candidate of the reformists and traditional conservatives. One reformist activist described him to me as the very last line of defense against the extreme right. And Rafsanjani delivered a staggering blow, winning nearly twice as many votes as Mesbah-Yazdi. The neoconservatives, it seemed, had been slapped down much the same way the reformists had: the traditional conservatives had decided that the threat they posed was intolerable, and the voters had decided that the president associated with them could not deliver on his promises.

On the morning of Election Day, Dec. 15, there were long lines outside the polling places in central and east Tehran. A crowd milled about the front courtyard of Masjed al Nabi, a large mosque in the east. There were children, a television camera and a seller of balloons in the shape of rabbit ears. A middle-aged couple stood by the sinks normally used for ablutions; the woman wore a long, tailored raincoat and a conservative black scarf. Her husband explained that the election was very important to them. "We are choosing our future," he said through an interpreter. He was too sick, really, to move, but he had told his doctor that he could not forgo his civic duty to participate in the election.

Then I asked him if he saw big differences among the candidates for Assembly of Experts. "No," he said, "they are all the same."

What about the ones for city council?

"No," he replied. "They are all the same, too."

It is nearly impossible to have a political discussion with only one person on an Iranian street. Outside Masjed al Nabi, the first interloper was a clean-cut 35-year-old man in a plaid shirt who gave his name as Ali. "How can you say they are all the same?" he nearly shouted at the man who had been speaking. "We have candidates who are like the Taliban and others who are practically liberals. We have candidates who think women should be free and others who do not think so at all."

"I never heard of a thing like that," the first man said calmly. "The country has laws to decide these matters."

To my right, a woman in a chador heatedly exclaimed: "He's right! How can you say they are all the same? That's why we're here to vote, because they are all different. Our new president, Ahmadinejad, before the election he said women were free and equal. Now he says we should just make babies. Because he wanted our votes, he said good things."

The original couple took advantage of the hubbub to slip away. Mohammad, a 37-year-old in a running jacket, pushed his way into our circle. "I am not voting," he told me. "I want to choose my freedom. I don't want to vote for them. I'm sure that whether I vote or not, it makes no difference. I don't accept the Constitution of this country, and I hope I can change it without voting."

Ali was listening intently. "The people who are good in this thing accept the vote of the people not just for show and not just on Election Day," he told Mohammad. "Even in America it is the same; everywhere in the world it is. Everywhere in the world there are some people who are pro-democracy and others who are against it. Now people are more educated. One day, our democracy will be better than democracy in the United States, if we believe in it. We like our religion, our imams, God and Islam.

DOJ_NMG_0123301

We want democracy next to this. We don't believe in democracy and freedom the way it exists in other parts of the world. We want something of our own."

It was 5 o'clock when I left the crowded mosques of middle-class central and east Tehran for the deserted polling places of the affluent northern hills. In Tajrish, an election official told me that he had seen just 200 voters — far fewer than in the presidential election less than two years ago. "All the mullahs are the same," he confided. "Everything always gets worse. Ahmadinejad is like a catalyst, speeding it up. The philosophical foundation of the state is not good."

The debates among ordinary voters go to the heart of a structural weakness in the Iranian state. Founded on two conflicting ideas — the sovereignty of the people and divinely inspired clerical rule — the Islamic Republic of Iran has suffered from a decadelong crisis of legitimacy. Nothing forced that crisis quite the way the reform movement did, despite, or perhaps even because of, its cautious temperament and legalistic methods. Over the course of Khatami's presidency, Iranians were faced with an inevitable question: What use was a supreme leader in a democracy, and what use were elections in a theocracy? The rise of Ahmadinejad, then his comeuppance, have forced those questions from the other direction. How far could the conservatives go in the authoritarian direction, and if not all the way, why not?

"In a sense, many people, including myself, we believe that Mesbah is right," Sadegh Zibakalam, a reformist Tehran University professor, reflected when I visited him at his mother's home in north Tehran in December. "Trying to make an amalgam of Western, liberal, democratic ideas and Shiite theology is nonsense. It doesn't work."

Later, he added: "Either Khamenei is infallible, or he's not. If he's not, then he is an ordinary person like Bush or Blair, answerable to the Parliament and the people. If he is, then we should throw away all this nonsense about Western values and liberal democracy. Either we have Western liberal philosophy, republican government and checks and balances, or we should stick to Mesbah. But to combine them? Imam Khomeini was so popular and charismatic. People rallied behind him and believed he was infallible. We never thought, What if the supreme leader is not supported by the people? The answer to this was brilliantly made by Mesbah: to hell with them."

Zibakalam described Mesbah-Yazdi's reading of velayat-i-faqih as a radical version of the one first proposed by Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini. But when I looked back through the lectures in which Khomeini first delineated the theory in Najaf in 1970, I found a vision strikingly similar to Mesbah-Yazdi's. At that time, Khomeini had little truck with popular sovereignty. He quoted the Koran and sayings attributed to Muhammad: "The prophet has higher claims on the believers than their own selves" and "The scholars are the heirs of the prophet." The only legitimate legislation was that which had already been made by God, and this would be administered by the learned jurist, who would rule over the people like a guardian over a child.

Nine years later, from his Paris exile during the revolution, Khomeini would approve a constitution drafted by more liberal associates. It was the blueprint for a parliamentary democracy, in which a council of clergymen would play an advisory role. This draft became the basis for the debate that occupied the first Assembly of Experts, convened to revise and approve a final constitution. After much discussion of the contradictions it engendered, the experts, many of them clerics, nonetheless yoked velayat-i-faqih to the republican structure they had been handed.

To this day, the structure of the Iranian state remains too liberal for the authoritarians and too authoritarian for the liberals, but the traditional conservatives at the center of power cannot resolve this obvious paradox at the republic's heart without relinquishing their own position. The best they could do was to revise the Constitution after Khomeini's death, greatly expanding the powers of the clerical councils and of the supreme leader at the expense of the elected offices.

Clerics I spoke to from the traditional conservative camp associated with Khamenei were paternalistic in their view of the state rather than outright authoritarian. They seemed to genuinely believe in a limited form of popular sovereignty — guided, of course, by Islamic scholars so that the people would not fall into error but nonetheless necessary for the legitimacy of the state.

It was this traditional conservative establishment that the reformists, many of them clerics, hoped to transform by introducing new policies through the legal channels of the state and by persuading jurists to assimilate new ideas about rights and freedoms into their interpretations of the sacred texts. One of the leading reformist theorists, Mohammad Mojtahed Shabestari, explained to me: "Many nations have influenced our jurisprudence. We could set aside some of the decrees of Islam today and bring some Western laws to replace them. This doesn't make us infidels."

DOJ_NMG_0123302

After eight years in power, the reform movement found itself blocked by the conservative establishment, hamstrung by its own mistakes and unwilling or unable to shore up the failing economy. Ahmadinejad rose in its wake, campaigning not on ideological extremism but on populist blandishments. He would ease the financial pain of his countrymen, he promised, by bringing Iran's oil wealth to the people's tables.

As Omid Malekian had intimated to me at the Mahestan shopping mall, however, this was not a promise to make lightly. The Iranian economy has been mismanaged at least since the revolution, and to fix it would require measures no populist would be willing to take. Under Ahmadinejad, inflation has risen; foreign investors have scorned Iranian markets, fearing political upheaval or foreign invasion; the Iranian stock market has plummeted; Iranian capital has fled to Dubai. Voters I talked to pointed to the prices of ordinary foodstuffs when they wanted to explain their negative feelings about the government. According to Iranian news sources, from January to late August 2006 the prices of fruits and vegetables in urban areas rose by 20 percent. A month later, during Ramadan, the price of fruit reportedly doubled while that of chicken rose 10 percent in mere days. Housing prices in Tehran have reached a record high. Unemployment is still widespread. And Ahmadinejad's approval rating, as calculated by the official state television station, had dipped to 35 percent in October.

Iran is not a poor country. It is highly urbanized and modern, with a sizable middle class. Oil revenues, which Iran has in abundance, should be channeling plenty of hard currency into the state's coffers, and in fact the economy's overall rate of growth is healthy and rising. But as Parvin Alizadeh, an economist at London Metropolitan University, explained to me, what ultimately matters is how the state spends its influx of wealth. The Iranian government has tried to create jobs swiftly and pacify the people by spending the oil money on new government-run projects. But these projects are not only overmanned and inefficient, like much of the country's bloated and technologically backward public sector; they also increase the demand for consumer goods and services, driving up inflation.

Ahmadinejad has continued this trend. He has generated considerable personal good will in poorer communities, but hardly anyone I asked could honestly say that their lives had gotten better during his presidency. He fought to lower interest rates, which drove up lending, leading to inflation and capital flight. The government cannot risk infuriating the public with the austerity measures that would be required in order to solve its deep-rooted economic problems. But as long as its short-term fixes continue to fail, the government will go on being unpopular. The last two presidents have lost their constituencies over this issue. And so officials seek to distract people from their economic woes with ideological posturing and anti-Western rhetoric. Not only has this lost its cachet with much of the Iranian public, it also serves to compound Iran's economic problems by blackening its image abroad. "Iran has not sorted out its basic problem, which is to be accepted in the international community as a respectable government," Alizadeh said. "Investors do not take it seriously. This is a political crisis, not an economic crisis."

For a Western traveler in Iran these days, it is hard to avoid a feeling of cognitive dissonance. From a distance, the Islamic republic appears to be at its zenith. But from the street level, Iran's grand revolutionary experiment is beset with fragility. The state is in a sense defined by its contradictions, both constitutional and economic. It cannot be truly stable until it resolves them, and yet if it tries to do so, it may not survive.

Report: Iran Denies Centrifuge Work (AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 28, 2007

An Iranian nuclear agency official has denied claims made by a top lawmaker that the Islamic Republic had begun installing 3,000 centrifuges at an uranium enrichment plant, Iran's state-run news agency reported late Saturday.

Hossein Simorgh, head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization public relations department, said "no new centrifuges have been installed in Natanz," referring to the nuclear facility in central Iran, the official Islamic Republic News Agency reported.

Earlier Saturday, lawmaker Alaeddin Boroujerdi said Iran was currently installing the 3,000 centrifuges, underlining that the country would continue to develop its disputed nuclear program despite U.N. sanctions.

Iran faces the prospect of additional United Nations sanctions unless it stops uranium enrichment by the end of a 60-day period that ends next month.

DOJ_NMG_0123303

The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously in favor of economic sanctions Dec. 23 after Iran ignored an earlier deadline to halt enrichment.

Large scale use of centrifuges makes it possible to produce more enriched uranium in a shorter period.

Enriched uranium is used to fuel nuclear reactors and to make nuclear weapons. Many countries, including the United States, believe that Iran is using its nuclear program as a cover to produce an atomic weapon. Iran says its program is only for generating electricity.

Cracks In Iran (WP)

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

THE BUSH administration's recent steps against Iran, which have included the dispatch of a second aircraft carrier to the Persian Gulf and the arrest of Iranian agents in Iraq, have worried a lot of people in Washington, who fear that the White House may be gearing up for another war. Fortunately, some influential people in Tehran appear to be getting nervous, as well. The stock market is dropping, and capital flight is accelerating. Some influential voices have begun publicly suggesting that flexibility as well as toughness is needed in dealing with the West. Pressure is growing on radical President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has been rebuked by voters in recent elections, by parliamentary resolutions and by editorials in newspapers that reflect the views of the country's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei.

All this suggests that the U.S. measures, compounded by a U.N. sanctions resolution, may be having an effect on the mullahs. If so, the impact is sorely needed. During the past year Iran and its ally Syria have behaved as if they can defy the United States and United Nations with impunity. They have pressed a broad and violent offensive against Western interests across the region, from Baghdad to Beirut to the Gaza Strip, even as Iran has rejected Security Council orders to freeze its nuclear program.

It's too early to tell whether Iran will back off from that belligerent agenda: Last week its ally Hezbollah renewed its attempt to stage a coup against Lebanon's pro-Western government. But it's not too soon for the Bush administration to begin working on the next stage of its strategy. That's because the pushback tactics, while necessary to change the atmosphere of hubris in Tehran, aren't likely by themselves to achieve the administration's goals. The pressure needs to be carefully measured, since Iran, too, has the capacity to escalate, both in Iraq and elsewhere. While the threat of military action is useful, this president should not have to resort to that option.

What's needed is a mix of pressure with avenues for moderation by Tehran. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has offered to meet with Iranian officials and discuss a broad agenda of issues but only after the nuclear program is suspended -- a retreat Iran appears unlikely to undertake anytime soon. The administration doesn't help its cause by describing the Islamic regime as a Soviet-like monolith and publicly dividing the Middle East between pro- and anti-Iranian blocs. That ignores the very differences between extremists and moderates that can now be glimpsed in Tehran, and it invites Mr. Ahmadinejad to rally the country on a nationalist platform.

The most promising way of refining the current policy would be to return to a strategy that worked when the Bush administration tried it in 2001, which is engaging Iran in a regional forum. Five years ago the United States and Iran quietly cooperated within a larger group of nations to fashion a new regime in Afghanistan; now they have the possibility to work with Iraq's other neighbors to head off the escalation of sectarian war in Baghdad. To pursue such an initiative while simultaneously stepping up military and economic pressure on Iran, the Bush administration would have to forswear the Manichaeism it is so prone to in foreign affairs. But it might get better results.

20 Killed In Baghdad On Eve Of Holiday (NYT)

By Marc Santora, Damien Cave

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 27 — Shiite neighborhoods in Baghdad came under fierce assault once again on Saturday, following two weeks of violence that left at least 300 dead and many hundreds more wounded.

Many of the recent attacks, nearly all of them in heavily Shiite areas, have occurred during the period of commemoration that leads to one of the holiest days for Shiites, an intense day of mourning known as Ashura that falls this year on Monday.

DOJ_NMG_0123304

Three American soldiers died when a roadside bomb exploded near their vehicle on Saturday north of Baghdad, [a news agency] reported. The news service said that the military confirmed the deaths of two other soldiers who were killed Thursday when their patrol was attacked in eastern Baghdad, and said that two additional soldiers died in separate episodes on Friday in Diyala Province.

Sunni militants have previously staged attacks on Shiites on Ashura, and fears are especially pronounced this year because it will be the first observance of the holy day since the sharp rise in sectarian killings after the bombing of a revered shrine in Samarra last February.

Basim Shareef, a member of Parliament and part of the Shiite coalition that controls the government, said the attacks might be timed to coincide with the Shiite holy days. But he thought it was more likely that militants were taking advantage of the relative lull in activity by Shiite militia leaders, who might be worried about becoming the targets of the new Baghdad security plan.

"I think the parties that might retaliate believe that they are targeted in the new security plan, and that is why they have not taken any retribution," he said.

In Saturday's deadliest attack, at least 15 people were killed and 55 wounded when twin car bombs exploded near a busy market and movie theater in eastern Baghdad, according to an Interior Ministry official.

The first car exploded after barreling into a crowded intersection, where many Shiites had gathered to perform rituals common in the period leading to Ashura, including self-flagellation.

A second bomb, in a vehicle parked nearby, exploded moments later. It was timed to inflict maximum damage just as a crowd gathered to help the victims of the first blast, according to an Iraqi security official.

Women in black chadors helped victims covered in blood reach rescue workers as militia members flooded the area.

At the time of the attack, the neighborhood, known as Jadida, was being guarded by Shiite militiamen as well as the Iraqi Army and the police, residents said.

Although it is unclear who was behind the attack, coordinated car bombings are considered to be a hallmark of Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia, which includes foreign fighters.

The spate of recent attacks appear to have been intended not just to inflict the maximum amount of civilian suffering, but also to grind all aspects of daily life closer to a halt. In a little over a week, schools, busy markets and even an animal market have been targets.

Saturday's violence came on a day when President Bush discussed the new security plan by telephone with Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki. According to a statement released by Mr. Maliki's office, Mr. Bush "renewed his commitment to the Iraqi government."

Despite the violence and the threat of even worse attacks, Iraqi officials said they did not expect ceremonies associated with Ashura to be altered.

Ashura marks the seventh-century death of the Prophet Muhammad's grandson, Hussein, in the battle of Karbala, where the biggest gatherings will be held Monday. Last year's holy day was marked by scattered violence in which fewer than a dozen people were killed, but the two years before that were deadlier.

Two years ago, on the eve and the day of Ashura, 11 suicide bombers killed at least 74 people. In 2004, more than 180 people were killed during Iraq's Ashura commemorations.

In other violence in Baghdad on Saturday, gunmen killed five people from the same Shiite family and wounded three more after storming a home in the Amil neighborhood, the Iraqi authorities said.

Forty bodies were found around the city, most tortured and executed.

And in the Shiite area of Karada, gunmen stormed the office of a computer store and kidnapped at least eight people.

The attack began when four camouflaged S.U.V.'s swept into the crowded street of computer shops just outside the capital's Technology University shortly after noon, witnesses said. Men in camouflage commando uniforms poured out, witnesses said, fired into the air, shouted for people to get into their homes and stormed the Al Basra computer company, situated on the second floor of a nondescript concrete house on the main thoroughfare. They seized the workers and fled.

It was unclear whether the abductors were the police or Iraqi soldiers, or impostors.

DOJ_NMG_0123305

Elsewhere, American forces continued to clash with militants, killing 14 insurgents in an airstrike early on Saturday in Diyala Province.

The attack was directed against “a known foreign-fighter safe house” as the men inside tried to flee, a military statement said.

There was also an explosion in the early evening Saturday in the Green Zone that set off alarms, activating a mechanized voice warning people to duck and cover. It shook houses blocks away and followed an attack on Friday, when two rockets left six non-American workers wounded, according to an American official.

U.S. Troop Deaths Cap Iraq's Bloody Week (AP)

AP, January 27, 2007

BAGHDAD (AP) — The U.S. military reported the deaths of seven more soldiers Saturday, while Sunni insurgent bombers struck yet another market in a predominantly Shiite district, killing at least 13 people in their bid to terrorize Baghdad days before a U.S.-Iraqi military crackdown.

The latest market attack capped a week in which more than 150 people, mostly Shiites, were slain in bomb attacks.

Death squads, believed to be primarily Shiite militiamen, continued their butchery on the other side of Iraq's deepening sectarian divide, with police reporting the discovery of 40 bodies dumped in Baghdad alone. Two of the victims were women and most of the bodies showed signs of torture, police said.

In all, at least 61 victims of Iraq's sectarian warfare were killed or found dead across the country.

Of the seven service members reported dead on Saturday, two died in Diyala province northeast of the capital on Friday, three in an unspecified location north of Baghad on Saturday and two in east Baghdad on Thursday.

The latest reported deaths raised to at least 3,079 the number of U.S. service members who have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count. The figure includes seven military civilians. At least 2,471 died as a result of hostile action, according to the military.

U.S. airstrikes killed 14 insurgents and destroyed a safe house for foreign fighters during a raid south of Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad. Two suspects were captured, the military said.

The Americans said the raid had targeted a foreigner they believed responsible for a series of attacks on U.S. and Iraqi forces in the extremely violent Baqouba region. The military there has been caught in the midst of some of the bloodiest sectarian fighting of the war.

Saturday's bombings employed what has become a classic insurgent tactic. First a suicide car bomber drove into the crowded market stalls in the busy New Baghdad commercial area shortly after noon, then detonated his explosives among the stores and kiosks selling food, clothes, household appliances and birds.

As people rushed to help the victims, a parked car bomb exploded. The 13 killed included two policemen; four officers were among the 42 wounded, police said.

Burned-out hulks of cars and vans littered the market. A bag of fruit lay in the twisted metal on the bloody pavement.

Farooq Haitham, the 33-year-old owner of a watch repair shop, said the area had been targeted by bombers before but shopkeepers had no choice but to keep opening their doors.

"What can we do? We want to live. We need the money so we come to work," Haitham said.

It was the latest in a series of attacks against commercial targets, in which more than 150 people have died since last Sunday. The attack signals a tough battle ahead as U.S. and Iraqi forces prepare for the security operation, a third bid to pacify the capital since Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki took power on May 25.

The week's deadliest attack killed 88 people Monday when a suicide car bomber crashed into a market in the central neighborhood of Bab al-Sharqi.

Shortly before sunset Saturday, a rocket slammed into the Green Zone, wounding two people slightly. It was the second time in three days that rockets hit the area, home to the U.S. Embassy, the Iraqi government and thousands of American troops.

DOJ_NMG_0123306

In central Baghdad, police said armed men in police commando uniforms and driving cars with license plates commonly used by the Interior Ministry raided a computer shop in a Christian section of the Sina'a neighborhood. They took away four employees and three customers.

"The group pointed their guns at the victims and the passersby, then they forced the victims into the cars and they sped away," Younis Kadhim, 36, who owns a small restaurant nearby.

Two mortar shells also slammed into a residential district in the western Baghdad neighborhood of Hurriyah, police said, killing two people and wounding seven others.

A taxi driver was shot to death after he was caught in the crossfire during clashes in Mosul. A parked car bomb targeting an Iraqi army patrol later exploded in the northern city, killing one civilian and wounding another.

Seven U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq (WT/AP)

By Bassem Mroue

The Washington Times, January 28, 2007

BAGHDAD -- The U.S. military reported the deaths of seven American soldiers yesterday, while Sunni insurgent bombers struck yet another market in a predominantly Shi'ite district, killing at least 13 persons in their bid to terrorize Baghdad days before a U.S.-Iraqi military crackdown.

The latest market attack capped a week in which more than 150 people, mostly Shi'ites, were slain in bomb attacks.

Death squads, thought to be primarily Shi'ite militiamen, continued their butchery on the other side of Iraq's deepening sectarian divide, with police reporting the discovery of 40 bodies dumped in Baghdad alone. Two of the victims were women, and most of the bodies showed signs of torture, police said.

In all, at least 61 victims of Iraq's sectarian warfare were killed or found dead across the country.

Of the seven U.S. service members reported dead yesterday, two died in Diyala province northeast of the capital on Friday, three in an unspecified location north of Baghdad yesterday and two in east Baghdad on Thursday.

The latest reported deaths raised to at least 3,079 the number of U.S. service members who have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003, according to an Associated Press count.

U.S. air strikes killed 14 insurgents and destroyed a safe house for foreign fighters during a raid south of Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad. Two suspects were captured, the military said.

The Americans said the raid had targeted a foreigner they thought to be responsible for a series of attacks on U.S. and Iraqi forces in the extremely violent Baqouba region. The military there has been caught in the midst of some of the bloodiest sectarian fighting of the war.

Yesterday's bombings employed what has become a classic insurgent tactic.

First, a suicide car bomber drove into the crowded market stalls in the busy New Baghdad commercial area shortly after noon, then detonated his explosives among the stores and kiosks selling food, clothes, household appliances and birds.

As people rushed to help the victims, a parked car bomb exploded.

The 13 killed included two policemen. Four other officers were among the 42 wounded, police said.

Burned-out hulks of cars and vans littered the market. A bag of fruit lay in the twisted metal on the bloody pavement.

Farooq Haitham, the 33-year-old owner of a watch-repair shop, said the area had been targeted by bombers before, but shopkeepers had no choice but to keep opening their doors.

"What can we do? We want to live. We need the money, so we come to work," Mr. Haitham said.

It was the latest in a series of attacks against commercial targets, in which more than 150 people have died since last Sunday. The attack signals a tough battle ahead as U.S. and Iraqi forces prepare for the security operation, a third bid to pacify the capital since Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki took power on May 25.

The week's deadliest attack killed 88 persons Monday when a suicide car bomber crashed into a market in the central neighborhood of Bab al-Sharqi.

Seven U.S. Soldiers Killed In Iraq Over Three Days (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

DOJ_NMG_0123307

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

BAGHDAD, Jan. 27 -- Seven U.S. soldiers were killed in Iraq over the past three days, the military said Saturday, as violence in the capital and elsewhere continued to surge.

Three of the soldiers were killed Saturday north of Baghdad when an improvised explosive device detonated near their vehicle, the military said in a statement.

A Task Force Lightning soldier assigned to the 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division was killed Friday in Diyala province in eastern Iraq when an improvised explosive device struck his vehicle, according to a military statement. Another soldier was killed Friday in Diyala when his unit came under attack, the military said.

The military also announced that two soldiers were killed Thursday in eastern Baghdad when their vehicle struck an improvised explosive device.

The soldiers' names were withheld pending notification of their relatives, officials said.

Iraqi civilians also were targeted in the violence.

Two suicide bombers drove into a market in the New Baghdad neighborhood of the capital and simultaneously detonated explosives in their vehicles, said Maj. Kassim Abdul Karim of the Iraqi Ministry of Interior. At least 13 people were killed in the attack, the latest in a string of bombings this week in areas where Shiite Muslims congregate.

More than 45 bodies with shotgun wounds were found in Baghdad during the past 48 hours, said Brig. Salim Muhsin, another Interior Ministry spokesman.

Also Saturday, armed men wearing what appeared to be Iraqi police uniforms and driving vehicles that looked like police cars raided a computer store in the Sinaa sector of the capital. The gunmen kidnapped eight employees and stole several computers, the ministry spokesman said.

Zaid Sadiq, a merchant who works near the raided store in eastern Baghdad, said the gunmen abducted only men but stole cellphones from women.

"How can we work or live like this?" Sadiq asked. "They looked exactly like police -- how can we resist them? They were in police uniforms, and who's to say that they are not police?"

Meanwhile, a prominent politician in the western city of Ramadi was kidnapped and killed, according to a physician at Ramadi Hospital. Saied Hussein al-Alwani, a council member, was abducted by suspected members of the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq; his body was discarded on a road an hour later with four shotgun wounds, according to Mahmood al-Ani, the physician.

Ani said the politician was killed because he had been "accused of helping the American forces." Al-Qaeda in Iraq posted a statement at a mosque asserting responsibility for the killing, Ani said.

In Baghdad, two rockets fired into the fortified Green Zone at 4 p.m. slightly injured two people, a U.S. Embassy spokesman said. "We are currently investigating the incident," spokesman Lou Fintor said.

It was the second rocket attack this week on the compound that houses the U.S. Embassy and the Iraqi parliament.

Iraqi officials said the U.S. Consulate in Hilla, the capital of Babil province, was attacked with mortars. Fintor said he did not have information about the reported attack.

60 Civilians, 7 U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi,

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

15 of the dead are victims of a double suicide car bombing at an outdoor market in Baghdad.

BAGHDAD — At least seven U.S. soldiers were killed in separate combat incidents, the U.S. military said Saturday, amid a steady swirl of violence against American troops and Iraqi civilians.

Nationwide, at least 60 Iraqis were killed or found dead Saturday as U.S. and Iraqi officials struggled to find a formula to calm sectarian passions and reduce the American troop presence.

Three U.S. soldiers were killed Saturday north of Baghdad when a roadside bomb exploded near an Army vehicle conducting a security escort mission. One soldier was wounded.

DOJ_NMG_0123308

The U.S. military disclosed no further details about the attack, but a farmer in the Tarmiya region north of Baghdad described an incident in which a roadside bomb destroyed a U.S. Humvee near his home. A U.S. helicopter arrived to evacuate the casualties, he said.

Two soldiers were killed Friday in separate bomb attacks northeast of the capital in Diyala province. One was assigned to the 1st Cavalry Division. The other was killed in an attack that left three soldiers wounded, the military said.

Two troops were killed Thursday in east Baghdad in a bomb attack on a combat patrol that also left two soldiers wounded.

The deaths brought the number of U.S. military personnel killed in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003 to 3,075, according to icasualties.org.

In east Baghdad, two suicide car bombers struck a crowded outdoor market in a poor district, killing at least 15 Iraqis and injuring dozens. The bombing in Jadida was one of many recent attacks on civilians in the capital's Shiite-dominated outdoor shopping venues.

Police and witnesses said two suicide bombers driving cars plowed into the crowds within seconds of each other just after the noontime call to prayer.

"The first explosion was very powerful, then the second explosion took place," said Haidar Abdul-Mohsen, 37, a minivan driver who witnessed the attacks. "I saw some bodies of people. Two were completely charred."

Authorities suspect that many such bombers are young Sunni Arab men from other countries heeding religious calls to fight against the U.S. military and Iraq's Shiite government. Iraqi soldiers at a checkpoint in south Baghdad on Saturday detained four foreign Arabs in a car containing suicide belts. Authorities declined to disclose their nationalities.

Elsewhere in Baghdad, gunmen attacked the house of a Shiite family in a western neighborhood, killing four and leaving a 10-year-old boy for dead.

Gunmen wearing police uniforms raided a shop in the city's main computer bazaar, kidnapping the store manager and seven others, police said.

Mortar rounds struck a mostly Shiite neighborhood in north Baghdad, killing one and injuring 10. Another family on a nearby side street was sprayed with gunfire in an attack that killed one and injured three.

South of the capital, a man was killed in a drive-by shooting in Iskandariya, and police in Hillah banned vehicles in an effort to protect pilgrims walking to Karbala for an annual Shiite religious festival. Two Iraqi soldiers were shot and killed in the area.

In southern Iraq, authorities in the port city of Basra discovered the bodies of four men who had been kidnapped a day earlier. And in Suwayrah, authorities discovered the corpses of five teenagers in pajamas floating in the Tigris River. All had been handcuffed, blindfolded and shot.

In the northern city of Kirkuk, a car bomb killed two people who later were identified as would-be suicide bombers.

daragahi@latimes.com

Special correspondents in Baghdad, Basra, Hillah and Kirkuk contributed to this report.

Bombs At Baghdad Market Kill 15; 7 U.S. Troops Die (CNN)

CNN.com, January 27, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq (CNN) -- Twin car bombs exploded in a busy Baghdad market Saturday morning, killing 15 people, Baghdad police officials said.

Separately, seven U.S. troops were killed in three incidents Saturday.

Two Iraqi police officers were among the people killed in the Baghdad blasts, and five other officers were wounded.

It was the second Baghdad market bombing in two days. On Friday, 15 people died when the popular Ghazel pet market, where people buy and sell monkeys, cats and dogs, was attacked.

In addition to the 15 killed in Saturday's bombings in southeastern Baghdad, 55 people were injured. The first of the two car explosions was a suicide attack, police said.

Another person was killed and 16 more were injured in northwest Baghdad's Hurriya neighborhood after two mortar rounds landed in a residential area Saturday, a Baghdad police official said.

DOJ_NMG_0123309

About 38 miles (60 kilometers) south of Baghdad, in al-Iskandariya, two Iraqi soldiers were killed and two others were wounded when gunmen opened fire on a civilian car, a Hilla police official said.

The soldiers were in civilian clothes and were headed back to their military base in Baghdad after a vacation, the official said.

In other violence, 40 bodies were found strewn across various Baghdad neighborhoods, according to Baghdad emergency police.

Also Saturday in Baghdad, gunmen dressed as Iraqi national police officers stormed a computer store, abducted seven people and sped off in three vehicles, Baghdad police said.

It is not the first report of gunmen disguising themselves. Attackers have been reported wearing Iraqi Army, national police and commando uniforms, as well as uniforms that resemble U.S. military attire.

In October, U.S. Maj. Gen. William Caldwell said Iraqi police brigades were forced to buy new uniforms after gunmen committed "criminal acts and sectarian violence" while dressed as police officers.Seven U.S. troop deaths reported

Three U.S. soldiers conducting a security escort mission were killed and one wounded Saturday in a bombing north of Baghdad, the U.S. military said.

They were from Multi-National Division-Baghdad.

Earlier Saturday, the military reported four other U.S. troop deaths -- two in Diyala province on Friday and two in eastern Baghdad on Thursday.

The number of U.S. military deaths in the Iraq war now stands at 3,067. Seven civilian contractors for the military also have been killed.

About 35 miles north of Baghdad -- near the city of Baquba -- coalition forces killed 14 suspected terrorists in an airstrike Saturday. Two more suspected terrorists were arrested during morning raids targeting safe houses for foreign fighters, the U.S. military said.

Two more insurgents were killed in southern Kirkuk when their car, rigged with explosives, detonated outside a Shiite mosque, a Kirkuk police official said. Iran fires back

Saturday's violence comes a day after a national security official confirmed that President Bush had authorized the U.S. military to capture or kill Iranian agents in Iraq who are plotting attacks against U.S.-led coalition forces.

Although the Iranian mission to the U.N. had no official comment on the policy, an article by the Islamic republic's semi-official FARS news agency quoted a top Iranian official as saying that the U.S. policy constituted "terrorist measures"

"Such a measure illustrates the failure of the United States' new strategy in Iraq because it has had no effect in quelling unrests and restoring calm and order and has instead roused intensified reactions in Iraq," said Alaoddin Boroujerdi, chairman of the Iranian Parliament's national policy commission, according to FARS.

"Such moves are deemed as terrorist measures and are in blatant contradiction to the international rules and regulations," Boroujerdi is quoted as saying.

The Iraqi government will have to share responsibility for the "illogical and incredible" policy if the reports are true, Boroujerdi said, according to FARS.

An Iranian official at the United Nations, who did not wish to be identified, said the policy will help neither Americans nor Iraqis. The Iranians, he said, are in Iraq to help.

This month, U.S. forces detained five Iranians in the northern Iraqi city of Irbil, a U.S. military officer said.

A preliminary investigation found links between the detainees and the Iranian Revolutionary Guard, which has provided funds, weapons, bomb technology and training to extremist groups in Iraq, the coalition said.Bush defends policy, asserts it's confined to Iraq

Bush reportedly approved the plan in the last couple months in an effort to be tougher with the Islamic republic.

"Some are trying to say that because we're helping ourselves in Iraq by stopping outside influence from killing our soldiers or hurting Iraqi people that we want to expand this beyond the borders," Bush said.

"That's a presumption that's simply not accurate. We believe that we can solve our problems with Iran diplomatically. And we're working to do that. As a matter of fact, we're making pretty good progress on that front," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0123310

The White House has rejected calls by the Iraq Study Group to diplomatically engage Iraq's neighbors, including Iran and Syria. The Bush administration says it will not meet with Iranian officials until the nation moves to end its alleged nuclear weapons program.

Iran has repeatedly denied interfering within Iraq's borders, but Defense Secretary Robert Gates backed the president in Friday remarks, saying the policy is aimed at outside forces who mean harm to U.S. and coalition forces.

"Our forces are authorized to go after those who are trying to kill them," Gates said. "If you're in Iraq and trying to kill our troops, you should consider yourself a target."

Asked whether the measure is part of an "anti-Iran strategy," Gates said he does not think so, but "we're not simply going to stand by and let people bring sophisticated IEDs [handmade bombs, or "improvised explosive devices"] into the country that can disable an Abrams tank and give them a free pass. But as we've said before, we think we can handle this inside the borders of Iraq and the operations are limited to inside the borders of Iraq."

Leaders of Iraq's Shiite Muslim community have strong ties to Iran, including powerful Iraqi cleric Abdel-Aziz al-Hakim.

Al-Hakim leads the Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq (SCIRI), the Iraqi party most closely associated with Iran.

As violence between Shiites and Sunnis rises, along with insurgent attacks on U.S. and Iraq forces, Bush has ordered that 21,500 more U.S. troops go to Iraq.

Contractor Deaths In Iraq Nearing 800 (HC)

By David Ivanovich, Brett Clanton

Houston Chronicle, January 28, 2007

Laboring in a war with no discernible front line, more than 770 civilian contractors have died in Iraq since the U.S.-led invasion began in March 2003.

Statistics kept by the Labor Department indicate fatalities among civilian contractors working for American firms escalated rapidly late last year, with at least 301 dying in Iraq in 2006 — including 124 in the final three months.

U.S. military deaths totaled 818 during the year, the Defense Department has reported.

Despite the danger, job seekers continue to flood contractors' offices with résumés.

Some 165,000 prospective employees contacted Houston-based Halliburton Co.'s KBR last year about job opportunities in Iraq, Kuwait and Afghanistan, company officials said. KBR now has half a million résumés on file.

And the recent troop "surge" announced by President Bush has prompted KBR to increase its hiring, company Chief Executive Officer Bill Utt said Friday.

Among the job seekers crowding into a recent KBR orientation program at Greenspoint Mall, many of the job seekers crowding into a recent KBR orientation program at Greenspoint Mall were fatalistic about the risks.

"When it comes your time, it comes your time," said Robert Hulion, 59, of Crestview, Fla., before being deployed to Iraq to work as a fumigation specialist.

"I've been through Vietnam, and I've been to New York City. But what I call dangerous is Mardi Gras in New Orleans," Hulion joked.

Hulion has joined what the Pentagon estimates to be 100,000 civilians working for U.S.-based contractors in Iraq.

Supplementing the 130,000 American troops serving in the country, these civilians provide a wide variety of functions, including serving up chow and interrogating prisoners.

The 100,000 figure is an estimate because, nearly four years into the war, the Pentagon is just now conducting its first survey to determine how many civilian contractors are working in Iraq.

And Pentagon officials, citing military regulations, don't track contractor deaths.

Contract worth billionsHalliburton's KBR is the largest military contractor operating in Iraq, with more than 50,000 employees and subcontractors working there, as well as in Kuwait and Afghanistan.

Working under a multibillion-dollar contract with the Army, KBR crews drive trucks, wash clothes, deliver mail and provide a host of other support services for U.S. troops.

DOJ_NMG_0123311

KBR's workers are a critical component of the Pentagon's privatization strategy, enabling the military to reduce the number of troops needed in the country by turning over noncombat functions to civilians.

The idea behind the privatization plan was to keep these noncombatants away from the fighting. But that has proved impossible in violence-riddled Iraq.

"The whole place is a front line," said Peter Singer, a senior fellow at the Washington-based Brookings Institution and author of Corporate Warriors: The Rise of the Privatized Military Industry.

The contractor death toll rose last week when five Americans working for Blackwater USA were killed in Baghdad after their helicopter was shot down by insurgents. The contractors were rushing to help a U.S. Embassy convoy that had come under attack.

Civilian contractors killed in Iraq are often eligible — and many have received — the defense secretary's Medal for the Defense of Freedom, the so-called Purple Heart for civilians working on behalf of the military.

But their names are left off the Pentagon's Iraq casualty rolls.

If they were counted, the U.S. military's official casualty figures — 3,063 as of Friday — would be 25 percent higher.

"Since Day 1, the administration has been very, very comfortable artificially deflating the human cost of our effort in Iraq," said Steven Schooner, co-director of the government-procurement law program at George Washington University Law School.

The Pentagon's failure to report contractor deaths angers some family members whose loved ones died working in Iraq.

"There are so many of them who have been killed, and they're not acknowledged," noted Hollie Hulett, whose husband, Stephen, a truck driver, was killed when his convoy was ambushed in April 2004. "They're swept under the rug."

Tracking casualtiesThe 770 tally — representing fatalities (including deaths by natural causes) between March 2003 and Dec. 31, 2006 — was tabulated by the Labor Department's Division of Longshore and Harbor Workers' Compensation.

Last year's contractor fatalities represent 39 percent of the deaths reported by the Labor Department.

Besides those killed, another 7,761 civilian contractors had been injured in Iraq as of Dec. 31, the Labor Department said.

The Labor Department has these numbers because it tracks workers' compensation claims by injured workers or families of slain contractors under the federal Defense Base Act.

"Using employee time lost is a kind of a weird way to track casualties," Singer noted. "But it's part of the bizarre nature of this industry and the way it's been used in Iraq."

Still, the Labor Department figures don't tell the full story.

KBR, for instance, says 95 of its employees and subcontractors have been killed in Iraq, Kuwait and Afghanistan. Company officials declined to say exactly how many have died in Iraq alone.

The Labor Department provided the Houston Chronicle a breakdown of fatalities and injuries by contractor, through the end of December, but this list does not identify any deaths as KBR fatalities.

The database has many — often intentional — holes. The Labor Department, for instance, won't specify an employer if that contractor has fewer than seven cases in a particular category, a department spokesman said via e-mail.

Contractor injuriesAside from the deaths, KBR officials say 430 workers and subcontractors had been injured because of hostile action in Iraq, Kuwait and Afghanistan.

In terms of fatalities, however, KBR reported a decline in 2006. The company and its subcontractors suffered 17 fatalities last year, compared with 41 in 2004.

KBR officials would not discuss why their fatalities dropped last year.

"To avoid jeopardizing the safety and security of our employees and subcontractors, we will not detail the specific measures that are currently in place," company spokeswoman Melissa Norcross said.

The Labor Department records indicate L-3 Services Group, which provides translators and interpreters for the Army, had suffered the worst casualties in Iraq: 241 workers killed by the end of 2006, including 32 in the last three months of the year.

The actual number of L-3 Services Group fatalities in Iraq, noted Rick Kiernan, the company's vice president for strategic communications, was 255 as of Dec. 31 and 261 as of Friday.

Many of those victims were Iraqis, known to be working with Americans and then assassinated while off duty, Kiernan said.

DOJ_NMG_0123312

The spate of contractor deaths suffered by L-3 Services during the fourth quarter, Kiernan said, could reflect the timing of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan, when many of the workers returned home for the holiday.

The U.S. arm of Britain's ArmorGroup International, a private security firm, has seen 22 workers die in Iraq, the Labor records show.

Company spokesman Patrick Toyne Sewell declined to confirm those figures, noting: "'If you focus on the numbers, you start to consider people as numbers, rather than as much-missed friends or colleagues."

"We aim to prevent any (casualties) at all," Toyne Sewell said.

In their discussions about Iraq, military experts had been assuming contractor casualties would account for, perhaps, 10 percent of the total U.S.-related fatalities.

If the Labor Department figures are correct, contractors accounted for 27 percent of all U.S.-related fatalities last year.

"The question is: Is this better data, or is the rate going up at a frightening pace?" Schooner said.

Of the 770 victims, only 144 have been certified as having died as a direct result of enemy action, a Labor Department spokesman said.

Why that figure would be so low — fewer than one in five fatalities — is not completely clear. But L-3 Services' Kiernan noted that the assassinations of off-duty workers, for example, would not be counted as combat deaths.

How many of these civilian-contractor casualties were American citizens is unknown. Labor officials say they cannot provide a breakdown by nationality.

Splitting the contractDespite the new hiring, KBR's activity in Iraq has declined since a peak set back in 2004, although the company still performed $4.8 billion worth of work last year, including $1.2 billion in the fourth quarter, the company's figures show.

The Army has decided to split up KBR's huge logistics contract among three companies. But KBR still has plenty of work to do.

In fact, KBR has 1,000 positions to fill in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The applicants funnel through an old Montgomery Ward store at Greenspoint. KBR processes as many as 900 job applicants a week.

In 22 training sessions, instructors cover everything from the dangerous spiders workers might encounter in the Middle East to how to behave if kidnapped.

For Trish Anderson of West Palm Beach, Fla., a one-year tour with KBR represents a way to receive some financial freedom.

"I want to buy a few more pieces of property, and I have a daughter who's ... going to college," Anderson said.

Like many applicants, Anderson also sees a bigger mission — "to be able to give the gift of freedom."

This 38-year-old former Marine Corps staffer and a veteran of both the Persian Gulf War and the Iraq war says she is not going into this blindly.

"I know what the dangers and the stress and the risks are," she said. "Honestly, I don't think it's getting worse. I think it's getting better."

Still, all the uncertainty about the actual level of danger and fatalities appalls critics.

"Should we have to estimate this matter, or should we know it as fact?" asked T. Scott Allen, a Houston attorney representing the Hulett family as well as other families of slain KBR workers and injured employees in a lawsuit against the company.

Rep. Jan Schakowsky, D-Ill., has introduced legislation that would force the administration to report to Congress about civilian casualties.

"I think people have lost patience with this war without calculating in the other 770 people who have died.

"Imagine," Schakowsky said, what the public reaction would be if the reported casualty figures "were now closer to 4,000 people who have died?"

A Conversation Wtih Adel Abdul Mahdi (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0123313

By Lally Weymouth

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

As the Bush administration moved ahead last week with plans to send 21,500 additional troops to Iraq, Washington Post-Newsweek's Lally Weymouth sat down with Iraq's Shiite vice president, Adel Abdul Mahdi, at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland

Many in the United States wonder if the situation in Iraq can be brought under control. Your own prime minister was not supportive in the past of President Bush's sending more troops.

What do you think of the president's plan to send additional troops? What are the chances this will work and what will your government do to help?

We both think, Americans and Iraqis, that Baghdad is a key issue. We have to succeed on that.

But will Bush's "surge" make a difference?

As Iraqis, we think we need more troops in Baghdad. It's up to the multinational forces to decide whether they need more troops.

You talk about multinational forces. But the U.S. administration is sending additional American troops. No one else is volunteering for the job. Are you for that or against it?

I am saying we need more troops in Iraq. Multinational forces are part [of that].

But you have to be for or against the United States sending an additional 20,000 men.

I am not a military man. I can't say if they need to deploy more troops in Baghdad.

You're saying if "they" want to. You mean if the United States wants to send more? That sounds like you don't really care.

I care, but it's a technical question. It's a military question.

But it's not a military question. Americans are going to die. Is it worth the sacrifice?

I can [only] measure things seeing them as Iraqis [see them].

[The Americans] are there to succeed, not because they wish to be there. They came with plans, agendas and policies. If they want to succeed, we need more troops.

What are the chances of success with additional troops?

We are optimistic about succeeding. To give you some of the features of the new plan: Baghdad will be isolated and the entrances and exits will be controlled. There will be only 28 checkpoints. Baghdad will be encircled either by barriers or the river. Iraqis now will take the lead while Americans will support us.

Doesn't success depend on your government standing up to the Shiite militias that support it?

We are not facing only militias. We are also facing al-Qaeda and insurgents.

Do you believe the government is capable of stopping the Shiite atrocities?

I think they can do the job if Prime Minister [Nouri al-]Maliki takes the practical measures he is announcing.

It's rumored that you're the favorite of the U.S. government [to replace Maliki].

I think al-Maliki can still do it and he should have his chance.

[Shiite cleric Moqtada] al-Sadr, of course, supports the Iraqi government. What happens if U.S. forces go after him?

We are going to impose laws. If you are going to break the law, this will not be acceptable.

If the United States doesn't have the right to use our military the way we want to and we're operating under the sovereignty of your government, what good are additional U.S. troops?

This is one of the good understandings between us and the Americans. We are very fair on the security issue whether it concerns militias or insurgents. But we are very open in the political process. We want to bring more Shiites on board, more Sunnis on board. I have been asked to be responsible for the political issues within this security plan.

Do you think restoring security in Iraq is doable?

I was in the United States in 2003 and 2004. People were so optimistic at that time, whether Iraqis or Americans. We couldn't tell them that there was a mess in Iraq. We were telling them to be more practical.

Now people are so pessimistic and you can't tell them that this country has a chance.

All Americans see on TV screens are Sunnis slaughtering Shiites and ethnic cleansing in the streets.

DOJ_NMG_0123314

Unfortunately this is true. But this is only one part of the picture. Only 12 months ago, we had elections and 12 million people voted, Sunnis and Shiites.

What can you show in the next couple of months that will inspire confidence?

If we can succeed in Baghdad, then we can give hope, not only to Americans but also to Iraqis. If we can improve services in Baghdad, then journalists will see that, and we'll have a new image.

Do you believe you can really work with the Sunnis?

Of course, yes. Now in the parliament, you can see Sunnis and Shiites. You never saw that before in a country like Iraq.

But there is ethnic cleansing going on in Baghdad.

Absolutely.

How long do you think it would take to restore order in Baghdad?

It depends on many factors. I'm not a magician. I think we need time. Violence will continue in Iraq.

For how long?

I can't tell, to be honest with you. It depends on many things. What we are saying is that to feel successful in Iraq we have to see some shift in the behavior of people. People have to start to depend for their safety on governmental forces, not on militias or other groups.

Is it the government's policy that it will help the people who have been cleansed from their neighborhoods to return to those neighborhoods?

Yes, of course. And this time, when clearing a neighborhood of any kind of violence, then there will be a [police or military] unit stationed there to help people return and to maintain the security situation.

You have a law in Iraq that no one will carry a weapon?

That's right.

Are you going to use that law to have door-to-door searches to disarm the militias?

Of course, we are doing that and there are some achievements.

[Former national security adviser] Brent Scowcroft, who originally opposed the war, said recently that the United States cannot leave, but we cannot remain in the middle of a civil war. What role do you think America should play?

First, I don't think we are in a civil war. We are in a war on civilians. That's what [Abu Musab] al-Zarqawi was trying to do, that's what the insurgents are trying to do. Otherwise, what is the meaning of a car bomb in a university or a market? You are against a society, against civilians. Or, when Sunni militias attack, some Shiite militias attack [in retaliation]. They are not attacking as one [army] against the other, but are attacking civilians from the other community. That's why I say that we are in a war against civilians, not a civil war.

Secondly, the government is still powerful, still feared by the population. Whenever it issues a curfew, it is respected all over Iraq. No country in a civil war respects the decision of a government. We have to go and decrease the sectarian violence, we have to go and protect people from car bombs and from insurgent acts that target civilians and institutions.

Do you believe that President Bush will stay in Iraq or that U.S. troops will leave?

We have to gain the confidence of the American people and the administration.

Do you worry that the United States will withdraw?

Of course we worry. We will be worried whether you stay or leave.

What do you prefer?

We are not going to decide for America. They will decide for themselves. Others bear the responsibility of where we are. We were not consulted about the war decision, we were not consulted about the invasion of Kuwait, we were not consulted about the war between Iran and Iraq, but we have to bear the consequences of all this.

I think America has only two alternatives: to stay or to leave. If they stay, they should stay in a helpful way. I don't think they will take orders from us but we have always advocated the idea of demarcation between our authorities and those of the United States.

Pentagon Seeks New Ways To Recruit (MCT)

DOJ_NMG_0123315

By Drew Brown

McClatchy, January 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — The war in Iraq marks the first time in modern history that the United States has fought an extended conflict with an all-volunteer military.

The strain of fighting nearly four years in a two-front war has put unprecedented stress on the Army and the Marine Corps — which have borne the brunt of the fighting — and has raised serious questions about whether an all-volunteer force can be maintained over the long term.

Even if U.S. troops were to pull out of Iraq tomorrow, the United States faces a war of unknown duration against al-Qaida in Afghanistan and elsewhere. Other threats include Iran and North Korea.

The Iraq Study Group warned in its report last month that the war in Iraq has put the country in a bind.

"An extraordinary amount of sacrifice has been asked of our men and women in uniform, and of their families," the group wrote. "The American military has little reserve force to call on if it needs ground forces to respond to other crises around the world."

"I think America is on a collision course with itself because America has worldwide obligations," said Frank Schaeffer, co-author of "AWOL: The Unexcused Absence of America's Upper Classes From Military Service — and How It Hurts Our Country."

"All it's going to take is one more conflict or one more world crisis," Schaeffer said, "and we would be very soon facing the fact that no matter what our position on these issues is, we're going to be facing a simple choice of act or don't act. And if we do, then we're going to have to have alternatives."

At least one lawmaker has proposed a radical alternative. Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., wants to reinstate the draft.

His proposal would require all U.S. residents ages 18 to 42 to perform two years of national service, either in the military or as civilians working in ports, hospitals or some other public-service role. The only people exempted would be high school students up to age 20, conscientious objectors and those who are too unhealthy to serve.

Rangel, an Army veteran who won a Bronze Star in the Korean War, opposes the Iraq war and has put forth a draft bill every year since 2002. Critics accuse him of political grandstanding.

Some fellow lawmakers find his basic argument compelling. If the war in Iraq is the national security threat that the Bush administration says it is, shouldn't all Americans be asked to shoulder their part of the burden to defend the country? "The answer to that question will be as varied as the people you ask," said Rep. Sanford D. Bishop Jr., D-Ga. "I think it's a legitimate question to ask. I don't personally believe the country is ready for a draft. But I believe that if they felt a serious enough threat, all able-bodied Americans would probably want to support our national security in whatever ways they could."

President Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney define the war in Iraq as the central battleground in the global war on terrorism.

"This is an existential conflict," Cheney said Jan. 14 in an interview on the Fox News Channel. "It's the kind of conflict that's going to drive our policy and our government for the next 20 or 30 or 40 years."

Bush often lauds the military for its service, but critics point out that he's never called on anyone to serve.

Asked recently why he's never asked Americans to make sacrifices for the war, the president said people sacrificed in other ways.

"I think a lot of people are in this fight," Bush said in an interview Jan. 16 with PBS news anchor Jim Lehrer. "I mean, they sacrifice peace of mind when they see the terrible images of violence on TV every night."

President Bush said he'd considered a draft but rejected it. "I think the volunteer Army is working, and we've got to keep it strong," he said.

Charles Moskos, a military sociologist at Northwestern University and a longtime advocate of the draft, said statements such as these exemplified what he called "patriotism-lite."

"It reflects badly not only on the national leadership, it also reflects badly on the American people," said Moskos, himself a former draftee. "They're not calling for the draft, either — you know, put my son in — but that's where it's got to start."

DOJ_NMG_0123316

The United States hasn't had a military draft since 1973, when Congress eliminated conscription as the Vietnam War drew to a close. Five years earlier, Nobel Prize-winning economist Milton Friedman, a champion of free markets, had labeled the draft "inconsistent with a free society."

For most of its history, the United States has been without a draft. The North and the South conscripted forces during the Civil War. There was a draft during World War I and again in World War II. The last draft lasted from 1948 to 1973.

Many military officers, lawmakers and analysts oppose bringing back conscription, saying it would ruin the professionalism and quality that the all-volunteer force has built up over the last 34 years.

"The nature of decentralized tactics today demands a level of professional experience and competence far above what it was 30 and 40 years ago," said Rep. Geoff Davis, R-Ky., a former Army officer and West Point graduate who serves on the House Armed Services Committee.

Davis, who wrote an opinion piece last month that ripped Rangel's proposal to revive the draft, said a return to mandatory service would add unnecessary costs to national defense and would "reduce the productivity of military organizations in general."

"Think about the burden on the unit of somebody who's not motivated or highly disciplined or isn't concerned about the motivation of their peer group; they're going to be a less effective individual," he said.

Davis said he thought that the Army could easily recruit to the level that the Bush administration wanted "with the right kind of expansion plan."

"It's very doable, because we're not talking about an increase of the size of the Reagan-era military," he said.

The Army had 732,000 active-duty soldiers during the 1991 Persian Gulf War, which occurred three years after President Reagan left office. The Army now has about 512,000 active-duty soldiers.

Rep. Jim Marshall, D-Ga., who also serves on the Armed Services Committee, said he generally liked the idea "of a year or two of service for all young Americans. But I don't think we need a draft right now."

"I do think that an all-volunteer service is preferable, and military commanders think the same thing," said Marshall, who served as an Army Ranger in Vietnam.

"The question is if the country is willing to pay for it," he said. "If the country is willing to pay for it, then we can enlist more soldiers."

The Bush administration recognizes that there's a problem and has promised to add 92,000 service members to the Army and the Marine Corps over the next five years.

But that means Army recruiters will have to sign up another 7,000 men and women every year, when they're already struggling and standards have been dropped to meet the current quotas.

Gen. Peter J. Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, has suggested that part of the answer is increasing the incentives to enlist. The Army already offers as much as $40,000 to recruits, however, and personnel costs are taking a larger chunk of the defense budget every year.

In the meantime, Defense Secretary Robert Gates has outlined plans to call up the National Guard and Reserves more frequently. But the more the military relies on its citizen-soldiers to fight the war, the less attractive the Reserves become to those who don't want full-time military careers.

There are concerns that overusing the Guard and Reserves could strain those forces as badly as the active-duty ranks.

"This is clearly not a risk-free set of solutions," said Christine E. Wormuth, a senior fellow at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a national-security research center, and a former Pentagon official who's written extensively about the National Guard and Reserves.

The Pentagon estimates that it would cost about $4 billion more a year to reinstate the draft. New facilities would have to be built to train and house the large numbers of inductees who'd be brought into uniform each year.

The Census Bureau estimates that there are 30 million people ages 18 to 25 in the United States.

About 4 million men and women reach military age each year, but the military needs only a small fraction of that number. That's a fact that those who argue for a return to the draft tend to overlook, said Bernard D. Rostker, the author of "I Want You: The Evolution of the All-Volunteer Force."

DOJ_NMG_0123317

"The fundamental question — which dogged us in the '60s and would dog us again if we return to conscription — is who serves when not all serve?" said Rostker, who's studied military personnel issues for more than three decades and served as a top Pentagon official in the Clinton administration.

Draft proponents say that those whom the military doesn't need could work in homeland security guarding airports, seaports and borders or could work in understaffed hospitals or schools.

The Gates Commission, which President Nixon created in 1969 to look at ways of ending compulsory service, considered a "standby draft" to be an integral part of an all-volunteer force, Rostker said.

At least one commissioner was convinced that while an all-volunteer military might be possible to maintain during peacetime, the draft would have to be reinstated during a major conflict, Rostker said.

So far, the war in Iraq has defied those expectations.

"We're three years into a war right now, and the all-volunteer force is doing remarkably well," Rostker said.

But whether that's sustainable over the long term in the war on terrorism is an open question.

Gates Aims To Lessen Forced Extensions (BSH/AP)

By Pauline Jelinek

Biloxi Sun Herald/AP, January 28, 2007

WASHINGTON - In an action branded a backdoor draft by some critics, the military over the past several years has held tens of thousand of soldiers, sailors, airmen and Marines on the job and in war zones beyond their retirement dates or enlistment length. It is a widely disliked practice that the Pentagon, under new Defense Secretary Robert Gates, is trying to figure out how to cut back on.

Gates has ordered that the practice - known as "stop loss" - must "be minimized." At the same time, he is looking for ways to decrease the hardship for troops and their families, recruit more people for a larger military and reassess how the active duty and reserves are used.

"It's long overdue," said Jules Lobel, vice president of the Center for Constitutional Rights and lawyer for some in the military who have challenged the policy in court. "It has created terrible problems of morale."

Gates has asked the chief of each service branch for a plan by the end of February on how they would rely less on stop loss.

The authority has been used off and on for years and was revived by all services to some extent after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

As an example, the Army revived it in early 2002 to keep people with some skills or specialties deemed critical to the fight against terrorism and later used it to retain whole units, according to an Army chronology of the policy.

Pentagon officials provided no figures on how many people the policy has affected. Yet just in the Army, it is in the tens of thousands.

The Navy stopped a few hundred sailors from leaving in the year after the terrorist attacks and used the policy again after the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in 2003.

The Marine Corps used it from January through August of 2003 and at the high point had some 3,400 active duty troops and 440 reservists held in service under the authority, said 1st Lt. Blanca E. Binstock, a spokeswoman.

The Air Force did not have statistics immediately available.

The Defense Department says the main reason for the policy is to keep units whole for deployments.

Iraqi Soldiers Still Rely Heavily On U.S. (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

TURKI, IRAQ — As dawn broke, a thick mist enveloped the lines of military trucks poised to sweep through a tract of rich farmland where Sunni Arab insurgents had turned miles of irrigation canals into trenches with holes to stash weapons, food and blankets.

A chilly downpour turned narrow dirt roads into sheets of slippery mud that sent vehicles skidding into ditches.

DOJ_NMG_0123318

For the U.S. Army, the weather was a temporary setback. Officers said it actually worked to their advantage because it left the enemy surrounded and exposed to the wet, wind and cold.

But for their Iraqi allies in an ambitious effort to reclaim an insurgent haven in eastern Diyala province, the weather could have spelled the end of the offensive. When U.S. Humvees, Bradley fighting vehicles and tanks pushed ahead two days later, they had to tow the Iraqis to the fight. Their flimsy pickup trucks and minivans had become hopelessly stuck.

As the campaign continued into a second week, U.S. forces flew in everything the Iraqis needed to keep going: ammunition, rice, T-shirts, dry socks and cigarettes.

A long way to go

As pressure mounts here and at home for U.S. troops to start leaving, the assault in Diyala province this month showed how far the Iraqis must go before they can stand on their own.

U.S. troops with the 3rd Brigade Combat Team, 1st Cavalry Division, said the Iraqis had made great strides since they were deployed to the province four months ago. But asked whether the operation would have been possible without the United States, Iraqi Capt. Kader Abdul Kareem Majid shook his head.

"The coalition forces have airplanes, tanks, all the equipment they need. But the Iraqi army does not have that," said Majid, a 10-year veteran of a Kurdish militia that fought Saddam Hussein's army. "We need U.S. support."

The offensive began Jan. 4 with a combined ground and air assault on a remote rural area the size of Baghdad. About 600 U.S. troops joined forces with about 400 soldiers with Iraq's 1st Brigade, 5th Army Division.

Insurgents in the targeted area are thought to be providing support for attacks in Baghdad, Baqubah and other strife-torn cities. Al Qaeda in Iraq last year declared an Islamic caliphate in Diyala, and its leader, Abu Musab Zarqawi, was killed in a U.S. airstrike here in June.

Back then, Iraqi soldiers refused to venture into the region around Turki, stronghold of a tribe that had supplied top officers to Hussein and later forged ties with Al Qaeda and other militant groups. Iraqi soldiers referred to a checkpoint on the northern edge of the region, which drew regular mortar fire, as the "posting of death."

"They are all dangerous here," said recruit Ali Mohammed, a Shiite teenager from western Diyala. "Only the men wearing the same uniform as me are my brothers in this land."

But with the might of the U.S. Army behind them, morale was much higher during this month's offensive. Iraqi soldiers clapped their hands and sang as they rolled out of their base.

The U.S. soldiers said they had to hold the Iraqis back as they conducted a slow and meticulous search of every home, seeking to collect evidence on insurgent activities.

"These guys are not organized, but they are aggressive as hell," said Capt. Andy Hercik, as he prepared a dozen Iraqi soldiers to search a wind-swept village eerily devoid of men. "When we went into the village yesterday, they swarmed the place."

"Like Normandy?" said a laughing Capt. Stephen Dobbins, his troop commander in the 5th Squadron, 73rd Cavalry Regiment, 82nd Airborne Division.

"More like cockroaches when you turn the light on," Hercik replied ruefully.

As the two sides searched mud huts and pillared homesteads, the Iraqis proved adept at spotting an out-of-place carpet concealing a hoard of guns or a bomb tucked among the reeds.

It was also Iraqis who recognized three brothers identified as key members of a group known as the Council, which oversaw insurgent activities in the region, just as U.S. forces were about to walk away from their mechanical repair shop in Turki.

Dobbins was delighted when he saw Iraqi soldiers squatting in a waterlogged field outside another village to provide cover as others pushed in.

"This is awesome. They are moving tactically, pulling security," he said. "This is a great step forward for these guys."

Details kept secret

But there also was friction. Fearful that information would leak to the insurgents, U.S. commanders kept details of the operation from all but the most senior Iraqi officers until hours before it began. Even so, one detainee later said he had been tipped off by an Iraqi officer.

Iraqi commanders said the tight security prevented them from preparing properly.

DOJ_NMG_0123319

"I didn't have time to organize supplies, vehicles or ammunition for the soldiers," said Majid, a company commander.

Although Iraqi officers emphasized their support for the U.S. forces' methodical approach to clearing villages, many of their men grew impatient. They repeatedly asked in broken English, "When we kill Wahhabis?," a reference to adherents of the fundamentalist form of Sunni Islam practiced by many Al Qaeda members.

U.S. soldiers assured them they would get their chance. But because of the yawning technological gap between them, it was the Americans who did most of the killing.

U.S. troops used advanced optics and aerial surveillance to spot small groups of gunmen and then called in thundering artillery and airstrikes. More than 100 were believed killed, in most cases before they had fired a shot.

"Look at our equipment. It is not like the Americans'," said Mohammed Habeeb, a Shiite soldier from the southern city of Basra, holding a battered machine gun with no sight. "Most of the insurgents would rather go after the Americans, but they are scared of them. So who do they go after? The ordinary Iraqi soldier."

Majid said he was forced to rely on U.S. aircraft to ferry in supplies and evacuate the wounded. Most of his vehicles had no armor plating or covers to shield his men from the elements. And his radios did not have the range to communicate with his headquarters.

After a rain-soaked night spent huddled beneath their vehicles, many of the Iraqi soldiers clamored to return to the rear for a hot meal — with bloody consequences.

An antitank mine ripped through the Iraqi convoy, killing a soldier and injuring three. They were among at least eight Iraqis killed and 29 injured during the operation. Antitank mines also injured more than a dozen U.S. soldiers, but because their vehicles were better protected, most of their injuries were less serious.

The United States has supplied the Iraqi 5th Army Division with 181 of a promised 211 armor-plated Humvees, U.S. officials said. But many were deployed elsewhere, and at least 45 already had been destroyed by roadside bombs or were awaiting repairs, they said.

U.S. officials are reluctant to provide more sophisticated equipment until they are confident the Iraqis can maintain and keep track of it.

Much of the training in coming months will focus on building logistics systems, they said.

"A lot of the Iraqi soldiers have the will and want to fight," said Lt. Col. Michael Beaudette, executive officer for five teams of U.S. trainers embedded with the 5th Division. "But in order for them to succeed, they need to be supplied and maintained."

Corruption is also a problem, he said. Some commanders inflate the numbers in their units so they can pick up the extra salaries, then wonder why they get asked to do missions they can't handle, he said. It also can take months for a promotion to be reflected in a soldier's pay.

"If you don't take care of your soldiers, they are going to walk," he said. "Because in Iraq, the soldiers are not held under any law to stay."

Suspicious Sunnis

The region's residents, most of them Sunnis, were suspicious of the mostly Shiite Arab and Kurdish soldiers, accusing them of shakedowns and arbitrary arrests when not accompanied by U.S. forces.

"We hear that sometimes they take the men, and they don't come back," said a worried Hanna Gatan. A gaunt woman wrapped in a green veil, she sat on a mat with her husband's second wife and their six squirming children while the soldiers searched their home. She said their husband was away herding sheep.

"What if they take him?" she asked. "He is the only man we have. Can you imagine a family without a man? Who will be responsible?"

U.S. and Iraqi soldiers detained about 50 suspects and seized dozens of weapons caches in the area, then set up a new base to maintain a presence. There are plans to improve water and electricity distribution, fix roads and open schools to undercut support for the insurgency.

It remains to be seen whether the Iraqis can hold the area after the Americans leave. But they said they already had achieved one important victory.

DOJ_NMG_0123320

"The government did not control this place before," Majid said. "Now, the people understand that the government can go anyplace it wants."

Iraq Cultivates Ties To Democrats (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

BAGHDAD — Representatives of Iraq's government are hedging their bets on America's political future, hoping to keep U.S. support for their country strong by building ties with a Democratic Party that now controls Congress and is closely scrutinizing President Bush's Iraq policy.

"There's a decision to be in contact, find out what they want, what their concerns are and to tell them of our concerns as well," said Ali Adeeb, a Shiite lawmaker and close associate of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki.

Republicans have dominated Iraq policy since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003. Many of the first U.S. officials in Iraq were handpicked party activists.

In one sense, the Nov. 7 election that handed Democrats control of Congress changed little, even though it was largely viewed as a repudiation of the White House's Iraq policy. The State and Defense departments are still the primary instruments of policy in Iraq.

A top government official close to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), who ended a brief visit to Iraq on Saturday, said the Bush administration remains the final arbiter of decisions on how much continued U.S. military and financial support the Iraqis receive.

But the election that changed the political dynamic in Washington also altered the rules of the game here. Iraqi leaders studied and discussed the possibility of a Democratic takeover for months before the vote. They concluded early that even the most staunchly antiwar Democrats would not abandon Iraq. In heated discussions, lawmakers reminded one another that it was Democratic President Clinton who signed the 1998 Iraq Liberation Act, which funded the opposition movements now in power.

The Shiite Muslim leadership has informally recommended to ministerial and parliamentary delegations heading to Washington that they cultivate closer relationships with Democrats as well as Republicans.

"They have to see people from both sides, because they are both taking part in the administration of the country," Adeeb said. "Whoever is a decision-maker in America, we have to have relations with."

Many pointed out advantages to the Democrats' increased sway over Iraq policy. Government officials said they had generally found the Democratic position on handing over security to Iraqi forces sooner rather than later closer to theirs. Almost all agree on Democratic Party initiatives, squashed when Republicans controlled Congress, to prevent the building of permanent U.S. bases here. They note news reports of Democrats acknowledging the suffering of the Iraqi population.

"I see that the Democratic ideas are more related to reality," said Ammar Tuma, a lawmaker who serves in Maliki's ruling Shiite coalition. "They talk about the real problems that the Iraqis are facing every day."

To date, government officials said, they've also found Democratic visitors such as Pelosi, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois less parochial, more culturally sensitive and more willing to listen to Iraqi concerns than Republicans.

"Before, Bush used to order Iraqi officials to do this and that," said one member of Maliki's Islamic Dawa Party, who spoke on condition of anonymity. "The Republicans were dictating the political process in Iraq. With the Democrats in control of Congress, the Republicans are now less influential than before. It helps us in a sense to breathe a bit more and to have more freedom."

Many of the Shiites around Maliki still harbor bitterness about the Bush administration's push to remove then-interim Prime Minister Ibrahim Jafari from his post last year. They considered the pressure inappropriate interference in Iraq's domestic affairs. They were also angered by recent remarks by Bush and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice questioning whether Maliki was up to the job of leading Iraq.

The Republican Party's election drubbing not only elevated Democrats, but also emboldened Maliki, who has begun criticizing the American president almost as much as Bush's deputies criticized him.

DOJ_NMG_0123321

"I understand and realize that inside the American administration there is some kind of a crisis situation, especially after the results of the last election," he told reporters this month.

"It's more balanced now," said the Dawa Party member who asked not to be named. "What we're seeing is Mr. Maliki criticizing Bush. You didn't have that before."

After weeks of icy relations and criticism, including a televised interview in which Bush faulted Maliki for the way the execution of ousted dictator Saddam Hussein was handled, the two men spoke Saturday by phone. It was the first time they had talked since Bush outlined his new Iraq policy. It was also the day Pelosi and a delegation of lawmakers wrapped up meetings with Iraqi officials.

"Now it's different because [the Democrats] have some decision-making power," said Farooq Abdullah, a Maliki advisor. "Before, we were meeting mostly with the Republicans because they were the ones in power. Now we're meeting with both of them."

Army Probes War Contractor Fraud (AP)

AP, January 27, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) — From high-dollar fraud to conspiracy to bribery and bid rigging, Army investigators have opened up to 50 criminal probes involving battlefield contractors in the war in Iraq and the U.S. fight against terrorism, the Associated Press has learned.

Senior contracting officials, government employees, residents of other countries and, in some cases, U.S. military personnel have been implicated in millions of dollars of fraud allegations.

"All of these involve operations in Iraq, Afghanistan and Kuwait," Chris Grey, a spokesman for the U.S. Army Criminal Investigation Command, confirmed Saturday to the AP.

"CID agents will pursue leads and the truth wherever it may take us," Grey said. "We take this very seriously."

Battlefield contractors have been implicated in allegations of fraud and abuse since the war in Iraq began in spring 2003. A special inspector general office that focused solely on reconstruction spending in Iraq developed cases that led to four criminal convictions.

The problems stem in part from the Pentagon's struggle to get a handle on the unprecedented number of contractors now helping run the nation's wars. Contractors are used in battle zones to do nearly everything but fight. They run cafeterias and laundries for troops, move supplies, run communication systems and repair weapons systems.

Special agents from the Army's major procurement fraud unit recently were dispatched to Iraq, Afghanistan and Kuwait, where they are "working closely and sharing information with other law enforcement agencies in the region," Grey said.

"Given the billions of dollars in contract dollars that have been and are being spent, it is our experience that our agents will detect millions of dollars in fraud before we are done," Grey said. "And just as likely, we will be instrumental in bringing back to the U.S. government millions of dollars in recoveries."

One case involves an Army chief warrant officer accused of taking a $50,000 bribe to steer a contract for paper products and plastic flatware away from a government contractor and to a Kuwaiti company, according to an indictment unsealed Thursday in federal court at Rock Island, Ill.

Prosecutors say the officer took the bribe while at Camp Arifjan in Kuwait, while he was the Army's food service adviser for Iraq, Afghanistan and Kuwait, according to the indictment. The officer is also accused of trying to smuggle $40,000 in undeclared cash into the United States on a December 2005 flight from Kuwait to Dover, Del.

Other cases involve a government officer manipulating a contract in exchange for large bribes, a contractor making false claims against the government and an official accepting gratuities. The cases range in type, seriousness and complexity and involve contractors both inside and outside the United States.

The Pentagon has viewed outsourcing a wide variety of military tasks as much more efficient, leaving troops trained in combat to the business of war.

But the Government Accountability Office reported in December that the military has been losing millions of dollars because it cannot monitor industry workers in far-flung locations.

DOJ_NMG_0123322

The Defense Department's inability to manage contractors effectively has hurt military operations and unit morale and cost the Pentagon money, the GAO said.

Some 60,000 contractors have been supporting the Army in Southwest Asia, which includes Iraq. That compares with 9,200 contractors in the 1991 Persian Gulf War.

Commanders are often unsure how many contractors use their bases and require food, housing and protection, according to the report. One Army official said the service estimates losing about $43 million each year on free meals provided to contractors who also get a food allowance.

The new Democratic Congress plans to ramp up oversight of the billions of dollars being spent in Iraq, including dollars awarded to contractors. Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, has said he plans to target contractor abuse.

Vietnam Shades Warner's Iraq Stand (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

Virginia Sen. John W. Warner's words betray the guilt he still carries about the Vietnam War and help explain why this pillar of the Republican establishment is leading a bipartisan revolt against the war plans of a president in his own party.

"I regret that I was not more outspoken" during the Vietnam War, the former Navy secretary said in an interview in his Capitol Hill office. "The Army generals would come in, 'Just send in another five or ten thousand.' You know, month after month. Another ten or fifteen thousand. They thought they could win it. We kept surging in those years. It didn't work."

Is that a lesson for what's going on in Iraq?

"Well, you don't forget something like that," he answers. There is a long pause, he closes his eyes and his voice gets softer. "No. You don't forget those things."

More than 30 years after Vietnam, Warner is once again watching as generals propose additional troops. But this time, he's not staying silent. In a rebuke to President Bush, Warner is leading an effort to have the U.S. Senate declare a lack of confidence in the administration's plans to send 21,500 additional soldiers into the Iraqi war zone.

White House officials were taken aback by the move, which is striking because of Warner's stature, both in the Republican Party and as one of the country's most ardent supporters of the military. But Warner, who once was married to Elizabeth Taylor, has an almost mythic popularity, which has made it impossible for Bush allies to demonize him on the issue.

The Senate will vote on his resolution as early as this week, along with a competing one drafted by Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Chuck Hagel (R-Neb.). There is little doubt that a majority of senators will vote their disapproval of Bush's latest plans for Iraq, further isolating the president from the people who once supported the war -- people such as Warner.

Throughout a career that might be winding down -- the 80-year-old senator won't say whether he will run for a sixth term next year -- Warner has been a Republican icon and a fierce defender of the military. He voted to go to war in 2003, and from his perch as chairman of the Armed Services Committee until this year, he was a frequent defender of the president.

But to GOP loyalists, Warner is also a more-than-occasional irritant who seems willing to buck the party line with little regard for the political consequences to his Republican colleagues.

In 1994, he campaigned against his party's nominee to become the junior senator from Virginia, Oliver North. That prompted a primary challenge when he sought reelection two years later. In 2004, he endorsed higher taxes in Virginia and later held hearings on the abuses in the Abu Ghraib prison. In 2005, he battled Bush over Supreme Court justices and the use of torture in U.S. terrorist prison camps.

Now he's at it again, delivering a new affront to Bush and offering nothing but a shrug when asked if he worries about that.

"I gotta tell you, I've gotten to that wonderful age in life -- I don't worry," he said. "If you do what in your heart you feel is right, go to sleep. Don't worry. I go to sleep and I don't worry."His Biggest Sin

The thing that makes John Warner different from most mavericks is that it's never clear when the next affront will come.

DOJ_NMG_0123323

He can go for weeks or months or even years as a revered member of the Republican family. A former Marine who led the Navy before his election to the Senate 28 years ago, Warner even looks the part of the courtly, white-haired GOP lawmaker from the South.

But every now and then, it seems, the urge strikes him.

"Obviously, when you're in the position of the White House or the party chairman, your job is much easier if everybody is just saying yes all the time," said Ed Gillespie, who as chairman of the National Republican Committee battled Warner on nominations to the Supreme Court.

It was Gillespie's job to shepherd the court nominees through Congress, a task made more difficult by Warner's alliance with 13 other moderate GOP senators. But Gillespie is a fan of Warner's nonetheless.

"John Warner understands full well that he is elected to the U.S. Senate, which is a separate and equal branch of government," said Gillespie, who has since become chairman of the Republican Party of Virginia.

Warner's biggest sin, in the eyes of conservative Republicans, was his opposition to North, who was seen as an unadulterated champion for the party's right wing. Warner called North "unfit" for office because of his role in the Iran-contra arms scandal.

Warner not only opposed North's candidacy, he recruited an independent challenger -- former Republican attorney general J. Marshall Coleman -- who helped give the race to then-incumbent Sen. Charles S. Robb (D). Infuriated, Virginia conservatives persuaded former president Ronald Reagan's budget director to challenge Warner in the 1996 Republican primary.

Warner won easily and in the process cemented what had been an evolving reputation as a moderate, independent politician.

"[We] live in a great state of people of common sense, of wisdom, and they are fair-minded," Warner said after defeating James C. Miller III in the primary.A Profound Impact

To anyone paying attention, it has been clear for months that Warner's support for the Iraq war has been wavering.

In October, just before the midterm elections, he returned home from a trip to Iraq and warned that the war effort was "drifting sideways." The comment was perfectly crafted for Warner: not too impertinent on its face but striking nonetheless.

Now he's gone further, sketching out his latest challenge to Bush during a late-night meeting last week with two colleagues in an ornate office at the back of the U.S. Senate chamber.

It is, he said, an attempt to send the same message offered by Hagel and Biden but without what he calls an overly harsh tone. Although it begins by respecting "the Constitutional authorities given a President," its bottom line is just as direct:

"The Senate disagrees with the plan to augment our forces by 21,500, and urges the President instead to consider all options and alternatives," the Warner resolution reads. He unveiled his draft a day before Bush's State of the Union speech.

"His support for a redeployment resolution -- and his opposition to the surge policy -- is very important," said U.S. Rep. James P. Moran Jr. (D-Va.), a longtime friend. "It's going to have a very profound impact on the debate."

Warner's resolution gives some of his Republican colleagues a politically safe position to take on a war that is increasingly unpopular with the American public. "When John Warner decides that these issues have seriousness . . . there are a number of people who come with him," said Warner's new Virginia colleague, Sen. James Webb (D).

But to conservatives, the effort is nothing but folly.

William Kristol, founder of the Weekly Standard, calls both resolutions "wrong, foolish and irresponsible."

Kristol is careful to say of Warner that "I think he's sincere." But he said the effect of the resolution passing will be to weaken Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, who was confirmed Friday as the top U.S. commander in Iraq and will implement Bush's surge.

"John Warner can be a patriot and still do something foolish that hurts our foreign policy," Kristol said.Support for Soldiers Few criticisms aimed at Warner seem to have much effect on him these days.

But one has.

At an Armed Services hearing last week, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) prompted Petraeus to express concern about the passage of a Senate resolution.

"A resolution -- a Senate-passed resolution of disapproval for this new strategy in Iraq -- would give the enemy some encouragement, some feeling that, well, some clear expression that the American people are divided?" Lieberman asked.

DOJ_NMG_0123324

"That's correct, sir," Petraeus replied.

When it was Warner's turn to speak, he was clearly upset. He called the exchange "personal" for him and said forcefully that support for the resolution should never be taken as a lack of support for soldiers in the field.

"We're not a division here of patriots who support the troops and those who are making statements and working on resolutions that could be translated as aiding and abetting the enemy," Warner told Petraeus and his colleagues. "I hope that this colloquy has not trapped you into some responses that you might later regret."

A few days later, in his office, Warner made it clear that he's unwilling to give in.

"Those who say we're not doing the right thing, tell me, what is the obligation of the Senate?" he asked. "Do nothing?"

How Iraq Affects D.C. Reputations (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

SEN. RICHARD G. LUGAR (R-Ind.) was once considered one of the Senate's foremost foreign policy experts, while Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) was, well, not. Now, if you believe the Beltway buzz, their reputations have been reversed. Even if that reversal were justified — and it isn't — it shows that the president isn't the only politician in Washington whose career has been hobbled by Iraq.

Until the Iraq war, Lugar was seen as an elder statesman whose sound foreign policy counsel changed presidential minds for the better. His greatest hits included persuading Ronald Reagan to dump corrupt Philippine President Ferdinand Marcos and outmaneuvering GOP cold warriors to pass the landmark Nunn-Lugar law, which paid the collapsing Soviet Union to safeguard its nuclear arsenal.

But like his friend, Colin L. Powell, Lugar found himself frozen out by the Bush administration even as he continued showing loyalty to his president — to the dismay of his liberal admirers. Lugar's erstwhile fans could not understand why the powerful Senate Foreign Relations Committee chairman allowed himself to be rolled over by the Bush administration. Even after losing his chairmanship to Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), Lugar hasn't challenged the White House on Iraq, offering only some mildly expressed concern about the surge strategy.

Although Lugar had previously enjoyed a reputation as one of the Senate's brightest, the courtly Warner has not radiated the same glow. As chairman of the powerful Senate Armed Services Committee, Warner was seen as the military's chief champion on Capitol Hill, stern in his defense of both military budgets and martial honor.

Because of Warner's long-reliable pro-military vote and support for Bush's foreign policy, it came as a shock to the body politic when the former Navy secretary returned from a trip to Iraq last October and declared bluntly that Congress would have to make "bold decisions" if the Iraqi government didn't shape up within three months. Warner's reversal made it kosher for Republicans to distance themselves from the president's war during the midterm elections. Three months later, the senator has introduced a resolution opposing Bush's troop escalation.

Warner may not win any lifetime achievement awards from foreign policy observers, but his defiance may go down as a tipping point in the war. Lugar's stellar reputation, on the other hand, only makes the fallout from his Hamlet-like indecision about Iraq worse. Fair? No. But that's war.

After The Fall (WP)

By Kirk W. Johnson

The Washington Post Magazine, January 28, 2007

ALL AMERICANS WORKING IN IRAQ, ARMED AND UNARMED, MILITARY AND CIVILIAN, DREAM ABOUT THEIR HOMECOMING -- about who will meet them at the airport, what they'll eat first, whether things will have changed much while they were gone. During my year with the U.S. Agency for International Development in Iraq -- first in Baghdad and later in Fallujah -- the send-offs to those finishing their Green Zone tours were a weekly ritual. Deep within our perimeter of blast walls, there would be a lot of backslapping and comparing of "Baghdad Donuts," the round computer graphics that ticked how many months, days, hours, seconds and milliseconds you had been in Iraq and how many you had left to go.

I had a plan for whenever I got back to the States: a month-long road trip with friends, from the Deep South to the Pacific Northwest. But when the time came, there was no send-off and no celebration at my return.

DOJ_NMG_0123325

Instead, I was wheeled onto U.S. soil, pushed like luggage by a disgruntled employee through the bowels of New York's John F. Kennedy Airport. My face was awkwardly concealed with yellowed gauze and strips of medical tape. Adults stole quick glances and admonished their staring children.

I wasn't supposed to be going home. And I wasn't ready to go.

From my wheelchair, I watched a set of golf clubs circuit the baggage carousel -- anything to distract my mind from the gnawing confusion. I had left Iraq, on R&R, to join a family reunion in the Caribbean. But while I had made it to the beach, now I was here, in America, and I couldn't remember the few decisive events that had led to this. Nobody knew. Every few hours, my dad, who was escorting me back to the family home in West Chicago, Ill., asked the same question: Anything yet? He was the one who had answered the frail tapping of my ring on his hotel room window, who drew open the blinds to see my mangled face. He later told my mother, who had slept through the worst of it, that I looked as if I'd been shot at close range, that he had never seen anything worse than my face that dawn. Without any answers, he clung to his theories. You don't remember being attacked, like with a crowbar?

It was useless. Despite my restless efforts to retrieve the memory, a few critical hours of my life were inaccessible. And what I'd been able to surmise, deduced from the recollections of witnesses and the physical facts of my injuries, made little sense: On the second night of my vacation, Fallujah had uncoiled itself in my mind, commanded my sleeping body upright and piloted me toward the window of my second-story hotel room. My sleeping hands pried open its latch. I went over the rail, sending myself tumbling 15 feet to the cold pavement below.

A WEEK BEFORE IT ALL, IN THE FINAL DAYS OF 2005, my brother Soren had called me as I stood at the landing zone in Camp Fallujah, to thank me for the gift I had recently mailed him: an AK-47 slug, spent in celebratory, retaliatory or predatory fire over Baghdad one August night. It had deep coppery scratches from its scuttle along the pavement beside my hooch and looked exactly as you might imagine a fired round would look. He told me he had placed it on his desk in the public relations office of the Catholic Diocese of Arlington. "It's a good conversation piece," he said. I thought about priests picking up the bullet.

"I'll see you soon, bro!" I shouted over the thump-thump of a pair of approaching midnight helicopters. I was leaving for my R&R, five days off to meet my family at a resort in the Dominican Republic. I sat with my gear on the edge of the concrete field watching the wobbling and shivering descent of the choppers. When they touched down, I made my way toward the beckoning aerial gunner under the rotor span, who read the letters I'd inked on my hand to confirm my destination. It would take only about 20 minutes to skirt over the deserted fields of the Euphrates River valley and past the glaring perimeter lights of Abu Ghraib prison before Baghdad's knotted skein of dimly lit neighborhoods unfurled below us. The helo nosed onward, and Marine aerial gunners hunched over their 50-cals, squinting through night-vision goggles. The baby Chinook was an aging bird with paneless windows that channeled in the wind, forcing my eyes shut.

The last time I had seen Soren was in the freighted days before I left for Baghdad, in December 2004. West Chicago had been blustery but bearable. My brothers had both come home for the holidays, and we strung lights around our frozen pond in the back yard, which we shoveled off with mounting excitement. Their wives took pictures and helped my baby niece explore the ice. We played hockey without skates; Mom brought us popcorn and hot chocolate, and we stopped between goals, steam wending its way from our lungs. Dad appeared at the pond's edge for a few moments with his pipe, surveying the game and his family quietly. We stayed away from the deep end, where Derek had once fallen through the ice 20 years earlier.

The night before I left for Iraq, as my brothers and I sat in my room clanking our beer bottles, I taught them the geographic cues that the U.S. government had trained me to use if I was taken hostage and appeared on al-Jazeera, kneeling in front of masked insurgents. My forehead, north. South, my chin. My nose was Baghdad.

I'd tried for nearly two years to get myself to the war zone. During the invasion, I was living in Cairo as a Fulbright scholar, studying the intersection of politics and Islamism. It was a path I'd started down at age 15, after a trip to Egypt with my grandmother sparked a fascination with the culture. I had begun studying Arabic almost immediately. By the time Baghdad fell, I had six years of Arabic under my belt, a degree in Middle Eastern history and had lived throughout the region. I nurtured profound opposition to the war, but I thought I could contribute my skills in the attempt to rebuild Iraq.

Now it had been nearly a year since I arrived in Iraq. And, frankly, it felt wrong to leave for even a week. There was still so much to be done in Fallujah, so much to figure out. I didn't want to take that responsibility lightly, like so many U.S. officials who had come for a few hours to get their picture taken and to say they'd been. But my family rarely had reunions, and I was due for a break. Plus, just days before I left, the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force, soon to deploy to Fallujah from Camp Pendleton in California, had requested a briefing on USAID's work in Anbar province. I would be able to fit in that trip after my R&R and was pleased at the chance to get at least some work done while I was out of Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0123326

In the helicopter, I bowed my head in a feeble effort to catch a few minutes' sleep before Baghdad. The air outside warmed as we dipped beneath the convection layer. I cracked open an eyelid and saw the drowsy Tigris ribboning through the center of the capital. We were almost to the Green Zone. I wondered from which street or rooftop an Iraqi had fired his Kalashnikov, arcing a volley of conversation pieces for my brother back home.

I checked my watch. In about 60 hours I'd be on the beach -- away from the dusty sea of armor and Humvees, rubble and barbed wire, helmets and the weary faces beneath them.

FOUR FLIGHTS LATER, MY FAMILY LAID SHOCKED AIRPORT EYES ON ME -- I'd lost a few dozen pounds in Iraq -- and smothered me with attention. They said, You don't have to talk about the war if you don't want to, but it was as though I'd never known anything else worth talking about.

USAID, a government agency, was charged with helping to rebuild the country and with providing humanitarian assistance. My first assignment when I'd arrived in Iraq at the beginning of 2005, at age 24, was as the agency's information officer in Baghdad's Green Zone. The perpetually devolving situation beyond our blast walls had turned the place into a sort of prison, and colleagues who had forged successful careers in the trenches were stuck in a bizarre arena of paperwork and booze, punctuated occasionally by the sounds of the war outside.

I grew steadily more frustrated by the surreal isolation of palaces and swimming pools bobbing with drunken contractors and began to agitate for a job outside of the Emerald City. So, that fall, I was dispatched to coordinate the agency's efforts in Fallujah, the restive (as our government labels it) city about 30 miles west of the capital on a southerly bend in the Euphrates. Despite its strategic importance, USAID had spent less than .05 percent of its Iraq budget on projects in Fallujah. I was charged with intensifying our work there before time, money or U.S. patience ran out.

My work was exhausting, infrequently rewarding and drenched with a sense of urgency and importance. What little work we had finished, I discovered, was either ill-conceived or poorly executed. We had paid more than $100,000 to erect a few billboards to encourage war-weary and unemployed Fallujans to keep a tidy city. At the government-run veterinary clinic we had funded, I walked in to find that the vet had moved all of our donated equipment to his private clinic, where he was charging the area's impoverished farmers seven times the government rate for his services -- and simultaneously asking us for more supplies. Out west in Ramadi, both the Marines and the Iraqis wanted to rehabilitate the city's dilapidated glassmaking factory -- once Anbar's largest employer -- but our advisers in Baghdad were pushing free-market policies that precluded restarting a failing state-owned enterprise. The glacial pace of our government bureaucracies meant that new projects, such as hiring droves of Fallujans to clear out the choked irrigation canals stemming from the Euphrates, would take time. So, for the moment, Anbar's steadiest employer was the insurgency, which paid for planting explosives, for sowing disorder.

Over the months, I settled into the grind, pushing myself through 80- or 90-hour weeks as though I were on Wall Street. I was sleeping less and less, exercising more and more. I felt as if the only way to obtain reliable information was with my own eyes and ears, so I took every opportunity to get out of the camp into the city's streets. Several mornings a week, I'd armor up, Velcroing on my flak jacket, and prepare for meetings downtown with city leaders. By 7:30 a.m., I'd be shivering in the Fallujah dawn, sitting on my helmet as Marines pinched out their cigs and loaded their gear into our cluster of Humvees. We would listen to the same convoy briefing: order of march, execution, rally points, enemy tactics, routes, rules of engagement, escalation of force, medical aid. It never changed. I would ride in the open-air tub of a Humvee, which resembles the bed of a pickup truck with shoulder-height armor plating. That fall, several children had run up and tossed grenades into the tubs. I would have one chance, the Marines grinned, to swat these ringers away from the Humvee before they exploded. If I missed, I'd have to warn the others, who, unlike me, carried weapons and were busy peering through the scopes of their M-16s. As the convoy lurched its way through camp, I'd sheepishly practice swats, doubting my coordination, feeling absurd.

On the hardball road that led into the guts of the city, I would join the others in sizing up everything that lay in front of us. It was all lethal. Black bags of trash became the hoods of grim reapers. Parked and idling cars, massive and rusty weapons, bits of string, detonation wire. Left to right, right to left, my eyes scanned pavement, bodies, vehicles, signs, medians, hands, light posts, tree limbs, eyes, gas stations, bushes, abandoned shacks, auto body repair shops, pierced and rusting petroleum tanks, overpasses, children on bicycles, children on foot, children.

DOJ_NMG_0123327

Convoy movement is forced amnesia, visceral and bitter. On the road, it didn't matter that I spoke the language, knew the music, read the authors, studied the religion. What mattered was that they stayed away from my vehicle. That they not make any quick movements when I passed by. They needed to freeze. They needed to smile.

Hypervigilance, an expert in post-traumatic stress disorder later explained to me.

THOUGH I SHOULD HAVE BEEN EXHAUSTED FROM THE DAYS OF TRAVEL from Fallujah to the Dominican Republic, my mind was surging. I stayed up late the first night, talking more to myself than to my relatives. When I finally made it to bed, I lay there, staring at the ceiling and waiting for sleep.

A few hours later, I drowsily walked past the window in my room. Spotting a half-built dun-colored apartment complex outside, I dropped to the floor and shouted an expletive, thinking it was reckless for me to be walking without my body armor. A Fallujan sniper had put us all on edge after shooting several Marines in the weeks before, and here I was walking past a window without battle rattle. It was then, on the floor of my hotel room, that I realized where I was, safe. I was embarrassed and felt a sapping dissonance. I didn't remember getting out of bed minutes earlier, but I could replay with precision the thoughts that flared when I saw that building. I got back under the covers and waited for the sun to rise. I tried to forget about the confusing event and chalked it up to fatigue.

Later that day, after my family awoke, I tried to unwind but couldn't. Though tourists were relaxing by the ocean, I found it jarring to walk among civilians without a covey of well-armed Marines, past piles of litter while sightseeing helicopters flitted overhead. Again, I talked with my family for hours too long about Iraq. Even while I threw a football with my brothers and dad in the crashing surf, I thought about the briefing I'd give the Camp Pendleton Marines after my R&R, and I felt I was doing important things with my life.

That night, I folded my jeans, placed my watch on the nightstand and crawled under the sheets. This is my last memory of that night, which I now replay as one does the moments in which a car accident might have been avoided.

Primitivo, the Haitian night guard at the hotel, later told my family what he saw. At 4:30 in the morning, he noticed me perched on the windowsill, staring off in the direction of the unfinished apartment complex. "Â¡Peligroso!" he warned, pointing a flashlight at me. Dangerous ! I yelled back something he didn't understand. Rebuffed, he continued along his night watch until he heard a crashing thud. "Â¡Se cayo!" he shouted. He fell! He raced back to find me kneeling in a pool of my blood.

A ravine of torn flesh ran between my brows. My chin flapped below my jaw. I held my mouth with two broken wrists and groaned about my teeth, jarred loose from my fractured upper jaw. Blood spigoted from my forehead, from the nostrils of my broken nose, over shreds of lip.

I WAS FACING MONTHS OF REHABILITATION. But upon arriving in West Chicago with my father, I fought against my injuries, sparring with doctors, tugging at stitches, mentally truncating every estimate about how much time I'd need to heal. I had spent months climbing out of Humvees and Chinooks to develop relationships with city leaders, identify needs and draw lessons from the mistakes of the reconstruction. Now, my mother was buttoning my shirt for me.

I lay in my childhood bed, willing the cracks in my bones to seal and the stress in my mind to settle, and stubbornly considered this a mere interruption to my job. In the first days, I forced my fiberglass-encased hands to work the phone and pound a keyboard so I could leave messages with my bosses in Baghdad and e-mail them pictures of me in the hospital bed, along with the list of required medical procedures.

I knew that to return, I'd have to get a new health clearance from the government, a requisite for civilians working in Iraq. So, as though setting out to repair an engine, I made a list of everything wrong with my body. It would take at least two months for the casts to be cut from my broken wrists. The wires lashed around my jaw would be removed in two weeks, at which point I could schedule the several root canals required for my front teeth. Afterward, I could visit my high school orthodontist for another round of braces to hoist my fractured teeth back into line. All in all, I'd need eight weeks, I told my office, before I'd be good to go. I asked if there was anything I could do in the meantime, offering to work with the agency in Washington until my return or to write a report with recommendations for projects in the city. Aside from early well-wishes, I heard nothing back. The friends over there who took my calls told me not to feel offended: I was merely out of sight and out of mind.

DOJ_NMG_0123328

I wondered how the Fallujans would interpret my absence at our next meeting. Too many U.S. advisers and politicians had swooped in and out of Fallujah, making promises soon forgotten or ignored. I had sworn to myself I wouldn't make grand promises, wouldn't disappear. Now a series of ruptures snaking across my face and through my bones was making me break my word. I started to type an explanatory message in Arabic to Khaled, a city council member who was working on proposals for agricultural initiatives in the outskirts of the city, but I felt foolish. What could I tell him?

I realized I had come to know more about Fallujah than about my own home town. Stuck in a wartime framework, I made a Fallujah of West Chicago. I studied satellite maps on my computer, marveling at elements of our infrastructure that I'd never noticed, at how insecure we were. I plotted a takeover of the town in case the West Chicagoans sparked an insurgency. How many troops would we need, and how would we divide the city for administration? Where would we set up entry and exit control points? Where would rally points be set in case of IEDs or small-arms fire? Just as Fallujans had had to convert their soccer pitch, my town would have to use our high school's football field for trench graves. As a show of force, I'd position an M1A1 Abrams tank in the parking lot between Ace Hardware and Taco Bell. I'd coil concertina wire into the street to snarl traffic into a slow, observable mass. While my parents drove me through town on the way to doctor's appointments, I imagined mile-long vehicle queues snaking round the gas station and muzzles of counter-sniper rifles poking from the rooftops.

After I had pacified West Chicago, I succumbed to my anger. A month into my recovery, and I still hadn't heard anything from the mission in Baghdad. With each procedure, new complications appeared, and my estimated return date was slipping further from my reach. In trying to fix one wrist, a doctor accidentally expanded the crack in the bone, adding weeks to rehabilitation. When my oral surgeon failed to remove one of the wires holding my loosened teeth in place, I drove to the hardware store and bought a pair of pliers. I wrenched the wire from the gum tissue myself, wiped the blood from my chin and crossed that procedure off my list.

I still couldn't explain why the accident had happened, or even how. My dad, a Vietnam vet, still insisted that I had been attacked or robbed, unwilling, I think, to accept the idea of any sort of mental failure. Friends overseas told me that Marines and diplomats I barely knew were gossiping about me -- a two-star general was overheard declaring that I had been drunk, that I was trying to get out of coming back. When people suggested, gingerly, that I might have been suffering from PTSD, I rejected it out of hand. I hadn't worn a uniform and didn't believe I had the right to group my injury with those who did. So many had it worse: Marines, soldiers, Iraqis -- so many Iraqis. I called a psychiatrist friend, who said that I probably had experienced a stress-prompted fugue state, which is characterized by dissociative amnesia and autopilot behavior. I didn't see a shrink because I didn't think I'd have the time, especially since I was still hoping to return to Fallujah.

I decided to accept that explanation as the most likely, despite its obvious frustrations: The most important decision I'd ever made in my life happened that night on the windowsill, and I wasn't around to make it. I declared a family moratorium on discussing other possibilities. I wasn't likely to retrieve the lost memory, and the conjecture was draining us all.

As to the larger question of why it happened, visitors would offer unsolicited explanations. A minister friend of the family informed me that I was breathing because I'd been saved, because God had plans for me. "It's a Wonderful Life" looped on television for the holidays, telling me I should be feeling reborn. Each day is a gift!

I didn't feel that way; I felt ridiculous. After all, I'd spent the 12 months before the fall in a landscape scarred by a hail of bombs, mortars, rockets and bullets. I had seen death and the on-the-brink moments that make you think you're headed there: On a cold morning in Fallujah weeks before I left the city, my convoy had missed the wrath of a suicide car bomb by a few minutes. The vigilant Marines in the lead Humvee had even spotted the vehicle lurking along Route Fran, but for whatever reason, its explosives were meant for someone else. The next morning, we drove past the black char blossom left by the blast on the pock-marked pavement. Yet it was sleepwalking at some beach resort that nearly did me in.

I wondered if it would be any different if I had sleepwalked over there, instead. Would it be easier to understand? The ifs were exhausting, unrelenting.

I came to loathe the night. I'd crawl into bed warily. After a few hours, I'd snap awake, the kind of awake that is complete and leaves you with no doubts as to its certainty. My doctors blamed it on the Vicodin and general anesthesia, but I'd never told them about the nightmares since my return. In each, I was back in Iraq, abandoned, in danger or helpless to save others. In a sweat, I'd roll over and turn on the television, which lit the room with infomercials hawking bagel slicers and girls gone wild. In the hours until the sun came up, I wondered what was happening in Fallujah.

DOJ_NMG_0123329

For a while, people called from Iraq to tell me the news. The canal-clearing initiative foundered in my absence. I learned that our colleague Sheikh Kamal, head of the city council, was assassinated while walking out of his house.

January lapsed into February, and I still had no final word from Baghdad about my future in Fallujah. My bosses hadn't yet discussed with me the likelihood of resuming my work. A friend in Baghdad forwarded an e-mail from a newly arrived diplomat who asked, "Who was Kirk Johnson, where did he work, and when did he leave?"

Moments before getting the roots of my three dead front teeth bored, I thumbed through magazines in the endo-dontist's waiting room and came across a quote of mine in Time magazine, made weeks earlier on Election Day in Fallujah, at a time that now seemed so much more important, more loaded, than anything at home. Humming drill in hand, the doctor asked, What was it like over there? I wasn't ready to accept that past tense. I hadn't finished over there. Hell, my socks and razor were still over there.

But I wasn't going back. My cellphone rang a few weeks later, on the drive back from getting my casts sawed off. It was Baghdad. Mom turned down the radio. My contract had expired during my recuperation, my superiors said, and they weren't going to field a replacement for me. Congress was slashing reconstruction funds, and what remained wasn't likely to be spent in Fallujah. As I listened to the news, I stared out the window at the freshly plowed, salt-streaked parking lots that pooled around the strip malls and fast-food joints. The neon in their signs cut against the encroaching dusk: Fantastic Sams, L.A. Tan, Hollywood Video, Dollar Heaven. I was home, after all.

Kirk W. Johnson, a writer and Arabist, has lived throughout the Middle East and is working on a collection of essays from his experiences in the war.

Taliban Vows Summer Wave Of Suicide Bombers (WT)

The Washington Times, January 28, 2007

KABUL -- The Taliban is gearing up for a massive summer offensive, with more than 2,000 suicide bombers ready for action and even more preparing, a senior Taliban commander said yesterday.

The commander, Mullah Hayat Khan, issued his threat a day after a top U.S. diplomat warned that Afghanistan was in for a bloody and dangerous spring after the bloodiest year since the hard-line Islamist Taliban was ousted by U.S.-led forces in 2001.

"The Taliban will intensify their guerrilla and suicide strikes this summer," the mullah said. "This will be a bloodiest year for foreign troops."

He said 2,000 suicide bombers were ready -- about 40 percent of the total suicide force -- adding that numbers were so high that it was sometimes hard to find enough explosives and targets.

"Our war preparations have been completed to a large extent, and we're waiting for summer to set in," Mullah Khan said.

More than 4,000 people died last year, a quarter of them civilians, as the resurgent Taliban fought back with what NATO generals said was surprising ferocity.

Calling the guerrillas virulent and tough, Richard Boucher, U.S. assistant secretary of state for South Asia, warned on Friday the spring would be bloody and dangerous after the traditional winter lull in fighting.

"I think we will face a strong offensive and will have a difficult and dangerous and bloody spring," he told BBC radio as NATO foreign ministers discussed Afghanistan's future at a summit in Brussels, "but we are also better set up to deal with it."

The threat coincides with an upsurge in attacks by Muslim terrorists on both sides of the Pakistan-Afghanistan border.

Pakistani investigators probing a suicide blast at a top hotel in Islamabad said yesterday they were looking at possible links to pro-Taliban extremists near the border. Police said they were examining the head, a leg and an arm of the bomber who detonated explosives strapped to his body when he was prevented from entering the Marriott Hotel in Islamabad on Friday, killing a security guard.

"Experts are examining the few remains of the bomber's body in a bid to identify him," said Brig. Javed Cheema, the Interior Ministry crisis-management chief.

DOJ_NMG_0123330

Officials said a sketch of the bomber could not be prepared because no witnesses so far had come forward, nor had hotel security cameras filmed the attacker.

Interior Ministry officials said no group had yet claimed responsibility for the attack.

"We suspect [the attack] could be by militants opposed to the government's drive against Taliban elements in the tribal regions," a senior security official said on the condition of anonymity.

Pakistan is under pressure to curb Taliban activity in its lawless tribal zone bordering Afghanistan.

Afghanistan and U.S. officials said the Taliban uses the area to recruit and train fighters for cross-border attacks on Afghan, NATO-led and U.S. forces.

Kabul also has accused the Pakistani government and intelligence services of backing the insurgency, which claimed about 4,000 lives in 2006, the deadliest year since U.S.-led forces ousted the Taliban in 2001. Pakistan denies the charges.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and a delegation of U.S. lawmakers met with Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf yesterday in a mood of concern over a provision in a U.S. bill proposing restrictions on military aid to Islamabad. Neither side was scheduled to make any public comments.

The bill, passed by the House and awaiting action in the Senate, calls for ending U.S. military assistance to Pakistan if the country fails to stop the Taliban from operating on its territory, according to Pakistani news reports.

Under the provision, President Bush has to certify to Congress that Pakistan was doing its level best to combat insurgents before releasing any new military assistance. The Bush administration thinks that such restrictions on aid to Pakistan would undermine cooperation in the war on terrorism and is trying to persuade the Congress to drop the provision before it becomes law.

"Such conditionality [would] be counterproductive to the important goal ... of fostering a closer relationship with Pakistan," said a statement on administration policy from Mr. Bush's office.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Qwest May Face Fight For Money (DENP)

By Andy Vuong, Denver Post Staff Writer

Denver Post, January 28, 2007

If its ex-CEO is convicted, the firm can seek reimbursement for paying to defend him.

CA Inc. is trying to recover the $14.9 million that the software company spent to defend former chief executive Sanjay Kumar against accounting-fraud charges.

A lawsuit by the Islandia, N.Y.-based company, formerly known as Computer Associates, has targeted Kumar's cars, home, yacht and bank accounts after he pleaded guilty to masterminding a multibillion-dollar fraud.

A similar court battle could be in line for Denver-based Qwest if former chief executive Joe Nacchio is convicted of criminal insider trading.

Qwest is footing Nacchio's legal bill, which could cost up to $75 million for both civil and criminal cases, according to experts. Nacchio has pleaded not guilty to 42 counts of illegal insider trading. His criminal trial is set to begin March 19.

Bob Toevs, a Qwest spokesman, wouldn't say whether the company would seek reimbursement if Nacchio is convicted, but he said it has the right to.

Qwest and CA are just two of a large number of companies that pay legal fees for their current and former executives, experts say.

"It's very, very common for almost any corporation, and certainly for large publicly traded companies, to have provisions and agreements that will actually require the corporation to advance defense costs up front," said Lawrence Hamermesh, a corporate and business law professor at Widener University School of Law in Wilmington, Del.

Hamermesh said companies are not required to do so under state law in Delaware, which is where Qwest and many firms are incorporated.

DOJ_NMG_0123331

Instead, experts say, most companies offer indemnification from legal proceedings and pay attorney fees in advance in order to attract officers and directors to their company.

"If I'm wrongfully charged, why should I have to fork out $25 million to $50 million or $60 million to defend myself?" said John Marquess, president of Legal Cost Control, a legal-fees consulting firm in New Jersey.

Current and former officers and directors at Qwest don't have to.

Qwest can attempt to recover

Qwest says its bylaws require it to advance legal fees for officers and directors who may be involved in a civil or criminal proceeding because of their work with the company. The company also says that if a conviction is handed down, it can attempt to recover its money.

The Justice Department charges allege that Nacchio sold $101 million in Qwest stock in early 2001 while he knew the company's finances were faltering.

Nacchio's attorneys have argued that Nacchio had a rosy outlook for Qwest in early 2001 because he knew the company was in line to receive large government contracts.

Separately, the Securities and Exchange Commission has sued Nacchio and several other former Qwest executives, charging that they fraudulently boosted revenues by $3 billion from 1999 to 2002. Qwest later restated much of that revenue.

Nacchio has also been named in several shareholder lawsuits.

Toevs wouldn't disclose how much the company's insurance may be covering in legal expenses for Nacchio.

Amount of coverage varies

Insurance broker Bruce R. Swicker said companies can carry two types of so-called directors and officers insurance to help defend the company and its key officials against lawsuits - one to cover the company and the other to cover the individual officer or director. The coverage is also used to pay settlements.

Toevs said Qwest has D&O coverage. Nacchio's severance agreement indicates that the company has separate coverage for him.

A provision in the agreement says that "the company shall continue to make the indemnification/insurance payments" as defined in his initial employment contract.

Nacchio joined Qwest in early 1997 and left in mid-2002.

How much Qwest ends up paying for legal fees depends on the insurance coverage limits they purchased, Swicker said. The insurance coverage is rescinded, however, if an officer or director is found guilty of a crime that harms the company.

Enron reportedly only carried limits of up to $365 million for the entire corporation.

Qwest paid $250 million in 2004 to settle an SEC suit alleging accounting fraud. It later paid $400 million to settle a shareholder class-action suit.

D&O insurance may have covered portions of those settlements, but Qwest won't say.

Swicker said the wave of corporate scandals in the late 1990s and early 2000 forced some insurance companies to stop offering D&O coverage.

"When all this first broke, there was a definite hardening of the market, as carriers either withdrew or they lowered the limits they were willing to offer," Swicker said.

He said new corporate governance laws such as Sarbanes-Oxley have helped the market recover.

Staff writer Andy Vuong can be reached at 303-954-1209 or avuong@denverpost.com.

Is The Fix Worse Than The Problem? (NYT)

By Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

CONGRESS has a new idea about how to rein in executive pay. Trouble is, the plan will squeeze midlevel workers, even as they need to save more money for retirement. And it won't even dent top executives' takes.

Tucked into the proposed Small Business and Work Opportunity Act of 2007 are two provisions that would limit employees' use of deferred compensation plans to save for retirement.

DOJ_NMG_0123332

The provisions are advertised as aiming at fat-cat deferred compensation plans — like those that contributed to the recent $200 million payouts to Hank A. McKinnell of Pfizer and Robert L. Nardelli of Home Depot. But tax and compensation experts say the law could hurt those making less than $100,000 a year. Potential victims also include workers at start-ups or companies undergoing a turnaround, or even people who have recently changed jobs.

"This doesn't just deal with the Nardellis and McKinnells of the world," said Brian Foley, an independent compensation consultant in White Plains. "It deals with all sorts of people who are middle management who will never make the big money and for whom deferred compensation is critical for saving for retirement."

The act is meant to give tax breaks to small businesses that may be hurt by an increase in the minimum wage. To offset lost revenue arising from those breaks, the bill proposes to limit the amount that any employee can amass in so-called nonqualified, tax-deferred compensation plans. The limit would kick in when earnings in a plan exceed the five-year average of an employee's annual taxable pay, or $1 million, whichever is less. If earnings in such plans exceed that limit, all of the employee's deferred compensation will be immediately taxable and subject to an additional 20 percent penalty and interest.

If the bill passes, the limit will take effect in 2007 and will not apply to earnings in qualified plans, like 401(k)s.

Know this: If a chief executive were to owe taxes or penalties because of the new limit, his company would surely cough them up. This practice, de rigueur in corporate America, is so venerable that we might as well call it "ye olde tax gross-up." Better yet, company accountants and tax specialists would figure out a way around the limit altogether for the top guys. Both outcomes would probably end up costing shareholders more.

Down the ladder, the story will be very different, however. "The definition of deferred comp, the types of arrangements and who it applies to is so broad," said Brigen L. Winters, principal at the Groom Law Group in Washington. "The vast majority of people affected by this will be in the $100,000 range." And it is unlikely that their companies will cover taxes generated by exceeding the limit.

Let's say an employee made $100,000 a year, on average over the past five years — that would be his annual limit for amounts earned in deferred compensation plans each year. While $100,000 may sound like a lot to generate in one year, it could be reached fairly easily. If a worker had $1 million saved in his deferred compensation account, for example, his savings would have to earn just over 10 percent in a year to put him over the limit. Then, his whole account would be subject to the tax and penalty.

Those who have worked the longest and set aside the most money for retirement would be prime candidates to exceed the limit — around the same time they would need to tap into their accounts.

Others who could be hurt by the deferred compensation cap are employees at start-up companies that pay little in salary but provide big equity stakes in deferred compensation programs to lure and keep talented employees. (Some stock options are exempt from the cap.) New hires, whose five-year average pay at their employers is minimal, could also be snared by the limit. And because certain severance payments are included in what the bill considers deferred compensation, workers who took early-retirement packages might also find themselves owing taxes and penalties. Older employees who wanted to cut back on their work life but not retire altogether — known as phased retirement — could also be hurt by the limit.

In addition, the law would discourage executives who receive restricted share units of their companies' stock from holding onto the stakes, eliminating an incentive for managers to align their interests with those of shareholders.

"Pensions are being eliminated left and right and a souped-up 401(k) can only do so much," Mr. Foley said. "If the nonqualified stuff is going to be capped and if the cap is going to apply across the board, it seems to me it puts the squeeze on the guys in the middle."

Good point. Limits on deferred compensation might not be bad if workers had been allowed to increase contributions to 401(k) plans beyond relatively low limits — $15,500 in 2007 — or if corporate pension plans were flush and growing in number rather than being terminated.

But amid fears that many employees have not saved enough for retirement and will face runaway health care costs as they grow older, limiting deferred compensation for middle-level managers seems goofy. The small-business bill's limits on deferred compensation were made without any hearings on their consequences.

DOJ_NMG_0123333

The idea behind this cap seems to be an Enron byproduct. The 2002 investigation by the Joint Committee on Taxation into Enron's failure, requested by Senators Max Baucus, Democrat of Montana, and Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, highlighted generous deferred compensation plans given to the company's executives. Senator Baucus, chairman of the Finance Committee, is a proponent of the limit.

"Enron allowed its executives to defer significant amounts of compensation even though Enron had to forgo a current deduction with respect to such amounts," the Joint Committee's report stated when it came out in 2003. "The fact that Enron was apparently indifferent to the deferral of its deduction provides further support for the need for changes to the tax treatment of nonqualified deferred compensation."

Carol Guthrie, a spokeswoman for the Senate Finance Committee, said: "There are a lot of hypotheticals out there about this provision affecting those other than whom it's meant to affect, but its application will not bear those out. This provision still allows far, far higher deferral benefits to the people it affects than those received by the average worker. It's hard to argue that 100 percent of your pay is too stingy an allowance for deferral."

But Mark J. Ugoretz, president of the Erisa Industry Committee, a lobbying organization that represents major employer health, retirement and compensation plans, said: "Historically, you do not get taxed on money that you have not received, do not have control over, or do not have the use of. That's a reasonable policy since, when the employee receives this money, the government will get their fair share."

Given the explosion in executive pay, it was thoroughly predictable that Congress would jump into the fray. But legislators' past attempts to curtail executive pay have wound up fattening already rich packages. The 1993 law that limited the deductibility of executive pay to $1 million, for example, pushed executives into enormous stock options packages.

The tax code should not be used to legislate corporate governance. This is why it is so crucial now to bring shareholders and company directors together to discuss executive pay. And why it is foolish for companies to resist those dialogues.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Trial Shows Unsealed Lips In CIA (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

Though the agency has sought to protect covert identities, the leak case reveals that the secrecy rules are sometimes ignored.

WASHINGTON — From their earliest days, U.S. intelligence agencies have made it an article of faith to protect the identity of their secret agents. And in 1982, following a rash of malicious exposures, the CIA prevailed on Congress to make it a crime to knowingly disclose the identity of such operatives.

So in 2003, when the name of a CIA arms proliferation specialist, Valerie Plame, surfaced in a newspaper column, the agency immediately demanded a Justice Department investigation.

But last week, as former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby went on trial in connection with the leak, it appeared that neither the CIA nor some other intelligence community insiders were all that tight-lipped about such supposedly sensitive matters.

When it came to talking to outsiders, the agent's identity was often treated as not much more than water-cooler dishing or cocktail party chatter.

A high-level CIA official dropped Plame's agency connection into a conversation with a White House aide who did not know Plame existed. Another CIA official confessed that it was only after he had mentioned the agent's name to an official outside the agency that he felt a twinge of regret — a kind of belated "oops" — over what he had done.

And former Deputy Secretary of State Richard L. Armitage, a possible witness in the Libby trial, has acknowledged discussing Plame with a reporter. Armitage, an old hand at dealing with sensitive intelligence matters, later told a friend that gabbing about Plame was "the dumbest thing he'd ever done in his life."

DOJ_NMG_0123334

The agent's identity wound up being a subject of discussion inside Washington's sprawling national security community after it was unveiled in a syndicated newspaper column. Libby is accused of lying to federal investigators looking into who leaked Plame's name to the columnist.

Plame is the wife of former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV, who publicly raised questions about the intelligence used to justify the invasion of Iraq.

The revelations thus far in Libby's trial suggest that, though U.S. officials — especially within the Bush administration — have publicly insisted that secrecy is crucial in national security matters, there is a backstage world inside the government where even the most basic rules for protecting sensitive information may be ignored.

In theory, sensitive intelligence is highly compartmentalized and shared only on a need-to-know basis with people who have been cleared to receive it.

That was hardly the case with Plame.

In one instance described last week, the CIA's then-chief public affairs officer, William Harlow, apparently brought her name up almost in passing during a 2003 telephone conversation with his counterpart in Vice President Dick Cheney's office.

The White House official, Catherine J. Martin, then Cheney's director of communications, said, "It was a pleasant conversation. I had never spoken with him before."

Martin was calling about a report in the Washington Post that an unnamed diplomat had turned up evidence contradicting Bush administration claims about Iraq trying to get nuclear material from Niger. The story, and others that followed, said the diplomat had been sent to the African nation because of Cheney.

The vice president was upset over being linked to the venture, which undercut White House arguments about the Iraq threat.

Martin testified that Libby suggested she call Harlow.

"I remember talking about press reports about a former ambassador sent to Niger, and the press reports saying it was because of an inquiry by the vice president," she said.

"So I was saying, 'Who sent him? Who is this guy? And what are you saying to the press? It keeps getting reported that we sent him,' " Martin testified.

"Ultimately, I remember Bill Harlow saying his name was Joe Wilson, he was a charge in Baghdad and his wife works over here."

Harlow, responding to an e-mail request, declined to comment, citing the pending trial.

Libby allegedly learned that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA from the agency's top expert on Iraq, who testified Wednesday that he regretted passing along the tip.

Former CIA official Robert Grenier said he gave Libby the information. He said he had not remembered doing so when he initially spoke with investigators but recalled it later because he had a lingering feeling that he had done something he regretted.

"I recall feeling briefly guilty about it, that I had said too much," Grenier said. "By saying that Joe Wilson's wife was working in CIA, in effect I was revealing the identity of a CIA officer."

The law does not forbid all disclosures. It targets only leaks of identities of covert operatives and incidents where the recipient does not have a security clearance to receive the information. Libby, as Cheney's national security advisor and chief of staff, presumably had high-level security clearances.

But Grenier said he still had qualms about his actions "because it was not absolutely necessary for me to have said that…. Our habit is, if you don't need to say something, you don't."

CIA officials weren't the only ones trafficking in information about Plame. Former White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer, scheduled to testify Monday, apparently disclosed her identity to several reporters.

Afterward, he was so concerned that he might have broken the law that he refused to cooperate with investigators until he was granted immunity from prosecution.

Plame had worked overseas, posing as a private energy consultant while working for a CIA department tracking weapons proliferation. Although she had been working at CIA headquarters at the time of the leak, the disclosure ended her clandestine career and could have endangered people who had helped her abroad.

DOJ_NMG_0123335

In part, the readiness of intelligence officials to bring Plame into conversations with White House officials reflected an unspoken reality of politics and power in Washington: The CIA is an independent agency, but it serves the president and other high officials — who not only use the intelligence it provides but pass judgment on its performance.

"The CIA works both sides of the street, satisfying the political bosses while protecting turf and tradition," said Williams Banks, a professor at Syracuse University law school and a national security expert. "Ironic for sure, but part of the Washington fabric."

The political pressures were especially intense when the Plame case broke in 2003. The CIA was under White House scrutiny because of intelligence failures preceding the Sept. 11 attacks and the Iraq war.

The pressure was clear in Grenier's testimony:

The former CIA official recalled taking a call from Libby, who, with what Grenier described as a "slightly accusatory tone in his voice," wanted to know whether the CIA was involved in sending Wilson to Africa and whether it had done so because of interest expressed by Cheney's office.

"It was pretty clear from the context that he wanted answers as quick as I could get them. It was unusual for him to be calling me in the first place."

Grenier said he called an individual who worked in the CIA counter-proliferation division who informed him about the trip and that Wilson's wife was working in the unit that had sent Wilson there.

Before Grenier could report back to Libby, he said, Libby's office had him called out of a meeting with the CIA director. "I don't think I had ever been called out of a meeting with the director before or since," Grenier said.

"I told him, in fact, it was true that the CIA had sent Ambassador Wilson to Niger. And how much else I said about it I really don't recall. I may have mentioned he was debriefed and a report was written."

Question: "In your conversation with Mr. Libby, did you also talk about information you had learned about Ambassador Wilson's wife?"

Answer: "I believe I did."

Question: "Can you tell us about that?"

Answer: "I mentioned that, only in passing, I said something to the effect, in fact, Ambassador Wilson's wife works here."

Question: "You felt that was a piece of information that was or should be passed on to Mr. Libby?"

Answer: "I'm not sure it should have been passed on to Mr. Libby. The reason why I said it, I wanted to be as forthcoming as I possibly could."

Assessing Grenier's testimony, Larry Johnson, a retired CIA and State Department counter-terrorism expert, said, "They wanted to avoid any unpleasantness with the vice president."

Besides, Johnson said, "If you can't give the vice president and president information with any degree of confidence that it is going to be protected, then you know, the entire game is up."

rick.schmitt@latimes.com

For Hevesi Prosecutor, 'One Standard Of Justice' (NYT)

By Danny Hakim

The New York Times, January 29, 2007

ALBANY, Jan. 27 — P. David Soares, the Democratic district attorney here, has clashed at various points in his two years in office with the mayor, the police chief, the sheriff and the County Legislature. He has assailed the war on drugs as a failure that "provides law enforcement officials with lucrative jobs" and called prison building an American "economic development strategy."

Now Mr. Soares, 37, is taking on one of the most durable political machines in America: the elected officials of Albany, where built-in incumbency and a "pay-to-play" system have created a culture in which at least 10 state lawmakers have been investigated, indicted or convicted in recent years.

While Gov. Eliot Spitzer has been the most prominent voice calling for change, it was Mr. Soares who sent tremors through Albany by pressuring former State Comptroller Alan G. Hevesi, a fellow Democrat, to plead guilty to a single felony charge and to resign last month. Since then, Mr. Soares said his office has received numerous tips about wrongdoing in state government.

DOJ_NMG_0123336

Perhaps most worrisome for the capital: his efforts to look into corruption are now being aided by a partnership with Attorney General Andrew M. Cuomo, creating what could be a potent check on legislative abuses in a newly reform-minded Albany.

"This historically has been an office that was very much a part of the local political establishment," Mr. Soares said recently about the Albany prosecutor's office, which has jurisdiction over crimes in the capital. "I come to this job with a certain independence and therefore I feel much more comfortable in looking at these cases."

Much of the groundwork for the Hevesi case was laid out by the State Ethics Commission and the attorney general's office, but it was Mr. Soares (pronounced soars) who decided to pursue it as a felony investigation. Mr. Soares's predecessor, Paul A. Clyne, prosecuted high-profile cases, but the more notable, including cases against former Assemblyman Roger L. Green and J. Michael Boxley, a former top Assembly aide, ended with misdemeanor pleas.

The Hevesi case reinforced Mr. Soares's pledge to bring "one standard of justice" to the office. Although a Democrat in a Democratic-run county, he is also an outsider in a city led by older white men, a native Portuguese speaker from Cape Verde, off the western coast of Africa, who moved to Pawtucket, R.I., at age 6. He graduated from Cornell and then Albany Law School.

"Politically, my environment's a toxic environment, O.K.?" Mr. Soares said in an interview. "These are people that do not forget and have not forgotten."

From a seafaring culture, he has decorated his office with images of sailboats. He has a fullback's build and dresses in conservative suits, but also wears a wristband with the word "one" on it, part of an antipoverty campaign popular with celebrities — "I'm a big U2, Coldplay fan," he explained.

Before his 2004 election, he was an obscure junior prosecutor frustrated with his former boss, Mr. Clyne. Then he decided to do the unthinkable: run against his supervisor, and the local Democratic machine.

He told Mr. Clyne he was going to run against him, which led to a seven-minute conversation, Mr. Soares said. "First five, he laughed and didn't think to take me seriously, and the next two were firing me."

Mr. Clyne, who now assists district attorneys in the state, declined to comment.

A bitter and expensive campaign followed. Wealthy backers of drug law reform, including a group linked to the billionaire financier George Soros, rallied support for Mr. Soares. That angered local politicians, including the longtime Albany mayor, Gerald D. Jennings, who complained that interests from New York City were interfering in the election.

In a recent interview, Mr. Jennings said: "I don't have a lot of contact with David. I expect him to do the job he was elected to do."

His iconoclastic behavior as district attorney has certainly led some to see him as a hero ready to take on state government, while others see a zealous young prosecutor intent on making a name for himself.

Relations with law enforcement officials frayed last year when Mr. Soares delivered a speech in Canada highly critical of American drug policy, saying the war on drugs "provides law enforcement officials with lucrative jobs" — a comment that he later apologized for making, while not backing off from the essence of his criticisms.

"I took great offense at that," said James L. Campbell, the Albany county sheriff. "I'm in my 41st year of law enforcement, 16 as sheriff, 24 with the state police, and I have had people I work side by side with killed in this war on drugs, so I really was offended by it, but he did apologize for it."

His ability to take on corruption in state government was limited until recently. Last year, he created a public integrity unit to pursue such cases, but he had only two lawyers and one investigator working both local and state matters. Adding to his problems has been a feud with the County Legislature, which recently tried to strip him of his investigator.

Along came Mr. Cuomo, the new attorney general, who pledged to bolster the district attorney's efforts with lawyers and investigators from his much larger office. The deal has benefits for Mr. Cuomo as well — giving his own office more teeth on such cases and access to criminal grand jury proceedings — and a prosecutor with jurisdiction.

"In opening the newspapers for the past several weeks, you see scandal after scandal involving state government," Mr. Cuomo said recently, adding that corruption cases were "a higher priority than probably ever before."

Mr. Soares said he was cautious about the Hevesi case at first, because the initial complaint was delivered to his office by Mr. Hevesi's political opponent, J. Christopher Callaghan, with cameras in tow. But Mr. Hevesi's admissions that he had used state workers to chauffeur his wife, and scathing reports from the State Ethics Commission and the attorney general's office, provided a road map for conviction, and Mr. Soares insisted on a felony plea.

DOJ_NMG_0123337

"You had to ask yourself, if this was a guy who worked at Dunkin' Donuts, and this happened to a guy that worked at Dunkin' Donuts, what would we be doing?" he said. "And if the answer is he's got to plea to this charge, he's got to pay restitution, he's got to leave his job, then what's good for the guy at Dunkin' Donuts is also good for the state comptroller."

In fact, Mr. Soares's entry into the political world similarly reflected more pedestrian concerns. The central issue in the 2004 race for district attorney was the Rockefeller-era drug laws, which sent many drug offenders away to prison for decades.

Mr. Clyne was a vocal supporter of such laws, while Mr. Soares became an outspoken advocate of easing them and felt the district attorney's office eschewed alternatives to locking people up. He was assigned to be the community prosecutor — essentially presenting a public face for the office — but felt his efforts to reach out were undermined.

The roots of Mr. Soares's feelings on drug policy go back to his youth.

In Pawtucket, his father worked as an electrician and carpenter. Though he and his three sisters have done well, his older brother has struggled with drugs and crime.

"He had brushes with the law as early as the age of 14, in and out of reform school, in and out of state prison," Mr. Soares said, adding, "my mother had to be the lady in the audience watching her son be arraigned."

Eventually, his brother was deported.

"I think what was frustrating for his family, and for David," said Joao Goncalves, a close friend of Mr. Soares's who also grew up in Pawtucket, "all the other siblings turned out just fine, but his brother was the bully in the neighborhood, he went down a different path."

Mr. Soares, he said, "sees the reality of people, and sees that there are some good people that make some really bad decisions and there are bad people that make some really bad decisions as well."

Perhaps the same can sometimes be said of politics. Mr. Soares seems intent on making his mark.

"In the wake of our most recent state prosecution, I think more people are beginning to take note," he said. "We do have tremendous jurisdiction and ability to help this governor with his reform agenda."

In The Penalty Phase, All One's Secrets Revealed (NYT)

By Michael Brick

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

In the federal court system of the United States of America, duly recorded and transcribed by professional stenographers, there exists testimony documenting the fact that one Ronell Wilson, 24, of Staten Island, wet the bed into his teenage years.

Kids might call that T.M.I., "too much information." The law calls it evidence of a "mitigating factor" that could spare a defendant's life.

Mr. Wilson may or may not get the death penalty for killing two undercover detectives; jurors in Brooklyn will be asked to decide this week. But in two weeks of testimony to determine his sentence, he has already endured an unenviable ordeal.

The degree of scrutiny afforded a capital defendant is enough to mortify anyone who has ever been a child, dated a girl, gotten a haircut or tried to dress fashionably. This is the full probe. All your secrets revealed. Some defendants consider it either more agonizing than death, a sentence no federal jury in New York has prescribed for a half-century, or at least worth a big gamble to avoid.

In 2003, in the same court, a defendant named Emile Dixon took his chances, forbidding defense lawyers to call his relatives or dissect the circumstances of his upbringing. The strategy worked well for him, or as well as possible under the circumstances. Six jurors wrote on a verdict sheet that Mr. Dixon had impressively "exhibited concern for the privacy and dignity of his family."

He is serving a life term for dealing drugs and murdering two people, including another dealer who had become a government witness.

A Killer, and Bad in Math

DOJ_NMG_0123338

In theory, this adversarial process known as the penalty phase, coda to a capital murder trial, informs jurors of the broader circumstances of the case. Prosecutors argue that the convicted man is more rotten than other killers; defense lawyers suggest causes for mercy. In practice, it can produce some bizarre tableaus. After all, once it has been established that you murdered somebody, other biographical details can seem surreally picayune.

Because of the youth of Mr. Wilson and his co-defendants, some of whom were teenagers at the time of the killings in 2003, the jury has already seen some jarringly boyish displays. In the first phase of the trial, one witness told of a clash after a school talent show. One enlarged evidence photograph showed Mr. Wilson making a gang hand sign for the camera, but the image was stamped with the logo of the Six Flags Great Adventure theme park.

On Wednesday, a gallery of TV reporters, sketch artists and figures from throughout Mr. Wilson's life learned that his I.Q. had once been measured at around 78. Asked long ago how to respond if a younger, smaller child started a fight, he had answered, "Pick him up and throw him in the garbage."

At P.S. 14 on Staten Island, he had done well in physical education, less so in math. Those grades were projected on a giant screen in the courtroom. His lawyer, Mitchell Dinnerstein, said: "We're talking about a kindergarten kid, right?"

"Everybody makes mistakes," cried Constance Wilson, Aunt Connie to the defendant, as she pleaded for his life from the witness stand. Her choice of words sounded belittlingly off-key in the courtroom, as the mistake in question was the murder of two men with young families, but the jury also heard about other transgressions to better fit that bill.

Prosecutors called a computer technician named Jack Marczewski to describe an encounter from June 1996, when he was 13 and Mr. Wilson was 14. With another boy, Mr. Wilson had demanded bus passes, rifled through young Jack's book bag, stolen his calculator and punched him in the face.

Cross-examination was brief. A defense lawyer asked Mr. Marczewski how he was doing these days.

"Ah, doing well," he said.

Indignities Left and Right

Seeking to portray Mr. Wilson as a sweet-hearted, wayward, neglected and possibly brain-damaged child, his own lawyers have subjected him to a catalog of humiliations.

They displayed a photograph of Mr. Wilson at age 12, thumb firmly in cheek.

They put his father, Robert Earl Barnes, on the witness stand, then made a spectacle of his resplendent incoherence. They revealed that Mr. Wilson was originally called Earl, presumably after this heavily sedated man who could not identify the year of his son's birth.

A former teacher at a juvenile detention center testified that Mr. Wilson had arrived at age 15, reading at a second-grade level. A counselor from the center, Michael J. Hall, who testified for the record that he liked Mr. Wilson, described him as "immature," "slow academically" and "a thumb sucker."

A defense lawyer asked: "Did he also wet the bed?"

Mr. Hall said: "Oh, yes."

Then he recounted a time when Mr. Wilson had claimed to be a member of the Bloods street gang. Mr. Wilson, he said, rescinded his claim when confronted by older boys who were known gang members.

The next witness, Milton Munroe, described Mr. Wilson's efforts to fill out a supermarket job application.

"I realized pretty much that he only had his first and last name on the application," Mr. Munroe said, "after 15 minutes of trying to fill it out."

It remains to be seen what value the jurors will place on any of this. From the defense table, Mr. Wilson has watched the parade of counselors and teachers and parents and other relatives go by. He has registered no humiliation, no particular response at all. There is some indication he just appreciates the concern.

"It's nice to know somebody still got love for me," he wrote in a jailhouse letter to a friend (who later betrayed him on the witness stand). "I feel much better to know that."

It Only Looks Like The Girls Have Gone Wild (PPG)

By Torsten Ove, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

DOJ_NMG_0123339

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, January 28, 2007

Study finds no increase in 'violent femmes'

COLUMBIA, S.C. -- Six Eau Claire High School students, all girls, are arrested for fighting as students board buses after school.

WOONSOCKET, R.I. -- Two mothers and their daughters, both 13, are arrested after one woman drives her already suspended daughter to Woonsocket Middle School to fight a teenage rival.

PITTSBURGH -- As police try to calm two groups of teens yelling at each other, a brawl breaks out involving 20 females. One girl is bashed in the head with a brick, and her mother is bitten on the ear.

Incidents like these are showing up in news media reports across the country, often to illustrate a common theme: American girls are becoming more violent.

But have girls really gone so wild?

A U.S. Justice Department report, under internal review and due out in about a month, will largely conclude that they haven't -- or at least that there's no data to support that they have.

"We don't have good evidence that it is increasing. We think it's not getting worse," said Margaret Zahn, lead investigator for the Girls Study Group, a panel of experts assembled by the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention. "The media [approach] is always, 'If it bleeds, it leads.' I do wish the media would be more careful about how these things are reported."

But the drumbeat continues. Just last week, "CBS Evening News" reported on a group of Long Island girls who videotaped vicious assaults and put them on the Internet. That story also featured commentary by James Garbarino, the author of an influential 2006 book, "See Jane Hit: Why Girls Are Growing More Violent and What We Can Do About It."

Yet the consensus of most criminologists is that the "crisis" of girl violence is probably overblown, inflated by statistics gathered from reporting standards that didn't exist years ago -- such as zero tolerance policies in schools and increased reporting of domestic violence.

"The empirical evidence shows it is a myth," says Penn State criminologist Darrell Steffensmeier, who is part of the Girls Study Group. "There are a lot of unanswered questions. But if you take the best evidence we have, the rates aren't any higher."

Pittsburgh police and city school police agree.

"I don't think it's anything new," says Lt. Philip Dacey, who until recently commanded the East Liberty station, the busiest in the city. "And if it's shooting up, it's not happening in my area here."

Some research, however, points the other way.

Cindy Ness, program director at the John Jay Center on Terrorism and Public Safety, has studied African-American girls in Philadelphia. Her conclusion is that street fights are a way of life for girls there but that most of the battles are never reported to police.

In her 2004 report, "Why Girls Fight: Female Youth Violence in the Inner City," she found that the girls she interviewed "actively pursue and enjoy physically dominating others and take pleasure in inflicting pain and in emerging victorious."

One girl, Aiesha, summed up the attitude this way: "You kidding me, girls be fighting more than boys do. They so emotional they'll fight over anything. Boys won't get into it over no he-said, she-said. They only gonna fight over something serious like money or drugs."

Ms. Ness also insists that street-fighting among girls in low-income areas is "significantly underestimated."

"I think it's largely an inner-city phenomenon," she says. "I think it's ratcheted up. But it's not to say it's crazy out of control. It's not this sense of Girls Gone Wild! It's more subtle than that."

More arrests, but why?

The root of this debate is numbers.

Girls are definitely getting arrested for assault and aggravated assault more often than they used to, according to figures from the FBI's Uniform Crime Reports.

Although juvenile arrests for violent crime are down overall, girls represent a larger percentage of those arrests.

While the rate for boys declined 26 percent between 1980 and 2003, the female rate jumped 47 percent. Between those years, female assault arrests rose from about 200 for every 100,000 girls to 750.

DOJ_NMG_0123340

Some analysts and media reports cite that fact in saying the "gender gap" between boys and girls is closing. Authors such as Mr. Garbarino have seized on it to bolster their contention that girls are becoming more violent.

He lists plenty of reasons why this is happening: the breakdown of the family, the decline of the church and the natural evolution of the women's liberation movement, which began in the 1960s and now encourages girls to be as aggressive as boys.

He and others are also big on blaming the entertainment industry for featuring "violent femmes" in action roles, such as gun-toting Lara Croft and sword-wielding Uma Thurman in "Kill Bill."

Even the highbrow heroine of the Harry Potter books, Hermione Granger, punches a boy and says, "Boy, that felt good."

"Girls in general are evidencing a new assertiveness and physicality that goes far beyond criminal assault," Mr. Garbarino writes. "It is evident in their participation in sports, in their open sensuality, in their enjoyment of 'normal' aggression that boys have long enjoyed in rough-and-tumble play, and in the feeling of confidence that comes with physical prowess and power."

But criminologists largely dismiss Mr. Garbarino's book, and others like it, as simplistic and alarmist.

The 15 members of the Girls Study Group, including such prominent researchers as Meda Chesney-Lind of the University of Hawaii at Manoa and Jody Miller of the University of Missouri-St. Louis, suggest more complex factors are at work.

For one thing, several studies that rely on self-reporting by girls, such as the National Crime Victimization Survey, show very little change in violence over the last two decades.

The National Youth Risk Behavior Survey, put out by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, actually shows a 10 percent decrease in fighting reported by girls in grades 9-12 between 1991 and 2003.

Some surveys could be skewed because they're often given in school, and many of the girls who fight might not be in school.

Still, says Ms. Zahn, "all the self-reporting data indicates no change. They're not reporting more violence."

Shifting definitions

The Girls Study Group says the reason arrests are up is probably that more people in authority are paying attention.

Police today are more likely to arrest girls than before in part because of laws requiring them to take action in domestic violence incidents. And since those are more likely to involve girls than boys -- often in fights with their mothers -- more girls are being charged than in years past.

In schools, fights among girls are more likely to end up with someone arrested than in the past.

Ms. Zahn, 60, said that when she was a 16-year-old student in Lorain, Ohio, a friend got into a "knock-down, drag-out fight" with another girl.

"I saw it," she says. "But that was never reported to anyone. I don't even know if the principal knew about it. Now we have zero tolerance in the schools."

Another factor, the study group says, is what constitutes an assault.

Mr. Steffensmeier says police are using broader definitions that include more minor incidents that girls are more likely to commit. His research shows that disorderly conduct, harassment and resisting arrest are now often categorized as simple assault -- and reported as such to the FBI.

"You can get busted much more easily now," he says. "If you start busting people for scratching or kicking or throwing minor objects, you're going to arrest more girls [than boys]."

And in some jurisdictions, the study group says, behaviors traditionally categorized as "status offenses" such as incorrigibility or truancy are now considered grounds for detention in a juvenile facility.

Mr. Steffensmeier says fear of lawsuits might also be pushing social workers, school officials and police to seek arrest instead of handling cases informally.

The bottom line, the study group says, is that violence among girls does not seem to be as widespread as it has been portrayed.

But Cindy Ness isn't convinced.

In Philadelphia, girls said they fought all the time to protect themselves or their reputations. What's more, many took pride in their viciousness and in "not fighting like a girl."

DOJ_NMG_0123341

One told her, "I punched her in the face and then I banged her head against the ground. I only stopped 'cause someone pulled me off her."

Others said a girl with a knife will always go for the other girl's face to disfigure her, whereas boys will stab to kill.

"This way she gonna see herself in the mirror every day and remember what I did to her," said one of the girls, named Lakeesha.

The fights often came home and ended up involving mothers, aunts and sisters, as in the brawl on Crucible Street in Pittsburgh on Jan. 8.

On one ride-along with police, Ms. Ness saw 30 women and girls in a fight that police had to break up three times before they finally made arrests.

But was that kind of behavior happening in 30 years ago?

"No one can say for sure," she says. "But it's been going on for a long time in the African-American community."

EDITORIAL: The Cavalry Is Coming (NOTP)

New Orleans Times-Picayune, January 28, 2007

With a rash of murders to begin the year and only one arrest in 14 cases, New Orleans police clearly needed help. They are getting it.

In the broadest law enforcement commitment yet from the federal government, FBI, U.S. Marshal, Drug Enforcement Administration and Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives agents will work the streets with police to make arrests, develop cases and reach out to residents in the city's most violent neighborhoods.

"The goal is to detain, imprison, prosecute, convict and incarcerate these violent criminals, to take the pressure off the local criminal justice system," said U.S. Attorney Jim Letten, who delivered Thursday's announcement for U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales. Wherever possible, Mr. Letten said, cases will be handled in federal court.

Hallelujah.

The federal system is functioning at a much higher level than the New Orleans Police Department and Orleans Parish district attorney's office. As for the city's criminal court judges, there are so many problems with evidence gathering and prosecution of cases that it's difficult to figure out how well the judges are handling their duties. There have been judges who went out of their way to set low bonds for violent offenders. But with Judge Charles Elloie off the bench that doesn't seem to be the problem that it was a year ago.

The federal initiative will double the number of agents assigned to New Orleans and will expand their involvement. FBI agents will go on patrol with police officers and will knock on doors to try to create relationships with residents. DEA agents won't be limited to drug arrests but are being given the power to work all kinds of crimes.

The city will get six additional ATF agents, nine additional FBI agents and three extra deputies and an investigator in the U.S. Marshal's Service -- all at the expense of the federal government. The DEA also will replace ruined ballistics equipment for the Police Department.

This effort seems more about expertise than sheer numbers, though. The Police Department has struggled to put together solid cases and follow through with all the necessary documentation. Many witnesses are afraid of neighborhood thugs and distrustful of police, which is a combination that practically assures failure.

If FBI agents can turn that situation around, they will be heroes.

Two FBI agents also will work with the Police Department's cold case homicide squad, which has done some solid work in the past clearing old homicide cases. Solving old murder cases is vital, not only to bring closure to individual cases but to stem the cycle of violence. Some suspects have been linked to multiple murders but never convicted. Getting repeat violent offenders off the streets is crucial to building a safer city.

The effort to curb drug dealing is vital, too. The beefed up Drug Enforcement Administration unit will do undercover sweeps of crime-ridden neighborhoods, which is a good strategy. The effort ought to yield better intelligence about scattered drug operations and help build evidence against the violent dealers who terrorize some neighborhoods.

Federal authorities aren't new to the crime fight in New Orleans.

DOJ_NMG_0123342

ATF agents were instrumental in building a case against the 7th Ward Soldiers drug gang in the late 1990s. Federal investigators traced bullet casings fired by gang members "back into their hands," then-Police Superintendent Richard Pennington said when 16 people were indicted on gang-related charges that included murder and attempted murder.

When he arrived to take over the New Orleans FBI office in May 2005, special agent in charge Jim Bernazzani started talking about creating an intelligence-sharing group across law enforcement lines to fight street crime.

Post-Katrina, with the city's justice system in shambles for months, Mr. Letten and other federal authorities have looked for ways to work with police and to take on the prosecution of criminal cases that might have gone to state court in the past.

In November, nine people were indicted on federal drug and gun charges in Central City through the teamwork of the Police Department and agents from the FBI and Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

A few weeks before those arrests, ATF had brought back its 24-hour gun hotline. Since October, 117 investigations have sprung from calls made to the hotline, agency officials said Thursday. In one of those investigations, drug dealers were rooted out of a house they had commandeered from a woman, and her home was given back to her.

Federal intervention can only go so far. The cases Mr. Letten can prosecute are limited by law. Police, prosecutors and Criminal District Court must be equipped to handle their share of cases, and those are plentiful.

But New Orleanians weary of crime are surely thankful that the cavalry is on the way.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Noxubee Clerk: No Inquiry Into Invalid Ballots (JCL)

By Jimmie E. Gates

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, January 28, 2007

Noxubee County Circuit Clerk Carl Miggins testified Friday his office took no action to find out why signatures on some absentee ballots in a 2003 election were different than the signatures on the applications for the ballots.

A court ruled that 33 absentee ballots cast in a race between a black candidate and a white candidate in the race for sheriff were invalid. But the judge ruled the election results in which a black candidate was declared the winner would stand because the absentee ballots didn't affect the election's outcome.

In the first lawsuit of its kind in the United States, the Department of Justice is accusing black political leaders in majority-black Noxubee County of discriminating against white voters.

Miggins, the last official witness called by the Justice Department, began his testimony late Friday.

He will complete his testimony Monday, when the trial in U.S. District Court in Jackson enters its third week. District Judge Tom S. Lee is presiding.

Defendants in the lawsuit are the Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee and its chairman, Ike Brown, and the county Election Commission.

Miggins, who is black, and Noxubee County had been defendants but were removed after the county signed a federal consent decree to prevent any discrimination against voters.

Questioned Friday by Justice Department attorney Christopher Coates about the signatures being different, Miggins explained he took no action to find out why "Because the judge and the Election Commission ruled on it. ... If a judge ruled on it, I feel it is behind us."

Miggins said he personally doesn't make any determination on ballots cast the day of an election. He said it's up to poll workers to decide who can cast a ballot legally at the polls.

But Coates told Miggins that in his capacity as circuit clerk he is the administrator of absentee ballots and the registrar of voters.

Wil Colom, attorney for Brown and the Democratic Executive Committee, objected to Coates' questions about the signatures on the absentee ballots.

Colom said the difference in the signatures was not the only reason the 33 ballots were thrown out.

"There were probably 12 different reasons," Colom said.

DOJ_NMG_0123343

The defense will begin putting on its case after the government completes its case. The defense expects to take four to five days, Colom said.

Rental Housing Under Scrutiny (BRCN)

By KARA L. RICHARDSON, Staff Writer

Bridgewater (NJ) Courier-News, January 28, 2007

Central Jersey towns consider tougher rules for overcrowding

In the battle against illegal overcrowding in rental properties -- often called "stacking" -- some Central Jersey communities are considering tougher laws, some of which require the registration of individual tenants and their landlords.

That's the case in Raritan Borough, for instance, where officials might require landlords to certify the number of tenants in each rental unit, Mayor Jo-Ann Liptak said.

"We're going after the landlord who thinks he can exploit these people," Liptak said of tenants who are stacked.

Flemington, North Plainfield and Bernards also are considering stronger laws, although not everyone thinks they are necessary.

"I think there are enough regulations that adequately regulate the situation already," said William Johnson, municipal prosecutor in Somer-ville, where last week a landlord was fined for allowing a tenant to sleep in a basement.

Tougher laws might also stir the debate over whether overcrowding laws inordinately penalize Hispanics.

"Most of these ordinances go substantially beyond traditional health codes," said Stuart Deutsch, dean of Rutgers School of Law in Newark. "They are less about housing and more about who is being housed."

The ordinances, he said, come during this "very hot debate right now about immigration, especially related to Hispanics."

Her desire for a stiffer law, Liptak said, is not anti-immigrant. "It's anti-greedy landlord."

What inspections uncover

When housing inspectors uncover an overcrowded rental property, they often find other illegal -- and potentially deadly -- conditions such as:

Full-sized refrigerators and hot plates in bedrooms

Electrical cords strung like spiderwebs

Locks bolting every door

Mattresses in the kitchen and sleeping quarters in a basement or attic with only one way out in case of a fire.

Barry Van Horn, Somerville's fire marshal, has seen children sleeping in closets or in the bottom drawer of a dresser. Once, a woman without heat used coals under her mattress.

"You can't appreciate what this is all about until you see the desperation in their faces," Van Horn said.

Because of the widespread nature of the issue, the New Jersey League of Municipalities is collecting ordinances that deal with residential overcrowding, said Bill Dressel, the league's executive director.

Last week, Dressel said, the league started a immigration committee, and overcrowding will be one of the issues studied.

"There are quality-of-life issues both for the immigrant population and concerns for the residents who are there," Dressel said.

In North Plainfield -- with 5,000 rental units -- Council President Skip Stabile said a discussion about overcrowding laws, begun in 2006, might be resumed this year.

"You're really looking for the number of occupants," Stabile said.

The suggestion to study codes came from from North Plainfield Housing Director Jim Rodino, who wants to inspect an apartment when rented to a new tenant.

Now, municipal officials may inspect a property only when it is sold.

Support from a landlord

Jeffrey Allegar, a Raritan Borough landlord who owns a two-family property, supports overcrowding ordinances. He is required to register as a landlord, and his property is inspected annually.

"That's a good thing," Allegar said. "You're in there, you see are what doing. It's good for everybody. It saves a lot of hassles."

DOJ_NMG_0123344

"The burden should be on the town," he said. "If they make you register, they should check up, too," he said.

Not every community dealing with overcrowding laws is making them tougher.

When Bernardsville wanted to make sure its inspection practices were not discriminatory, it looked to Bound Brook, said Elaine Broyles, Bernardsville's Zoning Code Enforcement official, and adopted Bound Brook's revised guidelines.

In 2004, Bound Brook agreed to reform its inspection practices -- which the U.S. Justice Department said were designed to drive out Hispanics -- in order to end a federal lawsuit.

Among other reforms, Bound Brook translated its property maintenance code into Spanish, gave residents 24 hours notice to correct an illegal living situation and hired a bilingual coordinator to give residents information about housing, property maintenance and redevelopment.

On May 3, 2006, the Plainfield City Council repealed a 2004 overcrowding ordinance after determining that existing ordinances accomplished the same purpose.

When initially adopted, some residents felt it unfairly targeted the city's Hispanic population. The law had required the name and address of the building's owner, managing agent and superintendent; the number of sleeping rooms in each unit and a floor plan; and the number of people living in each unit, including children older than 2.

Kara L. Richardson can be reached at (908)707-3186 or krichard@c-n.com. Staff writers Brad Wadlow, Christa Segalini and Chad Hemenway contributed to this report.

Matching The Police To The Populace (NYT)

By Allan Richter

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

AS part of an initial push to recruit minority officers to the Long Beach, N.Y., Police Department in 2004, the civil service exam was opened to nonresidents for the first time. That move, police officials said, led to the hiring of a Hispanic woman and an Asian-American man, both New York City police officers.

But the department was unable to hire a police officer who was black in that recruitment drive. “We diversified but were still missing a part of the target population,” said Lt. Bruce Meyer, who heads the recruitment efforts for a department that had no black officers for almost four decades. “At that point I said we have to do more.”

Police departments in suburbs and towns across the region have been putting a new emphasis in recent years on bringing more black and Hispanic officers into their ranks as, census figures show, the white population in the suburbs has declined by 2.1 percent and minority populations have grown in the last five years.

The departments are using different tactics, with mixed success, including tweaking residency requirements and recruiting candidates who live beyond their borders. They are holding civil service tests more frequently, initiating new advertising campaigns and turning to the military for possible candidates.

In Long Beach, where the black population is 6.2 percent, according to the 2000 census, the decision was made to try again with a more ambitious recruiting effort. Lieutenant Meyer said the Police Department persuaded the civil service commission to hold another test a year later, rather than wait the usual four years. This time, posters announcing the test went up in churches, and a recruiting unit was assembled from the department’s few minority officers.

The effort yielded results: Some 750 candidates applied for the new test, up from 341 in the previous round, including more than five times the number of black candidates and three times the number of Hispanics. Two black officers were sworn in to the now 78-member police department last fall. It was the first time in 38 years that Long Beach had hired a black police officer.

Officer Judy Arroyo, who joined the Long Beach department in July 2005, said she had become a de facto point person for Spanish-speaking women enduring domestic abuse. “I’ve seen that people call and request me,” she said. “They see they can connect with me.”

In Bergen County, N.J., Sheriff Leo P. McGuire said his department has also been making a big push to diversify its ranks by changing its recruitment tactics. Instead of limiting job candidates to the county, positions for rank-and-file officers were made available to people statewide for the first time. Last month, the 466-member department swore in eight black officers, seven of them women.

DOJ_NMG_0123345

"Now the public is saying this administration means business," Sheriff McGuire said.

In Paterson, N.J., where Hispanics make up 57 percent of the city's population and blacks make up 30 percent, the Police Department took the opposite approach by focusing its recruiting efforts within the city's borders.

In addition, the city's police force recently agreed to hire "police assistants," a position created by the New Jersey Department of Personnel five years ago to help municipalities broaden their candidate lists with a more accessible entry-level post.

"We put ads in the local newspapers," said Michael Walker, the department's civilian police director. "We addressed every criminal justice class at Passaic County Community College in Paterson, across the street from our headquarters. We went to the religious community."

As a result, the Paterson police force expects to hire 18 police assistants — most of whom are Hispanic men and women — by the spring, Mr. Walker said.

Maki Haberfeld, chairwoman of the department of law, police science and criminal justice administration at John Jay College of Criminal Justice, said the public feels more comfortable when they know that "people of the same background are represented on the force."

Dr. Haberfeld added, however, "I do not think effective policing in any shape or form is related to someone's race or background."

Some police departments that have failed to increase the number of minority officers have come under scrutiny by the United States Justice Department, which has entered into consent decrees to help oversee the recruiting efforts of a number of departments, including those of both Nassau and Suffolk Counties.

Under such decrees, the Justice Department typically helps shape the content of civil service exams. But Steve Levy, the Suffolk County executive, said the department's input had done little to raise the number of minority officers.

"The test was ridiculous in that it was basing questions on biographical information and very subjective things such as your favorite color — things that had no correlation to one's ability to be a good police officer," he said.

In addition, Mr. Levy said the Justice Department vetoed his idea in 2005 to recruit police officers from Suffolk communities where crime was high. "Unfortunately we have a Justice Department that tells us what we can't do," he said, "but doesn't tell us what we can do."

Cynthia Magnuson, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said the consent decree with Suffolk County, agreed to in 1986, has resulted in a "significant improvement" in police minority hiring. In 1983, when the Justice Department first lodged complaints of discrimination against the county, only 25 women, or less than 1 percent of the force, and only 59 blacks and Hispanics, or 2.3 percent, were on the county police force.

In 2005, there were 320 women, or 12.1 percent, and 262 blacks and Hispanics, or 9.9 percent.

"Our contact with the county is through the county attorney, who has not conveyed to us any criticism regarding this department's input into the county's civil service examinations, or this department's monitoring of the consent decree we have with the county," Ms. Magnuson said.

The proposal from Mr. Levy that the Justice Department struck down, she added, would have violated nondiscrimination provisions of the consent decree and the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by instituting a racial quota. Mr. Levy's plan sought "an absolute preference" to fill 20 percent of entry-level police officer slots from minority communities, she said.

Ambitious and focused efforts do not always get results. Five years ago, the Hartford police began administering the department's civil service test more frequently and enlisted community leaders to help recruit candidates.

But Lester McCoy, the assistant police chief, conceded that those efforts had apparently not worked. The 420-member force is about 60 percent white, 20 percent Hispanic and 18 percent black, just as it was five years ago.

"We're not doing any worse, but were not doing any better," he said, adding that the force has not had the budget to dispatch its own recruiting teams to minority colleges and other potential sources.

Church-state "Wall" Coming Back Down? (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

DOJ_NMG_0123346

The Washington Times, January 28, 2007

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof ..."

the First Amendment of the Bill of Rights to the U.S. Constitution, which took effect Dec. 15, 1791

U.S. courts rule about two times each week on cases involving whether prayers can be included in a high school graduation ceremony, an image of Jesus Christ can be displayed in a public school or a Ten Commandments monument can remain in a government building or public park.

The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) says such prayers and displays violate the principle of separation of church and state.

The Rev. Barry Lynn, executive director of Americans United for Separation of Church and State, estimates the frequency of such rulings between 104 and 156 annually.

Mr. Lynn, whose group often gets involved in the cases, says they represent only a small fraction of incidents that arise.

"Most of these cases never even make it to court," he says.

The ACLU, which routinely takes on such cases in federal court, has scored some important victories in the church-state area.

Those victories include the 1992 U.S. Supreme Court ruling in Lee v. Weisman, which struck down school-sponsored prayers at public-school graduation ceremonies.

Another was the court's 2000 decision in Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, which struck down a Texas school district's policy of permitting students to vote on selecting a classmate to lead prayers before football games.

The tide started to turn in June 2005, when the Supreme Court ruled that a granite monolith on the grounds of the Texas state Capitol in Austin featuring the Ten Commandments -- along with Jewish and patriotic symbols -- did not violate the First Amendment's ban on an establishment of religion.

Francis Manion, senior counsel for the American Center for Law and Justice (ACLJ), says that with its 5-4 opinion in Van Orden v. Perry, the high court "did away with the idea that there is something constitutionally radioactive about the Ten Commandments."

In a December 2005 ruling about a Kentucky courthouse's display of the Ten Commandments, the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals held that the phrase "separation of church and state" is an "extra-constitutional construct ... [that] has grown tiresome." The court ruled that the display was allowed because it was "part of an otherwise secular exhibit."

Since then, the ACLJ, a public-interest law firm that specializes in religious-liberty cases, has won "most of the Ten Commandments court cases" in which it has participated, Mr. Manion says.

History of the 'wall'

Many Americans wrongly assume the words "separation of church and state" are included in the U.S. Constitution.

In fact, the phrase "wall of separation between church and state" was first used by Thomas Jefferson in a letter he wrote to the Danbury Baptist Association in Danbury, Conn., on Jan. 1, 1802, 10 months after his presidential inauguration.

An analysis of that letter -- now housed at the Library of Congress -- as well as other documents from this nation's earliest years and nearly 150 years of legal decisions strongly suggest that Jefferson and his contemporaries would be at odds with the courts today regarding church-state issues, according to the Rev. Bryan Fischer, a minister and executive director of the Idaho Values Alliance in Boise.

Mr. Fischer says Jefferson coined the phrase that some judges are calling overused to "reassure" the Connecticut Baptists that they had "no need to fear oppression from the federal government or its intrusion into the free exercise of religion because the Constitution had erected a 'wall of separation between church and state.' "

"In other words, Jefferson's wall was designed to protect the church from the state, not the other way around," and it "was never intended to insulate the state from the influence of the church," Mr. Fischer wrote in a 2005 opinion piece published in the Idaho Statesman.

Mr. Lynn disagrees and calls opponents "historical revisionists."

DOJ_NMG_0123347

"Thomas Jefferson was a longtime champion of not having the state involved in religion," says Mr. Lynn, an ordained minister with the United Church of Christ. "He and James Madison erected a framework for separation of church and state. ... It's clear the majority of the framers of the Constitution had no interest in having government accommodate religion."

Mr. Manion says the two sides in the church-state debate agree that the Founding Fathers opposed allowing government "to make any religion obligatory" or giving one religion preferential treatment over another.

"But we know the framers of the Constitution permitted acknowledgement of religion in the public square. Given the things Jefferson said and did, he would be sued by the ACLU if he were president today," he says.

The 'wall' in court

Jefferson's letter to the Baptists was cited by Supreme Court justices for the first time in the 1879 case of Reynolds v. United States.

George Reynolds, a Mormon polygamist, had been convicted of bigamy in the Utah Territory. He said his conviction should be overturned because it was his religious duty as a Mormon to have multiple wives.

Eight justices held that religious duty was not a suitable defense to a criminal indictment. The majority opinion alluded to Jefferson's letter, in which he said there was a distinction between religious belief and action that flowed from religious belief.

The court said it recognized that under the First Amendment, Congress cannot pass a law prohibiting the free exercise of religion. But it noted that a law limiting marriage to one spouse at a time had been in effect since the times of King James I of England, who ruled from 1603 to 1625.

Nonetheless, the Supreme Court case cited by many legal analysts as having the greatest influence on the church-state debate today is Everson v. Board of Education of Ewing Township, N.J., in 1947.

"That's when the Supreme Court yanked the phrase out of an obscure letter Jefferson had written and inserted it in a legal ruling," Mr. Fischer says. "Overnight, it went from being an obscure phrase Jefferson had written" to being used in a way its author had not intended, he said.

In his lawsuit, Arch R. Everson charged that a New Jersey law authorizing local school boards to pay the costs of transportation to and from private and parochial schools violated the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution and the state constitution because it allowed indirect aid to religion.

In its ruling, the Supreme Court applied the Establishment Clause to the states through the Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment. The latter says: "No state shall make or enforce any law ... nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

However, the court was divided 5-4 in its decision that the New Jersey law allowing reimbursement to parochial-school students was constitutional.

Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas, one of the five who signed the majority opinion in the Everson case, acknowledged in a 1970 ruling that the Everson case turned the entire issue of religious liberty on its head.

By incorporating the 14th Amendment into the Establishment Clause, Justice Douglas wrote, the high court "reversed the historic position that the foundation of those liberties rested largely in state law," not federal legislation.

Rob Boston, spokesman for Americans United, commemorated next month's 60th anniversary of the Everson ruling in the January issue of Church & State, his group's newsletter.

His article describes Everson as the "most important church-state decision you never heard of," which "kicked off the culture wars that still exist today."

"The importance of Everson can hardly be overstated," Mr. Boston wrote. "Virtually every case that deals with the 'establishment of religion' cites Everson. Federal judges use it as a touchstone when seeking guidance in contentious clashes over the proper role of religion in government. Its language appears in countless lower court rulings and legal briefs."

Debating Everson

However, there is disagreement about the importance of the Everson ruling among legal scholars.

Bruce Fein, a lawyer who specializes in constitutional law, is a sharp critic of the Everson ruling and has made his opinions known in columns published in The Washington Times and other newspapers.

DOJ_NMG_0123348

"It sows more doubts than it dispels," he says. "If there really was a wall separating church and state, a city fire department couldn't even put out a fire at a church."

Besides, Mr, Fein says, "Thomas Jefferson never insinuated the wall was at the state level."

But Jonathan Turley, professor of law at George Washington University, contends that "it makes a lot of sense to have a system where we all have basic [religious] rights, no matter what state we are in."

Mr. Manion says it's "hard to believe that in a country where 80 [percent] to 90 percent of the people believe in God" that the government forbids the acknowledgement "of the widespread nature of this belief."

John Whitehead, president of the Rutherford Institute, a public-interest law firm that takes on cases it sees as limiting religious freedom, says he sees several "ominous trends" in the church-state area.

"In the past few years, we've seen judges put more emphasis on something they call the government's speech doctrine, which limits free speech on government property," including prayer, Mr. Whitehead says.

He cites two cases the Rutherford Institute is working on, in which people were denied the right to pray in public ceremonies or meetings.

One case involves a City Council member in Fredericksburg, Va., who was told he could not say "in Jesus' name" in a prayer at a council meeting.

"So Christians can't pray now in public. It's dangerous," Mr. Whitehead says..

ANTITRUST:

Microsoft Faces New Antitrust Clash With Vista (AFP)

AFP, January 28, 2007

BRUSSELS (AFP) - Microsoft risks a new showdown with EU regulators with the roll-out of its Vista operating system nearly three years after a landmark antitrust ruling against the US software giant, officials have said.

After numerous delays, Microsoft's next-generation Windows Vista operating system is to make its debut with home computer users on January 30 after it was shipped to business clients in November.

While Microsoft readies to roll out its first revamped operating system in five years, rivals are preparing to do battle again with the IT colossus after already winning one victory in March 2004 with an EU antitrust ruling against the company.

"With Vista, Microsoft has clearly chosen to ignore the fundamental principles of the commission's March 2004 decision," said Simon Awde, the chairman of the ECIS trade association that opposes Microsoft in its antitrust troubles.

ECIS, which includes such tech giants as Oracle, IBM and Nokia, filed a complaint with EU regulators in February 2006 targeting Vista and Office and updated their action with details on Vista last month.

"We are in the process of examining this complaint," said European Commission spokesman for competition issues Jonathan Todd.

Microsoft did not respond to requests for comment on the complaint when contacted on Friday.

The US company has long clashed with the commission over the crushing market power of its existing Windows operating system and was fined a record 497 million euros (642 million dollars) in a landmark March 2004 antitrust ruling.

In addition to fining Microsoft, the EU ordered the company to sell a version of its Windows operating system without Media Player software and to divulge the software protocols underpinning Windows for makers of rival products.

Microsoft challenged the 2004 ruling in the EU's second-highest court in April and the judges are expected to hand down a decision in the first half of the year.

Frustrated with Microsoft's defiance of some of its demands, the commission in July slapped daily fines adding up to 280.5 million euros over the six-month period of the penalty for failing to fully respect the 2004 antitrust ruling.

Microsoft is appealing against the charges.

Meanwhile, the threat of further fines remains as the commission has not yet decided whether Microsoft is meeting its demands.

DOJ_NMG_0123349

The company's rivals warn that, as with earlier Windows versions, Vista is designed in a way that makes it difficult for them to build software that is interoperable with it, hampering competition in effect.

"Vista is the first step in Microsoft's strategy to extend its market dominance to the Internet," ECIS' Awde said.

ECIS claims that a computer language Microsoft has written to replace the current standard for publishing pages on the Internet, HTML, was designed to be dependent on Windows, making operations with other platforms difficult.

The association says that Microsoft is also to release a document file format that only operates seamlessly on Microsoft's Office platform unlike the existing format, Open Document Format.

The European Commission is unlikely to open a new antitrust front against Microsoft over Vista before the EU court gives its decision on the regulators' 2004 ruling.

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Dearborn Waste Treatment Company Execs Face Myriad Of Dumping Charges (DEARPG)

By Cristen Kis, Press & Guide Newspapers

Dearborn (MI) Press & Guide, January 28, 2007

DEARBORN - A Dearborn waste treatment company and three former executives were indicted Wednesday and face charges of dumping untreated industrial waste into the Detroit sewer system.

CESI, Comprehensive Environmental Solutions, Inc., a liquid industrial waste treatment and disposal facility at Ford and Wyoming, is accused of violating the Clean Water Act from March 2002 until the present.

A federal grand jury returned a 12-count indictment alleging the company bypassed treatment processes and discharged untreated wastes directly into sewers, in violation of the Clean Water Act and Detroit City Ordinance requirements.

To conceal the misconduct, the indictment charges that employees made false statements and engaged in other surreptitious activities to cover up the violations.

"The federal regime of environmental laws is in place to protect the public and prevent unlawful discharges into our water system," said United States Attorney Stephen J. Murphy. "(Wednesday's) charges demonstrate the commitment of my office, U.S. EPA and the FBI to pursue possible violations of the environmental laws as well as attempts to conceal such violations."

In addition to CESI, three company officials were also indicted. Former president and CEO Bryan S. J. Mallindine, 50, of Carlsbad, Calif.; former president, general manager and sales manager Michael G. Panyard, 44, of Pleasant Ridge, Mich.; and former plant and operations manager Charles D. Long, 41, of Brownstown Township are charged with conspiracy and Clean Water Act violations.

Mallindine is also charged with obstruction of justice and Panyard is facing seven false statement charges.

A fourth employee, former plant manager Donald A. Kaniowski, 37, of Dearborn, pleaded guilty to unlawfully bypassing treatment equipment and discharging untreated liquid wastes into the sewer system, in violation of the Clean Water Act.

If convicted, the employees could face up to five years in prison for each violation of conspiracy or making false statements; up to three years in prison for Clean Water Act violations for unlawfully bypassing treatment equipment or otherwise violating local pretreatment requirements; up to two years in prison for the Clean Water Act violation of tampering with or rendering inaccurate monitoring equipment.

Mallindine also faces up to 10 years in prison for the obstruction of justice charge.

According to the indictment, CESI took over ownership and operations at the Wyoming Street facility in 2002. The facility had a permit to treat liquid waste brought to the facility through a variety of processes and then discharge it to the Detroit sewer system.

The ink, oil and other pollutants discharged are considered harmful, but are not classified as hazardous waste.

"The indictment in this case alleges that the defendants were paid to accept millions of gallons of waste at a time when their storage tanks were already filled to capacity," said David M. Uhlmann, Chief of the Justice Department's Environmental Crimes Section. "The defendants then allegedly discharged the waste into the Detroit sewer system without adequate treatment, which is precisely the type of conduct that the Clean Water Act was enacted to prevent."

The facility contained 12 large, above ground tanks capable of storing more than 10 million gallons of liquid industrial wastes. According to court records, although the facility's storage tanks were at or near capacity, the company continued to accept millions of gallons of liquid wastes it could not adequately treat or store.

The indictment alleges that, in order to reduce costs and maintain storage space at the facility for additional wastes, the defendants often bypassed treatment processes and discharged untreated wastes directly to the sewer.

Untreated and insufficiently-treated industrial wastes discharged into a sanitary sewer can interfere with the operation of a sewage treatment plant, causing a discharge of untreated sewage and other wastes into a lake or river.

If a major storm event causes a sanitary sewer to exceed its capacity, then untreated and insufficiently-treated industrial wastes in that sanitary sewer may discharge directly to lakes and rivers.

CESI also came under scrutiny in April 2002 after a major oil spill dumped about 85,000 gallons of oil into the Rouge River and cost more than $7 million to clean up. That spill — and a 5,000-gallon oil spill in 2004 — were never linked to a source.

Robert Moll, CESI spokesman, told a local television station that the company "fully cooperated with the investigation" of the 2002 spill and continues to believe it was not involved.

Moll also said the company "added a new management team, including two full-time onsite chemists, and voluntarily installed millions of dollars to complete an aggressive campaign to improve operations and engage in more environmentally friendly practices."

The Long Road To Energy Independence (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

President Bush never used the phrase “energy independence” in his State of the Union address last week, and it is just as well. His program for cutting gasoline demand is ambitious in scope, but modest in effect, according to experts.

The reason is that the United States has fallen down a very deep well, and it’s hard to get out. Last year, the United States imported 60 percent of the oil it consumed. If, as Mr. Bush proposes, we cut gasoline consumption 20 percent by 2017 — about 2.1 million barrels a day — then the share of oil imported will fall only by 4 or 5 percentage points.

In fact, the government expects the share of imported oil to fall anyway, to less than 56 percent, because of a rise in domestic production, mostly from the Gulf Coast.

Domestic production has fallen sharply since the mid-1970s, but the Energy Information Administration, which is part of the Energy Department, expects production to rise to almost six million barrels a day by 2017, up from a little over five million barrels a day now.

Mr. Bush is also proposing an increase in fuel-economy standards and an increase in the production of ethanol and other gasoline substitutes, hoping to keep oil consumption relatively steady. Without such intervention, oil consumption is forecast to rise to just over 23 million barrels a day in 2017, from nearly 21 million barrels a day today.

“It’s an enormous challenge,” said John Felmy, the chief economist of the American Petroleum Institute, the industry’s main trade association.

Production of ethanol from corn has already put pressure on food prices, according to some agriculture experts, but Mr. Bush’s plan involves tripling the production of corn ethanol, and making huge amounts of ethanol from cellulose, which is not now done commercially.

Integrating that much ethanol into the fuel supply will involve many more rail-tanker cars or trucks, because ethanol cannot be shipped in conventional pipelines. In addition, the gasoline formula with which it is mixed has to be changed, or the mixture evaporates too easily, causing air pollution.

The actual amount of ethanol produced will depend on what is technically feasible and on the price of oil. But at the rate of change suggested by the Bush plan, energy independence is about a century away.

Top Democrats Still Divided? (POL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Politico, January 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123351

Many of the models displayed at the Washington Auto Show have brought couples together over the years. Did it work for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Energy and Commerce Chairman John Dingell, D-Mich.?

The Politico heard differing accounts of the success of the auto date and a subsequent meeting at Pelosi's office in diffusing an escalating battle over the select committee on climate change. (Pelosi wants to create it. Dingell opposes it on the grounds that it would impinge on his committee's jurisdiction.)

A Democratic aide close to Pelosi suggested that the meeting, which also included Rep. Henry Waxman, D-Calif., had been a turning point: "We no longer anticipate a floor battle," the aide said.

But Dingell wasn't so sure. In a memo to his committee members this afternoon, he noted progress in diffusing the dispute:"I am pleased to report that the Speaker agreed to work closely with us when drafting the resolution to create the Select Committee …we will continue working in good faith to find a solution that will satisfy the concerns of our Members while preserving the overall objectives of the Speaker. I am confident this is possible."

But, he added, he's still keeping his firepower at the ready: "If we are unable to satisfy the concerns of this Committee, however, I reserve all options available under the Rules of the House and will request a caucus of the Democratic Members of the Committee to weigh those carefully." Translation: Nancy, I reserve the right to make this ugly for you.

Still, it's unclear whether Dingell has the muscle to win this one on the floor. He'll have some help from Republicans eager to deliver a loss to Pelosi, but a Republican leadership aide conceded that "25 to 35" moderate Republicans likely would break ranks and side with her. So Dingell can only count on around 170 Republican votes, which is a long way from 218 even if every one of the 31 Democratic members of the Energy and Commerce Committee vote with him, which they won't. (Committee member Anna Eshoo, D-Calif., a Pelosi confidante, declared in a closed-door meeting last week that she "doesn't worship at the altar of jurisdiction," according to a Democratic aide.)

Worry Over Expiration Of U.S. Law That Helped Rural Areas (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

MARLINTON, W.Va., Jan. 27 (AP) — The expiration of a federal law that provided $385 million for schools and roads last year in some of the nation's most scenic and rural areas has administrators in 41 states concerned.

In 1908, President Theodore Roosevelt struck a bargain with rural America: In exchange for allowing the creation of national forests, counties would receive 25 percent of the receipts from logging and other resource sales.

In return, the land would be off limits for development and could not be taxed by state and local governments.

For years, financing fluctuated with the price of timber. Recognizing the stress these market fluctuations put on schools, Congress offered a short-term solution, the Secure Rural Schools and Community Self-Determination Act, a six-year financing plan that expired in December.

West Coast states would feel the pain on the largest scale. Last year the program paid Washington $42 million and California $66 million. Oregon took the most, $149 million.

School administrators who have depended on the revenue for the last six years say they may be forced to cut staffs and programs. Without a solution, the counties will revert to the old 25 percent-share formula. But 25 percent of what, the school districts wonder.

"It's un-American for the federal government to walk away from rural communities of America, and we're here to remind them of that commitment," said Bob Douglas, president of the National Forests Counties and Schools Coalition, which estimates that nine million children could be affected.

But with the budget deficit, and spending on the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, it is difficult to gain support for a solution, said Mark Ray, under secretary of natural resources for the Department of Agriculture.

The law will cost West Virginia $2 million if Congress does not agree to reauthorize the program by March.

"It will be very devastating," said James Law, superintendent of schools for Pocahontas County, where more than half of the county cannot be taxed or developed because it lies within Monongahela National Forest.

"We don't have income from homes or businesses because we don't have the population and we don't have the benefit of use of that land for development," Mr. Law said.

DOJ_NMG_0123352

West Virginia's state financing for schools is based on the number of students, so low population density hurts the bottom line in rural regions. Rural schools are also spread out over often difficult terrain, meaning districts must pay for long and expensive bus rides.

One Forest Service proposal that remains a possible source of revenue is the sale of 170,000 isolated tracts of national forest lands, Mr. Ray said. So far, though, Congress has been unable to agree how the program should be financed.

Representative Peter A. DeFazio, Democrat of Oregon, has introduced a bill calling for reauthorization of the Community Self-Determination Act through the 2013 fiscal year.

Senator Ron Wyden, Democrat of Oregon, introduced a bill in the Senate to continue the program.

The House legislation has been referred to the committees on agriculture and natural resources.

"It is not just the Pacific Northwest at risk," Mr. DeFazio said last week in a speech on the House floor. "It is hundreds of counties and school districts, from Florida to Maine, all across America, who are at risk."

Mr. Douglas, who is also superintendent of Tehama County schools in California, said administrators in nearby Trinity County — home to Shasta-Trinity National Forest — might have to lay off staff and school nurses and eliminate library services, arts and music programs and counseling.

"If this money goes away," he said, "there are going to be catastrophic changes."

2 Wolf Groups To Lose Endangered Status (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

BILLINGS, Mont., Jan. 27 (AP) — Wolves in the Northern Rockies will be removed from the endangered species list within the next year, the Fish and Wildlife Service said Friday.

The agency also will remove from the list wolves in the Western Great Lakes region. Announcements on the two proposals are planned for Monday, said Sharon Rose, an agency spokeswoman.

If the Northern Rockies' proposal skirts expected legal challenges, it would open wolves in the region to trophy hunting for the first time since an intensive wolf restoration effort began in the late 1980s.

The Great Lakes wolves would be protected from public hunting for at least five years.

The action caps a sharp turnaround for the wolf. By the 1930s, following a prolonged government-sponsored eradication effort, gray wolves were virtually eliminated across the West. The animal was declared endangered in 1974, shortly after passage of the Endangered Species Act.

Federal and state biologists previously have said that each of the states in the Northern Rockies, Montana, Idaho and Wyoming, will be required to maintain a minimum of 100 wolves, including 10 breeding pairs, or the animal would again come under federal protection.

Tribes In Texas, Elsewhere, Oppose Bid To Change Gaming (AP)

By Garry Mitchell, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 28, 2007

ATMORE, Ala. — The melodic bing-bing-bing on the electronic bingo machines at the always-open Poarch Creek entertainment center in south Alabama has kept players busy and the parking lot crowded.

Would they keep playing if the game took a little longer and required more players? Or would they head to gaming centers elsewhere, off tribal land?

These questions have poured into the National Indian Gaming Commission in response to its proposal to change such electronic games, a move that Indian tribal leaders in at least 10 states, including Texas and Alabama, fear could cause hundreds of millions of losses in annual revenues and hundreds of jobs.

"These proposed rules are unnecessary and should be significantly revised to reduce new layers of federal bureaucracy," Chadwick Smith, principal chief of the Cherokee Nation in Oklahoma, has told the NIGC.

With advances in technology, the NIGC says the line between Class II games, such as bingo, and Class III games, such as Vegas-style slot machines, has blurred. The commission, joined by the Justice Department, has proposed new uniform standards for Class II games that are widely used in Indian gaming centers.

DOJ_NMG_0123353

Tribal leaders contend the change would cause bingo games to be less entertaining, played at half the current pace by requiring a two-second delay between each ball draw and, in one example, requiring a customer to wait for five additional players instead of the current one additional player.

An additional wait doesn't sit well with some players.

"To me, it would reduce your chances of winning," said James Stromer, 73, of Pensacola, Fla. He lives about an hour's drive from Atmore, and about two hours from the slots at Mississippi Gulf Coast casinos.

"Class III machines are best for me, like they have in Biloxi," he said on a recent January afternoon.

Bryan Couch, 35, who lives on the Creek reservation in south Alabama, said he's opposed to adding minutes to the playing time because he's usually in a hurry.

"Sometimes I don't have a whole lot of time. I try my luck and get on out," he said.

NIGC spokesman Shawn Pensoneau said he did not have a date for a final ruling on the proposed change.

"This being an extremely important issue to the Indian gaming industry, the commission is carefully reviewing all of the comments, recommendations and concerns before publishing a final rule," he said.

Pensoneau said some tribes may agree that a distinction between Class II and Class III games would be beneficial to the industry. "Exactly how the distinction is determined is where the differences arise," he said.

Nationwide, the new-rule scenario could reduce gaming revenue by $142.7 million, with an additional loss of $9.6 million in non-gaming revenue, according to an independent analysis of the proposal for the NGIC by Alan Meister of the Los Angeles-based Analysis Group, Inc. The analysis also says about 458 tribal member jobs would be lost.

In Alabama and other states without tribal-state compacts, Class III games are not allowed. Tribal leaders say the changes to Class II games will drive away players, leaving tribes with little recourse but to consider whether to continue operations.

Poarch Creek Chairman Buford L. Rolin of Atmore has asked the commission to withdraw the proposed rule changes and would like to avoid any litigation over the issue.

Rolin estimates the Poarch Creeks, Alabama's only federally recognized tribe, would have lost more than $65 million last year in net income out of its $108.3 million in revenue if the rule change had been in place.

Because of the regulatory uncertainty, he said, the tribe also may be forced to shelve its $500 million expansion plans for two of its existing gaming centers in Alabama. The tribe has 2,100 machines at three locations.

"These numbers may appear dramatic, but when the proximity of competition is considered they may be conservative," Rolin said in a letter last year to NIGC Chairman Philip N. Hogen in Washington, D.C. "In short, the viability of our gaming enterprises is at stake."

The NIGC has been trying to determine which games fall under tribal-state compacts and which do not. Rolin says if the Creeks' machines fall into the Class III category under the proposed standards, the tribe will seek to continue using them for three years under an exception to the NIGC rule.

In 2004, the NIGC identified certain Poarch Creek games as "questionable." Rolin said the tribe removed 76 games and modified about 600 others to satisfy the NIGC's concerns. That action resulted in a 34 percent decrease in revenue and a 56 percent decrease in net income, Rolin said.

"There is no game in existence in the Class II gaming industry that would be able to stand up to the proposed standards," said Smith, the Cherokee chief in Oklahoma, in a letter last November to the NIGC.

Under the proposed changes, he said his tribe would be forced to shut down all of its 2,165 Class II games.

Dexter W. Lehtinen of Miami, an attorney for the Miccosukee Tribe in Florida, said the proposed regulations will prohibit the growth of Class II gaming and "micromanages tribal business judgment and regulatory responsibilities." He said the proposals also would eliminate virtually all games that Congress intended to allow as "similar to bingo."

Kickapoo Chairman Juan Garza of Eagle Pass, Texas, said Congress passed the Indian Gaming Regulatory Act, in part, to boost tribal economic development.

"Class II gaming has done just that," Garza said in his written comments on the proposed changes. Like Alabama, Texas has no gaming compact with the tribe, which rules out Vegas-style casinos. Because of that, he said, the tribe is wary of any proposals that may undermine the games it operates.

DOJ_NMG_0123354

The analysis by Alan Meister's group found that tribes with a viable alternative to Class II machines, such as Vegas-style slot, would not be likely to suffer losses in gaming revenue. These tribes include all of those with Class II machines in Arizona, Florida, Oklahoma, Oregon, and Wyoming, and most tribes with Class II machines in California.

Tribes without a viable alternative to Class II machines would have to adopt lower revenue-generating machines that comply with the proposed changes. These tribes include all of those with Class II machines in Alabama, Alaska, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, New York, Texas, South Dakota, Washington and Wisconsin, and the one tribe with Class II-only facility in California.

Veteran players interviewed at the Creeks' Atmore gaming center on Jan. 19 were unaware of the NIGC debate and couldn't quite grasp how it may affect their bingo.

"I just make sure how much money I'm playing," said O. H. Rivers, of Pace, Fla. "Longer you stay on the machine, the happier you are."

On the Net:

http://www.nigc.gov

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Drug War Victories (SDUT)

By Robert J. Caldwell

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 28, 2007

The battered Tijuana cartel is on the ropes

Mexico and the United States, working together, are steadily dismantling the murderous Tijuana drug cartel, the infamous Arellano Félix Organization. Once among the most powerful and feared criminal syndicates in Mexico, the AFO is now a shambles. Its top leaders are dead or in custody. Most if not all of the AFO leaders now behind bars face trial in the United States, where bribery cannot buy the criminal justice system and intimidation doesn't work.

Mexico's extradition of 11 accused narco-traffickers to the United States a week ago wielded the weapon the cartel leaders fear most. If convicted, they will spend the rest of their lives locked away in maximum security federal prisons. The favors and preferential treatment, the illicit opportunities to continue running their drug empires, even the possibility of escape or early release that their money might buy in Mexico won't be available in the U.S. prison system.

Here, the capos of Mexico's drug mafias will have 50 years or more to sit in their cells reflecting on the untold numbers of murders they ordered, the horrendous torture they routinely sanctioned and the millions of lives blighted or destroyed by their drugs. Under the terms of these extraditions, U.S. authorities must respect Mexico's prohibition on extradition of criminal suspects who would face sentences of death or explicitly stated life terms. Prison sentences of 50 or 60 years would substitute nicely for the latter.

Mexico's extraditions – which included eight drug kingpins, among them two top AFO lieutenants and an AFO assassin, plus the former head of the Gulf cartel – sent the cartels another jarring signal. Mexico's new president, Felipe Calderón, is more determined than any past Mexican president to break the drug mafias that threaten to turn Mexico into a narco state. After just seven weeks in office, Calderón did what no other Mexican president has done – delivered Mexican drug traffickers en masse to the United States for trial.

The pending defeat of the AFO, implicit in these extraditions and the recent capture by U.S. authorities of AFO leader Javier Arellano Félix, sends a message of hope that Mexico desperately needs. To wit, that the rule of law can yet prevail over the narco-trafficking syndicates that have made Mexico synonymous with drug-war killings (more than 2,000 last year) and massive, systemic corruption of Mexico's police and government at the local, state and federal levels.

For the United States, law enforcement's cumulative defeat of the AFO sends a signal hardly less welcome.

Mexico has long been the source or transit country for most of the illicit narcotics on America's streets: cocaine, marijuana, methamphetamine and heroin. While the plague of smuggled narcotics won't end so long as a lucrative market exists in the United States, defeating Mexico's cartels is nonetheless vital for both countries.

The drug cartels have turned border cities such as Tijuana and Cuidad Juarez into lawless killing grounds. The resulting epidemic of deadly mayhem is a threat on both sides of the border. Over time, the cartels also became stunningly efficient at the mass export of drugs to the United States – quantities of narcotics measured not by the kilo or the ton but by hundreds of tons. In turn, the billions of dollars in illicit drug-trade profits made corruption a veritable underground industry in Mexico.

For reasons of economics, geopolitics, national security and immigration, it is a paramount American interest that Mexico's historic democratization and economic modernization succeed. The drug cartels pose a massive threat to the rule of law that must underpin these reforms.

So, the extradition of AFO figures Ismael Higuera Guerrero, his younger brother Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, and Jose Alberto MÁrquez Esqueda and their delivery to San Diego to face federal charges represent much more than merely a criminal justice matter.

Ismael Higuera, aka "El Mayel," was the AFO's top lieutenant and director of operations, according to federal indictments, until his capture in Ensenada in 2000 by an elite force of Mexican para-military police. Younger brother Gilberto faces federal charges of running the AFO's Mexicali operations and using kidnapping, torture and murder to protect his drug smuggling. José Alberto MÁrquez, aka "Bat," is an accused drug trafficker and AFO enforcer.

The Higuera brothers and MÁrquez will join Javier Arellano Félix, the most recent AFO head until his capture in international waters off Baja California last August by the U.S. Coast Guard, in line for trial in federal court here. Francisco Arellano Félix, the oldest of the Arellano brothers but only a peripheral figure in the cartel, also faces trial on a 1980 drug charge. Francisco was extradited by Mexico in 2006 after serving a dozen years in prison in Mexico.

The U.S. Justice Department is formally requesting the extradition of eight other AFO leaders in custody in Mexico, including the cartel's longtime leader Benjamin Arellano Félix, who was captured in Mexico in 2002.

If, as is now expected, the Calderón government extradites the rest of the AFO leaders to the United States, the cartel's top leadership would stand trial in federal court in San Diego. The evidence against them, painstakingly accumulated over a decade and a half by the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and other federal law enforcement agencies, is overwhelming.

That leaves the battered Arellano Félix Organization apparently under the uncertain leadership of the sole Arellano brother still at large, the reclusive Eduardo.

Thanks to years of dedicated and often dangerous work by law enforcement in Mexico and the United States, the AFO's two-decade reign at or near the top of Mexico's drug cartels is ending.

Meanwhile, President Calderón has sent the Mexican army and thousands of federal agents into Tijuana, Cuidad Juarez, the states of Sinaloa and Michoacan and other regions long infested with narco-traffickers. The United States must wish Calderón well, provide maximum cooperation, and continue to press for extradition of all drug traffickers under indictment in the United States.

A counter-narcotics war popularly disparaged as a chronic loser, yet vital to the national interests of both Mexico and the United States, is producing its biggest victories ever.

Caldwell is editor of the Insight section and can be reached via e-mail at robert.caldwell@uniontrib.com.

Gun-safety Center Targets 'corrupt Dealers' (WILNJ)

By Robin Brown, The News Journal

Wilmington (DE) News Journal, January 28, 2007

Mayors group places crime as high priority for meeting

A national group fighting gun violence tied into a mayors conference to push for reform and more federal resources to cut illegal gun sales by "corrupt dealers."

The Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence unveiled its study called "Shady Dealings: Illegal Gun Trafficking From Licensed Gun Dealers" last week in Philadelphia -- a city struggling with gun violence -- joined by the city's Police Commissioner Sylvester Johnson and others.

The release of the study, which does not directly address Delaware, was timed to precede the start of the 75th winter meeting of the United States Conference of Mayors, running Wednesday through Friday in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0123356

The Brady center cited gun violence as a top issue for mayors across the country.

The mayors group did not make a formal response to the Brady center study.

But crime already had surfaced as No. 2 in the mayors' 10-point legislative agenda on issues impacting cities and families. That agenda first was presented to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, then brought to the full mayors meeting headed by Conference President and Trenton Mayor Douglas H. Palmer.

The mayors are calling for a federal-local partnership to fight crime, including the creation of a federal trust fund that could fund law enforcement deployment, support of local innovations, fight domestic violence and pay for crime-fighting technology. They also back restoration of past federal block grants and policing funding.

The Brady study pointed more directly to the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms & Explosives. The study concluded the bureau lacks enough resources to inspect licensed gun dealers and that laws should be changed to ease prosecution and increase penalties for gun-sale violations.

The ATF had no immediate response to the study.

ATF Resident Agent in Charge Richard Young, based in Wilmington, said he knows of no agency reports ranking or detailing how Delaware is faring in illegal gun sales or legal sales of guns that later surface with criminals.

He referred questions to the Baltimore regional office, which referred questions to the ATF's Public and Government Affairs Office in Washington, which didn't comment.

Pennsylvania figured centrally in the Brady center study as the state was the site of 11 of 28 case studies it detailed.

The study did not include any Delaware cases among those cited as proof or examples of problems from repeat gun-buying customers and multiple copy gun sales to in-store "straw purchases" of guns for other people, and dealers selling to traffickers at gun shows.

Pennsylvania cases, however, were as close to Delaware as Philadelphia and Willow Grove.

Ohio had five cited cases, while Oklahoma had three, Arizona and Georgia had two each and one was cited in Maine, Virginia, Indiana, Alabama and Florida. Like Delaware, Maryland had none.

Staffing an issue

The study concluded that the understaffed ATF also faces hurdles pursuing what it called "corrupt dealers."

The agency faces a high threshold of proof for prosecution, but serious record-keeping offenses -- tied to guns ending up in criminals' hands -- are only misdemeanors, the study said.

Separate from the study, the center's legislative and grass-roots affiliate called The Brady Campaign to Prevent Gun Violence recently launched a nationwide effort, the "Campaign Against Illegal Guns." Campaign officials described that as "a landmark multiyear effort to stem the trafficking of guns from licensed gun dealers into the hands of criminals, kids and other prohibited purchasers."

Two years ago, the center's activism arm graded Delaware on state laws to keep firearm violence out of families.

Delaware's report card had a final grade of C. Subject grades ranged from A -- for the state's minimum age of 21 for sale or transfer of handguns and 18 for other firearms -- to a pair of F's.

The F's were for what the Brady group called the state's lack of gun-safety lock and design standards and lack of background checks for secondary private gun sales.

The Brady center and campaign are named for Jim Brady, an aide to former President Ronald Reagan who was shot and seriously injured in a presidential assassination attempt. Later, Brady and his wife became gun-safety advocates and lead the center.

Contact robin brown at 324-2856 or rbrown@delawareonline.com.

IMMIGRATION:

A Family Apart, A Child In Pain. For What? (STPPP)

By Rubén Rosario

The St. Paul Pioneer-Press, January 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123357

The federal judge predicted this would happen. So did the doctor and nurse who have treated the little boy since birth.

But their warnings meant nothing. A legal system that proved stubbornly deaf to common sense brushed aside their concerns. All this could have been avoided.

Instead, 16 months after the federal government deported his mother, 3-year-old Cece Lamah finds himself facing months of difficult medical care — mostly on our dime.

Cece, hospitalized in Minneapolis, endures daily pain. One recent afternoon, he asked his dad to remove a needle and tube from his arm because they hurt so much.

Two years ago, U.S. District Judge Donovan Frank, Dr. Stephen Nelson and nurse Jane Hennessy of Children's Hospital in Minneapolis warned in court filings that deporting the boy's mother, Cynthia Lamah, would have a devastating domino effect.

Cece, a U.S. citizen, has sickle cell anemia, a condition that requires constant care and monitoring. His mother was his primary caretaker.

At the time, the boy's father, Daniel Lamah, a native of the Congo granted political asylum in the United States in 1999, worked as a tile setter and had health insurance benefits.

But Cynthia Lamah came here illegally from Germany with a falsified passport. She did so after her requests for a visiting visa and political asylum were denied. Federal officials ordered her deported.

"This could put Daniel's work and the family's financial situation in jeopardy," Nelson and Hennessy wrote in a July 6, 2005, letter filed in court and sent to officials at the Homeland Security Department and Immigration and Customs Enforcement. "Sending Cece, a United States citizen, to Cameroon, with his mother would also put him at high risk."

Frank, who reviewed a last-minute request for a reprieve, concluded he had no legal standing to block a Justice Department immigration judge's deportation order. He nevertheless criticized the move on practical and moral grounds.

"This is a sad day for those who believe that when a judge adheres even-handedly to his or her oath of office, justice will prevail and the public interest will be served," Frank wrote. "To the extent that a civilized and democratic society is judged by the way in which it treats and protects its most vulnerable members, it has failed today."

Here's what has transpired since my 2005 column on the family's plight.

Cynthia, who suffered a miscarriage while detained at the Ramsey County jail in July 2005, was deported two months later to Cameroon. She now lives with one of her husband's sisters in nearby Guinea.

In December 2005, Daniel Lamah was laid off by his longtime employer, a Twin Cities construction company.

"They told me it was because of a work slowdown," Daniel Lamah, 41, said last week inside the hospital room that has turned into his makeshift home for the past two weeks. "I suspected, because some friends still work there, that it might have had to do because I had to take time out three times to find day care or take my child to the hospital."

Unemployed, with no family here and unable to find an adequate sitter to tend to his son's needs, Lamah made a choice in February 2006 that he dreaded: taking his son to Africa to stay with his mom.

"It was a risk, because I knew that the doctors there had little knowledge about (sickle cell anemia)," he said. "We took extra medication, antibiotics, and I felt I could come back and find a job and bring him back."

He returned to the Twin Cities in May. He has not found work. Meanwhile, his son underwent what Nelson describes as questionable and damaging surgeries to alleviate bone swelling in his body.

"Had that happened here, it would be malpractice, and I would lose my license," Nelson said, adding that the life expectancy of a child with sickle cell anemia in West Africa is less than five years, as opposed to 50 in the United States.

The surgeries apparently led to bacterial infections that have significantly attacked the boy's bone structure, particularly his upper arm and left leg.

Daniel Lamah flew to Guinea on Dec. 23 to bring his son back here. A family physician took one look at the kid and ordered him sent to Children's.

"I was horrified when I saw him," Nelson said, his anger palpable. "His left femur is essentially destroyed. He hasn't walked in about a year. He will need months of IV antibiotics and a blood transfusion every three to four weeks.

"Compared to just taking care of a child with sickle cell anemia, the medical expenses now for him, that the taxpayers are going to pay, is just astronomical. And this boy has suffered both physical and emotional trauma."

DOJ_NMG_0123358

But hey, we followed the law, didn't we? We got rid of another illegal alien.

Though disappointed at how his life is going, Daniel Lamah still clings to the concept of the American dream.

"I'm still dreaming," he says. "I still love and am grateful for this country."

The dream is what he had before this entire nightmare — a steady income, a home in Brooklyn Center bought before thoughts of bearing or raising children or having his wife come here from Germany. Now he's in danger of losing the home as well.

Unlike his countryman Dikembe Mutombo, the Houston Rockets center deservedly singled out for praise last week by President Bush during his State of the Union speech, Daniel Lamah is not 7-foot-2 and can't dunk a basketball.

If he could, the government would have found some way to stretch or break the rules and keep Cynthia Lamah here, raising her kid. You can bank on that.

Instead, Daniel Lamah is still waiting for the green card he applied for more than six years ago. He has no money to hire a lawyer to even inquire about it.

Michele Garnett McKenzie, director of Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights' refugee and immigrant program, is looking into the Lamahs' situation. She said Daniel Lamah cannot apply to get his wife back here until he receives his green card and becomes a naturalized U.S. citizen.

Even so, she said, the fact that Cynthia Lamah was deported means she must wait at least 10 years before she can be allowed to reunite here with her husband.

"He has been through a lot," said McKenzie, who knows of Daniel Lamah's experiences in his native land. "He was a (Congolese) government worker who was jailed, placed in solitary confinement and forced to drink his own urine because he refused to shoot at innocent civilians."

Daniel Lamah doesn't want handouts. He wants a job in order to take care of himself and his son. On this morning, however, his focus rests squarely on Cece, crying from hunger because he is scheduled for surgery to have an IV tube placed in his chest.

A nurse walks into the room and asks Daniel Lamah whether he would prefer to have his son wheeled out on a cart.

"No," he responds as he gently drapes Cece over his right shoulder.

"I'll carry him there. It's no problem."

Rubén Rosario can be reached at rrosario@pioneerpress.com or 651-228-5454.

Minnesota's Guard: Eyes On The Border (MINNST)

By Jean Hopfensperger

Minneapolis Star Tribune, January 28, 2007

SANTA TERESA, N.M. -- As dusk fell over the desert, silhouetting distant mountains in red, Specialist Thomas Bolinger pointed binoculars toward the border and watched for anything suspicious.

Soon the Minnesota National Guardsman saw something: car headlights nearing a Mexican ranch a mile away. Then the headlights clicked off. More illegal migrants about to sneak into the United States? Bolinger grabbed his hand-held radio and alerted the U.S. Border Patrol.

It's a routine task in his unusual new mission.

Across the nation's 1,300-mile border with Mexico, in a no-man's land of cactus and tumbleweed, thousands of National Guard soldiers are now playing a front-line role in the divisive fight over illegal immigration. Bolinger is among the first wave of Minnesota Guard members trying to stop the more than 1 million migrants who attempt or make illegal crossings each year -- a tide that's flowing up to Minnesota and bringing both benefits and burdens.

"You can see how they just want to make a better life for themselves," Sgt. Ryan Clark, of Byron, Minn., said from his outpost in Deming, N.M. "But there's a [legal] way to do that."

The National Guard's assignment, dubbed "Operation Jump Start," is part of a broad crackdown along the southwestern border that President Bush initiated last year.

DOJ_NMG_0123359

Another controversial step in that plan began last week: construction of a massive fence and other border barriers. Meanwhile, in his State of the Union address last week, Bush also revived his push for a guest-worker program and said that immigration reform is one of his priorities this year.

Federal officials say the National Guard's deployment, which began months ago for some state units, reduced border arrests in the last three months of 2006 by 26 percent from California to Texas -- to about 153,000.

"It's gone extremely well," said Craig Duehring, a Mankato native who is the Pentagon's principal deputy assistant secretary overseeing reserve affairs. "In each border patrol region, the number of arrests has gone down."

But some immigration experts say the military build-up is forcing illegal immigrants either to find more remote crossing points or to rely more on smuggling networks that abuse and exploit them. Others say it does nothing to address the root causes of illegal immigration.

"When you resort to putting the military on the border, you're admitting to the failure of the system you've set up," said Kathleen Walker, an immigration attorney from El Paso and president-elect of the American Immigration Lawyers Association.

Long, watchful days and nights

About 80 Minnesota Guard soldiers took up positions on the border here in New Mexico three weeks ago. Another 120 were deployed this weekend.

Minnesota is one of 47 states and territories answering the president's call. Last summer, Gov. Tim Pawlenty said he would deploy the state's Guard to the border because illegal immigration was "nearly out of control" and the level of border enforcement was "embarrassing."

National Guard troops from other states are erecting fences, repairing Border Patrol vehicles and building border barriers against cars. Minnesota troops are strictly doing surveillance.

They spend long days and nights perched in mobile watchtowers high above the desert or stand next to their Humvees armed with binoculars and radios.

The soldiers are from the Albert Lea-based D Company, 2nd Battalion, 135th infantry. Many of them have served in Afghanistan, Kosovo or Iraq. Border duty, they say, is an unusual change of pace.

"It's a heck of a lot easier here," said company commander Capt. Eric DiNatale, 35, of Lake City.

Last week, DiNatale's soldiers were divided between Santa Teresa, an area about 15 miles west of El Paso, and Deming, about 70 miles northwest. Wearing camouflage fatigues, the Guard members in Santa Teresa could be spotted along Hwy. 9, which runs parallel to the Mexican border. Their olive green tents and turquoise portable toilets offered a hint of color in the otherwise drab desert.

Across the vast desert, it's nearly impossible to distinguish where Mexico ends and the United States begins. No fence. No Rio Grande. Just endless miles of rocky, rolling terrain of sand and shrubs.

The Guard members around Deming were further inland, watching for illegal immigrants who had already slipped into New Mexico and were on their way north. Relaxing at their new base, most of the Guard members said they had yet to spot anyone illegally crossing the border.

But Sgt. Clark said he had witnessed a crossing a day earlier. He was checking on soldiers at their surveillance posts, wind-swept from unexpected cold hitting the region, when they noticed a figure on a hilltop about 50 meters away.

It was an elderly man wearing a backpack and worn-out jacket and boots, Clark said.

Realizing he had been spotted, the man walked toward the soldiers to turn himself in. He stopped, took off his hat and fanned his face, Clark said.

The Minnesota Guard notified nearby Border Patrol agents, whose white and green vehicles whizzed to the scene. Within a half hour, Clark said, 10 people were arrested.

In that instance and all others, the Guard's rules of engagement were simple -- identify suspicious activity and report it to the Border Patrol. Guard members' weapons can only be used for self-defense.

What Clark witnessed was a typical border crossing, but others are more elaborate, said Doug Mosier, a spokesman for the U.S. Customs & Border Protection Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0123360

Illegal immigrants have strapped wood to the bottom of their shoes, with animal hoofs attached to the bottom of the wood, to prevent Border Patrol agents from spotting their tracks. Some migrants also sweep up their tracks in the sand with a branch after each step. And some walk backwards toward the border, Mosier said.

Others have come through legitimate border crossings disguised as priests, military officers and even clowns. One group dressed in Lycra and tried to pass themselves off as a bicycle team, he said.

"You have to respect the ingenuity," Mosier said.

The Border Patrol has its own tricks. It places portable sensors, triggered by movement or contact, in areas with frequent illegal crossings. It uses cameras, infrared spotlights and helicopters. Border Patrol vehicles also continually drag tires over the sandy trails that criss-cross the desert so fresh footprints can easily be seen.

Permanent barriers

The National Guard's new presence on the border is making a big difference, said Larry Jones, the Border Patrol liaison with Operation Jump Start in the El Paso/New Mexico area.

In New Mexico and western Texas, border arrests dropped 38 percent in the last months of 2006, as compared to the previous year, Jones said. Soldiers also have built more than three miles of permanent vehicle barriers on the border just west of Columbus, N.M., he said.

Across the border from there, the town of Palomas, Mexico, now has many empty hotel rooms and restaurants because far fewer illegal immigrants are passing through, said Eduardo Correo, owner of the San Carlos Hotel there.

"People don't know much about the National Guard," said Correo, whose business is down about 60 percent. "They just think of them as the military. And that makes people scared."

Immigrant advocacy groups along the border say the presence of soldiers disturbs them because it implies that illegal immigrants are a dangerous enemy. The U.S. border is not a battlefield, they say, and the people crossing are overwhelmingly just ordinary people seeking a better life.

For more than 30 years, Ruben Garcia has run a shelter for illegal immigrants in El Paso. The newly tightened border security, he said, is merely rerouting border-crossers or causing them to wait to "see how this plays out."

Among those watching and waiting is Victor Hernandez, 40, who was in Juárez, Mexico, one recent day selling newspapers next to the wide bridge that connects his city to Texas. Downtown El Paso is so close he can read the signs on the stores and see what sidewalk mannequins are wearing.

Like many Mexicans, Hernandez has slipped into Texas for years, worked in agriculture or as a day laborer, and saved some money before heading back home to his family in Mexico. He has seen the new fences, the helicopters and the troops. He said he thinks the solution is for people like him to be able to cross legally and work -- not sending more soldiers.

"It's getting harder to cross," Hernandez said. "But people will keep trying anyway."

Study Of Immigrants Links Lighter Skin And Higher Income (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

NASHVILLE, Jan. 27 (AP) — Light-skinned immigrants in the United States make more money on average than those with darker complexions, and the chief reason appears to be discrimination, a researcher says.

The scholar, Joni Hersch, a professor of law and economics at Vanderbilt University, looked at a government survey of 2,084 legal immigrants to the United States from around the world and found that those with the lightest skin earned an average of 8 percent to 15 percent more than similar immigrants with much darker skin.

“On average,” Dr. Hersch said, “being one shade lighter has about the same effect as having an additional year of education.”

The study also found that taller immigrants earned more than shorter ones, with an extra inch of height associated with a 1 percent increase in income.

Other researchers said the findings were consistent with other studies on color and pointed to a skin-tone prejudice that went beyond race.

DOJ_NMG_0123361

Dr. Hersch took into consideration other factors that could affect wages, like English-language proficiency, education, occupation, race or country of origin, and found that skin tone still seemed to make a difference in earnings. That meant that if two similar immigrants from Bangladesh, for example, came to the United States at the same time, with the same occupation and ability to speak English, the lighter-skinned one would make more money on average.

"I thought that once we controlled for race and nationality, I expected the difference to go away," Dr. Hersch said, "but even with people from the same country, the same race, skin color really matters."

Although many cultures show a bias toward lighter skin, she said her analysis showed that the skin-color advantage was not based on preferential treatment for light-skinned people in their country of origin. The bias, she said, occurs in the United States.

TAX:

Communities Quiet On Bond Probes (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, January 28, 2007

NEW YORK -- Cities and towns across the United States are being investigated by the Internal Revenue Service and keeping the investigations secret from taxpayers.

The IRS sent more than 100 letters last year to local governments from California to Pennsylvania, saying bonds they sold may be subject to federal taxes, said Charles Anderson, who led the field operations for the IRS's tax-exempt bond division until this month. Fewer than a quarter of the municipalities disclosed the probes.

"The entire market is hampered by that lack of information," said Martha Haines, chief of the Securities and Exchange Commission's Office of Municipal Securities. With municipal bond sales averaging $30 million each, 100 letters indicates as much as $3 billion is under scrutiny.

Bond audits cost taxpayer-funded agencies more than $100 million from 2001 to 2005, according to IRS data. Abuses first spotted by the agency led the Justice Department to issue more than a dozen subpoenas last year in the broadest probe to date of the municipal bond market.

The IRS has focused on whether municipalities paid banks inflated fees to invest proceeds from bond sales before the money was used for roads, schools, sewers, and other projects. Local governments are required to return most profits from investments as taxes, so higher payments to banks erode IRS revenue. US prosecutors are checking whether banks violated antitrust rules by fixing prices of the investment products.

State and local governments raise $400 billion a year in the municipal bond market, borrowing at lower rates than corporations or the federal government because debt payments are exempt from taxes.

Bonds that lose tax-exempt status usually fall in value and increase a municipality's financing costs, so local governments agree to pay IRS fines 95 percent of the time rather than risk a challenge, according to Anderson.

"We need to have more information," said Richard Ciccarone, chief research officer at McDonnell Investment Management in Oak Brook, Ill. , which oversees $11 billion.

"We need to know which deals are being targeted and why. We as investors have to know if there's a pattern" to the types of deals that draw IRS scrutiny, he said.

The Budget Illusion (NYT)

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

In the State of the Union speech, President Bush said that the budget deficit had been cut in half from 2004 to 2006. Not quite. The deficit declined, but not by half, from $412 billion to $248 billion. If you measure it as a percentage of the economy, Mr. Bush was off by an amount equal to about $15 billion.

Then, Mr. Bush greatly compounded his otherwise modest exaggeration by taking credit for the reduction, when the deficit really fell despite his policies, not because of them. The distinction is crucial, to understand both the current mess — in which debt is mounting just as huge obligations are coming due for Medicare and Social Security — and how best to get out of it.

DOJ_NMG_0123362

The drop in the deficit over the past few years was due largely to the cyclical recovery from the earlier recession, and to a boost in revenue when temporary business tax cuts expired after 2004.

Mr. Bush, meanwhile, has pursued a single-minded strategy of spending more while slashing taxes. That is the opposite of deficit reduction; it has made the budget hole deeper than it would have been. Still, Mr. Bush wants you to believe that tax cuts caused the economic recovery, and thus the budget improvement. If you follow that logic, the key to continued improvement would be continued tax cuts, and that is just what Mr. Bush called for last week. He conjured a bright future in which the deficit disappears after he leaves office, without anyone ever having to raise taxes.

That was the speech, and then there is reality, which came knocking within days when the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office released its annual 10-year budget outlook. The outlook is for a cumulative deficit of $2.9 trillion to $3.4 trillion — about $300 billion a year — if, as Mr. Bush wishes, the tax cuts are extended beyond their scheduled expiration in 2010 and tax relief continues for Americans wrongly afflicted by the alternative minimum tax. In arriving at its estimate, the budget agency also assumed that costs for the war in Iraq would start going down next year, an assumption that, if proved wrong, would result in even higher deficits.

In the absence of overt tax increases, that leaves Mr. Bush only three ways to erase the deficit. He would have to make pie-in-the-sky assumptions of revenue growth, which would be dicey in any event, but folly at a time when the economy is slowing. He would have to renege on his pledge to protect taxpayers from the alternative minimum tax, a huge backdoor tax increase. Or he would have to persuade lawmakers to make cuts in spending even more draconian than those already dodged by the previous Republican-controlled Congress.

Fortunately, such cuts are necessary only if one accepts Mr. Bush's premise that taxes must never rise under any circumstances. That is clearly a false premise. Mr. Bush's tax cuts should largely be allowed to expire. Facing that truth is not a fiscal challenge, it's a political one.

Mr. Bush will not meet it. But a future president and Congress will have to.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Lawyer Suited For Tough Inquiries To Replace Harriet Miers (AAS)

By Ken Herman, WASHINGTON BUREAU

Austin American-Statesman, January 28, 2007

Democrats' rise created need to replace White House counsel, officials say.

WASHINGTON — White House Counsel Harriet Miers, President Bush's longtime go-to lawyer, is being replaced by a longtime Washington lawyer viewed as more suited for the rough-and-tumble of congressional investigations to come.

For 13 years, Bush had turned to Miers when he needed a personal lawyer, a Texas Lottery Commission leader, a key White House aide and a Supreme Court nominee.

She retains the president's respect and friendship, but three cabinet members, all longtime friends of Miers', said the Democrats' rise contributed to Miers' demise.

The nation's top diplomat put it diplomatically. "Changed circumstances require changed talents," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said.

The changed circumstances include anticipated Democrat- led congressional investigations of the Bush White House.

When Miers leaves this week, Fred Fielding will become White House counsel, an office in which he worked during the Reagan and Nixon administrations, making him a veteran of the Watergate and Iran-Contra investigations.

Just what the president needs, some say.

Josh Bolten, Bush's chief of staff, acknowledged last week in a National Public Radio interview that the White House is gearing up for "some tough oversight hearings and so on."

In an interview Friday, Miers shed no light on why she is leaving. "I had a series of discussions with (Bolten), and we both concluded that it was time to make a change in the counsel's office," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0123363

Asked about Rice's comment, Miers said, "I think the role of the counsel's office is always to guide the presidency in the areas where legal issues are implicated, and to that extent the role will remain the same.

"But every day was different when I was here, and I'm sure every day will be different when I'm not," said Miers, a former Dallas lawyer who has not decided what she will do when she leaves the White House.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, both longtime friends of Miers' dating back to their work for Bush in Texas, agreed that the new Washington reality contributed to the need for a new top White House lawyer.

Gonzales, who preceded Miers as White House counsel, said, "There are others who have dealt with these kinds of issues before, people that have more experience with them than even I do."

Bringing Fielding on board is part of making sure "we have the best assets, the best tools, to deal with those challenges," Gonzales said.

Spellings agreed that change was needed.

"The nature of a job changes as times change," she said, praising Miers as among the most tireless workers in the administration.

Outside experts concur with the insiders' views of why it was time for one of Bush's closest aides to leave the West Wing.

"I just presumed the White House was going to want to change the counsel to someone who had Washington-based experience and who is a Washington insider who had connections to Capitol Hill," said Nancy Kassop, a State University of New York-New Paltz political scientist who has studied the White House counsel office.

William Marshall, a University of North Carolina law professor who worked in the White House counsel office in the Clinton years, said Miers' departure was predictable.

"It's not a slight on her abilities," he said. "It just recognizes that when you are playing defense in the way the White House will have to that somebody who is experienced in responding to subpoenas and other kinds of things is appropriate."

In October 2005, Bush nominated Miers to succeed Supreme Court Justice Sandra Day O'Connor. The selection went down in flames under questions about Miers' qualifications, her conservative credentials and the administration's unwillingness to let senators see sensitive documents Miers had worked on at the White House.

On Friday, Miers had nothing but nice words about her three weeks as a Supreme Court nominee.

"The experience was very, very enjoyable in many, many ways and, of course, it goes without saying, for a lawyer to be nominated to the Supreme Court by the president of the United States — and for me particularly this president — is an incredible honor," Miers said.

She was, however, critical of the judicial confirmation process.

"It's very unfortunate that people view the process as so troublesome that it discourages people from coming forward and offering themselves to serve," said Miers, a top Bush hand in selecting judicial nominees.

Bush, though benefiting from Fielding's experience, could miss the long, close ties he shares with Miers, according to Gonzales.

"I think not having that background is something Fred will have to overcome," he said. "There will be a learning curve for Fred. He doesn't know the president as well as Harriet does."

Experts See Peril In Bush Health Proposal (NYT)

By Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 27 — With his proposal to uproot a tax break that has been in place for more than 60 years, President Bush has touched off an impassioned debate over the future of the employer-based system that provides health insurance to more than half of all Americans.

“Changing the tax code is a vital and necessary step to making health care affordable for more Americans,” Mr. Bush said in his State of the Union address this week.

Mr. Bush said his proposal would eliminate a bias in the tax code that strongly favored insurance provided by employers over coverage bought by individuals and families outside the workplace.

DOJ_NMG_0123364

Paul Fronstin, director of health research at the Employee Benefit Research Institute, a nonpartisan organization, said: "The president's proposal would mean the end of employer-based benefits as we know them. It gives employers a way out of providing the benefits because their employees could get the same tax break on their own."

Tony Fratto, a White House spokesman, denied that the president wanted to move people away from the employer-based system and toward the individual insurance market. "We are seriously agnostic on that," he said.

It might take years for changes to occur. "Large corporate employers could not immediately terminate their health benefits because there is, at present, no reliable place where employees can get coverage they can afford outside the workplace," said Frank B. McArdle, a health policy expert at Hewitt Associates, a benefits consulting firm.

The economic rationale for Mr. Bush's proposal is that too many people have "gold-plated, deluxe" health insurance, which encourages them to use excessive amounts of health care, driving up costs for everyone.

Many economists agree. But they doubt that Mr. Bush's proposal would do much to hold down costs or cover more people.

"The president's proposal addresses inequities in the tax code that provide an open-ended subsidy for premiums paid by employers," said Robert D. Reischauer, a former director of the Congressional Budget Office. "If your employer does not provide health insurance and you have to buy it on your own, you get no tax benefit at all. The president's plan would eliminate that distinction."

But Mr. Reischauer said, "A glaring problem with the president's plan is that he did not call for any stronger regulation of the individual insurance market." In that market as it now exists in most states, insurers can deny coverage or charge higher rates to sick people.

In their desire to achieve universal coverage, some Democrats have also begun to raise questions about the employer-based system. "We have to ask ourselves if the employer-based system of health care is still the best way for providing insurance to all Americans," said Senator Barack Obama, Democrat of Illinois, noting that workers frequently changed jobs.

The Service Employees International Union negotiates with employers to secure health benefits for its members, but the president of the union, Andrew L. Stern, said, "The current employer-based health care system is not the foundation for 21st-century health care reform."

Mr. Bush's proposal differs radically from President Bill Clinton's plan for universal coverage, but experts on health benefits said they were similar in one respect: In an effort to help the uninsured — about one-sixth of the population — they would upend the system that covers most Americans.

The Clinton plan would have provided comprehensive health benefits to 39 million uninsured Americans, with more than $400 billion in new federal spending over 10 years. The White House says the tax changes proposed by Mr. Bush would provide coverage for 3 million to 5 million people at no cost to the government over 10 years.

Since Mr. Bush took office in 2001, the number of people without insurance has increased by more than 5 million, to 46.6 million, according to the Census Bureau. Administration officials said they hoped to reverse that trend by helping states that offered basic private insurance policies to their residents. To pay for such help, the administration would take federal money from hospitals that serve large numbers of poor people.

Under Mr. Bush's proposal, employee health benefits would, for the first time, be treated as income and would be subject to income and payroll taxes, just like wages. At the same time, Mr. Bush would create a tax deduction for health insurance of $15,000 for families and $7,500 for individuals. The same deduction would be available to everyone with coverage, regardless of the source or value of the policy.

A family with coverage worth $18,000 would have to pay taxes on the amount exceeding the $15,000 standard deduction — $3,000, in this example.

Katherine Baicker, a member of the president's Council of Economic Advisers, said the proposal would increase taxes for 30 million people with the most generous employer-provided health benefits, unless they "change their behavior" and choose less costly coverage. Ms. Baicker said the proposal would cut taxes for more than 100 million people who bought insurance on their own or had employee health benefits worth less than the standard deduction.

DOJ_NMG_0123365

Treasury officials said that under the Bush proposal, an uninsured family of four with an annual income of $60,000 would save $4,545 if it bought coverage in the individual market. By contrast, they said, a family that earns $80,000 and has employer-provided coverage worth $20,000 could see a tax increase of about $1,500.

Joel D. Kaplan, deputy chief of staff at the White House, acknowledged that the proposal could accelerate the trend of employers' dropping health benefits for employees. But he said more people "would be able to buy insurance in the individual market," so there would be "a net increase in the number of insured."

Politicians and health care providers are skeptical.

Representative John D. Dingell, the Michigan Democrat who is the chairman of the Committee on Energy and Commerce, said, "The president's proposal would do little to help the uninsured, but would undermine the employer-based system through which 160 million people get coverage."

Richard J. Umbdenstock, president of the American Hospital Association, agreed. "The tax proposal would have the effect of driving people to the small-group insurance market — a market that has proved unstable," Mr. Umbdenstock said. "For many people, even with a tax break, coverage would remain unaffordable."

Historically, employers have used benefits as a tool to recruit workers and keep them healthy and productive.

R. Bruce Josten, executive vice president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, praised the general direction of the president's proposal but said his members had serious concerns.

First, Mr. Josten said, the $15,000 cap on tax-free insurance takes no account of wide geographic variation in the cost of health care and insurance. The same package of benefits typically costs more in Boston than in Minneapolis, for example.

Moreover, Mr. Josten said, a health plan may be expensive because it covers older workers with major medical problems, not because it is "gold-plated." A single mother, working as a low-paid secretary at a law firm, could be pushed into a higher tax bracket because she participates in an $18,000 health plan covering older men who have had heart attacks and expensive surgery, Mr. Josten said.

Treasury officials acknowledged that some people with costly, comprehensive benefits had modest incomes.

But deluxe health plans are vanishing fast. In recent years, many workers have found themselves paying more for less comprehensive benefits. From 2000 to 2006, premiums for employer-sponsored coverage rose 87 percent, about four times as fast as workers' earnings, according to the Kaiser Family Foundation.

Rangel And Others Condemn Bush Medicaid Plan (NYT)

By Ray Rivera

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

Representative Charles B. Rangel and a number of city officials urged President Bush yesterday to reconsider a proposed change to Medicaid that could cost the city's public hospital network millions of dollars in annual financing.

"We want to make sure the president knows how damaging his health care proposal will be to our Health and Hospitals Corporation," the City Council speaker, Christine C. Quinn, said, referring to the agency that runs the city's 11 public hospitals and dozens of diagnostic centers and health clinics.

Agency officials estimate the president's plan would cost the corporation about $350 million a year, about 7 percent of its annual budget.

Ms. Quinn joined Mr. Rangel and more than a dozen other elected officials and health care representatives at City Hall yesterday to protest the president's proposal.

"Isn't it embarrassing we have to do this," said Mr. Rangel, who promised to join other Democrats and use his post as chairman of the powerful Ways and Means Committee to cut off funds to the president's health care plans.

"How can a great nation like ours explain that we can't take care of our own," he said, adding that the president's proposals come as "millions are being spent on a war that nobody wants."

Mr. Bush's proposal would end a longstanding regulation that allowed public hospitals to receive more money from Medicaid, the health plan for the poor, than private hospitals receive for the same services.

DOJ_NMG_0123366

Federal officials have said that the resulting savings could be sent to the states in the form of “affordable choice grants” and used to provide the uninsured with private health insurance.

Alan D. Aviles, president of the Health and Hospitals Corporation, said that the rule was in place to help public hospitals that provide treatment to the indigent, and that losing it would “shred the safety net of the safety net providers.”

The City Council plans to send a letter to the president this week opposing the proposal.

A Deal In The Desert For Sen. Reid? (LAT)

By Chuck Neubauer, Tom Hamburger

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

BULLHEAD CITY, ARIZ. — It's hard to buy undeveloped land in booming northern Arizona for $166 an acre. But now-Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid effectively did just that when a longtime friend decided to sell property owned by the employee pension fund that he controlled.

In 2002, Reid (D-Nev.) paid $10,000 to a pension fund controlled by Clair Haycock, a Las Vegas lubricants distributor and his friend for 50 years. The payment gave the senator full control of a 160-acre parcel in Bullhead City that Reid and the pension fund had jointly owned. Reid's price for the equivalent of 60 acres of undeveloped desert was less than one-tenth of the value the assessor placed on it at the time.

Six months after the deal closed, Reid introduced legislation to address the plight of lubricants dealers who had their supplies disrupted by the decisions of big oil companies. It was an issue the Haycock family had brought to Reid's attention in 1994, according to a source familiar with the events.

If Reid were to sell the property for any of the various estimates of its value, his gain on the $10,000 investment could range from $50,000 to $290,000.

It is a potential violation of congressional ethics standards for a member to accept anything of value — including a real estate discount — from a person with interests before Congress.

In a statement, Reid's spokesman Jon Summers said that the transaction was not a gift and that the price was due to the property's history and the fact that only a partial interest was sold. Reid's action on the lubricants issue was unrelated to the sale and reflected the senator's interest in fairness for small businesses, Summers said.

Reid "has never taken any official action to provide personal financial benefit to me, and I would never have asked him to," Clair Haycock has told The Times. Haycock's son, John, who runs the petroleum-products distribution company with him, said in a recent e-mail that it was "absolutely wrong" to connect the land sale and Reid's lubricants legislation, which did not pass.

Legislative efforts

Records and interviews show that beginning in the mid-1990s, Reid tried several times to push legislation that would have protected lubricants distributors from abrupt cancellations by their suppliers. Though unsuccessful, the legislation sent a clear message to the oil firms that there was congressional interest in the matter, according to Sarah Dodge, then-legislative director for an industry group that worked on the bill.

By the time of the land sale, the Haycocks say, they had lost interest in the issue and were not aware that the legislation had been introduced.

Because an employee pension fund had owned the land Reid purchased, labor law experts contacted by The Times said, a below-market sale would raise additional questions. Pension fund trustees like Clair Haycock have a duty in most cases to sell assets for their market value, the experts said.

"I think this would have been considered a potentially serious issue" at the time, said Ian D. Lanoff, who led the Labor Department's pension division during the Carter administration and was provided basic details of the case — though not the identity of the lawmaker — by The Times.

"Theoretically it's a serious issue for the trustee who sold the property, though practically it may not be" because the pension plan is now closed and its obligations were met, Lanoff said.

John Haycock said his workers received all promised benefits from the Haycock Distributing Co. pension plan and were therefore unaffected by the land transaction. Federal records confirm this.

DOJ_NMG_0123367

Reid's interest in the barren parcel dates back to the period of 1979 through 1982, when he and Clair Haycock bought the 160 acres. Haycock bought a three-eighths interest, equivalent to 60 acres, for $90,000 — $1,500 an acre. Reid, then a Nevada lawyer and political figure, bought the other five-eighths, the equivalent of 100 acres. They did not divide the parcel.

The property has sweeping mountain and mesa views and now abuts a housing development, which could make it attractive to developers. But there are some limitations. The land has a steep wash, or desert stream bed, and the adjacent land has a gravel pit.

In early 1987, Haycock turned over his interest in the land to the pension fund, for which he acts as trustee. The fund provided retirement benefits for about 80 employees, and under law, employers must contribute to such funds each year.

In the early 1990s, California investors bought the entire 160 acres from Reid and Haycock for a little over $1.34 million — around $8,400 an acre. The new owners obtained approval to develop a mobile home and recreational vehicle park. But a few years later they defaulted, and Reid and the pension fund were once again the land's joint owners.

Development slowed in the late 1990s, and Reid and the Haycocks say the property became a cash drain. In 1999, according to Reid's office, the senator began working without success with developer Craig Johnson on a plan for the property. At some point, Reid's office said, he offered to give the land to Johnson, who declined. Johnson has confirmed that offer. In a statement Reid's office provided, Johnson described the listless market and the property's challenges.

In 2001, Haycock Distributing Co. decided to convert its existing pension fund into a 401(k) retirement program. In liquidating its assets, the firm decided that the plan must quickly sell its share of the property.

Lawyers advised the Haycocks that the family could not buy it from the pension fund, so Clair Haycock approached Reid. At first, Reid said "he and his wife were not interested due to the property's past history," Haycock wrote in a letter to The Times.

"Eventually, he gave me $10,000 for my share," Clair Haycock wrote. "I was just happy to have been able to liquidate the property from my pension plan." Reid's office said the senator and his wife purchased it reluctantly. "Because it had minimal value to them, they were willing to pay only a minimal price," a Reid staffer wrote in response to questions.

How good a deal?

How good a deal did Reid get? Paying $166 an acre for Mohave County land is "a super deal," said the county assessor, Ron Nicholson. But the precise answer in this case, Nicholson said, is complicated by the fact that only a minority portion of a partnership was for sale; minority shares can be difficult to sell. Other experts who reviewed the transaction for The Times acknowledged the complexity of the deal but said the senator appeared to have acquired valuable property for a fraction of its value.

"The price strikes me as low," said professor Crocker H. Liu, McCord chair of real estate at Arizona State University's W.P. Carey School of Business. "But I don't know what other considerations — valuable or otherwise — were part of this transaction. Usually when a purchase price is that low, there is other juice in the deal."

Calculating the precise amount of Reid's discount is difficult because of varying values assigned to the property around that time, including some by the senator himself. In his 2001 Senate financial disclosure, Reid valued his Bullhead City acreage at $5,000 to $10,000 an acre. When questioned about the filing several months ago, Reid's office said he might have overstated the value. A Reid spokesman said the senator was in the process of amending his ethics statements to more accurately describe the terms of the deal.

At least twice, Reid appealed to the Mohave County assessor to lower the land valuation and decrease his taxes, in 2002 presenting a 2001 appraisal that valued the land at $1,000 an acre. The assessor's office made a downward adjustment for 2003 but still places the value at about $1,748 an acre.

On a recent property tour, the assessor acknowledged that Reid's land had problems.

"There are topographical issues on this property," Nicholson said as he drove a county-owned four-wheel-drive vehicle through the tract. He pointed out the property's steep wash and another streambed.

An adjacent parcel with similar topography sold in April 2004 for $4,260 an acre.

Reid's spokesman said the senator had paid a fair price for the pension fund's minority interest.

"When a willing buyer pays a willing seller to buy an asset, that is a sale, not a gift," Summers said.

DOJ_NMG_0123368

Real estate experts say that minority interests in partnerships are often sold at a discount, sometimes of 20% or more. But they say that such discounts do not necessarily apply in a case like Reid's where he is the majority owner and gains 100% control by the purchase.

"We were happy to get out of the deal as we did," John Haycock said, adding: "Would we have liked to make more money on the Bullhead City land? Of course."

Reid's office produced statements from three Haycock retirees who attested that they believed they had been well-served by the pension plan.

Since taking full control of the parcel in 2002, Reid has pushed for federal funding for a new bridge over the Colorado River a few miles from his property, a spending request The Times disclosed last November.

Reid said he secured funding for the bridge, which would connect fast-growing Bullhead City with the gambling town of Laughlin, Nev., because local residents wanted it. He said the bridge would not affect his property's value.

Losing business

Reid has long been known as a champion of Nevada interests, particularly gambling and mining. But he seemed an unlikely choice to advocate for the beleaguered lubricants industry when he took up the issue in 1994. He did not sit on the Energy Committee.

At that time, the Haycocks went to Reid for help, according to a former employee of the lubricants industry trade group, Petroleum Marketers Assn. of America, who was involved in the events. The employee asked that his name be withheld because his current job involves congressional contacts.

The Haycocks had lost business in 1994 when Mobil Oil Co. canceled the family's distributorship, costing the firm a lucrative contract with the Las Vegas-area General Motors dealers, which had to use Mobil products.

The family was "incensed that this had happened and there was nothing they could do about it," said the former trade group employee.

Reid mentions constituent

The Haycocks — who were considered industry leaders — say they do not recall discussing the matter with Reid. But the former trade group employee said the Haycocks convinced Reid to take action.

Reid "did it because John or Clair asked him to do it," said the former employee.

With the legislative session coming to a close, Reid brought the issue to the Senate floor on Oct. 5, 1994. He described a Nevada constituent whose "franchise agreement to sell lubricating oils to car dealers in Las Vegas was arbitrarily canceled with 30 days' notice," adding: "This seems grossly unfair."

A Washington lawyer who represented the Haycocks in their dispute with Mobil recalls that dealers turned to Reid after other avenues of redress had been exhausted.

"The Haycocks provided access to Sen. Reid," said Al Alfano, the attorney, who still represents distributor interests. However, Alfano said, Reid's efforts brought no relief to the Haycocks. Although the issue remains a concern for many distributors, he said, the Haycocks lost interest after the mid-1990s.

Nonetheless, Reid cited the same constituent example almost word-for-word in 2002, soon after the land sale, and again in 2003 when he introduced legislation, cosponsored by Sen. John Ensign (R-Nev.), to protect lubricants distributors.

John Haycock said Reid's actions provided no benefit to his company. "I am not aware of any action taken by the senator, relative to lubricants, that has had a financial benefit to our company," Haycock wrote. "At one point I believe Sen. Reid pushed for legislation … but that legislation was never passed and therefore could not have had any impact….

"To my best recollection, I didn't even know Sen. Reid had introduced the legislation," John Haycock said, referring to the legislation in 2002 and 2003.

Reid's spokesman said: "In any event, the Haycocks are Sen. Reid's constituents, and there is absolutely nothing improper about Sen. Reid working to advance good policy on matters of concern to Nevadans and businesses in Nevada."

You Listening To Me? (NYT)

By Deborah Solomon

DOJ_NMG_0123369

The New York Times Magazine, January 28, 2007

You have just written your first book, "Positively American: Winning Back the Middle-Class Majority One Family at a Time," in which you try to produce a functional platform for the famously unfocused Democratic Party. What do Democrats stand for? No one has a good answer. I felt anguish about that. I felt a burning need to have us thinking beyond the immediate.

What about your fellow senator Barack Obama? Did you read his book, "The Audacity of Hope," which similarly insists that politicians need to reclaim the American dream for the middle class? I just read little pieces of it.

You couldn't finish it? I skimmed the parts that were interesting.

He prescribes policy on the same issues you do, from education to health care to the war in Iraq. And he similarly wants to increase support for education. But his is not a platform. The two books, in terms of their outlook, are not dissimilar. In terms of specificity, I think I go a lot further. I hope the presidential candidates will rip off my ideas and use them.

Will you be supporting Obama for president? I'm supporting Hillary. I've worked closer with Hillary and, on experience, I would have to give her the edge. I think she's terrific. When you see her work up close, she is really smart, she asks the right questions and has a good sense of how to balance things.

In your book, you express the travails of the middle class through the example of a couple you invented: Joe Bailey, an optimistic insurance agent, and his devoted wife, Eileen, who "is able to splurge now and then at the mall," as you write. Did you like the description of them?

Not that much. They're fictional characters who lack the artistry of fiction. Oh, please! It's the Baileys! They're everything. I didn't create the Baileys for the book. I have been living with the Baileys for decades. I talk to them. I know them. They're real to me. The Baileys are average people. They could be anyone.

Why did you, a Brooklyn native, make the Baileys suburbanites who own a house in Massapequa, Long Island, and seldom drive into New York City? Massapequa could be any suburb in America. I have always felt connected to average voters. Jerry Seinfeld, you know what he said Massapequa meant? I had no idea. He said it meant in Native American, "It's near the mall."

Regardless of how your book is received, you made history in November as the chief strategist of the Democrats' campaign to regain the Senate, and you subsequently became the third-highest-ranking senator in the new majority. Have you spoken to President Bush since? He called me to congratulate me on taking back the Senate. Look, to his credit, he was gracious. He said: "I never expected you to do this, but congratulations. You did an amazing job."

Does Vice President Cheney talk to you? No. He used to. On energy issues, I talked to him, and then when I didn't agree with him, he stopped talking to me.

Do you think he will remain as large an influence inside the White House in the wake of the Republican drubbing? Unfortunately, yes, maybe more so, because in an odd way, the counter to Cheney was Karl Rove, and he has lost some credibility.

Do you expect the president to respond at all to the ideas of the new majority? I don't have much hope that Bush will moderate, but many of the Republicans in Congress, having seen the handwriting on the wall, may moderate, and that will help us. Dick Lugar, John Warner — these are old-fashioned conservatives who know that this hard-right philosophy is wrong.

Did you send a free copy of your book to the president or any members of his administration? No. I hope they'll buy it.

At Roll Call, An Uneasy Silence (WP)

By David Montgomery

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

The desk is heavy and wooden, well-used, not ornate. Lying flat on the uncluttered glass top is a big calendar. Diagonal blue lines cross out the days as they pass. The felt-tip pen is here, ready to continue marking time's march. But the last day that has been dismissed with a blue slash is Tuesday, Dec. 12.

For Sen. Tim Johnson, the Democrat from South Dakota, time is in suspension now.

Everything in his Hart Building office is exactly how he left it last Dec. 13: The morning when words deserted him, and they rushed him, speechless, to the hospital.

DOJ_NMG_0123370

By the calendar is the Dec. 13 edition of the Hill, a Capitol Hill newspaper. Behind his chair on the thick blue carpet is his briefcase, a scuffed black leather satchel, worn gray in places.

Johnson remains in George Washington University Hospital, undergoing speech and physical therapy after surgery to repair a brain hemorrhage. The initial horror and cold calculations of those first days -- when it seemed possible he and the Democrats' one-vote majority in the Senate might not survive -- have subsided. Now the questions are about absence: How long will it last? What does it mean to the state, the nation, the institution, when one senator is missing?

Next to the computer is a pad of paper with the U.S. Senate letterhead. Johnson had scribbled some notes and figures on the pad, federal dollars he was trying to get for projects back home. He was discussing the items on this pad when the bleeding in his brain stopped him, midsentence.

His staff has left everything virtually untouched as a sign of respect, a sign of love, a sign of not knowing what else to do. It is an appeal to presence in the void of absence.

The news from the hospital has been good, so far.

"In talking to his physicians, we really feel optimistic and confident that he is going to make a full recovery," says Brendan Johnson, 31, one of the senator's three children and a lawyer in Sioux Falls, S.D. "It is something that takes time. Unfortunately we don't have any type of exact timetable. What we do know from the therapists and physicians working with him at GW is that he is making much faster progress than anyone anticipated."

Johnson speaks only a few words at a time. "He's not conversational, in terms of long conversation," Brendan Johnson says. "He's clearly registering when we discuss topics. I think he loves to hear about how his [three] grandkids are doing. I also keep him updated on what certain baseball teams are doing."

Johnson has three hours of therapy every day, working with parallel bars and practicing naming objects, according to statements by his doctors released by his office. An MRI showed that the speech center of his brain is undamaged. And an angiogram showed that the surgery successfully repaired the original problem, called an arteriovenous malformation.

An AVM is a tangle of arteries and veins usually present since birth. Most of the estimated 300,000 Americans who have it never know and live symptom-free. In Johnson's case, two weeks shy of his 60th birthday, bleeding caused by the AVM suddenly disrupted his ability to speak and made him weak on his right side.

Johnson's family and staff members say they hope he will recover enough to do some work within "several months." But in the statements released by the office, predictions of his recovery time have never been attributed to his doctors.

"Senator Johnson is showing evidence of more functional, spontaneous speech and is indicating preferences. He is answering questions and following commands appropriately," Philip Marion, medical director for GW's Department of Rehabilitation Medicine, says in the most recent statement, released Thursday.

Johnson's wife, Barbara, spends much of every day with her husband. Several times a day, she taps out updates on her BlackBerry and sends them to staff and family members.

Amusing anecdotes from the hospital, hot off the BlackBerry, are savored and laughed about around the office: Watching football playoffs, the senator groaned in mock dismay when his wife kept referring to the Chicago Bears as the Chicago Cubs. He rolled his eyes when she asked why he wasn't rooting for the Patriots over the Colts, since South Dakota native Adam Vinatieri is the place kicker. Did she not know that Vinatieri had signed with the Colts!?

Staff and family say the senator's wife, an education consultant and a two-time breast-cancer survivor, has been a powerful presence during this period of absence. (She declined to be interviewed for this story.)

"It probably shouldn't be this way, but she's been the source of strength for her kids rather than vice versa," Brendan Johnson says. Tim and Barbara Johnson have been married for 37 years.

The senator wasn't in the House chamber Tuesday evening, but he let his wife know he wanted to watch the State of the Union address. He heard President Bush say, "We pray for the recovery and speedy return of Sen. Tim Johnson."

Barbara Johnson tapped out this bulletin: "Tim was very touched by the President's recognition. It was obvious that he wanted to be there and I reminded him that next year he would be."

From such glimpses, friends and colleagues glean that the old Tim Johnson is present, albeit in a hospital bed.Senate Precedents

DOJ_NMG_0123371

When a senator is absent for an extended period, two seemingly contradictory sides of Washington come into focus.

There is an inevitable, almost ruthless, forward momentum that tarries for no senator. The people of South Dakota must be served, partisan interests must be advanced.

Yet, there is also a human side, an instinct for decency, an acknowledgement that life can't fully go on as usual.

"Every senator plays a unique role within the process; all 100 fit a specific place," says Jay Truitt, vice president of government affairs for the National Cattlemen's Beef Association. He relies on Johnson to advocate for his industry. Yet he also knows he can count on others in the meantime. "While one single senator has a great deal of power, they're not bigger than the process. . . . We are going to do an appropriations bill. . . . The work will go on."

"There isn't an event that goes on around here where Tim isn't mentioned and prayers aren't offered," says Sen. John Thune, the Republican from South Dakota.

Thune lost his first race for the Senate to Johnson in 2002 by 524 votes. When the Republican visited Barbara Johnson after her husband was stricken, she noted that her husband is a tough fighter. Thune, recalling that contentious election, said wryly, "Believe me, I know it!"

Expressing both qualities of senatorial absence, Julianne Fisher, Johnson's communications director, finds herself issuing somewhat paradoxical messages: "The office is open and we continue to work." And: "The senator is not replaceable."

Her predicament is obvious. To suggest the work has been seriously disrupted would be to imply the people aren't being served. To say everything is being accomplished too well would imply the senator is superfluous.

Of course, senators might be absent for many reasons.

Some run for president. In 1996, Majority Leader Robert Dole resigned his seat to campaign against President Clinton. This year, with at least a half-dozen Democratic and Republican senators already vying for 2008 -- and none publicly planning to give up his or her seat -- absenteeism is certain to rise. Phoning in votes from New Hampshire or Iowa is not allowed.

Sometimes senators aren't very active even when they are present. By the time he was 98, in 2001, an exceedingly frail Strom Thurmond of South Carolina rarely participated in debates, gave speeches or interviews, questioned witnesses, wielded a gavel or introduced consequential bills.

Karl Mundt, a Republican from South Dakota, suffered a stroke in 1969, but held his seat until the end of his term in January 1973, even though he could no longer report to the Senate. Johnson holds Mundt's old seat.

In 1988, Joe Biden of Delaware was out for seven months recovering from two brain aneurysms. He proves a senator can bounce back from brain surgery, get reelected and run for president.Something Was Wrong

The recording of the moment when Johnson slipped from present to absent is chilling to hear.

He was in a basement studio in the Capitol for his weekly conference call with South Dakota reporters. There was one last question about funding for four projects, including a medical school and a Boys and Girls Club.

"Ah, ah, second, uh, uh, you know," Johnson stammered. He laughed nervously. For long moments there was more stammering, silence, isolated words.

It was the awful sound of a man struggling mightily to master his thoughts.

"Well said," the senator concluded, trying to make a joke. "Anything, uh, further? Going once, twice. Okay."

On the subway back to Hart, Fisher tried to draw Johnson into conversation. When she asked about his wife -- family was a subject that always got him chattering -- and he gave a one-word reply, she knew something was wrong.

Within minutes the staff summoned a doctor, and Johnson was wheeled to an ambulance. That night he was in surgery.The Mechanics of an Absence

The 46 members of the senator's staff in Washington and South Dakota suddenly found themselves on their own.

"This experience is certainly one of the most surreal of my life," says Drey Samuelson, Johnson's chief of staff for 20 years in the House and Senate.

The first few days brought out the best and worst of Washington: Colleagues from both sides of the aisle rushed to be with his family, sent piles of food to his office. But no one could help speculating: What if Johnson died or resigned? South Dakota's Republican governor probably would pick a Republican successor. The Senate would be divided 50-50. Vice President Cheney would break ties.

DOJ_NMG_0123372

"It was hard to see Tim treated as a poker chip as opposed to a human being," Samuelson says.

When it became "clear he was going to live," the story lost its sizzle and the reporters went away, Samuelson says.

Then the quirkier aspects of absence came into play. Senate officials postponed approving reimbursements for official staff travel while Johnson was sedated, which he was until late December, because his agreement could not be verified.

The staff asked the Rules Committee for permission to send out official mail over the chief of staff's signature. For the first time in his career, Samuelson scanned his autograph into an autopen. Wielding his new authority with great deference, he has signed only a brief letter thanking constituents for their input and explaining the unusual situation.

Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada appointed temporary substitutes to key committees where the Democrats could not afford to lack a vote. Barbara Boxer of California would chair Ethics in Johnson's stead; Jack Reed of Rhode Island would chair the Appropriations subcommittee on military construction and veterans affairs; Frank Lautenberg of New Jersey would occupy Johnson's chair on the Budget committee.

There were inadvertent slights. Another Capitol Hill paper, Roll Call, published a supplement listing committee members in the new Congress. Johnson was mistakenly omitted from Budget and Ethics.

"One of the things that makes it easier is jumping back into the work," says Todd Stubbendieck, the legislative director. "We've tried to return to be as normal as we can be, and get back into the swing of things and the normal schedule."

"We all want to work hard so when he comes back, he's proud of the work we've done," Fisher says.

Luckily, Johnson had nearly completed a series of legislative planning meetings in the days before he was stricken. The staff is following that plan.

His key constituencies include farmers, ranchers, veterans, seniors, rural communities. Although his profile is low on Capitol Hill, in South Dakota, a state with fewer people than Prince George's County, residents address their senator as "Tim" when they see him in the coffee shop on Main Street.

"He's one who was never real imbued with the power and the glory, he just wanted to do a good job," says Jerry Oster, news director with WNAX-AM radio in Yankton, who has known Johnson since he was a baby-faced lawyer in Vermillion. "It's part of that Norwegian upbringing. Don't care who gets the credit . . . . We always kid him about being Norwegian powered by coffee."

If Johnson's recuperation lasts longer than several months, then his absence will be felt more keenly. That is when the farm bill will be moving through the Senate, and the appropriations process will be underway.

"Senator Johnson's main impact would come this summer," says Troy Larson, executive director of the Lewis & Clark Rural Water System, which is seeking $35 million for pipeline construction. "It would not be possible for senators in other states to make up that clout."

As always in the political world, some are sizing up Johnson's prospects for reelection in 2008, and whether his illness has made him vulnerable. A moderate Democrat from a very red state, Johnson has twice won tight races for the Senate.

"I think the reelection question is a key one," Samuelson says. "I talked to Barb [Johnson] about whether or not to shut our fundraising operation down. She said that she felt that when Tim recovers, he will want to run for reelection. We can't know that for sure, but that's what she thinks and that's what I think as well."A Small, Empty Desk

Johnson has another desk, as every senator does, rather small, made of mahogany, on the floor of the Senate chamber: the ultimate symbol of his position and, when not occupied, of his absence.

Johnson's is in the second row, between those of Mary Landrieu and Barbara Mikulski. Every morning, the same legislative paperwork is placed on Johnson's desk as on every other, as though he might be present. There is a sharpened pencil in the pencil slot.

Early one afternoon, the clerk calls the roll for another vote. It's on an amendment to the minimum wage bill.

" . . . Mr. Inhofe. Mr. Inouye. Mr. Isakson. Mr. Johnson. Mr. Kennedy. Mr. Kerry . . . "

The senators amble up to the clerk's desk and signal thumbs up or down.

Mr. Johnson is recorded as "not voting."

On Tuesday, the Democrats head to the Lyndon B. Johnson Room for the weekly caucus lunch.

"I think knowing Tim Johnson as I have, respecting him greatly, that I will convey the ideas as he would have them," Lautenberg says of filling Johnson's chair on Budget. "But it's an interpretation. I'll do my best."

DOJ_NMG_0123373

"He has a great deal of technical competence, so we miss him," Mikulski says of the Appropriations subcommittee that Johnson is supposed to chair. "At the same time, our good friend Sen. Jack Reed is filling that role. So we can pick up the slack."

One morning, Christopher Dodd (D-Conn.) gavels Banking to order. Dodd salutes the absent senator and wishes him a speedy return -- then gets down to business, a hearing on mass transit security.

Johnson is the second-ranking Democrat on Banking, after Dodd, and would ordinarily sit immediately to Dodd's right. But this morning Johnson's chair is not empty. It is occupied by Reed, whose lower rank in the pecking order should place him farther from the chairman.

Afterward, Reed says of Johnson: "He's one of those guys you like to emulate, because of his example as well as what he says. A lot is said around here. When you can provide the example, judgment and decency that he provides, those are very scarce commodities."

What about taking Johnson's chair this morning in Banking?

"I think it's less important where we sit than what we contribute," Reed says. "But I assure you, I'm just keeping that seat warm."

Ginsburg Feels Isolated On Court (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

BOSTON -- U.S. Supreme Court Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said Friday that she dislikes being "all alone on the court" nearly a year after the retirement of Sandra Day O'Connor.

Ginsburg, who spoke to an assembly at Suffolk University Law School, said she sees more women in law school, arguing before the court and sitting as federal judges.

"My consolation is that if you look at the federal courts altogether, you get a much different picture than you do if you look only at the U.S. Supreme Court," she said.

Of herself and O'Connor, the court's first female justice, Ginsburg said: "We have very different backgrounds. We divide on a lot of important questions, but we have had the experience of growing up women and we have certain sensitivities that our male colleagues lack."

Ginsburg, 73, did not elaborate or take questions afterward.

Supreme Court TV (WP)

By Dahlia Lithwick

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

The justices of the Supreme Court have served hard time in the makeup chair in recent months. John Paul Stevens and John G. Roberts Jr. gave prime-time interviews to ABC's Jan Crawford Greenburg; Ruth Bader Ginsburg chatted with CBS's Mike Wallace in chambers; and Stephen G. Breyer has logged almost as much time on camera as Lindsay Lohan -- including a sit-down with Charlie Rose and a gig on "Fox News Sunday." And Roberts, the chief justice, is part of a documentary airing on PBS next week.

Even some of the justices who are reluctant to talk on camera have been more amenable to speaking on the record lately. Breyer and Antonin Scalia engaged in a wide-ranging public debate in December that is available on the Web. And ABC's Crawford Greenburg secured interviews with nine justices for her new book, "Supreme Conflict." Nine justices. That's a far cry from "The Brethren."

What the justices have discussed in these interviews has ranged from the personal -- the chief justice's young son likes Spiderman -- to judicial philosophy. And that has opened the door to a more robust and nuanced national conversation about constitutional law and the role of the judiciary. Whether it's Roberts extolling the virtues of unanimity and minimalism or Breyer selling his constitutional theory of "active liberty," the court has finally taken its case to the airwaves, and that is unequivocally good for a nation that -- for better or worse -- has pretty much taken up permanent residence there.

But a funny thing happened on the way to the sound stage. Some justices are refusing to talk about areas of the law in these extra-judicial discussions. And that raises interesting questions about which justices avoid which topics, and why. Does this sudden selective chill reflect fissures on the court, in the law, or both?

DOJ_NMG_0123374

We had, for example, Ginsburg talking openly with CBS's Wallace in October until he raised the subject of abortion. Out came the ice water: "Stop!" she said. "We're not going to talk about abortion." Ginsburg also refused to discuss the separation of church and state and Bush v. Gore, insisting that "questions are going to come before this court on those turbulent issues."

And as Fox's Chris Wallace asked Breyer about abortion in December, Breyer interjected, explaining: "I decide abortion cases when they come up. But I know perfectly well that anything I say on that subject is enormously volatile." Breyer also considered it improper to "talk about that subject, particularly in a public forum that isn't the court." When Wallace asked for clarification, Breyer repeated: "No, not any question to do with abortion." Breyer similarly refused to touch the subject at a public debate with Scalia in Washington in December, even though Scalia had no such qualms.

At first this looks like a variation on the old confirmation two-step. That's the dance that happens at judicial confirmation hearings wherein a prospective justice refuses to answer questions about subjects that "may come before the courts," and, yes, the court heard an abortion case this term. But that's not the calculus that the justices seem to be using these days: At that same debate in December, Breyer spoke about Brown v. Board of Education, even as the high court was hearing two cases that raised related issues that very week. He briefly discussed the presidential powers cases in his interview with Wallace. (You can bet that issue will come before the court again soon.) And in her interview with Mike Wallace, Ginsburg spoke passionately about the court's decision in a major case involving the presidential authority to create military tribunals, concluding, "In this country, we have no royalty, we have no king who has absolute authority."

Stevens recently discussed the flag-burning case. And this week Scalia told an audience at Iona College in New York that Florida's handling of the recount in Bush v. Gore was a violation of the Constitution's guarantee of equal protection under the law. "Counting somebody else's dimpled chad and not counting my dimpled chad is not giving equal protection of the law," he said, even though such cases will come before the court again in the future. Scalia let the crowd know that the case is firmly in the history books: "It's water over the deck -- get over it," he said. And given that Bush v. Gore explicitly claims to hold no precedential value in future cases, perhaps he's right.

So how do we account for the justices' sudden silences and pregnant pauses? In part, it must be personality. Roberts seems unwilling to discuss cases or doctrine off the bench; Breyer is inclined to talk about them, but mostly in the abstract; and Scalia is inclined to gab about pretty much anything.

But there's something else at work here -- something to do with what Breyer calls the "volatile" cases and Ginsburg calls the "turbulent" ones. For both justices, abortion clearly falls into that category, but in general they seem to avoid talking about the moral issues that divide the court just as they divide the country: gay rights, race-based decision-making, abortion and religion. On these issues, the courts' liberals often strive to use constitutional doctrine to protect minority rights. And where there is a sound constitutional basis for these positions, it has been tricky for them to explain them in a sound bite.

The unifying theme in most recent judicial speeches has been this: The power belongs to the people. Whether it's Breyer urging citizens to engage in government or Scalia insisting that it's the job of the people, not the court, to modify the Constitution, the universal message of the justices is not to fear the court, but to become active in the legislative process. But that's only half the story, and the justices know it. Those cases are the tough ones, and, invariably, the hardest to explain. As Scalia continues to prove, the taut lines of his theory of "originalism" tend to be an easier sell than the blurriness of a "living Constitution." Which may be why the justices sometimes talk the loudest when they say nothing at all.

Search Ends For 3 In Calif. Copter Crash (AP)

AP, January 28, 2007

The Navy called off a search Saturday for three missing crew members of a helicopter that crashed in the ocean about 50 miles off California's southern coast.

Friday's crash during a training mission left one sailor dead, and the Navy had searched for the remaining crew through the night and into Saturday afternoon.

"The cold water temperature and the time that elapsed since the crash occurred led Navy officials to conclude that aircrew survivability is extremely unlikely," said Navy Lt. Cmdr. Elizabeth Meydenbauer.

DOJ_NMG_0123375

Meydenbauer said the Navy knew the location of the sunken helicopter, but had not decided whether the wreckage would be brought up from the ocean floor.

The MH-60S Sierra helicopter, based at Naval Air Station North Island in Coronado, went down around 5:30 p.m. EST Friday. It was on a mission off the USS Bonhomme Richard.

The pilot radioed a mayday but gave no indications of mechanical malfunctions or fire, Meydenbauer said.

One sailor was pulled from the water but died while being treated on the Bonhomme Richard.

Identities of the helicopter crew members would not be released until relatives were notified, Meydenbauer said.

However, Jim Helman of New Richmond, Wis., said Navy officials informed him that his son, Cory Helman, 27, was one of the crew members and had pronounced him dead.

The Bonhomme Richard is an amphibious assault craft that took Marines to Indonesia after the 2004 tsunami.

The MH-60 Sierra is a twin-turbine craft based on the UH-60L Black Hawk and the Navy's SH-60B Seahawk, according to the manufacturer, United Technologies Corp.'s Sikorsky Aircraft. It is designed to operate off aircraft carriers, cruisers, destroyers and frigates, ranging up to 100 nautical miles from a ship.

Voting Rights Chicanery (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several states . . . ."

-- Constitution of the United States, Article I, Section 2

"What's the Constitution between friends?"

-- Rep. Timothy Campbell, a Tammany Democrat, to Democratic President Grover Cleveland after Cleveland said that a bill Campbell favored was unconstitutional.

There they go again. House Democrats should at least provide variety in their venality. On Wednesday, fresh from legislating new ethics regarding relations with lobbyists, they demonstrated that there are worse forms of corruption than those involving martinis and money.

They again voted to give the delegates to the House from Guam, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands and the District of Columbia, and the resident commissioner from Puerto Rico, the right to vote in the House when it is sitting as the Committee of the Whole, which is how it sits almost all the time. It is in that status that almost all debate about and amending of legislation occurs.

If these five votes decide the outcome of a vote in the Committee of the Whole, the matter at issue will be automatically revoted by the full House without those five participating. Still, these five faux members will have powers equal to those of real members on everything but final passage of bills, which often is more perfunctory than the process that leads to that. Almost always, all five delegates are Democrats. (Puerto Rico's current resident commissioner is the first Republican in 100 years.)

What part of the words "several states" do House Democrats not understand? Their cynical assumption is that "the people of the several states" will not notice this dilution of their representation in the House.

Members of Congress today represent, on average, 687,000 people. The population of Guam is 171,000; of American Samoa, 58,000; and of the Virgin Islands, 109,000. The 3.9 million Puerto Ricans are U.S. citizens and have the right to vote for statehood, which they have rejected in three plebiscites (1967, 1993, 1998).

The 58,000 Samoans pay no federal income taxes, but their delegate will be able to participate in raising the taxes of, say, Montanans. Samoa's delegate will have virtually the same power as Rep. Denny Rehberg, who represents all 944,000 Montanans. Obviously the Democrats' reverence for the principle "one person, one vote" is, well, situational.

January 1993 was the last time Democrats engaged in this cynical political alchemy, transmuting delegates from four island jurisdictions, and one from the seat of the federal government, into the functional equivalents of representatives selected by people of "the several states." In January 1993, two months after they lost 10 House seats, they counterfeited half that many votes -

DOJ_NMG_0123376

- even though they had an 82-seat majority. One year later, such arrogance contributed to the Democrats' loss of their House majority.

In 1970, Democrats were contemplating allowing Puerto Rico's resident commissioner to serve with powers equal to those of real members, but only on standing committees. Rep. Tom Foley, a Washington Democrat then in his third term, told his colleagues that would be fine because those committees are created by the House, not the Constitution, and they "can be extinguished at will and created at will." Furthermore, service on committees involves only "preliminary advisory votes." But, he added, "it is very clear" that "a constitutional amendment would be required" to give a resident commissioner "a vote in the Committee of the Whole of the full House." By 1992, when Foley, then in his 14th term, was speaker and full of the sense of entitlement that deranged Democrats in the last years of their 40-year hold on the House, he supported what the next Democratic speaker, Nancy Pelosi, has now done. In 1994, Foley became the first speaker since 1862 to lose his congressional seat, and the new Republican majority undid what the Democrats had done.

For Speaker Pelosi, two questions about the possible scope of your majoritarian abuse: Given your disregard of the unambiguous language and clear intent of Article I, Section 2 -- which uses the word "state" eight times to designate the only entity from which a member of the House may be chosen -- do you acknowledge any impediment to using your majority to give "Committee of the Whole" voting power to a delegate from, say, the AFL-CIO?

Or, for that matter: Do you think that Article I, Section 5 ("Each house shall be the judge of the . . . qualifications of its own members") allows your majority to give such voting powers to your hairdresser? If not, why not?

The George W. Bush Library: Scholarly Mecca Or $500 Million Oxymoron? (NYT)

By Dorothy Samuels

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

The news reports that President Bush's representatives seem to be closing in on a deal to put a half-billion-dollar presidential library and policy institute at Southern Methodist University in Dallas has inspired the predictable lame jokes and references to "The Pet Goat."

But the project raises issues that are no laughing matter, touching on the writing of history, the university's scholarly mission, governmental integrity and the rule of law.

S.M.U.'s negotiations regarding Mr. Bush's library are bound to have a large public impact, which is why I'm hoping that the university's president, R. Gerald Turner, and members of his board of trustees (presuming Laura Bush, the best-known trustee, has removed herself from the deliberations) can be persuaded to withhold a final go-ahead unless two basic conditions are met.

First, the university should insist that Mr. Bush rescind Executive Order 13233, his 2001 directive that reverses — illegally in the view of many leading historians, journalists and legal thinkers — the strong presumption of a public right of access to presidential papers embedded in the 1978 Presidential Records Act.

Under this early exertion of presidential power, both sitting presidents and former presidents (and even their heirs) can indefinitely postpone public release of sensitive material past the law's usual 12-year waiting period by simply denying a request for access. No explanation is required, and there is no provision for appealing the denial to a trained professional archivist.

Instead, the executive order requires the person requesting the material to begin a costly and time-consuming lawsuit challenging the stonewalling. It's a formula for keeping embarrassing facts secret in perpetuity and for thwarting a full and accurate accounting of a president's time in office, which, presumably, was among S.M.U.'s prime goals in seeking to be home to the new presidential edifice, along with enhancing the university's visibility, prestige and available financial resources.

Mr. Turner told concerned faculty members that the new library would house "a treasure trove of documents and artifacts that describe one of the most intense and controversial periods in our history." For a university interested in promoting historical research and open inquiry, especially one located in the president's home state, it's undoubtedly a mighty tempting prize. But that is all the more reason Mr. Turner and the trustees owe a duty to act decisively to protect the university's reputation, the public's right to know and history itself from Executive Order 13233, and Mr. Bush's ignominious penchant for excessive secrecy.

Second, there is the pesky issue of fund-raising. Following the corruptive path blazed by White House predecessors, Mr. Bush and members of his library committee apparently plan to spend the administration's remaining days trying to coax huge contributions to the budding library complex from friends and well-heeled special interests. Under present law, the identity of presidential library donors, and the amounts they contribute, need not be disclosed. The House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, supports legislation to change that, but its timing and fate remain unclear. Meanwhile, S.M.U. officials have an opportunity to advance government integrity, and avoid entangling the university in potentially compromising secret fund-raising, by insisting on disclosure.

DOJ_NMG_0123377

Dozens of theologians and S.M.U. faculty members have objected to locating Mr. Bush's library and institute at the university, saying among other things that his awful record on civil liberties, the war in Iraq and the abuse of prisoners should preclude any university affiliation. They have it wrong. But so do those who would minimize the university's duty for making sure the highest standards of scholarship, openness and ethics govern the entire enterprise.

OTHER NEWS:

Looking For The Angry Populists In Suburbia (NYT)

By David Leonhardt

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

IN his confrontational response to President Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday, Senator Jim Webb of Virginia said that he was going to focus on only two topics. One, as everyone knew it would be, was Iraq.

But before he turned to the war, the new senator spoke about something else: an economy that he said made it seem "as if we are living in two different countries." In one, stock prices, corporate profits and executive pay are rising. In the other, the middle class is barely scraping by.

Mr. Webb said the situation was reminiscent of the early 20th century, when robber barons were raking in wealth and "dispossessed workers at the bottom were threatening revolt."

It was the sort of speech that one might have expected during a deep economic slump. Yet it came instead as most workers have started receiving significant pay increases for the first time in years and as polls show that most Americans think the economy has grown stronger.

This contrast was arguably the most significant part of the speech. As they plan their strategy on Capitol Hill and begin the 2008 presidential campaign, the leaders of the Democratic Party are betting that the temporary swings of the economic cycle no longer have the political power they once did.

Instead, they say, the economic shocks of recent years — technological change, globalization, the decline of labor unions and business icons like Ford Motor Company — have left many swing voters feeling anxious and insecure about the future.

After years of fighting losing battles against tax cuts, Democrats argue that this economic anxiety has altered the political landscape, making swing voters open to a new role for government — a form of what Representative Rahm Emanuel of Illinois has called "suburban populism."

With issues like energy policy, immigration and health care having gone largely unaddressed in recent years, Democrats see a way to define themselves as the party that can help Americans survive the 21st-century economy.

An unanswered question, though, is whether suburban populism can still have appeal during good economic times.

"The little ups and downs of the economy are not what's bothering the average American, as much as it is the feeling that there are large forces that buffet them around," said Senator Charles Schumer of New York, whose book laying out an agenda for the party was published last week. "In the past, the attitude was, 'Get government out of the way.' And now it's, 'Gee, I may need it.' "

Amy Klobuchar, a freshman senator from Minnesota, pointed out that her state had one of the strongest economies in the country, yet she still based her winning campaign largely on people's economic worries. "They feel insecure," Ms. Klobuchar said last week. "And the point of this is, they're right."

This strategy certainly has risks. Tax cuts — with a heavy dose of optimism thrown in — have been a much better political bet than populism for decades now, and Republicans are sticking to this script. During his address last week, Mr. Bush described the economy as being "on the move," and he is scheduled to visit Peoria, Ill., this week to call attention to recent wage gains. Republicans are pushing for an extension of the tax cuts passed during Mr. Bush's first term that they say are a major cause of the current boom.

DOJ_NMG_0123378

The economy emerged from a recession in late 2001, after the first tax cut went into effect, but wages for most workers still did not keep up with inflation for much of the next few years. Only in recent months has that changed.

In 2006, the average hourly pay of rank-and-file workers, who make up about four-fifths of the work force, rose 4.2 percent, while the consumer price index increased only 2.6 percent. The net result — an inflation-adjusted increase of 1.6 percent — was a bigger annual raise than any that workers received from the late 1970s to the mid-90s.

The direction of wages has historically been one of the best predictors, if not the best, of the public mood, and it, too, has been brightening. In a Gallup Poll conducted in mid-January, the share of respondents calling the economy excellent or good — 52 percent — reached its highest level since the Clinton administration.

But even with the recent increases, the real hourly pay of rank-and-file workers has risen only 3 percent since Mr. Bush took office, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Over the same span, productivity — that is, the value of what the economy produces per hour — has risen 18 percent.

Except for a few years in the late 1990s, in fact, pay increases have been modest for most of the last three decades, which appears to be contributing to the anxiety. In exit polls on Election Day, fewer than one in three people said they expected life for the next generation of Americans to be better than life today.

But even if suburban populism has some appeal, Democrats have been less clear about how to translate it into policy. During their first weeks in control of the House, they have passed bills to raise the minimum wage, to cut the interest rate on federally subsidized loans to college students and allow government to negotiate with pharmaceutical companies over the cost of drugs sold through Medicare.

But none of the bills has yet passed the Senate, and even if they do, they are unlikely to have a big effect on most middle-class families — the target audience of the new suburban populism.

Some Democrats, in the party's center and on the left, are starting to push for broader ideas. In his new book, Mr. Schumer calls for biometric employment cards to reduce illegal immigration and a crackdown on tax evasion by the wealthy, among other measures. Tom Vilsack, the former Iowa governor who is running for president, is arguing for a push on new energy technology partly to "elevate our economy above global competition."

It is still not clear how much can be done by a party that, for at least another year, will lack a clear leader. In his speech last week, Senator Webb cited two populist role models, Andrew Jackson and Theodore Roosevelt, both of whom were presidents, not Congressional leaders.

But the coming year will give the party's leaders a chance to hone its message — and to see how long the current economic boom will last.

Clinton Begins Her Run In Earnest (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut, Dan Balz

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

DES MOINES, Jan. 27 -- Bursting onto the campaign trail for the first time here on Saturday, Democratic New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton quickly confronted two looming questions about her presidential candidacy: whether voters are ready to elect a woman to the White House and how aggressively she would respond to Republican attacks if she were her party's nominee.

Clinton held her first major public event a week after entering the 2008 campaign. It was a glossy, town-hall-style "conversation" with Iowans at a high school here in Des Moines, and it came nearly a full year before the state's first-in-the-nation presidential caucuses, scheduled for next January.

In an auditorium packed with more than 1,000 people -- many of them women -- Clinton stood alone at center stage, her arms outstretched, as she encouraged Iowans to help her win the presidency. "I'm running for president, and I'm in it to win it," she said to a burst of applause.

But the first question put to her focused on whether she, as a woman, would have extra difficulty winning.

DOJ_NMG_0123379

Clinton conceded that there may be special obstacles for any female candidate. "I think you've got to move beyond that," she said. "I am going to be asking people to vote for me based on my entire life experience. The fact that I'm a woman, the fact that I'm a mom, is part of who I am. But I'm going to ask people to vote for the person they believe would be the best president of the United States."

Clinton got just one question about Iraq, and she deflected it without answering it, speaking instead about health care for veterans.

But at a morning session with Iowa Democratic Party officials, she was asked to address her vote for the 2002 congressional resolution authorizing President Bush to go to war. That vote, along with her reluctance until late last year to recant, has put her at odds with many antiwar activists in the party and is expected to be a factor as she begins to meet voters in a state with a strong antiwar tradition.

"I've taken responsibility for my vote," she said. "But there are no do-overs in life. I wish there were. I acted on the best judgment I had at the time." She closed by noting: "I may have a slightly different take on this than some of the people who come through here."

The questions at the town hall meeting were uniformly polite and often adulatory. But her appearance among party officials brought out concerns that have echoed for months among party insiders nationally, all related to whether she may be such a polarizing figure that she will have a difficult time getting elected.

Clinton acknowledged that the campaign ahead might become brutal, particularly if she is picked as the Democratic nominee. She noted that she had overcome doubters who had predicted that she could not win a Senate seat in New York. And in response to a question about the lessons she has learned from Massachusetts Sen. John F. Kerry's loss to President Bush in 2004, Clinton promised to respond aggressively when attacked.

"When you're attacked, you have to deck your opponents," she said, after a more tepid initial response. She added: "I want to run a positive, issue-oriented, visionary campaign. But you can count on me to stand my ground and fight back."

Clinton is the front-runner for the Democratic nomination, based on national polls of Democrats, her capacity to raise as much or more money than any of her rivals, and the extensive network of loyalists built up during the presidency of her husband, Bill Clinton. But in Iowa, she is just one of four candidates currently viewed as the strongest contenders.

The others are Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who will formally launch his candidacy in two weeks; former North Carolina senator John Edwards, who has a strong base from his second-place finish here in 2004; and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack. Many Democrats here see Edwards currently in the strongest position, and he drew a sizable crowd on his first trip to the state as an announced candidate last month. But the campaign appears wide open at this point.

Clinton promised to return here often. And in her town hall appearance, she wryly remarked that she hopes to "have this as a one-on-one conversation, just you and me, and about several hundred national press people." But she added that the hoopla "will fade, and we'll actually be able to pursue this conversation in a very personal way."

Her interaction with the crowd was personal at times, despite the news media crush. One woman, Terri Hoffman, 53, a teacher from Des Moines, confessed in front of the audience that she is going through menopause. Clinton nodded knowingly and smiled. At another point, a member of the audience shouted to Clinton: "You go, girl!"

"You go with me!" Clinton replied.

At the end of her hour-long appearance, as the tune "You Ain't Seen Nothing Yet" filled the gymnasium, Clinton lingered to shake hands and sign autographs -- a practice more closely associated with her husband.

The immediate reaction to Clinton's performance at East High School was enthusiastic. Still, many said that it is far too early for them to commit to her or to any of the other Democratic candidates vying for the nomination.

"She's an electrically charged presence who is articulate," said Marilyn Musser of Des Moines, who had posed the question about how Clinton intends to deal with the gender issue in the campaign.

Musser said Clinton's candidacy is the "most impressive for me," but she added: "We're a long way from the election." She made clear that the prospect of electing the first female president is a factor in her consideration. "What else do women have to prove?" she asked.

DOJ_NMG_0123380

Effie Hall of Grinnell, Iowa, was impressed with how well Clinton connected with the audience. "People say she's cold, but I thought she was quite warm," she said.

But Hall said the questions ignored some major issues facing the country. "Iraq wasn't really part of it," she said. "She talked about the VA and her support of the VA [Veterans Affairs] system, but I thought there would be more. Maybe that's an old story. Maybe people knew she supported [the war] and now has backed off."

The Clinton campaign worked to build the crowds. It ran radio ads encouraging people to attend the candidate's public events and used "robocalls" -- automated phone messages using Clinton's voice -- to let the most likely caucus attendees know she was coming. Clinton's advisers said they made no effort to screen those who came to the town hall meeting or to try to manage the questioning.

In addition to her public events, a busy private schedule filled Clinton's 24 hours in Des Moines. She met with Gov. Chet Culver (D) shortly after arriving on Friday, and later attended a private dinner with 15 to 20 Democratic elected officials. On Saturday morning, Clinton met with labor leaders over breakfast at her hotel.

At a house party in Cedar Rapids on Saturday night, Clinton raised the subject of Iraq herself, expressing strong disapproval of Bush's handling of the war and calling for Congress to cut off funding for Iraqi troops.

"The rest of the world is standing with their arms crossed, just kind of waiting to see what we do," she said. "In the Congress, we are trying to set a different message now."

She said that, through a bipartisan resolution of disapproval, the Democratic-led Congress is "trying to demonstrate to the world that at least some of us understand what has to be done."

"But it's going to be hard because we have very few tools that we can use to try to reverse course. The president has enormous power in the area," Clinton said.

In Iowa, Hillary Off And Running (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 28, 2007

DES MOINES, Iowa -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton began her presidential bid in earnest yesterday with all the momentum and certainty of a candidate in the final days of a campaign.

"I want to have this as a one-on-one conversation," the New York Democrat told a crowd of more than 1,000 Iowans packed into a high school gymnasium.

Absent from that conversation was the dominant issue of the war in Iraq, which Mrs. Clinton voted to authorize in 2002. She did address her vote during a meeting earlier in the day with state Democratic Party officials.

"There are no do-overs in life," Mrs. Clinton said. "I wish there were. I acted on the best judgment I had at the time."

Two hours before the former first lady arrived for her town hall-style meeting, the folding chairs at East High School's gym were nearly filled and an overflow room had to be opened.

Tall tripods for 17 television cameras were set up. Idling outside were seven satellite trucks and four industrial generators.

But Iowa voters especially those who will participate in the nation's first caucuses just under a year from now on Jan. 18, 2008 are famously persnickety and expect to be courted with humility, preferably in their own living rooms.

So, Mrs. Clinton began like anyone would.

"Well, I'm Hillary Clinton," she said to ecstatic applause. "And I'm happy to be here in Iowa."

Unlike most early campaign events in Iowa where the voters are undecided, the vast majority of those who showed up yesterday were firmly in Mrs. Clinton's camp. Many wore "Hillary!" stickers and buttons and waved posters with messages such as, "I LOVE HRC!"

Though national polls show Mrs. Clinton far ahead of any rival, surveys of Iowa voters show her trailing former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois and the favorite son, former Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa. However, such early polls are virtually meaningless, especially since Mrs. Clinton had not visited the state since 2003.

In her meeting yesterday with party officials, she made the case for why she should be given the chance to beat the next Republican nominee for president.

DOJ_NMG_0123381

"When you are attacked, you have to deck your opponent," said Mrs. Clinton, who has lived in the glare of the national press for nearly 15 years. "I have been through the political wars longer than some of you have been alive. We've got to be prepared to hold our ground and fight back."

Mrs. Clinton said she would have voted differently on authorizing the Iraq war if she had more accurate information at the time. She also said that as the junior senator from New York, she "lived through 9/11" and has "a slightly different take on this from some of the other people who will be coming through here."

However, Mrs. Clinton was not about to offer herself as a peace candidate.

"I do think we are engaged in a war against heartless, ruthless enemies," she said. "If they could come after us again tomorrow, they would do so."

During her forum with voters, Mrs. Clinton was not asked a single question about her vote authorizing the war.

She was asked how she planned to win election to an office that has been held by men for more than 200 years.

"Sometimes, you have to work harder," Mrs. Clinton said.

There were more women than men in the audience, but she strove to play down the issue of a woman as president.

"There will be more stories about my clothes and hair than some of the people running against me," Mrs. Clinton said.

But she did not avoid the topic of women in leadership altogether. She gave a nod to the new Democratic House speaker, Nancy Pelosi of California, and the crowd erupted.

At one point, a woman in the audience shouted, "You go, girl!"

Mrs. Clinton shot back without missing a beat: "Go with me!"

John Barry, a veteran, rose to ask a question and began by saying, somewhat nervously: "America loves you and you look very nice."

Beaming, Mrs. Clinton thanked him, and the crowd roared with approval.

Another issue she met head-on was her failed effort during her husband's White House tenure to implement socialized medicine.

"The problems we were trying to address are still with us," Mrs. Clinton said. "In fact, they've gotten worse."

She said she remains committed to "universal health care coverage" and predicted that it's a matter of "when," not "if" it will happen.

"We are finally creating a consensus in the country for this," Mrs. Clinton said.

On global warming, she said: "Of course, global climate change is real, and it is a threat."

On the disparity among states regarding the foster care of children, Mrs. Clinton said: "I do think we need a national approach to that."

Terri Hoffman, 53, an eighth-grade teacher was among those surprised not to hear more about the war. She opposes it, but said she still could support Mrs. Clinton. Her only reservation is that she also likes Mr. Edwards, who has energetically courted voters here for two years.

Miss Hoffman worries that voters might shy away from voting for a woman.

"If they become a team, I guess I would be very happy," she said. "I think she'll be a great vice president."

Natalie Coates, 17, of Goshen, Ind., attended the event with her mother. She has no reservations whatsoever.

"I think it's awesome that she's a woman," Natalie said.

By the time Election Day rolls around, she will be eligible to vote, and she said she would cast her first-ever ballot for Mrs. Clinton.

Clinton Hits Campaign Trail In Iowa (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, January 27, 2007

DES MOINES — New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton plunged into her presidential campaign Saturday at a town hall meeting complete with professionally printed banners and placards, a live jazz band and a crowd that was anything but tough.

DOJ_NMG_0123382

"I'm running for president and I'm in it to win," Clinton told a raucous audience in a gym at East High School, before fielding a series of questions that sometimes began with statements like "I think you look very nice" and "You're one of my idols."

Clinton offered a taste of how she intended to win at an earlier meeting with state party leaders when someone asked what she had learned from Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry's losing 2004 campaign.

"When you're attacked, you have to deck your opponents," Clinton said to laughter and applause from about 50 members of the Iowa Democratic Party Central Committee. "I want to run a positive, issue-oriented, visionary campaign. But you can count on me to stand my ground and fight back."

The Iowa caucuses kick off the nomination season for both parties in less than a year. Clinton's two-day tour of Des Moines, Cedar rapids and Davenport was her first visit here in more than three years.

While she leads in all national matchups of prospective Democratic nominees, two polls of likely Iowa caucus-goers this month had Clinton in third or fourth place. She was clustered with Illinois Sen. Barack Obama and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack, and all three were well behind former North Carolina senator John Edwards.

The gym at East High School was packed with more than 1,000 people and some 150 journalists from around the country and the world, including Japan, England, France, Germany, Italy and Switzerland.. Another 1,000 people watched the meeting from an overflow room.

The level of attention was similar to Obama's trip to New Hampshire, site of the first primary, last month. Some people were diehard Hillary fans; others were checking out the talent. Steve Tuttle, 59, a retired television news director, said he is interested in Clinton and Obama, who is black. "Let's mix it up," he said. "I'm tired of looking at old white guys because I am one."

Clinton told the town meeting that "bad decisions coming out of our government" are undermining "the promise of America" for the poor and middle class. She made clear she would not shy from the issue that was so problematic for her during her husband's administration. "I am committed to universal health care," she said to applause, adding she would offer specific ideas later in the campaign.

Several people asked Clinton how she would handle potential resistance to the notion of a female president. "I don't think I'm the only woman here who feels that sometimes you have to work even harder, right? And I'm prepared to do that," she said. "We are good at breaking barriers and going places nobody's gone before."

Without using the words "Bill" or "my husband," Clinton praised his administration for creating budget surpluses, helping schools finance new buildings and improving medical care for veterans. Talking to the Democratic committee members, she said she has favored repeal of one Clinton era policy — the don't ask, don't tell policy applying to gay people in the military.

Thousands of patriotic Americans have been discharged and "that to me does not make sense," Clinton said, adding the United States should judge military personnel as its allies do: by "actions and behavior, not status."

Clinton took two questions on Iraq from the state committee members. She said she does not support cutting off funds to troops in the field and does support working for a bipartisan resolution in the Senate. "We have to build the political will within the Congress to stop President Bush. That means getting Republicans to turn on this policy and turn against the president," she told them.

Edwards and Vilsack have urged that U.S. troops be withdrawn. Clinton said that "it's easy being on the outside saying 'Do this' or 'Do that.' But inside you've got to figure out how to get the votes to do anything, and that's what we're working on."

Sen. Clinton Woos Voters In Iowa (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

DES MOINES — Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton took on the full trappings of a presidential candidate Saturday on her first campaign swing across Iowa, where she defended her early support of the Iraq war and played up her chance to "break a historic barrier" as the first woman to win the White House.

Clinton's Iowa visit opened her yearlong courtship of Democratic voters in the state whose precinct caucuses launch the 2008 presidential nominating process. Clinton, who is leading her Democratic rivals in national polls but not in Iowa, sought above all to spur excitement over her status as the only major female candidate.

DOJ_NMG_0123383

"When people tell me, 'Well you know, I don't think a woman can be elected president,' I say, 'Well, I don't believe that, but we're going to find out,' " she told nearly 2,000 Iowans at her campaign kickoff rally in a Des Moines school gymnasium.

Greeted with repeated roars of cheering, the New York senator and former first lady said she expected "more stories about my clothes and hair than some of the people running against me."

"I just have accepted that," she said. "And there may be some other kind of funny stories about differences between us, or a little bit of the double standard, but I just reject that. You know, I think we've got to move beyond that. I'm going to be asking people to vote for me based on my entire life and experience."

Vowing tougher federal action to ensure equal pay for women and men, she told the crowd: "Women have made progress, and I'm very proud of that, but it is still not equitable."

For Clinton, who announced Jan. 20 that she was forming a presidential exploratory committee, the weekend spent in Des Moines, Cedar Rapids and Davenport marks her first foray before live voters after several online and carefully screened chats.

At the school rally, Clinton operatives supplied thousands of "Hillary for President" placards and bumper stickers.

Dangling from the gymnasium ceiling were red-white-and-blue banners declaring: "Let the conversation begin! Iowa welcomes Hillary Clinton for President."

But the commotion created by the dozens of television crews and scores of reporters covering her appearance threatened to upend the intimate bonding that Iowans had come to expect from presidential candidates.

"I want to have this as a one-on-one conversation, just you and me and about several hundred national press people," Clinton joked at the rally. "But I have to tell you that will fade, and we'll actually be able to pursue this conversation in a very personal way."

She attempted to do that Saturday evening at a Cedar Rapids gathering with roughly 150 invited guests at a private home where media access was limited.

In larger settings, like the Des Moines school rally, her reception was overwhelmingly favorable.

"Being the first lady, she must have learned a lot there," said Des Moines teacher Samra Olofson, 52, who sees Clinton as the most experienced Democrat in the race. "I've been hoping she would run for a long time."

For now, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina, the 2004 Democratic nominee for vice president, is leading Iowa polls, followed by Clinton, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack and others. Edwards, a frequent Iowa visitor over the last two years, has made painstaking efforts to expand his political network in the state, leaving Clinton and Obama to play catch-up.

With that in mind, Clinton met Friday with Iowa Gov. Chet Culver, a Democrat who has not endorsed a presidential candidate. Clinton also dropped by a diner Friday night for a milkshake with a Des Moines Register political columnist and met Saturday with union leaders at a hotel.

In public, Clinton tried to appeal to Democrats in this largely rural state by reminding them of the upstate New York farming regions that she represents in the Senate.

"We have cows — and on our farms live happy cows," she told several dozen Democrats gathered at state party headquarters Saturday morning.

There, as elsewhere, Clinton faced questions about her 2002 vote to authorize the war.

"I've taken responsibility for my vote, but there are no do-overs in life," she said. "I wish there were. I acted on the best judgment I had at the time."

Clinton reminded the crowd of her support for a cap on the number of U.S. troops in the war and her opposition to President Bush's plan to add more than 20,000.

"We have to build the political will within the Congress to stop President Bush," she said. "That means getting Republicans to turn on this policy and turn against the president."

At the same time, she said she was against "cutting off funds to troops in the field."

Jim Hutter, a former state Democratic committee member who asked Clinton about the war, said: "I thought it was a great answer."

DOJ_NMG_0123384

As she campaigned in Des Moines, Clinton alternated between taking shots at the Bush administration and reminiscing about the Clinton White House years.

"When I was in the White House, I worked to help craft the children's health insurance program, and it has worked extremely well, but now the administration has begun to cut it back," said Clinton, who renewed her call for universal health coverage but provided no details on how to accomplish it.

Clinton praised her husband's record on veterans benefits, but also called for repealing his "don't ask, don't tell" policy, which requires gays and lesbians in the military to hide their sexual orientation. She said thousands had been discharged and "that, to me, does not make sense."

Clinton also cast herself as a strong leader. She said the United States must put tough labor and environmental standards into trade agreements and "make it clear to countries that take advantage of our markets that we're not going to be patsies any longer."

On political matters, too, Clinton struck a tough tone. Responding to a question on lessons from Sen. John F. Kerry's presidential campaign in 2004, she drew guffaws and cheers by responding: "When you're attacked, you have to deck your opponents."

Clinton Begins Journey To White House (CHIT)

By Ray Quintanilla

Chicago Tribune, January 28, 2007

DES MOINES—Sen. Hillary Clinton began her presidential journey in this bellwether state on Saturday, raising energy and health-care issues but remaining conspicuously silent on the war in Iraq.

"I want to renew the promise of America. It starts right here in Iowa. I'm in it to win," Clinton (D-N.Y.) told cheering supporters—many of them women—who packed the gym at East High School here.

"You go, girl," came a shout from the audience.

"You come with me," Clinton replied, generating much applause.

Vowing to reduce U.S. dependence on foreign oil and re-ignite a push for universal health care coverage, the former first lady spoke for an hour during what her campaign billed as a "conversation with Iowans." She also talked of a need to change the "traditional roles" of women across society.

Saturday's event was Clinton's first political speech in the state since declaring a week earlier that she would seek the Democratic Party's nomination for president.

She took questions and spoke of boosting production of ethanol, increasing education funding and revamping how health care is delivered, especially to the poor. She said 20 percent of the nation's Medicaid dollars are related to diabetes, an illness that can be prevented or controlled with proper care. Yet the health care system does little to fund wellness care for those who are at risk, she said, adding: "But our system will pay to have your foot amputated. That has to change."

Missing from the day's "conversation" was a meaningful discussion on the war in Iraq. And that fact wasn't lost on some in the audience who groaned when Clinton spoke at length about standardized tests for schoolchildren.

"How can you get up and speak for an hour, and not talk about the war?" asked Thomasine Johnson, 66, shaking her head as she left the gym. "I am very disappointed she said nothing about why we are there, or how we can get out of Iraq. She voted for the war."

Roberta Hardwick, 35, said Clinton touched on all of the hot-button issues other than the war.

"Clinton talked about the need to help our veterans, and there was a good opportunity to address the war. But it didn't happen," said Hardwick, of Des Moines. "I am kind of disappointed about that."

She did discuss Iraq in an interview with The Associated Press, conceding that "I take responsibility" for voting to give President Bush authority to wage war.

"I have said clearly and consistently for quite some time that I regret the way the president misused the authority" given him by Congress to act in Iraq, Clinton told the AP. "He misled Congress and the country on what he was seeking and what he intended to do."

DOJ_NMG_0123385

"I take responsibility for having voted to give him that authority," she said. "My focus is on what we do now. That is the proper debate."

Others who heard Clinton here Saturday praised her for entering the presidential race, and said they left the gym feeling excited about the prospect of having a woman president for the first time.

"She did a thoughtful job of answering all the questions, and I believe her views are right on target," said Dayna Chandler, a 37-year-old mother of four who lives in Des Moines. "She's very confident, and I like that about her."

Jim Hutter, political science professor at Iowa State University in Ames, said Clinton's first major public speech in the Hawkeye State probably won't have much lasting impact, considering that the presidential caucuses are a year away.

Still, he added, Clinton is among the candidates generating interest from Democratic activists, many of whom were on hand Saturday. Others getting attention, he said, are former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards and former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack. Illinois Sen. Barack Obama's candidacy has sparked excitement as well, Hutter said.

Clinton told the AP she wouldn't concede the black vote to Obama. "I'm going to be asking for the votes of all Americans," she said.

Hutter has been an observer of Iowa's caucuses since the late 1960s.

"Having a political organization on the ground here is important, and so far Sen. Edwards seems to have the inside track," he said. "[Clinton] has to get to work on building an organization," he explained.

Later Saturday, Clinton was to travel to Cedar Rapids for a house party with supporters, and had a similar event planned for Sunday morning in Davenport.

Clinton Explains Role In Authorizing War (AP)

By Mike Glover

AP, January 27, 2007

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) - New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton blamed President Bush on Saturday for misusing authority given him by Congress to act in Iraq, but conceded "I take responsibility" for her role in allowing that to happen.

In an interview with The Associated Press, Clinton also said she would not cede black votes to Barack Obama and that she had proven as a U.S. senator that gender is irrelevant.

Of her husband, the former president, she said he would have a role in the campaign but "I'm the one running for president."

Clinton was making her first campaign swing through this early nominating state, which twice voted for Bill Clinton for president. She met with key activists and held a raucous town hall meeting with 1,500 cheering backers and hundreds of journalists.

"I have said clearly and consistently for quite some time that I regret the way the president misused the authority," said Clinton. "He misled Congress and the country on what he was seeking and what he intended to do."

The responsibility Clinton said she accepts was helping clear the way for Bush's path in Iraq.

"I take responsibility for having voted to give him that authority," she said. "My focus is on what we do now. That is the proper debate."

In the interview:

Clinton said she expected to attract black votes even though Obama, the freshman Illinois senator, has caught fire. "I'm going to be asking for the votes of all Americans," she said.

Her husband will play a key role in her campaign, though she'll make it clear she's the candidate. "At the end of the day when voters make up their mind, I will have a great team around me, including him," she said.

Her experience in a failed health care reform effort in the White House does not dampen her effort to again deal with the issue. "I think it makes me a more effective messenger," she said. "I now what the roadblocks and obstacles are."

Clinton expressed confidence voters are ready to elect a woman president. "It's one of those issues that evolves over time," she said. "I'm very confident I can see it unfold."

DOJ_NMG_0123386

In her first campaign swing through Iowa, the New York senator told party activists that Democrats in 2008 will face "someone on the other side who will be very tough and strong, even bellicose perhaps."

That likely was a reference to Arizona Republican Sen. John McCain, who has taken a hard line in supporting more U.S. troops to Iraq, as Bush has announced.

The former first lady also said has learned the lessons of the last two presidential campaigns, both lost by Democrats who responded slowly to criticism.

"When you are attacked, you have to deck your opponent," Clinton said. "I have been through the political wars longer than some of you have been alive. We've got to be prepared to hold our ground and fight back."

Clinton, who announced her candidacy last weekend, said Democrats cannot concede the security issue.

"We have to nominate someone who can have the trust and confidence of the American people to make the tough decisions as commander in chief," she said. "That is the threshold issue."

Her initial foray in Iowa was far different from the traditional caucus campaigning, with a few people in a living room. More than 1,500 people jammed a high school gymnasium for a town hall-style meeting. Some 150 reporters and photographers chronicled the event.

Earlier, she met with state Democrats at the party's headquarters.

Attention focused on Iraq and her vote to authorize the use of force ahead of the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003. Presidential rivals such as former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards now say the vote in support was a mistake.

"There are no do-overs in life," Clinton said. She says Congress received bad information going into the vote and that she would have voted differently given what she knows now.

"As a senator from New York, I lived through 9/11 and I am still dealing with the aftereffects," Clinton said. "I may have a slightly different take on this from some of the other people who will be coming through here."

Clinton said her view is that the nation is engaged in a deadly fight against terrorism, a battle that she contends Bush has botched.

"I do think we are engaged in a war against heartless, ruthless enemies," she said. "If they could come after us again tomorrow they would do so."

Clinton has urged a cap to the number of U.S. troops in Iraq, but has refused to go along with suggestions that Congress use its power of the purse to bring the war to a halt.

"This will be a problem that will be left to the next president," the senator said. "We've got to figure out now, given where we are, how we go forward."

In First Iowa Foray, Clinton Vows To Be Tough (NSDY)

By Glenn Thrush

Newsday, January 28, 2007

DES MOINES, Iowa -- Newly minted Iowa voter Laura Nutt wore three Hillary Rodham Clinton buttons on her sweatshirt, but the heart underneath was torn between the former first lady and Sen. Barack Obama.

"I really like her, but I'm mostly leaning towards Obama," said the 18-year-old high school senior, one of 2,000 Iowans who jammed the gym of East Hills High School to hear Clinton Saturday. "I'm looking at the war and I'm looking at a whole bunch of issues but I'm leaning toward Obama."

Such was the challenge Clinton faced during her first foray to Iowa as a presidential contestant, a two-day statewide tour with stops in the state capital, Cedar Rapids and Davenport. She steered mostly clear of Iraq -- addressing the issue for less than a minute during her 90-minute high school forum -- instead couching a populist economic message in some pugilistic language.

Clinton said she was the best Democrat to take on "bellicose" GOP opponents, such as Arizona Sen. John McCain and Rudolph Giuliani.

DOJ_NMG_0123387

"When you are attacked, you have to deck your opponent," she told Democratic state committee members earlier in the day. "I have been through the political wars longer than some of you have been alive. We've got to be prepared to hold our ground and fight back."

Clinton was given a rock-star welcome at the forum, arriving to Jesus Jones' "Right Here, Right Now," an early '90s dance-floor anthem.

"I will be here over and over again," the New York Democrat promised. "You may not always agree with me and we may not always see the world exactly the same, but I will answer your questions."

Iowa's first-in-the-nation caucus next January is considered a key hurdle for Clinton, 59. She trails in early Iowa polls to Obama, former vice presidential candidate John Edwards and ex-Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack.

"She's very formidable and now she's on the ground," said former state Democratic chairman Gordon Fischer, a Vilsack supporter. "As she meets with people, as they see how intelligent and charming she is, her poll numbers will move steadily higher. ... She's the person to beat in Iowa."

Clinton was trailed by a brigade of reporters, including at least three TV crews from Japan. On her future Iowa trips, she vowed, the press attention "will fade and we'll be able to pursue this conversation in a very personal way." She went on to predict that reporters soon would embark on a new slate of stories about "my hair and my clothes."

On Friday, Vilsack took an indirect swipe at Clinton, saying her proposal to cap the number of troops in Iraq amounted to staying the course.

Clinton dismissed stronger measures Saturrday, including a cutoff of funding for the troop surge, saying Democrats still needed to "build the will to stop President Bush" in Congress.

"The war is Bush's problem, not Hillary's," said James Jackson, 63, an accountant from Des Moines who supports her.

Clinton In DM: "No Do-overs" On Iraq (DMR)

Des Moines Register, January 28, 2007

U.S. Sen. Hillary Clinton confronted doubts today about her ability to win the 2008 presidential election and defended her position on the Iraq war during her first day in Iowa as a candidate for president.

The New York Democrat, who leads her party's presidential hopefuls in national polls, also insisted that her celebrity status will not inhibit her from waging a hands-on campaign for Iowa's lead-off caucuses.

"Many of the doubts that are being expressed now were certainly present when I made my initial listening tour in New York. There were so many doubts," Clinton said in a Des Moines Register interview.

Clinton insisted that the crush of national and international news media that greeted her at a blockbuster forum at East High School in Des Moines and shadowed her 10-car motorcade around the city would subside as her campaign progressed.

Should that occur, voters will get to know her better, Clinton said.

"People want to assess me for themselves. They don't want to take what other people say about me at face value," she added.

To that end, Clinton's campaign granted broad public access to her events, although she met early Saturday with labor leaders in private.

National media were allowed limited access to Clinton, with all of them congregating at East High.

A half-dozen satellite news trucks purred outside East High's new community center while dozens of news media from Iowa, New York, Washington, D.C., and around the world waited inside.

An especially noticeable contingent of Japanese press was on hand. Producers from some of the international networks said interest in Clinton's candidacy is huge in Japan.

Clinton also acknowledged doubts about her chances in a general election, should she win the nomination, that stem from national polls that consistently show her unfavorable rating to be around 40 percent.

"I do seem to inspire strong feelings," the 59-year-old former first lady told two dozen of Iowa's most influential Democrats at the state party's central committee meeting in Des Moines.

DOJ_NMG_0123388

In small groups, during interviews with Iowa media and in front of about 1,500 people at East High, Clinton repeatedly said voters will find her the most qualified Democrat, if they can get past the national hype.

She never mentioned her husband Bill's time in office as the most recent Democrat president. Instead, she touted her six years in the Senate, career as a lawyer in Arkansas and policy efforts while first lady.

"Let's start with what's the most important concern: Who can be the best president?" she said in the Register interview. "I think I'm that person. And if that's the question we get to, then I believe people will feel comfortable supporting me."

Clinton's heralded arrival in Iowa this weekend came a week after she declared she would form a committee to explore the 2008 Democratic presidential nomination.

The East High forum had the flavor of a fall campaign's closing days, with many in the jammed gymnasium waving "Hillary" signs. Another 1,000 people gathered in the old gym to watch on TV.

Clinton took questions about health care, being a woman presidential candidate and the war in Iraq.

"I'm less skeptical than I was two hours ago," Des Moines Democrat Elizabeth Sedrel said, as supporters and photographers flocked around Clinton at the end of the forum. "But I'm still not sure. There's a long way to go."

Clinton pivoted away from her position about the politically touchy war in Iraq during the forum, and talked more about veterans health benefits.

But during the meeting with state party leaders, she was asked directly about the potential problem her vote for the 2002 resolution authorizing President Bush's use of force in Iraq.

Clinton said, as she has since last month, that she would not have voted for the resolution had she known that the Bush administration's justifications for the war would be proven to be unfounded.

She also shot back at her rivals, who have become more openly critical of Clinton for not saying the vote was a mistake.

"I've taken responsibility for my vote. But there are no do-overs in life. I wish there were," she told the group.

"I've also been a member of the Senate and looked for ways to help try to manage this very dangerous situation," she said earlier, during the interview.

Former Sen. John Edwards, who leads in early caucus polls, and former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack have said Clinton has not done enough to stop Bush from sending more troops to Iraq.

"It's easy to be on the sidelines and say this and that," she said.

Clinton has called for capping troops at existing levels in Iraq, gradually redeploying them and cutting funding for Iraqi security forces.

She opposes Bush's plan to send the additional 21,500 troops to secure Baghdad and other areas in Iraq. But she also opposes blocking funding for those troops.

Instead, she said, getting Republican support for a non-binding resolution expressing opposition to the troop surge can spark a political movement to end the war.

Ames Democrat Jim Hutter, a former member of the state central committee, said Clinton's answer satisfied him.

"My concern is Iowa caucus-goers have not heard her make the statement she made today," said Hutter, who supported former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean in the 2004 caucuses but is undecided about 2008.

Clinton has trailed Edwards in Iowa and has support similar to Vilsack and Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, according to recent polls.

Clinton said Iowans have not seen her up close yet. She promised to wage an all-out campaign for the caucuses, less than a year away.

She planned to campaign tonight in Cedar Rapids and Sunday in Davenport. Her first event in Davenport, originally planned as a small-group gathering at a restaurant, is now scheduled as another town hall-style forum at the Mississippi Valley Fairgrounds.

Clinton stopped short of saying she expected to win the Iowa caucuses.

"I have no expectations," she said. "I'm starting off (with) the idea I have to earn every vote. That's what I did in New York. That's what I'm going to try to do in Iowa."

DOJ_NMG_0123389

Pool Report 1: Sen. Clinton At Iowa Democratic Party Central Committee Meeting (POL)

The Politico, January 27, 2007

Because Hillary Clinton's media entourage in Iowa is so large, her staff designated some events as "pool only." The pool reporter is responsible for telling colleagues at other news organizations what happened at pool-only events. This pool report was filed by Jackie Calmes, a political reporter for The Wall Street Journal.

In her first publicly scheduled meeting of a frigid Iowa campaign weekend, Sen. Clinton arrived this morning to a polite standing ovation from about 50 Democrats who were mostly at two long tables arranged parallel to each other and perpendicular to the podium.

"I thought I'd drop by," she started out, to some chuckles. "I was just looking around for something to do on a Saturday." Then getting right to the point, she continued, "I'm in, I'm in to win," and will campaign "exactly along the lines Iowans expect," going from living rooms to church basements to union halls. She noted her New York record of going all over the state, proving the doubters wrong –including the media that believed she'd find it too "boring"—by winning and then getting reelected.

Think NY is so different from Iowa? "We even have farms…34,000 at last count," she said, joking that "I actually took so much grief" during past debate on a farm bill from colleagues under the impression NY is an urban place. "They made so much fun of me." She boasted that her adopted state is No. 2 in apple production, No. 3 in dairy. "We have cows and on our farms I ive happy cows." Lots of laughter from the Iowans.

Then to issues.

* "We're going to get to universal health care coverage," she said, acknowledging she doesn't exactly know how. But "since I do have a little experience in this area, I know what not to do." More laughter.

* "We're going to have a new energy future in America….We should have something like a Manhattan Project. (Lots of applause here)

* Global climate change: Unlike President Bush, "We know it's real; we've got to tackle it." In doing so, jobs will be created for "a win-win."

* Education: "From preschool through higher education, we're losing ground." She recounted her record of involvement in education going back to her days as Arkansas' first lady.

* Then the war: "We've got to bring the Iraq War to the right end." (More below from Q-and-A portion)

* "Repair and rebuild our alliances"

* Support "labor and environmental standards in trade agreements."

"I think I know what I'm getting into," she continued. "I do seem to inspire strong feelings." More chuckles from the crowd, and scattered applause.

"I'm going to go out and try to earn your votes. I love this."

Then she said she'd take a few questions. A man asked what lessons she'd learned from the Kerry campaign. Clinton initially seemed to duck the point, noting "I've learned a lot of lessons" from the years of campaigns she's been involved in, her own and her husband's. She said "I believe strongly as a Democrat and a progressive" that Democrats have lay out their visions. Then she added that she also believes, "When you're attacked, you have to deck your opponents." The group liked that—laughter, clapping.

"I want to run a positive, issue-oriented, visionary campaign. But you can count on me to stand my ground and fight back."

Second question: whether she supports the military's don't-ask-don't-tell policy, this from a man who suggested he agreed with those who say the (Clinton Administration) policy is bad for the military.

"I have been in favor of repealing 'don't ask, don't tell,'" she said. (Spokesman Howard Wolfson says this isn't a new stand for her.) She said thousands of patriotic Americans have been discharged. "That to me does not make sense," she said. She noted that the US should judge military personnel –as US allies do --by "Actions and behavior, not status."

Third question: Her view on "the surge" and whether the Senate resolution has "teeth."

"I oppose the president's escalation," she said, and support a cap on troops. "I'm not for cutting off funds to troops in the field." She said she supports working toward a bipartisan resolution in the Senate, telling the Iowans that even if the president hasn't taken the anti-war message from the '06 election results, many Republicans in Congress have. "We have to build the political will within the Congress to stop President Bush. That means getting Republicans to turn on this policy and turn against the president."

DOJ_NMG_0123390

After some further discussion of Democrats' efforts for a phased redeployment since 2005, she said, "It's easy being on the outside saying 'Do this' or 'Do that.' But inside you've got to figure out how to get the votes to do anything, and that's what we're working on."

Fourth and last: Another question on the war from a man (Jim Hutter, a former central committee member, now here as an interested –and uncommitted—party activist) who asked the senator to 'say more" about her 2002 vote on the use of force. He said some people "simply don't seem to want to get past that."

Clinton did her riff about how if we'd known then what we know now, there wouldn't have been a vote. "I've taken responsibility for my vote. But there are no do-overs in life. I wish there were. I acted on the best judgment I had at the time. I said this was not a vote for preemptive war. The president took my vote, and others' votes, and basically misused the authority we gave him." As president, she said, "I would never have diverted our attention and our focus from Afghanistan." This got some of the biggest applause of the event.

She closed, adding this: "I may have a slightly different take on this than some of the people who come through here."

She got an enthusiastic standing ovation, then spent a good 10-15 minutes signing autographs, including in copies of her books. Then she retired to a back room to meet state party officials privately. For what it's worth, Mr. Hutter said of her war vote answer, "I thought it was a great answer."

Dour McCain (NOVAK)

Robert Novak, January 27, 2007

Democratic strategists who had feared Sen. John McCain as the potentially unbeatable Republican candidate for president in 2008 were surprised and delighted by his dour appearance on NBC's "Meet the Press" last Sunday.

One Democratic leader referred to McCain's performance, in suggesting President Bush's additional 21,000 troops may be inadequate, as "comatose." A Republican adviser to McCain said it was one of the worst performances ever on "Meet the Press." The senator's defender said he could not be expected to be cheerful about a plan to send additional U.S. troops in harm's way.

A footnote: Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney is picking up support for president among House Republicans, headed by former Speaker Dennis Hastert.

Whither Rahm?

Sources close to Sen. Barack Obama are sure that Rep. Rahm Emanuel will not support his fellow Illinois Democrat for the presidential nomination but will back Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

If so, Emanuel would be the only prominent Democratic officeholder in Illinois not for Obama. As a senior White House aide, Emanuel was one of President Bill Clinton's favorites. Emanuel has been close to both of the Clintons.

Emanuel refuses to talk about his 2008 presidential choice. He says he was deeply engaged in politics for two years as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee and in his new role, as House Democratic Caucus chairman, he is committed to legislation.

Undermining Hillary

Jerome Corsi, co-author of the 2004 campaign book "Unfit for Command" attacking Sen. John Kerry's war record, joined up Tuesday with the organization intended to similarly undermine Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton in the 2008 campaign.

TheVanguard.org is intended to be a right-wing version of the leftist MoveOn.Org. It was founded by Silicon Valley entrepreneurs, including Gil Amelio, former CEO of Apple and National Semiconductor.

Coming on board Feb. 16 as TheVanguard's full-time editorial and creative director will be Richard Poe, who has served as editor-in-chief of FrontPage Magazine. He has been described as the conservative movement's leading expert on MoveOn.Org's strategy in bringing together disparate elements with a common viewpoint.

Bush on Abortion

President Bush extended his stay at Camp David last weekend to arrive back at the White House Monday afternoon, missing the annual anti-abortion March for Life that morning in Washington to mark the anniversary of the Roe v. Wade decision.

DOJ_NMG_0123391

Bush was at the White House on Jan. 22, 2001, for the first March of his presidency but sent a written statement rather than attend in person. For the next five years, he was out of town for the event: Charleston, W.Va. (2002), St. Louis (2003), Roswell, N.M. (2004), Camp David (2005) and Manhattan, Kan. (2006). His routine is to address the event by phone.

A footnote: Only two of the many Republican presidential hopefuls attended this year's March for Life: Rep. Duncan Hunter of California and Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas. On Sunday, Brownback visited the Holiday Inn on Capitol Hill, mingling with marchers from Iowa (the first state in the presidential nomination process).

Dollars for Rudy

Texas Republican contributors are being solicited to spend $30,000 for dinner with former New York City Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani at the Houstonian Hotel in Houston Feb. 1 to finance his "presidential exploratory committee." The "private" dinner will follow a 6:30 to 8 p.m. cocktail reception, costing $2,100 a person and $4,200 for couples.

The best-known host of Giuliani's Houston event is billionaire oilman T. Boone Pickens Jr., chairman of the private equity firm BP Capital Management. Also on Giuliani's Texas fund-raising team are Tom Hicks, whose company owns the Texas Rangers baseball team; oil industry executive Jim Lee; and lawyer Patrick C. Oxford.

A footnote: A Giuliani fund-raiser will be held Jan. 29 in Pacific Palisades, Calif., at the home of Bill Simon, the 2002 Republican candidate for governor of California, costing $2,300 a person and $4,600 per couple. To find out more about Robert D. Novak and read his past columns, visit the Creators Syndicate web page at www.creators.com. COPYRIGHT 2007 CREATORS SYNDICATE INC.

Robert Novak is a syndicated columnist and editor of the Evans-Novak Political Report

Hillary Pushes Personality, Ducks Iraq (POL)

By Roger Simon

The Politico, January 28, 2007

DES MOINES - - In her first face-to-face meeting with voters since announcing for president, Hillary Clinton was asked about Iraq and ducked the question.

A man, who identified himself as a Gulf War vet, asked the New York senator at a town meeting in a high school gym here Saturday if the surge of new troops to Iraq “was going to be enough?”

Instead of answering, Hillary (as she is officially called by her campaign) said, “Thanks so much for your service” and then talked about how she visits military hospitals and believes America needs to provide good medical care for its veterans.

In the one-hour town meeting, Hillary did not mention Iraq a single time. She mentioned ethanol twice.

Ethanol, a gasoline substitute that can be made from corn, is wildly popular in this state where corn grows in profusion.

Iraq is far less popular here. In an interview with Gov. Chet Culver Friday, he told me, “We have lost 50 heroes, 50 Iowans in Iraq and Afghanistan. Every day it is becoming more of an issue.”

Hillary’s refusal to apologize for her vote to authorize the Iraq war rankles some Democrats here. Bruce Stone from Grimes, Iowa, said: “My problems with Hillary is she voted for the Iraq war and, until a few months ago, she supported it. I am a Vietnam-era vet and I take war very seriously. Her husband? He walks on water.”

But it is Hillary’s turn to slog through the presidential waters now. Before her town meeting, she went to Democratic state headquarters to meet with party activists. When asked about the war there, she said: “There are no do-overs in life." According to the Associated Press, she said Congress received bad information going into the vote and that she would have voted differently given what she knows now.

It is possible Hillary did not mean to duck the Iraq question from the Gulf War vet. Perhaps she was a little rattled when the vet, who identified himself as John Barry, ended his question to her by saying, “I think you look very nice.”

Earlier in her town meeting, Hillary had said with a smile, “I suppose there will be more stories about my clothes and hair than some other people running for president.” The crowd laughed.

Except for that one moment regarding Iraq, Hillary gave a virtually flawless performance from the moment she walked into the overflowing gym with her Secret Service detail discreetly sitting in the crowd, not standing in front of the low stage.

DOJ_NMG_0123392

(Hillary gets Secret Service protection by virtue of her being a former First Lady, not because she is a presidential candidate. While security can keep you at a distance from voters, it also makes a campaign look big time - - something Hillary's campaign would probably look like anyway.)

The crowd of about 1,400 had waited outside the gym in weather 9 degrees below freezing, a balmy day for Iowa in January in other words. One man held a sign that said, "Bill Clinton: First Lady's Man," which was either negative or just literal.

Hillary told the crowd, "I want a one-on-one conversation - - you me and several hundred national press." Both Hillary and the crowd laughed. "But I have to tell you, that will fade," she said.

Probably not.

By virtue of the polls and her background, Hillary is the front runner. Although she is only just days in to her second term in the Senate, she is the candidate of experience among the top tier of Democratic candidates, which is made up of Clinton, Barack Obama and John Edwards.

Being in the Senate is hardly a guarantee of getting to the White House, however. Only two senators in history - - Warren G. Harding and John F. Kennedy - - went directly from the Senate to the presidency. (And both died in office.)

Voters seem to prefer governors. Just in the last few decades, we have had former governors Ronald Reagan, Bill Clinton and George W. Bush elected to the presidency, all of whom served two terms.

There are at least three reasons for this: First, governors have executive experience and know how to get things done and that is appealing to voters. Second, unlike Senators, governors do not have hundreds of votes they have to defend against attack at campaign time. Third, governors can exploit anti-Washington feeling to their advantage.

But that was before 9/11. Doesn't 9/11 make American voters want a candidate with national security experience like some senators have?

I asked Tom Vilsack, the former two-term governor of Iowa, who is running for president, that precise question.

"Questions like that makes me want to reach across this table and strangle you," Vilsack said. (Rarely, if ever, do presidential candidates follow up on their death threats.) "It is not about what experience you have, but how you make decisions. I don't think 9/11 changes the dynamic."

When Mike Huckabee, former Republican governor of Arkansas, was asked recently at a lunch with reporters what he brings to a presidential campaigns, he said, "I think four things are necessary for a successful campaign: Message, understanding of Media, Motivated volunteers, and Money." Experience, which doesn't start with an M, did not make his list.

When he was asked about this, he said, "I believe it's going to be more about leadership. I don't think a Washington address and being in Congress will be an asset."

He hopes.

Hillary, on the other, hand, told the crowd Saturday, "I believe I have a lifetime of experiences that qualify me to take office in January, 2009."

"Go, girl!" a woman shouted from the crowd.

"Go with me!" Hillary replied.

Clinton's Presidential Posturing (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

When Lt. Gen. David Petraeus went before the Senate Armed Services Committee last week in open session, its members understandably had many questions for the new commander of American forces in Iraq.

They knew of his reputation as a battlefield leader, trainer of Iraqi troops and co-author of the Army manual on counterinsurgency warfare. They also recognized the difficulty and importance of his new assignment.

Many of the questions probed the rationale for the president's new strategy of injecting more U.S. troops into Baghdad neighborhoods racked by killings by rival Sunni and Shiite gangs. Others challenged the readiness of Iraqi forces and the Baghdad government to do their part in reducing sectarian violence.

DOJ_NMG_0123393

A few of the questions were naive, self-serving or tangents. But virtually all members of the committee were present, and senators of both parties recognized the value of probing this experienced and candid witness.

With one exception. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York used her time to make a speech about Iraq policy and did not ask a single question of the man who will be leading the military campaign.

Her speech replayed some of the themes from her news conference the previous week, on her return from Iraq, when she made clear her disagreement with President Bush's decision to add 21,500 soldiers and Marines to Petraeus's force.

She began by blaming the Iraq crisis on a "Congress [that] was supine under the Republican majority, failing to conduct oversight and demanding accountability, and because the president and his team, particularly the former secretary of defense, refused to adapt to the changing circumstances on the ground."

From that partisan opening, Clinton went on to decry "the failures of the Iraqis to step up and take responsibility for their own future." She said that the escalation Bush ordered was too little and too late and instead called on Congress to "threaten to cut money for the Iraqi troops and for the security for the Iraqi leadership," as a way to break the political gridlock in Baghdad and force efforts at national reconciliation.

She wound up the speech by saying that despite her disagreement with the policy, she wanted Petraeus's assurance that "we have every possible piece of equipment and resource necessary to protect these young men and women" going into battle.

"I'll do that, Senator," Petraeus said, and after that four-word response, Clinton was finished. She had no questions to ask.

Judging by all the polls, Clinton is the leading candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination. Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a leading candidate for the Republican nomination, is also a member of the Armed Services Committee.

McCain asked Petraeus 14 questions, ranging from the political situation in Iraq to the morale of the troops to the timeline for the planned "surge." He ran out of time before he ran out of questions -- quite a contrast to Clinton.

Clinton aides said that the senator thought it was important to rebut the comments from several other committee members suggesting that congressional resolutions opposing the president's policy would "undercut the troops," so she used her time for that purpose. But I can think of three other possible explanations for her remarkable reluctance to probe the general's thinking.

First, she has been treading a careful line from her early support of military action against Saddam Hussein to an increasingly sharp criticism of the war and calls for troop reductions. Perhaps she feared that dialogue with Petraeus would lead her into dangerous, uncharted waters. Caution is commendable, but she is sometimes faulted for being too calculating.

Second, the hearing came only three days after she announced her presidential exploratory committee, and she may have decided it was a good opportunity to repeat her views on Iraq policy before TV cameras rather than share time with the general. That wouldn't say much about her priorities as she begins a second six-year term as senator, but New York voters presumably knew in November that she might have loftier goals than just minding her Senate duties.

The third, less benign possibility is that Clinton is reverting to the mode of her ill-fated 1993-94 health-care initiative, when she gave members of Congress and other interested folks the impression that she thought she had all the answers -- so please just do as I say. In that period, she and her deputy, Ira Magaziner, two of the smartest policy wonks in captivity, were also supremely self-confident -- and in some eyes, arrogant. And it cost them support, even among potential allies.

This month Clinton began her presidential campaign, as she did her first race for the Senate in New York, by saying that she wanted to do a lot of listening. She sure wasn't listening to Gen. Petraeus. She wasn't even asking.

Hillary Clinton's Mission Unaccomplished (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

HILLARY CLINTON has an answer to those who suspect that her "I'm in to win" Webcast last weekend was forced by Barack Obama's Webcast of just four days earlier. "I wanted to do it before the president's State of the Union," she explained to Brian Williams on NBC, "because I wanted to draw the contrast between what we've seen over the last six years, and the kind of leadership and experience that I would bring to the office."

DOJ_NMG_0123394

She couldn't have set the bar any lower. President Bush's speech was less compelling than the Monty Python sketch playing out behind it: the unacknowledged race between Nancy Pelosi and Dick Cheney to be the first to stand up for each bipartisan ovation. (Winner: Pelosi.)

As we've been much reminded, the most recent presidents to face Congress in such low estate were Harry Truman in 1952 and Richard Nixon in 1974, both in the last ebbs of their administrations, both mired in unpopular wars that their successors would soon end, and both eager to change the subject just as Mr. Bush did. In his '52 State of the Union address, Truman vowed "to bring the cost of modern medical care within the reach of all the people" while Nixon, 22 years later, promised "a new system that makes high-quality health care available to every American." Not to be outdone, Mr. Bush offered a dead-on-arrival proposal that "all our citizens have affordable and available health care." The empty promise of a free intravenous lunch, it seems, is the last refuge of desperate war presidents.

Few Americans know more than Senator Clinton about health care, as it happens, and if 27 Americans hadn't been killed in Iraq last weekend, voters might be in the mood to listen to her about it. But polls continue to show Iraq dwarfing every other issue as the nation's No. 1 concern. The Democrats' pre-eminent presidential candidate can't escape the war any more than the president can. And so she was blindsided Tuesday night, just as Mr. Bush was, by an unexpected gate crasher, the rookie senator from Virginia, Jim Webb. Though he's not a candidate for national office, Mr. Webb's nine-minute Democratic response not only upstaged the president but also, in an unintended political drive-by shooting, gave Mrs. Clinton a more pointed State of the Union "contrast" than she had bargained for.

To the political consultants favored by both Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Bush, Mr. Webb is an amateur. More than a few Washington insiders initially wrote him off in last year's race to unseat a star presidential prospect, the incumbent Senator George Allen. Mr. Webb is standoffish. He doesn't care whom he offends, including in his own base. He gives the impression — as he did Tuesday night — that he just might punch out his opponent. When he had his famously testy exchange with Mr. Bush over the war at a White House reception after his victory, Beltway pooh-bahs labeled him a boor, much as they had that other interloper who refused to censor himself before the president last year, Stephen Colbert.

But this country is at a grave crossroads. It craves leadership. When Mr. Webb spoke on Tuesday, he stepped into that vacuum and, for a few minutes anyway, filled it. It's not merely his military credentials as a Vietnam veteran and a former Navy secretary for Ronald Reagan that gave him authority, or the fact that his son, also a marine, is serving in Iraq. It was the simplicity and honesty of Mr. Webb's message. Like Senator Obama, he was a talented professional writer before entering politics, so he could discard whatever risk-averse speech his party handed him and write his own. His exquisitely calibrated threat of Democratic pushback should Mr. Bush fail to change course on the war — "If he does not, we will be showing him the way" — continued to charge the air even as Mrs. Clinton made the post-speech rounds on the networks.

Mrs. Clinton cannot rewrite her own history on Iraq to match Mr. Obama's early opposition to the war, or Mr. Webb's. She was not prescient enough to see, as Mr. Webb wrote in The Washington Post back in September 2002, that "unilateral wars designed to bring about regime change and a long-term occupation should be undertaken only when a nation's existence is clearly at stake." But she's hardly alone in this failing, and the point now is not that she mimic John Edwards with a prostrate apology for her vote to authorize the war. ("You don't get do-overs in life or in politics," she has said.) What matters to the country is what happens next. What matters is the leadership that will take us out of the fiasco.

Mr. Webb made his own proposals for ending the war, some of them anticipating those of the Iraq Study Group, while running against a popular incumbent in a reddish state. Mrs. Clinton, running for re-election in a safe seat in blue New York, settled for ratcheting up her old complaints about the war's execution and for endorsing other senators' calls for vaguely defined "phased redeployments." Even now, after the Nov. 7 results confirmed that two-thirds of voters nationwide want out, she struggles to parse formulations about Iraq.

This is how she explains her vote to authorize the war: "I would never have expected any president, if we knew then what we know now, to come to ask for a vote. There would not have been a vote, and I certainly would not have voted for it." John Kerry could not have said it worse himself. No wonder last weekend's "Saturday Night Live" gave us a "Hillary" who said, "Knowing what we know now, that you could vote against the war and still be elected president, I would never have pretended to support it."

DOJ_NMG_0123395

Compounding this problem for Mrs. Clinton is that the theatrics of her fledgling campaign are already echoing the content: they are so overscripted and focus-group bland that they underline rather than combat the perennial criticism that she is a cautious triangulator too willing to trim convictions for political gain. Last week she conducted three online Web chats that she billed as opportunities for voters to see her "in an unfiltered way." Surely she was kidding. Everything was filtered, from the phony living-room set to the appearance of a "campaign blogger" who wasn't blogging to the softball questions and canned responses. Even the rare query touching on a nominally controversial topic, gay civil rights, avoided any mention of the word marriage, let alone Bill Clinton's enactment of the federal Defense of Marriage Act.

When a 14-year-old boy from Armonk, N.Y., asked Mrs. Clinton what made her "so inspirational," it was a telltale flashback to those well-rehearsed "town-hall meetings" Mr. Bush billed as unfiltered exchanges with voters during the 2004 campaign. One of those "Ask President Bush" sessions yielded the memorable question, "Mr. President, as a child, how can I help you get votes?"

After six years of "Ask President Bush," "Mission Accomplished" and stage sets plastered with "Plan for Victory," Americans hunger for a presidency with some authenticity. Patently synthetic play-acting and carefully manicured sound bites like Mrs. Clinton's look out of touch. (Mr. Obama's bare-bones Webcast and Web site shrewdly play Google to Mrs. Clinton's AOL.) Besides, the belief that an image can be tightly controlled in the viral media era is pure fantasy. Just ask the former Virginia senator, Mr. Allen, whose past prowess as a disciplined, image-conscious politician proved worthless once the Webb campaign posted on YouTube a grainy but authentic video capturing him in an embarrassing off-script public moment.

The image that Mrs. Clinton wants to sell is summed up by her frequent invocation of the word middle, as in "I grew up in a middle-class family in the middle of America." She's not left or right, you see, but exactly in the center where everyone feels safe. But as the fierce war critic Chuck Hagel, the Republican senator from Nebraska, argues in a must-read interview at gq.com, the war is "starting to redefine the political landscape" and scramble the old party labels. Like Mrs. Clinton, the middle-American Mr. Hagel voted to authorize the Iraq war, but that has not impeded his leadership in questioning it ever since.

The issue raised by the tragedy of Iraq is not who's on the left or the right, but who is in front and who is behind. Mrs. Clinton has always been a follower of public opinion on the war, not a leader. Now events are outrunning her. Support for the war both in the polls and among Republicans in Congress is plummeting faster than she can recalibrate her rhetoric; unreliable Iraqi troops are already proving no-shows in the new Iraqi-American "joint patrols" of Baghdad; the Congressional showdown over fresh appropriations for Iraq is just weeks away.

This, in other words, is a moment of crisis in our history and there will be no do-overs. Should Mrs. Clinton actually seek unfiltered exposure to voters, she will learn that they are anxiously waiting to see just who in Washington is brave enough to act.

You've Come A Long Way, Maybe (WP)

By Linda Hirshman

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

Hillary Rodham Clinton sure got it right when she announced her candidacy for president while sitting on her living room couch. Her success may very well turn on the decisions of millions of women sitting on their living room couches.

Clinton advisers James Carville and Mark Penn have said they're counting on a women's vote (the "X factor") to catapult their client into the White House. They're obviously hoping that a female candidate will get much more support from women and are banking on the "gender gap," the idea, trumpeted by the media and women's organizations, that women believe in liberal policies and will therefore, as rational political actors, support the Democratic Party.

But I have news for Messrs. Carville and Penn: All the gender gap talk notwithstanding, there's no guarantee that Clinton would receive enough votes from women to be elected. I've studied women and women's politics for 20 years, and if there's one thing I know, it's that, except for possibly once in 1996, female voters have not by themselves put anyone in the White House.

If Clinton is going to attract the women she needs, she's probably going to have to do something more than simply have a pair of X chromosomes herself. And much as it pains a feminist like me to say it, a lot of her campaign will have to involve putting her on the couch and analyzing her character and motivation. Again.

In every election, there's a chance that women will be the decisive force that will elect someone who embraces their views. Yet they seem never to have done so, and I've never seen a satisfactory answer as to why. My own theory is that women don't decide elections because they're not rational political actors -- they don't make firm policy commitments and back the candidates who will move society in the direction they want it to go. Instead, they vote on impulse, and on elusive factors such as personality.

DOJ_NMG_0123396

With Clinton's candidacy on the horizon, I decided to test my theory by asking a few white, married women -- the key demographic -- what they are up to this time.

If any women were going to be politically aware, I figured, it would be those in the Washington area. So I contacted half a dozen members of the Wednesday Morning Group, a D.C. area organization that provides speakers and programs mostly for stay-at-home moms. (One even told me I had caught her sitting on her living room couch.)

All the women voted in the midterm elections last year and intend to vote in 2008. But how do they decide which lever to pull? My small sampling is admittedly unscientific, but what they told me reveals a lot about why campaigning to women is so tricky.

A 49-year-old former public relations executive in suburban Maryland told me she votes the political agenda she learned from her lefty father. She reads The Washington Post, but there are no books on her bedside table. She counts on her husband to tell her what's in the Nation magazine and on the Web.

A 36-year-old former financial sales executive considers herself an independent, reads only the Style and Weekend sections of The Post and the Marketplace and Personal Journal sections of the Wall Street Journal, and also counts on her husband, a Republican, to tell her what's interesting in the rest of the paper.

A former human rights activist told me that she still reads the New York Times, skims the Economist, and gathers political information from PBS's "News Hour," a local broadcast from the BBC and from her church.

Neither the former teacher nor the retired television reporter read any newspapers at all.

There are some constants. Most of the women read People and Real Simple magazines. They all listen to news on the car radio, mostly National Public Radio. And almost all their full-time working husbands consume immeasurably more political information than they do ("He reads 10 times what I do," one told me), reading news magazines and political Web sites and bringing home political information from their jobs. The women gather little information from their almost exclusively female society of other stay-at-home moms.

They all said that after Clinton announced, they were "really excited." "She's been in politics a long time," a woman coincidentally named Hillary said. "She's tough as nails," added another gleefully. Jennifer, meanwhile, was won by Clinton's "combination of soft edges, as a mother and a nurturer and a strong person."

No one focused on any political agenda, policy or program. What seemed to matter to them all was character. Jennifer contrasted herself with her husband, who, while a Democrat, was not so sure he would support Clinton. "He doesn't look at character or personality," she said. "He's very much of an issue/policy person. I look at the whole picture."

Explaining why she did not vote for George W. Bush in 2000 even though she expressed concern over taxes, Hillary said: "I just could not get past the fact that I didn't like the man."

As inattentive as they were to Clinton's policy record, they were knowledgeable about her biography. They saw her as "smart" and determined not to be just another first lady. They were sorry that she had failed in her first foray into national policymaking with her health-care proposal. They understood her withdrawal into the East Wing and party-throwing as a necessary concession to her husband's career needs.

But they were clearly defensive about her decision to stay the course after the Monica Lewinsky scandal. "She set herself up in her life," one explained, "to get wherever she wanted to go. That's what men do all the time. . . . When a woman does it, what's wrong with that?"

I had such mixed feelings listening to these women describe their political selves. They're clearly idealistic, want to be good citizens, make an effort to get the information they need. It was hard not to like them. Their delight in seeing a woman so close to real power was palpable. Yet I couldn't escape the fact that they took in little of politics, especially compared with their husbands, that their decision-making seemed impulsive and that their response to Clinton's candidacy was driven to an amazing extent by personality.

DOJ_NMG_0123397

They unwittingly confirmed my theory about why women don't decide elections. But that theory is supported by a wealth of statistical information, too.

Women have voted more Democratic than men recently, but since the ratification of the 19th Amendment in 1920, only once has the women's vote arguably been different enough from the men's vote to determine the outcome of a presidential election. In 1980, 1984 and 1988, more women, like men, favored the winning Republican candidate over the losing Democrat. Geraldine Ferraro's presence on the Democratic ticket in 1984 apparently made little difference. In 1992, more women, like men, favored the winning Democrat over the losing Republican. The men's vote was so divided in 1996 that exit polls show Clinton one percentage point behind among men (a statistical tie), while winning the female vote. In 2004, more women, unlike men, favored the losing Democrat, but by such a small majority (51 percent) that they had no effect on the outcome of the male-driven election. Since the '96 elections was so close among men, it's fair to say that only in 2000 did women clearly part company with men, voting for Democrat Al Gore in large enough numbers to offset the male votes for Bush -- but the female majorities were not distributed among enough states to carry the electoral college.

Any campaign that needs women to win would have to break the 88-year record of women failing to produce election results that men oppose.

To this day -- as even my D.C. area correspondents seemed to confirm -- women just aren't as interested in politics as men are. The Center for Civic Education recently reported that American women are less likely than men to discuss politics, contribute to campaigns, contact public officials or join a political organization. About 42 percent of men told University of Michigan researchers last year that "they are 'very interested' in government and public affairs, compared with 34 percent of women."

Worse, women consistently score 10 to 20 percentage points lower than men on studies of political knowledge, regardless of their education or income level. Studies dating to 1997 have shown that fewer women than men can name their senator, or know one First Amendment right. They even know less about the Supreme Court's decision in Roe v. Wade than men do.

As a 2006 study by the Pew Research Center for the People and the Press put it, American adults live in "A World of His and Hers." Two million more men than women read either Time or Newsweek; more men listen to radio news and talk radio, read the paper and get news online. Only broadcast television news plays to more women than men, and a lot of that is TV news magazines and morning shows. Not only do fewer women read the newspaper, but almost half the women surveyed said they "sometimes do not follow international news because of excessive coverage of wars and violence."

So-called liberal women are the majority of swing voters -- those tantalizing independent late deciders -- in every election. While men remained committed to Republicans Ronald Reagan, George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush throughout the campaigns, women polled heavily for Democrats Walter F. Mondale, Michael S. Dukakis and John F. Kerry as late as September before settling in to vote Republican or anemically Democratic in November.

So what does all this mean for Hillary Clinton, or any woman who would be president?

First, when it comes to women who vote, the political is the personal. The Wednesday Morning women spoke passionately about Clinton's public and private travails but seemed oddly indifferent to her position on the Iraq war. If the polls continue to reflect male aversion to her beyond the baseline male Republican tilt, Clinton may have to go personal to bring the women home. Maybe she could get a couch on casters.

Unlike the married suburban women she must attract in large numbers, Clinton didn't stay home from work. Remember the "baking cookies" remark? On the other hand, she has had the soap opera story of the century with that charismatic, faithless husband. This has made her suffer, something one of the Wednesday women specifically singled out as a reason to support a candidate. Will she be willing to open that old wound to convince potential female supporters that her policies, such as universal child health care, arise out of her concern for women like them, rather than being just the usual liberal agenda? Worse, if she does play the wronged wife again, does she risk alienating the women who think she should have left her husband long ago?

The second lesson is that elections that turn on the female electorate bear an unfortunate resemblance to a popularity contest. The Republicans have succeeded with women at the polls when they've made Democrats look not just mistaken, but clownish or geeky. Reagan in blue jeans beat Jimmy Carter in a cardigan. George H.W. Bush looked like John Wayne next to

DOJ_NMG_0123398

Dukakis peering over the edge of a tank in a helmet. And who knows what would have happened if Kerry hadn't donned a wetsuit to go wind-surfing? Even the devil wears Prada. And women know it.

If Clinton is going to stand a chance in 2008, her campaign may have to discredit the Republican nominee. As political scientist Dianne Bystrom has found, it doesn't hurt female candidates when they go negative, and if women are going to make their political decisions based on impulse, then anyone needing their votes is going to have to make sure no one wants to sit with the other guy in the cafeteria. It was illuminating how often the Wednesday women spoke of Clinton's toughness.

A suffering wife and mother whose campaign mysteriously unleashes attacks on her opponents? It's not the current game plan, no doubt. But I'm drawing on the lessons of history. I'd rather promote cheery stories of the gender gap -- but those stories are just a diversion from the hard work of bringing women into the world of governance. Mark my words: Those who do not study women's history are doomed to repeat its failures.

Linda Hirshman, author of "Get to Work: A Manifesto for Women of the World" (Viking), is a retired professor of women's studies.

Giuliani Is Sounding More Like A Candidate (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-Peña

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

MANCHESTER, N. H., Jan. 27 — Rudolph W. Giuliani sounded nearer than ever to being a presidential candidate on Saturday, repeatedly talking about the prospect of running, and inviting voters to judge him by his record as mayor of New York City.

Though he has long been thought to be a presidential contender, he has fallen behind other candidates in declaring his intention, and the language he used on Saturday, while suggesting a run, also contained built-in escape hatches. Speaking to a convention of the New Hampshire Republican Party, he advised the delegates on “what you should look for in whatever decision you make in presidential primaries,” and added, “when I promise you things, if I do, when I do, as I do, I’ll promise them because I’ve done them before.”

He returned to that theme moments later, and as he has done in recent days, drew a direct analogy between fighting crime in his home city and establishing peace in Iraq.

“When I say to you that we should reduce taxes to stimulate the economy, I’ll say it to you because I did it and I saw it work,” he said. “When I say we have to bring peace and security as sort of the beginning of anything, whether it’s in Baghdad or in other parts of the world or here at home, I’ll say that to you because I saw that happen in New York, and I made it happen. I did it.”

In his first trip since last fall to the state that holds the earliest presidential primary, Mr. Giuliani stepped closer than he has before to suggesting that he will run.

“Government has got to work in order to allow people to have confidence in it,” he said. “And as I look at this, I believe there is something I can do about that.”

Whether or not he is serious about a campaign, he may need to send such a signal to keep his options open. He has raised money, traveled extensively and put together a more robust organization in recent weeks, but as other candidates enter the race, many Republicans — and some publications — have questioned whether he will go through with it.

On this trip, he met privately with several elected officials, including the mayor of Manchester, Frank Guinta — the kind of personal courting people here expect, and that other top contenders have done more than Mr. Giuliani has. “He’s going to have to spend a lot more with these people,” said Senator John E. Sununu.

When he speaks, Mr. Giuliani normally walks around the stage and does not refer to notes, joking and making matter-of-fact arguments. But Saturday’s speech, at the old Palace Theater, was unusually formal for him — he stayed behind the lectern and worked from notes — and also more overtly boastful and partisan, and more designed to rouse his audience.

Mr. Giuliani has taken the politically risky position of supporting President Bush’s unpopular decision to send more troops to Iraq, as have the other Republicans who rank highest in early polls, Senator John S. McCain and Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor. But for the second time in as many days, Mr. Giuliani cautioned Saturday that the strategy might not work, and that it should not be viewed as the last word in the war.

DOJ_NMG_0123399

"We hope and we root for and we pray for a successful outcome in Iraq," he said. "But our ultimate victory is not going to be a military victory. Our ultimate victory against terrorism is going to be a victory of ideas."

But he stayed away from the divisive social issues that put him at odds with much of his party, like his support of abortion rights and gay civil unions. Some delegates here said they had hoped Mr. Giuliani would explain support his past support for gun controls in New York that would be unpopular here.

Still, Republican officials here take him very seriously as a presidential contender, based primarily on his reputation for leadership in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 attacks.

"I would say his chances are excellent," said State Representative John Reagan. "Everyone knows he has been severely tested."

Giuliani Plays It Close To The Vest (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

MANCHESTER, N.H. — Will he or won't he?

The Rudy Giuliani Mystery Theater played the Palace on Saturday, a brief engagement at the city's landmark performing arts center and perennial campaign stop here in the first presidential primary state.

He gave away nothing about plans for a White House run.

Speaking from notes on a stage bathed by 12 small spotlights, the former New York mayor offered carefully qualified remarks to a convention of Republican activists. There were plenty of "ifs," as in: "People should vote for me or someone else, if I run … because they believe we can make this country better."

Outside, after his entourage bulled its way through the lobby crowd, Giuliani spoke with reporters just long enough to elude the presidential question with talk of examining his "heart and soul."

Giuliani finds himself in the happy position of sitting atop many opinion polls, even as he remains officially on the sidelines. While other candidates leap into the White House fray — former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee is expected to join the Republican contest Monday — Giuliani remains coy.

Asked his timetable for a decision, he said Saturday that there was none. "The timetable is: when's the right time?" he said.

So far, the most noteworthy aspect of Giuliani's exploratory efforts has been the surfacing of an internal strategy document — the Giuliani camp says it was pilfered — which gave the world a look at 140 pages of campaign analysis, including the ex-mayor's perceived pitfalls. (Among them, his messy divorce and ties to disgraced former New York City Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik.) But for the last two days in New Hampshire, at least, Giuliani displayed all the trappings of a bona fide presidential contender — including some he could have done without.

On Friday, he drew several hundred people to a Chamber of Commerce dinner in Littleton, in the White Mountains. On Saturday, he received a standing ovation and repeated applause from several hundred more at the New Hampshire Republican State Committee meeting in Manchester, delivering a speech that was long on platitudes and short on specifics:

"You've got a beautiful state. A beautiful state in the winter. A beautiful state in the summer."

He put some distance between himself and President Bush — "I don't agree with him on everything," Giuliani said — and also subtly differed with his proclaimed hero, President Reagan, on the proper role of government. Where Reagan once declared government part of the problem, Giuliani took a more measured view, suggesting, "We need to make government work again, as Republicans. Because we're the more practical party."

New Hampshire may be uniquely suited to the promise and perils of a Giuliani presidential run.

His profile — permissive for a Republican on social issues, conservative on fiscal matters — is well tailored to a state where Republicans tend to be moderate and independents can vote in the GOP primary. "Anybody who's been to New York in the last few years can't help but be impressed," said Charles Arlinghaus, a longtime Republican activist and head of a free-market think tank in Concord.

But Giuliani's famously prickly style could be a problem. New Hampshire voters expect a highly personal touch, not the kind of imperious display the Giuliani camp put on Saturday. As the ex-mayor was being swept into an SUV outside the Palace

DOJ_NMG_0123400

Theatre, a man pushed his way forward and threw an arm over Giuliani's shoulder, posing for a picture. A burly security guard lifted the man's arm off, like a piece of bad meat.

"He's only been exposed to rock star audiences up here," said Andrew Smith, the state's top political pollster. "What happens when he's asked not tough questions, but annoying questions? It will be interesting to see how Giuliani deals with them."

In N.H., Activists Embrace Giuliani (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 28, 2007

MANCHESTER, N.H. -- Judging by the effusive greeting Rudolph W. Giuliani received yesterday from Republican activists in the nation's first primary state, it seemed like the former New York City mayor was already running for president.

But he isn't -- at least not yet. The man made famous by his steely resolve and decisive leadership after the 2001 terrorist attacks on his city said yesterday he has no idea when he will decide whether to run.

"Every day you get closer, but we don't have a timetable yet. The timetable is, when's the right time and when do you have the confidence and the sense that you have the whole organization," Mr. Giuliani said, standing next to his wife, Judith Nathan.

"But most of it is about Judith and I deciding that there's a really unique contribution that we can make," he said.

The former mayor, who formed a presidential exploratory committee late last year, said that if he decides to enter the race, he will stress his leadership experience to voters to distinguish himself from his rivals.

"Leadership is about vision and performance," Mr. Giuliani told about 500 party activists in a speech about himself and his beliefs. "Who has the vision, and who can perform? Because you need both. ... You can ultimately judge whatever I promise you and whatever vision that I have by the things that I've done."

Like other Republican candidates, Mr. Giuliani -- who is pro-choice and supports homosexual rights, gun control and embryonic stem-cell research -- sought to burnish his party credentials, even poking a bit of fun at his own liberal social views, which irk many staunch conservatives.

"My great hero was Ronald Reagan. I have tremendous admiration for President Bush. I don't agree with them on everything. You know, I don't agree with myself on everything," Mr. Giuliani said with a laugh, drawing a good-natured response from the hundreds of people packed into the Palace Theatre.

Mr. Giuliani yesterday juggled a day full of events, paying homage to New Hampshire Republican activists, who can ease his ascension or hamper his ambitions, then dropping in to a Manchester restaurant to shake hands with potential voters.

But questions remain about whether the fiercely independent former mayor is serious about a national race. Some analysts say he is already far behind the curve set by Sen. John McCain of Arizona and former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, both of whom have in recent weeks snapped up top campaign veterans.

"The former mayor of New York City is quickly losing the campaign to acquire top talent," said Jordan Lieberman, publisher of Campaigns & Elections magazine.

"While Mayor Giuliani has hired former RNC Political Director Mike DuHaime, among the most gifted operatives in the country, Rudy's campaign staff lacks the essential depth and experience that McCain and Romney have acquired," he said.

But Mr. DuHaime said the rumors that Mr. Giuliani will soon drop out of the race are aimed at slowing the former mayor's momentum.

"There is an attempt to slow the campaign by saying that Mr. Giuliani is not serious," said Mr. DuHaime, speculating that the reports are coming from competing camps. "But he is very serious."

And some in the crowd yesterday said they are not troubled by Mr. Giuliani's positions.

"He's our moderate Republican," said Pamela Goodman of Exeter, N.H. "From a Christian standpoint, I wrestle with some of his policies, but I think it's a matter of looking @ who else is there. He has shown that he can get the job done, and that is the most important thing."

Giuliani Inches His Way To The White House (POL)

The Politico, January 27, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123401

BRETTON WOODS, NH, -- Appearing in New Hampshire for the first time since creating a presidential exploratory committee, former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani appeared to inch closer to a White House bid. Joined by his wife, Judith Nathan, and a phalanx of security guards and aides, Giuliani braved subzero temperatures to speak to about 500 members of a local chamber of commerce at the historic Mt. Washington hotel here.

One audience member got straight to the point after Giuliani gave an extemporaneous speech focusing on leadership and then asked for questions.

"Will we see you on the next presidential ballot?"

After waiting for the applause that the question drew to die down, Giuliani said, "That may be more up to you than me."

"I have to make a decision about my exploratory committee and running, but ultimately the more important decision is what you make a year from now."

After praising New Hampshire's first-in-the-nation primary, Hizzoner reiterated that his assessment "has something to do with the decision Judith and I make, but it has a lot more to do with the decision you make."

Warming the hearts of Giuliani's new campaign team on a night so cold that even the inside of the hotel had drafty spots, the questioner responded by telling the former mayor, to applause: "You have a lot more support than you realize."

Shaking hands, signing autographs and posing for pictures on his way out of the ballroom, Giuliani was again asked by a supporter when he was going to make an announcement.

"Not quite sure, we're getting there," he half-whispered.

But asked directly by this reporter what his timetable was for making a decision, Giuliani was vague.

"Don't have one. Timeline is when you've considered everything you've had to consider."

In a speech that lasted about 20 minutes, Giuliani focused on the namesake of his book and the attribute that many in the room associated with him in interviews after the program. Holding up as examples the top two presidents in the Republican pantheon, Lincoln and Reagan, Giuliani explained their leadership qualities.

"I don't imagine that they had those favorable/unfavorable things back during the Civil War," but Lincoln would not have fared well, Giuliani said.

Seeming to draw present-day comparisons, Giuliani noted that Lincoln even faced riots in New York City because people were unhappy with the war. "They wanted to quit because it was getting too tough."

There were extensive casualties, the conflict dragged on and Lincoln had to fire many of his generals, Giuliani reminded the salad-eating crowd.

Yet there came no comparison to President Bush and the war in Iraq. Instead, Giuliani lavished praised on the 40th president, recalling his days working in the Reagan Justice Department.

"He knew where he was taking the country," Giuliani said of Reagan, and did so based on principle.

"We have too many people in politics who take decisions based on polls. They tell you what they want to hear. It does not make them leaders, it makes them actors."

Giuliani also discussed his battle against prostate cancer and his response to 9/11, but Reagan kept seeming to come back up. Asked by an audience member about how he would deal with the federal budget, Giuliani said Washington needed to embrace the sort of "budget discipline" not seen since "back in the Reagan years." Answering a question about how he foresees the administration getting along with the new Democratic Congress, Hizzoner noted that he's "an optimist – I learned that from Ronald Reagan also." Then there was the easiest query of them all: What was his favorite story about the Gipper? (the most "moving" one, Giuliani replied, was his recollection of having breakfast with Reagan the day he was shot).

If Reagan's name was mentioned by the dozens, it was difficult to recall more than one passing mention of the current Republican occupant of the White House. Indeed, Gov. Jeb Bush came in for more praise than his brother as Giuliani spoke of the Floridian's emergency preparedness efforts and adroit handling of the many hurricanes that struck the state.

Until the end, though, the speech was almost entirely bereft of any mention of Giuliani's presidential ambitions. Thanking his hosts, the New Yorker said he'd be back to the resort for golf and his wife skiing.

"Maybe we'll come back and do some politics, too," he added to applause

Many of the mostly-Republican attendees liked what they heard and said they'd likely support Giuliani in a White House bid.

DOJ_NMG_0123402

"I would vote for him any day of the week," said Jean Mercier, the wife of a local fire chief. Mercier, who grew teary-eyed as Giuliani inscribed a 9/11 memorial book before the speech, said Giuliani's response to the terrorist attacks still "resonates with anybody who has been to Ground Zero" or has a connection to "first responders."

Schulyer Sweet, a transplant to the region from upstate New York seemed to pick up Giuliani's message. "I liked his analogies to President Reagan."

Ronay Bovarnick, the lady who asked Giuliani when he would launch a campaign as he worked the room, was even more helpful, despite her husband's efforts to keep her from saying anything impolitic.

Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, she explained, "doesn't have convictions" while Arizona Sen. John McCain "waffles back and forth."

But Giuliani is just right, she said. "We need somebody strong."

If the response was glowing, the stagecraft was even better.

Giuliani arrived at the century-old hotel, best known for holding the 1944 international conference that would create the first world monetary system, to a group of girl scouts selling their cookies. The former mayor quickly offered up $80 for 20 boxes (they usually go for $3.50 each). Mostly evading the media scrum on the way out, Giuliani and his wife ran into a couple who happened to be up for a ski weekend with their adorable 3 ½ year-old and 14-month-old. More pictures taken, it was then it was back out into -11-degree air that probably didn't feel as harsh to Giuliani as it did on the way in.

Building A Serious Staff (WP)

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

Former New York mayor Rudy Giuliani (R) is on a hiring tear of late, putting to rest speculation that he isn't serious about running for president in 2008. His latest signing is Bill Stepien, who will be his national field director. Stepien, like many of the operatives in the senior staffs of Giuliani, Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney (R), has his political roots in the Bush campaigns; he served as a New Hampshire field director in the president's reelection bid. Last cycle he directed the 72-Hour Project, the Republican National Committee's much-ballyhooed turnout apparatus.

In Law School, Obama Found Political Voice (NYT)

By Jodi Kantor

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Jan. 23 — The peers who elected Barack Obama as the first black president of the Harvard Law Review say he was a natural leader, an impressive student, a nice guy. But in the 1990 Revue — the graduating editors' gleeful parody of their elite publication — they said quite a bit more.

"I was born in Oslo, Norway, the son of a Volvo factory worker and part-time ice fisherman," a mock self-tribute begins. "My mother was a backup singer for Abba. They were good folks." In Chicago, "I discovered I was black, and I have remained so ever since."

After his election, the Faux-bama says, he united warring students into "a happy, cohesive folk," while "empowering all the folks out there in America who didn't know about me by giving a series of articulate and startlingly mature interviews to all the folks in the media."

In his two memoirs and the biographical video on his Web site, Senator Obama's legal education is barely a blip, one of the least known chapters of his life. But for the Illinois Democrat who is all but certainly running for the presidency, Harvard was the place where he first became a political sensation.

He arrived there as an unknown, Afro-wearing community organizer who had spent years searching for his identity; by the time he left, he had his first national news media exposure, a book contract and a shot of confidence from running the most powerful legal journal in the country.

As the ribbing in the Revue suggests, Mr. Obama was realizing the power of his own biography. He proved deft at navigating an institution scorched with ideological battles, many of which revolved around race. He developed a leadership style based more on furthering consensus than on imposing his own ideas. Surrounded by students who enjoyed the sound of their own voices, Mr. Obama cast himself as an eager listener, sometimes giving warring classmates the impression that he agreed with all of them at once.

DOJ_NMG_0123403

Friends say he did not want anyone to assume they knew his mind — and because of that, even those close to him did not always know exactly where he stood. It is a tendency that could prove perilous on the campaign trail, as voters, rivals and the news media try to fix the positions of a senator with only two years in office.

"He then and now is very hard to pin down," said Kenneth Mack, a classmate and now a professor at the law school, referring to the senator's on-the-one-hand, on-the-other-hand style.

Charles J. Ogletree Jr., another Harvard law professor and a mentor of Mr. Obama, said, "He can enter your space and organize your thoughts without necessarily revealing his own concerns and conflicts."

Many of his former professors and classmates say they are cheering on Mr. Obama, 45, in his candidacy. But the skills he displayed in law school may not serve him as well in American presidential politics, which sometimes rewards other qualities — like delivering sound bites instead of deliberateness or fidelity to a base of supporters instead of compromise.

The law review is "fairly disconnected from the breadth and the rough and tumble of real politics," said Bruce Spiva, a former review editor who now practices civil rights law in Washington. "It's an election among a closed group. It's more like electing a pope."

Mr. Obama declined to comment about his time at Harvard. He arrived at the law school in 1988 with a well-inked passport — he had grown up in Hawaii and Indonesia, son of a black Kenyan father and a white American mother — and years of community organizing experience in Chicago, making him, at 27, an elder statesman among the students who had tested and term-papered their way straight there.

Mr. Obama spent much of his time alone, curtailing his dating life after his first summer, when he met his future wife, a Harvard Law graduate named Michelle Robinson who was working in Chicago. He often played pickup basketball, replacing his deliberative off-court style with sharp elbows and aggressive grabs for the ball.

Along with 40-odd classmates, he won a precious spot on the law review at the end of his first year through grades and a writing competition. But the next year, when other students implored him to run for the presidency, he demurred; he wanted to return to community work in Chicago, he said, and the credential would be no help. Late in the process, he finally agreed, saying he might be uniquely able to heal the review's partisan divisions.

The election was an all-day affair with the ego-crushing drama of a reality TV show. Inside Pound Hall, the editors picked apart the intellectual and social skills of the 19 contenders, eliminating them in batches. At the last moment, the conservative faction, its initial candidates defeated, threw its support to Mr. Obama. "Whatever his politics, we felt he would give us a fair shake," said Bradford Berenson, a former associate White House counsel in the Bush administration.

The two finalists were invited back into the room. But before the winner could be announced, Mr. Mack, a black student who had rejoined the editors after being eliminated, lunged toward Mr. Obama, so moved by the barrier that had just fallen that he embraced him tightly, tears streaming down both men's cheeks.

Newspapers and magazines swarmed around the first black student to win the most coveted spot at the most vaunted club at one of America's most prestigious institutions. In interviews, Mr. Obama was modest and careful. (In a rare slip, he told The Associated Press: "I'm not interested in the suburbs. The suburbs bore me.") He signed a contract to write a memoir. A prankster posted a cast list for a movie version of his life, starring Blair Underwood. When Mr. Underwood visited the school, he questioned Mr. Obama for material for "L.A. Law."

"People were always asking me, do young black attorneys really exist like that?" Mr. Underwood said in a recent interview. "I would refer to Barack."

Winning the job was simpler than doing it. The president had to reject articles by some of the school's famous professors and persuade a divided group of editors to stop arguing and start editing.

"I have worked in the Supreme Court and the White House and I never saw politics as bitter as at Harvard Law Review in the early '90s," Mr. Berenson said. "The law school was populated by a bunch of would-be Daniel Websters harnessed to extreme political ideologies." They were so ardent that they would boo and hiss one another in class.

DOJ_NMG_0123404

Even trickier, Mr. Obama was the most prominent minority student on a campus shaken by racial politics. A group agitating for greater faculty diversity occupied the dean's office and sued the school for discrimination; Derrick Bell, a black law professor, resigned over the issue.

The law review struggled to decide whether affirmative action should factor into the selection of editors, and how much voice to give to critical race theorists, who argued that the legal system was inherently biased against minorities. That drew the ridicule of conservative students.

And it left the new president with a difficult choice. If he failed to use his office to criticize Harvard, Mr. Obama would anger black and liberal students; by speaking out, he would risk dragging himself and the review into the center of shrill debates.

People had a way of hearing what they wanted in Mr. Obama's words. Earlier, after a long, tortured discussion about whether it was better to be called "black" or "African-American," Mr. Obama dismissed the question, saying semantics did not matter as much as real-life issues, recalled Cassandra Butts, still a close friend. According to Mr. Ogletree, students on each side of the debate thought he was endorsing their side. "Everyone was nodding, Oh, he agrees with me," he said.

As the president of the review, Mr. Obama once again walked a delicate line. He served on the board of the Black Law Students Association, often speaking passionately about the tempest of the week, but in a way that white classmates say made them feel reassured rather than defensive. He distanced himself from bombast; he did a mischievous impersonation of the Rev. Jesse Jackson when he came to speak on campus, recalled Franklin Amanat, now a federal prosecutor in Brooklyn. Mr. Obama's boldest moment came at a rally for faculty diversity, where he compared Professor Bell to Rosa Parks.

But mainly, Mr. Obama stayed away from the extremes of campus debate, often choosing safe topics for his speeches. At the black law students' annual conference, he exhorted students to remember the obligations that came with their privileged education. His speeches, delivered in the oratorical manner of a Baptist minister, were more memorable for style than substance, Mr. Mack said.

"It's the inspiration of the speech rather than the specific content," he said.

Just as he does now that he is a senator, Mr. Obama spoke then about his own biography — initially, Mr. Ogletree said, to correct anyone who assumed he had acquired his position with ease. His message, Mr. Ogletree said, was, "Don't look at my success and assume that I have had a silver spoon in my mouth and gold coins in my hand."

During the constant arguments about race and merit, everyone could point to Mr. Obama and find justification for their views. He had acknowledged benefiting from affirmative action in the past, so those who supported it saw him as the happy product of their beliefs.

But those who opposed it saw his presidency as the triumph of meritocracy. He was a black man who had helped one of Harvard's most celebrated professors, Laurence H. Tribe, with an article on law and physics, and would graduate magna cum laude.

Another of Mr. Obama's techniques relied on his seemingly limitless appetite for hearing the opinions of others, no matter how redundant or extreme. That could lead to endless debates — a mouse infestation at the review office provoked a long exchange about rodent rights — as well as some uncertainty about what Mr. Obama himself thought about the issue at hand.

In dozens of interviews, his friends said they could not remember his specific views from that era, beyond a general emphasis on diversity and social and economic justice.

Instead, they wonder how the style of leadership they observed on campus could translate to another kind of historic presidency.

"The things that make law school politics fractious are different from the things that make American politics fractious," said Ron Klain, who preceded Mr. Obama at the law review and later served as Vice President Al Gore's chief of staff. Mr. Klain has watched the senator's rise.

"The interesting caveat," he said, "is that is a style of leadership more effective running a law review than running a country."

At Harvard Law, A Unifying Voice (BOS)

By Michael Levenson, Jonathan Saltzman

The Boston Globe, January 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123405

CAMBRIDGE -- It was just a five-on-five game between some law students at a Harvard gym, until someone jabbed a hard foul. An argument broke out, and pretty soon players were in one another's faces.

To the players who were on the court that day, it seemed punches were about to be thrown.

Then a skinny, soft-spoken forward with tight shorts and high socks named Barack Obama raced out from the sideline and put himself between two of the warring players.

"He said, 'Guys, this is not serious -- it's just a pickup game,' " recalled one of the players, Earl Martin Phalen, Harvard Law Class of 1993. Laughing, he added: "There was all this testosterone exploding, and he just kind of had perspective. . . . We ended up chilling it out."

These days, Obama is the hot new candidate for the White House, trying to end the warring in Washington with a warm message of unity and optimism. But years before taking that message to the national political stage, he was defusing battles large and small from the sharp-elbowed basketball games to the cutthroat classrooms at Harvard Law School.

Standing apart from others Right from the start, when he arrived in the fall of 1988 at the age of 27, Obama seemed different. With his leather bomber jacket, tattered jeans, and pack of cigarettes, he was older and appeared less starchy than many of his fresh-faced classmates newly arrived from the Ivy League. He was also one of the small minority of black students on the campus of about 1,500 of the nation's most ambitious future lawyers, judges, and corporate executives.

Beyond his appearance, what set him apart was his approach to argument, the lifeblood of the law school and the constant occupation of the young lawyers-in-training. While other students were determined to prove the merits of their beliefs through logic and determination, Obama preferred to listen, seek others' views, and find a middle way.

"A lot of people at the time were just talking past each other, very committed to their opinions, their point of view, and not particularly interested in what other people had to say," said Crystal Nix Hines, a classmate who is now a television writer. "Barack transcended that."

He confronted his most charged debates as president of the Harvard Law Review, the exclusive club of 80 student editors and future Supreme Court justices who publish a regular journal of legal writings. Classmates recall an especially emotional debate in the spring of 1990 over affirmative action, which conservative students wanted to abolish.

Presiding over an assembly of 60 mostly white editors in a law school classroom, Obama listened to impassioned pleas and pressed conservatives to explain their reasoning and liberals to sharpen their thinking. But he never spoke about his own point of view or mentioned that he believed he had benefited from affirmative action.

"If anybody had walked by, they would have assumed he was a professor," said Thomas J. Perrelli, a classmate and former counsel to Attorney General Janet Reno. "He was leading the discussion but he wasn't trying to impose his own perspective on it. He was much more mediating."

Obama was so evenhanded and solicitous in his interactions that fellow students would do impressions of his Socratic chin-stroking approach to everything, even seeking a consensus on popcorn preferences at the movies. "Do you want salt on your popcorn?" one classmate, Nancy L. McCullough, recalled, mimicking his sensitive bass voice. "Do you even want popcorn?"

Obama, who declined to be interviewed for this story, lived all three years in the same basement apartment on Broadway in Somerville, near Winter Hill. He kept the place spotless and decorated it with second hand furniture.

"He was a model tenant," said John K. Holmes of Arlington, his landlord. "I can remember when he told me he was leaving, I can remember being disappointed."

He skipped most parties and made his friends in class, including one good buddy, Rob Fisher, a first-year student from Maryland, whom he met on the first day of classes. Obama called Fisher, who is white, "brother," and teased him about his raggedy clothes. They watched Bulls games . Both idolized Michael Jordan.

Even in his first year, students saw Obama as a peacemaker. When his class needed someone to present an end-of-the-year gift to one stuffy contracts professor, the students chose Obama, who delivered a brief, gracious tribute.

"It was a moment of diffused tension and levity," said Kenneth W. Mack, a Harvard Law School professor who was in Obama's class. "He pulled it off."

DOJ_NMG_0123406

At the end of his first year, Obama joined the Law Review. He nearly missed the deadline to apply when his 1984 Toyota Tercel broke down, and beg ged Fisher for a ride and sweet - talk ed his way to the front of a line at the post office to have his envelope postmarked before noon.

"That's the one modest contribution I've made to his success," Fisher, now a Washington lawyer, said in a recent interview.

Obama won a slot on the review. He was growing more serious in his personal life, too. After casually dating women at the law school, he flew back to Chicago after his first year and met Michelle Robinson, a 1988 Harvard Law graduate, whom he later married.

Law review prestige In the fall of 1989, when Obama returned to campus for his second year, students were protesting the lack of minority law school faculty. They staged sit-ins in the law library, camped outside the office of Dean Robert C. Clark, and carried signs that read "Diversity Now" and "Homogeneity Feeds Hatred." The tensions continued the following spring, reaching a high when Derrick A. Bell Jr., the first tenured black professor at the school, resigned in protest. Obama was a member of the Black Law Students Association, which organized many demonstrations that spring. But he was less confrontational than some of his peers.

"Barack was a stabilizing influence in that he would absolutely support those efforts, but was also someone who could discuss and debate them with students or faculty who had different views," said Professor Charles J. Ogletree Jr., who became Harvard's seventh tenured black professor in 1993.

In February 1990, when the time came to elect a new president of the law review, Obama was initially reluctant, said Nix Hines. The presidency seemed better suited for careerist types who were aiming for positions at top-flight law firms, Obama told her at the time. The son of a black Kenyan father and a white mother from Kansas, he wanted to return to his work in Chicago as a community organizer.

"I was surprised because I knew he was very popular and well-regarded and obviously had the ability to do the job," Nix Hines said.

But at a dinner at Obama's apartment, an older black student challenged Obama and other black students to compete for the job. "And I do remember Barack saying that was the moment he finally decided, 'I'm going to do this,' " said Mack.

The law review president's election is a fussy affair, part intellectual debate, part frat house ritual. Obama was one of 19 candidates. As the 61 editors not running for the job debated the merits of the candidates behind closed doors on a Sunday morning in late February, the hopefuls cooked them breakfast, lunch, and dinner . Every few hours, the editors winnowed the list further, until just after midnight, when only Obama and a 24-year-old Harvard graduate named David Goldberg remained contenders .

At about 12:30 a.m., the editors called Obama into the room, told him he had won, and broke into applause. Mack, another black editor, pulled Obama in for a hug.

"It was a hard hug, and it lasted a while," Obama told the Harvard Law Record, the school newspaper, at the time. "At that point, I realized this was not just an individual thing. . . but something much bigger."

Obama gained instant fame, was profiled glowingly in newspapers across the country, and landed a contract for a book that would become "Dreams from My Father," his best-selling memoir.

There was buzz on campus, too. Blair Underwood, the actor who played a black lawyer on L.A. Law, one of the campus' s favorite shows, came to visit Obama at the Law Review and took him out for a Chinese food banquet. People who had helped pave the way were also moved.

"You should not underestimate the significance of him being the first black president of the Harvard Law Review because that was and remains a very elite group," said Bell, now a law professor at New York University. "These were some tough folks . . . . It's almost as impressive that he was elected president of the Harvard Law Review as him being elected senator of Illinois."

As editor for two semesters, Obama spent 50 to 60 hours a week holed up in a second-floor office of Gannett House, a 19th century building overlooking Cambridge Common. He reviewed hundreds of articles, on topics ranging from corporate law to racial bias in auto pricing, and presided over long, heated debates in the cluttered first-floor lounge.

"Even though he was clearly a liberal, he didn't appear to the conservatives in the review to be taking sides in the tribal warfare," said Bradford A. Berenson, a former Bush administration lawyer who was an editor at the review.

DOJ_NMG_0123407

"The politics of the Harvard Law Review were incredibly petty and incredibly vicious," Berenson said. "The editors of the review were constantly at each other's throats. And Barack tended to treat those disputes with a certain air of detachment and amusement. The feeling was almost, come on kids, can't we just behave here?"

A polished leader Sometimes he sounded like he was already running for public office, giving studied, measured responses in interviews with The Harvard Law Record. Asked in 1991 if he could do one thing differently in his last year at the Review, Obama said, "I don't know that it was possible to do it any other way than I did it, but I would have liked to have had the luxury of being more strategic about my tenure."

Basketball was his outlet. He played often at Hemenway, the law school gymnasium, just off Harvard Square. Hill Harper, a classmate and frequent defender, said Obama, who stands about 6 feet 1 inch tall, had a quick first step and could easily sink midrange jump shots. "If there was any knock against Barack, he pulled his socks up a little too high and his shorts were a little too small," Harper said, laughing. "We were just at the beginning of the Michael Jordan era. He more harkened back to the Julius Erving era."

Some students got their first glimpse of Obama, the orator, in the spring of 1991, when the Black Law Students Association broke with tradition and asked him, rather than a renowned judge or professor, to deliver the keynote address at the association's annual conference. Standing before hundreds , Obama gave what classmates recall as a stirring call to action.

"It was a clarion call," recalled Randall L. Kennedy, a law school professor who attended the conference. "We've gotten this education, we've gotten this great halo, this great career-enhancing benefit. Let's not just feather our nests. Let's go forward and address the many ills that confront our society."

Now that he's traveling the country as a full-fledged presidential candidate, Obama is clearly proud of his training at Harvard, and he is remembered proudly here.

From the landlord who showed him his $700 a month apartment to the learned professors who mentored him, everyone seems to recall him as an exceptionally conscientious young man.

But in some ways, he was just a typical, forgetful grad uate student. Records from Somerville show that he still owes the city $72.63 in excise taxes and $45 in late penalties on two parking violations.

The bright, young law student parked illegally in a bus stop in 1990 and illegally in a street-sweeping zone in 1991.

"I kind of kidded with the mayor and said, "If he comes to Somerville, he might get booted,' " said Walter Pero, a city alderman.

Secrets Of Obama Family Unlocked (LONT)

By Michael Sheridan, Sarah Baxter

Times of London, January 28, 2007

WHEN Barack Obama, America's newest presidential hopeful, was hit by allegations that he had attended a radical Islamic madrasah school as a boy in Indonesia, the claims spread like a virus through the media and internet.

It was a lie — the school was barely more religious than British church schools — but it was also a sign that Obama's chances of winning the presidency depend to an unusual degree on his life story and character.

The race is on to define the gifted but little-known senator for Illinois and The Sunday Times can reveal that his heritage is far more diverse and astonishing than anything American voters have heard so far.

Obama, 45, has two half- sisters, one living in Britain, and five surviving half-brothers, the eldest of whom converted to Islam, and whose stories span the globe.

Nobody was more surprised to hear that Obama had reportedly been educated in a madrasah than Julia Suryakusuma, a close friend of his mother until her death from ovarian cancer in 1995.

Suryakusuma, 53, one of Indonesia's most outspoken feminist writers, has fearlessly taken on extremist Muslim clerics in print. Last week she described Ann Dunham, Obama's mother, "as a liberal and a humanist", who learnt to speak fluent Indonesian and adored the culture.

"She was interested in religions but didn't follow one. She was a free-thinker," Suryakusuma said. "She was a pioneer and when she came to Indonesia she was ensnared and enchanted."

DOJ_NMG_0123408

On the coffee table in her cool modern house in Jakarta, full of the beautiful Indonesian fabrics and carvings which captivated her friend, lies an album of photographs which record the happy times.

There is Dunham, pale-skinned, jolly and frizzy-haired, celebrating with her friends at an art gallery opening or a drinks party, wearing the baggy, free-flowing clothes often favoured by bohemian western women in Asia. She always seemed to be laughing.

"You know Ann was really, really white," smiled Suryakusuma, looking through the album, "even though she told me she had some Cherokee blood in her. I think she just loved people of a different skin colour, brown people."

Dunham was from Wichita, Kansas, but her parents moved to Hawaii in search of a better life. According to Obama, a distant ancestor was a "full-blooded Cherokee".

Dunham's first marriage was to a Kenyan student, also called Barack Obama, but he left the family to study at Harvard and returned to Africa.

She went on to marry Lolo Soetoro, another foreign student, and moved to his native Indonesia with six-year-old Barack in 1967, after the new dictator Suharto summoned the country's citizens home.

Soetoro became a government relations consultant with a big US oil company. "He changed when he came back to Indonesia," Suryakusuma recalled. "Men can be a certain way when they are in the West and when they come back they are sucked into their own culture."

In his memoir, Dreams from My Father, first published in 1995, Obama does not conceal the estrangement between his mother and stepfather as Soetoro made compromises with Indonesia's power elite. They divorced and he died decades later of a liver complaint.

At 10, Obama returned to Hawaii, where he lived with his grandparents and attended an elite private school. His mother went back to Indonesia with Obama's half-sister Maya, now a professor at the University of Hawaii, and became an expert on the "feminine crafts", such as weaving and basket-making, practised by the women of Java.

Suryakusuma recalled that Dunham called her son "Berry" — Barry with an Indonesian lilt. "We were both mothers and we talked about how difficult it was for a mother to separate herself and send her child away, but she was really concerned about Barry's education."

She first met Obama when he came to visit his mother as a young adult. "She was so proud of him. I remember she was glowing with pride when he became the first black president of the Harvard Law Review.

"You know, having a white mother and a black father and coming to Indonesia," Suryakusuma reflected, "I could see he had the same kind of empathy with people that his mother had."

Obama's multi-hued heritage has put a distance between him and the African-American community, which has been reluctant to claim him as a "brother".

America's white community, in contrast, has embraced Obama as a hopeful affirmation that the fabled melting pot can transcend race. With his middle name Hussein (like Saddam) and surname Obama (like Osama), he is a rare and exotic figure in American politics.

"I believe the American electorate is ready to support leaders who embody the American dream despite their differences. In doing so, we affirm ourselves as a tolerant people," said William Galston, a senior fellow in public policy at the Brookings Institution in Washington.

Yet there are details in Obama's life that have yet to be subjected to full scrutiny. It may not be the information itself that matters, according to Galston, but "how Obama talks about the facts as they emerge and handles questions and controversies".

The Chicago Sun-Times columnist Lynn Sweet was the first to spot in 2004, when Obama burst on the national stage at the Democratic party convention, that his memoir, Dreams from My Father, contained "composite" characters and changed names.

"Except for public figures and his family, it is impossible to know who is real and who is not," she pointed out.

Obama admitted as much in his introduction, saying he had altered characters "for the sake of their privacy". As with the revelation that he took cocaine in his youth, he appears to have been candid about potential areas of controversy.

DOJ_NMG_0123409

Obama's African family is particularly complicated. By his own account, his father never really left Kezia, his first wife, in Kenya. She bore Obama Sr two children, Roy and Auma, who now works in social services in Berkshire.

They were separated, Obama's mother claimed, but "it was a village wedding and there was no document that could suggest a divorce".

His own father and mother's wedding in Hawaii may not have been properly documented either. "How and when the marriage occurred remains a bit murky, a bill of particulars that I have never quite had the courage to explore," Obama writes in his memoir.

After his father left Ann and two-year-old Barack to study at Harvard, he went to Africa with another American woman, Ruth, who became his third wife. She bore him two sons in Kenya, one of whom died in a motorcycle accident, but Obama Sr continued to see Kezia.

"Traditionally, she was still his wife," a relative explained. Kezia went on to bear two more sons, Abo and Bernard. Although their paternity is disputed by some relatives, Obama Sr regarded them as his own. Later in life, he fathered another son, George, by a young Kenyan woman.

After his parents split up, Obama saw his father only once before learning that he had died in a car crash in Kenya in 1982.

Obama's eldest brother Roy moved to America and went on to convert to Islam.

Obama, in contrast, became a committed Christian while he was working as a community activist in Chicago. Last week he denounced the reports that he was educated in a madrasah as a "ludicrous" smear.

Larry Sabato, professor of political science at the University of Virginia, believes Obama's richly textured African and Indonesian background will attract voters, no matter how controversial it is.

"America loves a success story — the new generation that rises from the sins and misfortunes of the older generation," Sabato said.

In Indonesia, Suryakusuma said she could still feel the "warm" presence of Obama's mother Ann. "She would be so proud if she knew about Barry, so proud to think that her little boy would be running for president of the United States."

Sticks, Stones And Mr. Obama (WP)

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

IT'S BECOME a fad among some conservatives to refer to the junior senator from Illinois by his full name: Barack Hussein Obama. This would be merely juvenile if it weren't so contemptible. Republican lobbyist Ed Rogers, on "Hardball," was one of the early adopters of this sleazy tactic. "Count me down as somebody who underestimates Barack Hussein Obama," he said. Radio host Rush Limbaugh, demonstrating his usual maturity, got a chuckle out of the senator's allegedly oversized ears, calling him "Barack Hussein Odumbo." And Tony Perkins of the Family Research Council issued this e-mail alert: "Joining an already glutted field of hopefuls, Sen. Barack Hussein Obama (D-Ill.) announced his candidacy for the 2008 Democratic nomination yesterday."

Insight magazine managed to further degrade the public discourse with a scurrilous "report" alleging that Mr. Obama, as a child in Indonesia, attended a radical Islamic madrassa. In fact, Mr. Obama attended a public school in Jakarta that was predominantly Muslim -- no surprise given that Indonesia is a predominantly Muslim country. Insight, whose piece was eagerly touted by Fox News Network, might have learned this if it had bothered to check its story rather than cravenly attributing the false report to "Hillary Clinton's camp," citing unnamed "sources close to the background check" that the New York senator supposedly conducted into Mr. Obama.

When the madrassa story was debunked by CNN and the Associated Press, Insight didn't even have the decency to slink away. "The media uproar over our reporting reveals a media establishment choosing not to ask the tough questions about Obama's Muslim past: If he was raised in a secular household (as he claims), why does he have -- or retain -- Muslim names, Barack and Hussein?" the magazine asked in a posting on its Web site. "Were his father and stepfather as secular as he says? What is the exact nature of Obama's current religious affiliation and what are the beliefs and teachings of his current church in Chicago, the Trinity United Church of Christ?"

Mr. Obama's slimers seem to think such name-calling and Muslim-baiting can score points with the American people. On the contrary, Mr. Obama's multicultural background (his father was Kenyan, and he spent several years living in Indonesia with his mother and stepfather) ought to be viewed as a plus. A president with an understanding of Islam and the developing world would be welcomed by those who too often feel misunderstood and slighted by the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0123410

Mr. Obama has never tried to hide his past or his family name: He has written about being educated at a predominantly Muslim school. His father, a non-practicing Muslim, was Barack Hussein Obama Sr. His grandmother is Sara Hussein Obama.

The senator, however, does not use his middle name. Those who take pains to insert it when referring to him are trying, none too subtly, to stir up scary images of menacing terrorists and evil dictators. They embarrass only themselves.

In A Sea Of Political Endorsements, Six That Could Make Waves (WP)

By Chris Cillizza, Shailagh Murray

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

Every day the potential presidential candidates fill The Fix's inbox with press releases touting some new endorsement from a sheriff in South Carolina or a state legislator in Michigan. For the most part, these endorsements are aimed at building momentum but have zero practical effect on the hunt for votes. Not all endorsements are created equal, however. Some really do matter. Here's a look at six of the most important.Republicans

Former governor Jeb Bush (Fla.): Not only is Florida expected to move its primary all the way up to Feb. 5, 2008, it is also a treasure trove of campaign contributions if you run in the right circles. Bush knows all the political and financial road maps. He also happens to be the president's brother.

Rep. Steve King (Iowa): King represents the vast -- and overwhelmingly Republican -- 5th District in western Iowa. He's also one of the state's leading conservatives and an outspoken opponent of immigration reform.

Gov. Mark Sanford (S.C.): Most of the statewide elected officials in the Palmetto State have chosen sides, but not Sanford. Although he backed Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) in 2000, Sanford has made clear that he hasn't decided where to throw his support this time.Democrats

Sen. Ted Kennedy (Mass.): Sen. John Kerry's decision to step out of the 2008 race makes Kennedy one of the most sought-after free agents in the field. Kennedy has ties to several of the candidates, although Sen. Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) stands to benefit most from an endorsement by the liberal icon.

Rep. Jim Clyburn (S.C.): The highest-ranking African American in the House, Clyburn is the rare modern politician with a proven political machine at his disposal. And he sits in a state that will vote on Jan. 29, 2008.

Former governor Jeanne Shaheen (N.H.): Shaheen, a former three-term governor, maintains an active political organization in the state, overseen by her husband, Billy. She may not be able to endorse from her current perch at Harvard, but a lot can change in a year's time.A Winter Showdown in the Sunshine State?

So long ethanol, hellllllo offshore drilling and big sugar .

Pandering to Iowa farmers is part of the job description for presidential candidates, but if several big states move up their 2008 primary dates, the promises will multiply like bugs on a Florida windshield.

The Sunshine State could be a particularly interesting addition, if the legislature decides, as expected, to reschedule from its usual March date to Feb. 5, just after New Hampshire votes. Florida features a complex mix of niche issues, including relations with Cuba, Everglades restoration and energy exploration in the Gulf of Mexico.

In the Senate, Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.) have taken opposite positions on both Cuba and offshore drilling. Obama twice voted to cut off funding for TV Marti, which is jammed by the Cuban government, while Clinton supported maintaining the signal. Clinton backed an expansion of oil and gas production in the Gulf of Mexico; Obama voted against it.

GOP candidates are starting to carve up the state, with former governor Mitt Romney (Mass.) making a strong early showing, with support from members of Jeb Bush's inner circle. But state GOP insiders believe that Gov. Charlie Crist (R) is a McCain man.

The Faint Hoofbeats? That's The Dark Horse (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123411

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON dashed to Iowa this weekend to hang an open-for-business sign on her new campaign operation. Barack Obama is besieged by admirers begging to join his team. And John Edwards has already dipped his toes into each of Iowa's 99 counties — and started his second lap.

So is the Democratic stable too full for a dark horse presidential candidate to emerge?

The current thinking suggests that only famous candidates, Democrat or Republican, can seize their party's nomination. But it has never been a wise bet to rule out the dark horse, a staple of American politics since James K. Polk went to the Democratic convention in 1844 and became the presidential nominee by accident after the favorite, former President Martin Van Buren, lost Southern support.

But perhaps more than any other presidential contest, 2008's could help determine whether the dark horse, a term borrowed from English racetrack lingo, is on the verge of extinction, particularly since the entry fee in the race for the White House has been raised yet again.

For the first time since 1928, neither a sitting president nor vice president will be a candidate in the race, theoretically creating a wide-open fight for both nominations and making it possible for a dark horse to pull stealthily ahead. But the contest is front-loaded as never before — California and other big states are rushing to wedge their caucuses and primaries into early February — so little-known candidates concede they have an even more difficult task.

Already, the leading contenders are making plans to reject public financing in the primary and general election campaigns for the first time since Watergate. The cost of preparing for a race, strategists believe, could swell beyond $75 million this year alone, which most dark horse candidates may struggle to meet, given the calendar.

"It makes it almost impossible for a dark horse to win," said Dayton Duncan, who worked on the 1984 and 1988 Democratic presidential races of Walter Mondale and Michael Dukakis and wrote "Grass Roots: One Year in the Life of the New Hampshire Presidential Primary." "But it might be the only chance for a dark horse candidate if they really caught lightning in a jar and were catapulted to the national stage."

The window will be narrow for a second-tier candidate. With rapid back-to-back primaries, a promising showing in Iowa or New Hampshire is critical to advancing.

But even before the rules and the calendar take shape for the 2008 race, dark horse candidates have one piece of storybook history to hold onto: Jimmy Carter, 1976.

After Mr. Carter declared his candidacy on Dec. 12, 1974, a Harris poll listed 35 prospective presidential candidates. Mr. Carter, a one-term Georgia governor, was not among them. Yet 13 months later, after spending day after day traipsing from the Missouri to the Mississippi, he won the Iowa caucuses, that all-important first test of a candidacy. The victory replenished his bank account and sustained him through the rest of the primary campaign.

But now, with the campaign's cost significantly higher and less time to raise money and attract supporters between primaries, it is hard to imagine a candidate's emerging from the shadows on persistence alone.

"Without a doubt, it's more difficult for someone to emerge today since you've got people who can raise tens of millions of dollars at the drop of a hat," said Senator Charles E. Grassley, an Iowa Republican, who as a young congressman watched the 1976 campaign with interest. "Little guys like Carter could never compete with that."

The Iowa caucuses not only created the lore of Mr. Carter, but Mr. Carter added to the lore of the Iowa caucuses. And for the last three decades, his out-of-nowhere victory has lured ambitious politicians convinced that they, too, could pull off the feat.

In 2004, the brief rise of Howard Dean again illustrated that little-known candidates could catch fire and raise money to compete with candidates blessed by the political establishment, but it also reinforced Iowa's importance. He finished third, his chances to become the nominee collapsing.

Mr. Dean tapped into the promise of the Internet like no other. And the next evolution of Internet fund-raising and activism — combined with old-fashioned discipline — might resuscitate the dark horse.

"The Internet can spontaneously combust a dark-horse candidacy that can take everyone out," said Joe Trippi, who managed Mr. Dean's campaign. "Everybody is sure it's going to be Hillary, Edwards or Obama, but my guess is that someone no one is talking about right now is going to give these three the scare of their life."

DOJ_NMG_0123412

The Internet could be the great equalizer. First, candidates who struggle to raise money through traditional means could tap into the grassroots to close the gap. Second, if a front-runner's stumble is caught on camera it is sure to be widely disseminated on YouTube and its ilk, which could clear a path for an outsider.

With the rush of candidates announcing their bids in the last few weeks, you could almost forget that the first primary votes won't be cast for another year. Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama are among the hopefuls whose high profile will deny them the advantage of learning on the fly, a privilege reserved for the dark horse. If, for example, former Gov. Tom Vilsack of Iowa missteps, he might be able to pick himself up without attracting as much notice as one of his more prominent rivals.

"A lot can change in a month," said Senator Tom Harkin, also of Iowa, who in 1992 sought the Democratic presidential nomination. "One of the problems of being a front-runner like Hillary and Barack, if they make a mistake, it will be magnified way beyond its own dimensions. If others stumble, it's not a big deal."

As he left the Senate floor to begin a weekend of campaigning, Sam Brownback of Kansas, one of many Republican candidates in the field, stopped for a moment to chat about his prospects. After describing himself as the "true conservative in the field," he acknowledged finding solace in the legends of Democratic dark horses.

"You have people like Jimmy Carter, who came out of nowhere. And Bill Clinton! They were not household names when they started this process," Mr. Brownback said. Asked when he was heading to Iowa, he paused for barely a beat and replied, "Next week."

Cullen Elected State GOP Chairman (NHUL)

By Garry Rayno

New Hampshire Union Leader, January 28, 2007

Manchester – Fergus Cullen was elected Republican state chairman on the first ballot at the party's annual meeting today at the Palace Theater in Manchester.

The vote for Cullen, a Wolfeboro businessman, was decisive: 247 votes, vs. 129 for Fran Wendelboe of New Hampton, who has served in the Legislature for 10 years, and 25 votes for three-term Manchester state Rep. William Infantine.

Cullen succeeds Wayne Semprini as party chairman.

Cullen calls himself "a conservative in the mainstream conservative wing of the Republican Party." He said the state party "has fallen down in many areas, including organization, candidate recruitment and fundraising. There are also basic infrastructure needs, such as updated computer and telephone systems."

Cullen said the party also needs to rebuild its get-out-the-vote program, which was absent this year, in time for the 2008 election. Cullen conferred with a lot of activists and party leaders before deciding to enter the race.

Move Up The California Primary (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

CALIFORNIA WILL be scorned no more. That is the sentiment driving state legislators to move up the state's next presidential primary, in 2008, to early February. Even though it held its 2004 primary in March instead of June, the nation's largest state was not a factor in the parties' nomination battles because they were all but over by the time Californians went to the polls.

The state was going to return to a June primary. But the Legislature is considering having only a local primary in June and catapulting to near the front of the line with a presidential primary that would immediately follow the first contests in Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

Sacramento is right to want to make the state a player in presidential races. At the same time, the front-loading of each party's nomination process is not a healthy development. As this month has shown, the compressed nomination schedule drives candidates to launch their presidential bids nearly two years in advance of the election. And by the time the voting begins, the fundraising primary — in which California's deep pockets do figure prominently — will have already helped determine the shape of the race.

It wasn't supposed to be this way. The primary season was intended to make party nominations more accessible to worthy but lesser-known candidates, forcing the parties to sponsor a cross-country debate on the issues. In theory, a modestly financed candidate could gain traction in the retail politics of New Hampshire and Iowa, then take his or her campaign to bigger states. The theory also holds that the grueling primary season helps vet, and develop, candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0123413

In reality, the primary season has been getting shorter. In 2004, Iowa and New Hampshire almost served as national primaries for the Democrats, with the party keen to crown a victor early and protect him from extended intramural bashing. The days when candidates could slowly gather momentum during the primary season are long gone, and it is a shame that the parties have refused to take steps to bring them back.

The best solution here would be a series of regional, rotating primaries (so that your state might go first if it went last the previous election). Such a tournament would force candidates to campaign nationwide and would draw out the nomination battles until May or June.

Alas, the parties have not taken meaningful steps to curtail the front-loading of the nomination process. The Democrats recently failed to adopt a plan to stretch out the primary season, opting instead to simply let Nevada and South Carolina join Iowa and New Hampshire at the front of the line. The message to the rest of the country: It's a free-for-all, so suit yourselves.

So it's understandable for California to want to hold its primary on the first permissible date under party rules: Feb. 5, 2008. This would force candidates to come to the nation's most-populous state not merely to raise money for their battles elsewhere (centered on other regions' concerns) but to focus on issues important to Californians. And if a California vote in February, with its high costs, makes the primary process seem untenably front-loaded to the point that it forces party leaders to establish a more rational calendar, then the state will have provided the entire nation a worthy service.

How Dems Can Use California To Win In '08 (LAT)

By Christopher S. Lehane

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

IN RECENT WEEKS, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and legislators have talked about giving California a well-deserved bigger say in the presidential campaign by moving up the state's primary. However, if Democrats really want to put the party in the strongest possible position to succeed in presidential elections, let's completely rethink the current primary system and replace it with a nominating process designed to pick the candidate best able to win.

In 2004, the primary season was frontloaded around a few early, relatively small and not especially diverse states in order to identify as quickly as possible the "most electable" candidate and to conserve money for the general election. Because these were small states that are historically won one voter and one constituency group at a time, candidates were rewarded for their retail campaign skills: one-on-one politics, constituency group building and a good biography. Unfortunately, these skills are about as relevant to a 21st century national presidential campaign as horseback riding is relevant to driving a car.

Modern presidential campaigns are tests of character; they're a hunt for candidates who have broad appeal (as opposed to a biography attractive to only a limited range of voters). They're about identifying candidates with the ability to articulate a message that speaks to all Americans, rather than those who rely on the typical 12-point plans constructed for one constituency group or another. Modern presidential races are about the ability to connect with voters over the TV in their living rooms — not about a candidate's charm when he meets with them in person in their own living rooms. And they're about the capacity to assemble and run a far-flung organization capable of raising well in excess of $100 million in just a few years.

With three reforms, the Democrats can put in place a nominating system that will produce the strongest and, yes, most electable candidate.

First, the Democratic primary schedule should open with a group of states that, when taken together, represents the mosaic that is America. Along with a Midwestern Iowa and a Northeastern New Hampshire, let's have a state from the Southwest, South and West all voting on the same day.

A multi-state campaign taking place on one day and involving a diverse set of states will begin the process of identifying the candidate who can put together the winning qualities of a national campaign.

Second, the primary season needs to be spread over a longer time period — not just in theory but in practice as well, so candidates are truly tested. Beginning in early February and going until May, Democrats should schedule a series of 10 primaries, with each involving five geographically diverse states voting every two weeks. The diverse and multi-state nature of the races would make it far more likely that the campaign would be competitive for a longer period. (Under the current system, the 2008 primary could effectively be over after four early states vote in a span of a few weeks, as it was in 2004. The compressed time period and winner-take-all nature of the existing system means that whoever does well in these first states, especially the first two, is in all likelihood the presumptive nominee.)

DOJ_NMG_0123414

This sort of diverse process over an extended time period worked in 1992 — the only time in the last 25 years that the Democrats nominated a candidate, Bill Clinton, who went on to be sworn in as president. That year, because Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin was running in the Iowa caucuses and because New Hampshire voters chose former Sen. Paul Tsongas of neighboring Massachusetts, neither Iowa nor New Hampshire played their historically determinative roles. In fact, the 1992 election was the first time in history that a candidate became president who did not win the New Hampshire primary. Instead, Democrats had to compete vigorously over the course of several months in such places as South Dakota, and then in Georgia (where Clinton got his first win), Maryland, Colorado, South Carolina, Arizona, Super Tuesday, and then on to Connecticut, New York and eventually California, where Clinton wrapped up the nomination in early June.

If Democrats had been using the 2004 primary system in 1992, their nominee could well have been Tsongas. The longer, diversified schedule, however, allowed Clinton to prove himself to voters, exposed the candidates' relative strengths and weaknesses and allowed the Democrats to stay on the offensive and define the terms of the general election. Democrats ended up with a candidate who actually won a number of states in the South and all the states in the upper Midwest — and who had the message, the battle-hardened ability and the proven campaign operation needed to beat the Republicans.

The third reform, in order to encourage more voter participation and loosen the grip of the Washington establishment on the Democratic Party's nomination process, is a three-part proposal: Eliminate the "super delegate" system. Super delegates are a significant pool of at-large, free-agent delegates representing the Democratic apparatus (including both party and elected officials) in the nominating process. In addition, the party should establish a system that more closely resembles the system that states such as Maine and Nebraska use in the general election, in which they divide nominating delegates by congressional districts, with votes for each district and additional points for whichever candidate wins the majority of the state's total vote. Finally, as in New Hampshire, independents should be allowed to vote in Democratic primaries.

These changes would force candidates to compete for an ideologically broader range of voters throughout all regions of a state, including in urban, suburban, exurban and rural districts.

Even a cursory glance at a red-and-blue color-coded map that divides the country's counties up shows that Democrats need to compete in more than just the major cities and coastal regions. Not only will this be of enormous help to producing a candidate who can compete nationally — it will help the party's candidates lower down on the ballot, where Democrats face challenges in traditional swing communities.

The winning coalition for Democrats will in all likelihood not be the old Democratic coalition of labor, minorities, women and coastal progressives. As the 2006 midterms demonstrated, for the Democratic Party to regain a permanent majority status, our candidates must win by talking to all Americans.

Christopher S. Lehane Served As An Advisor In The Clinton White House.

How California Can Spoil The '08 Election (LAT)

By Philip J. Trounstine

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

WITH SUPPORT FROM Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger and leaders of both parties in the Legislature, the prospects are looking good that California will move its 2008 presidential primary from June to February.

That would put the contest for the largest bloc of delegates (about 12% or so) needed to win a party nomination at the front end of the nominating process, after Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina.

From the standpoint of California — which traditionally has served as little more than an ATM for campaign cash — this would be a good thing. Why should such a big and important state weigh in at the end of the nominating process, when the races are all but settled by puny, one-dimensional states that matter not a lick in November?

Think about it:

DOJ_NMG_0123415

• Iowa, which is 92% white, has a population about the size of San Diego County.

• New Hampshire — 94% white — is smaller than Sacramento County.

• Nevada's population is just a bit larger than that of San Bernardino County, and South Carolina's is considerably smaller than the San Francisco Bay Area's.

To run well in California, a presidential primary candidate can't get by with boutique issues and handshakes in living rooms and coffee shops. He or she must demonstrate broad appeal to party members, must not only be able to perform hand-to-hand politics but display a media presence and the ability to speak to myriad constituencies on a wide range of issues.

And because you don't exist in California politics if you're not on TV, a candidate must have the ability to raise and spend a lot of money effectively. But that's not enough. He or she has to have something to say, for without a clear and simple strategic message, no candidate can capture California.

A Democrat who wants to carry California must appeal to labor liberals in Los Angeles and Oakland, to gun-rack flag wavers in Fresno and Bakersfield, tree huggers in Marin and Ventura counties and high-tech pragmatists in San Jose and San Diego. He or she has to connect with Latinos, blacks and Asians without driving away white union members in Long Beach.

A Republican has to appeal to churchgoers in Riverside and Anaheim, business owners in Redlands and Huntington Beach, middle managers in Fullerton and Pasadena, farmers and ranchers in Modesto and Delano. He or she has to capture the pro-life, prayer-in-school crowd without alienating all those moderate suburban Little League parents.

In short, a candidate who can capture California, with all its diversity, can be competitive in his or her party in virtually all the big states — Texas, New York, Florida, Illinois, Pennsylvania and Ohio, for example. A statewide victor in California is a national, not just a regional, candidate. Win California and you're ready for prime time.

But it's increasingly looking like California will not get to exercise its political weight unilaterally. Indeed, Feb. 5, 2008, may become Super-Duper Tuesday with, perhaps, Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Illinois, Missouri, New Jersey, New Mexico, North Carolina, North Dakota, Oklahoma and Utah voting on the same day.

If Super-Duper Tuesday does occur, California would still represent the biggest bloc in what would be, in effect, a national primary. But as the law of unintended consequences is wont to do, all this may actually increase, rather than decrease, the importance of Iowa and New Hampshire (and perhaps Nevada and South Carolina), because winners in those states would have the only momentum heading into Super-Duper Tuesday. It's the slingshot effect.

According to a variety of campaign consultants, a candidate, to be viable, would need something like $100 million in the bank and a fully functional national campaign operation to make it past Super-Duper Tuesday. For the Democrats, that likely winnows the field right off the bat to Hillary Clinton, Barack Obama and maybe a third contender. For Republicans, John McCain and Rudy Giuliani look like the only likely contenders right now.

So the nominating process itself may screen the field, even before a single vote is cast. That's not necessarily good for the country.

Those with name recognition and early money will have a huge built-in advantage. There won't be time to test, appraise and evaluate the candidates, to see them handle the slings and arrows that we expect our presidents to be able to deflect. Under a hyper-compressed primary system, Jimmy Carter would not have had a chance to beat George C. Wallace in Florida in 1976, and Pat Buchanan might have rode with his pitchfork right out of New Hampshire and into the 1996 November election.

The media would determine who is a viable candidate and who is not. They'll do that anyway, of course, but there won't be time for the voters to exercise their own, independent opinions. Even California — where contrarian Democrats opted for Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) over President Carter in 1980 and Sen. Gary Hart (D-Colo.) over Vice President Walter Mondale in 1984 — might get swept up in the stampede.

So, if the governor and Legislature strike a deal — keep your eyes peeled for a package that includes a February primary, reapportionment reform and an extension of term limits for state legislators — it may mean that California voters will have an early say in the nominating process. But when California is tossed in with lots of other states, its influence still won't match its measure. And the nominating process may become a mad dash for closure that serves no one well.

Philip J. Trounstine Is Director Of The Survey And Policy Research Institute At San Jose State.

DOJ_NMG_0123416

Dems Aim To Lift State's Stature In Presidential Race (DENP)

By Karen E. Crummy

Denver Post, January 28, 2007

Colorado Democrats are considering moving up the state's caucuses to the first week of February 2008 in an effort to be politically relevant in the next presidential election.

If Colorado moves its caucuses from the third week in March to Feb. 5, however, it would join more than a dozen other states that have either already moved their caucuses or primaries up to the same date, or are thinking about it. As a result, some political observers say, Colorado probably becomes insignificant.

"The chances are you get less attention on (Feb.) 5th than if you're some other place on the calendar," said Larry Sabato, director of the University of Virginia's Center for Politics. "Independently, states are making a rational decision to move things up, but collectively they are cutting their throats."

On the other hand, with at least four states holding presidential contests in January and more states holding them on Feb. 5, a contest past that date also risks irrelevancy because the nominees will effectively be picked.

Pat Waak, head of the state Democratic Party, has discussed moving up Colorado's caucuses with national party officials so they would coincide with other states in the region. On Friday, Waak was talking to county chairs to see if it would be logistically possible to reschedule the caucuses for the first Tuesday in February of next year.

U.S. Sen. Ken Salazar said that moving up the state's caucuses made sense.

"The candidates won't ignore Colorado," he said. "If there is a possibility that Colorado could be in a position to help decide the nominee in either party, it would make sense to do it."

Tired of being flyover territory for presidential candidates on their way to hefty electoral states such as California or Florida, elected officials in the Rocky Mountain West have for years discussed having a regional primary. But it never materialized.

Next year, however, Nevada's caucus is Jan. 19, sandwiched between the Iowa caucus on Jan. 14 and the New Hampshire primary on Jan. 22. Utah and New Mexico are set for Feb. 5. Arizona and Montana, along now with Colorado, are also considering moving their contests into February.

But so is California. And Florida is thinking about moving its primary up to the end of January.

If Waak and the party decide to move ahead with their Feb. 5 plan, it must be approved by the state legislature. It would apply to Republicans as well.

Dick Wadhams, a political strategist who is running to be state GOP chair starting in March, said he didn't object to an earlier caucus but wasn't sure it was going to make much of a difference. History indicates that candidates get the most momentum and media coverage from the first few contests.

"I don't think it changes the fact that Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina really determine the races," Wadhams said.

The consequences of the front- loaded political calendar have created problems for candidates - and potentially voters.

Most analysts predict both major-party nominations essentially will be determined by early February. That means the candidates are pouring massive amounts of money into the process early on. Those who can't ante up will have to get out.

Several analysts already have predicted that 2008 will be the first $1 billion presidential race and that to be taken seriously a candidate probably would need $100 million.

Additionally, with early primaries and caucuses comes a nine-month general-election campaign - for better or worse.

"The parties are stuck with those nominees. There's no opportunity for buyer's remorse," Sabato said, even if the candidate comes with heavy political baggage that might alter the course of an election.

"You could have a nominee that unfortunately hasn't been seriously vetted until the general (election)," said Jennifer Duffy, managing editor of the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

Bill Clinton In '08! (LAT)

By Jonathan Chait

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123417

THERE'S something about the upcoming presidential election that already feels terribly unsatisfying, and I think I've figured out what it is: the 22nd Amendment.

The 22nd Amendment, of course, forbids presidents from running for reelection after their second term in office. Republicans enacted it in a fit of pique at Franklin Roosevelt and his supposedly dictatorial tendencies. And the prohibition on a third term is, I suppose, one way of preventing a president from making himself a dictator (unless, of course, he's dictatorial enough to suspend the 22nd Amendment). But sometimes it makes our politics incoherent, and now is one of those times.

First consider the Democrats. The Hillary Clinton campaign is a product of the fact that her husband can't run for reelection. She is certainly highly intelligent and qualified to hold the presidency, but if her husband was running, she wouldn't be. People react to her candidacy largely on the basis of how they felt about Bill Clinton. Those who yearn for a return to his policies generally support her; those who disliked his policies don't.

Indeed, Democratic presidential politics since Clinton has consisted largely of referendum-by-proxy on Clinton. In the 2000 primary, Al Gore had the support of Clinton loyalists. Bill Bradley had the support of Democrats who opposed Clinton. You had the odd spectacle of Bradley getting support from liberal Democratic dissidents (such as former Labor Secretary Robert Reich, who bemoaned Clinton's stingy social investment) and conservative Democratic dissidents (such as Bob Kerrey, who bemoaned Clinton's failure to slash social spending).

In 2004, Howard Dean's campaign was powered in large part by liberal dissidents against Clintonism. He railed against the Washington Democratic establishment. This was the Clinton establishment. This time around, John Edwards is trying to collect the support of those anti-Clinton liberals. His embrace of anti-poverty measures is an implicit rebuke to Clinton's focus on the middle class and support for welfare reform. Barack Obama, meanwhile, isn't attacking Clintonism per se, but he is talking about leaving behind the debates of the 1990s.

So the Democratic voters are being asked to make a choice about Clintonism, but they're being asked in a roundabout fashion. It's like junior high, where your friend asks a girl's friend if the girl likes you or likes you likes you. Shouldn't we be able to vote on the real thing, up or down, rather than sort-of-pretend we're voting on something else?

Meanwhile, the Republican situation is even more frustrating. George W. Bush is going to leave office deeply unpopular with the American public. But what do Republicans think? According to a recent poll, three-quarters of them still approve of Bush's performance.

Because Bush can't run again, though, Republicans won't have to confront whether they want to stick with him or move in a different direction. So you have the spectacle of, for instance, John McCain sending out wildly contradictory signals — hugging Bush one day, excoriating his execution of the war the next (though carefully blaming it on others). I'm guessing McCain's plan is to convince Republicans that he mostly wants to continue Bush's policies, get the nomination, win the presidency and then announce a U-turn. If it happens, Republicans will be annoyed, and I don't blame them.

As a confirmed Bush-hater, I'm annoyed myself. Why should I only get one chance to register my verdict on Bush's presidency, especially when the vehicle for that verdict is John Kerry? Yes, the 2006 elections were fun, but punishing his co-partisans (many of whom had already abandoned him anyway) lacks the satisfying thump of actually throwing the bum himself out of office. Now Bush is going to go down in history as a two-term president, forever tied for second place in most terms awarded by the American voter.

If we had a straight dictatorship, Bush would long ago have been dragged out of the White House either by an angry mob or by disgruntled generals. (Note to oversensitive conservatives: I'm strongly against both dictatorships and assassinating Bush or any other president.) If we could vote for whoever we want, regardless of prior service, Bush would probably be dumped unceremoniously in 2008. Only our kooky current system lets him retire undefeated.

What this country really needs is to have Bill Clinton run against George W. Bush.

On The Hill (NOTP)

By Bruce Alpert, Bill Walsh

New Orleans Times-Picayune, January 28, 2007

Fund for rebuilding rentals urged

DOJ_NMG_0123418

Congress is getting ready to address the scarcity of affordable rental housing in New Orleans. The Feb. 6 hearing by the House Financial Services Committee is expected to be a prelude to legislation to rebuild the affordable-housing stock along the Gulf Coast decimated in Hurricane Katrina. Chairman Barney Frank, D-Mass., who has called the Bush administration's commitment to housing in the Gulf Coast an "abject failure," is expected to resurrect legislation that would peel hundreds of millions of dollars from the profits of government-backed mortgage buyers Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac for a rebuilding fund. The bill, pushed last year by Rep. Richard Baker, R-Baton Rouge, passed the House but stalled in the Senate.

Pair seek to expand police hiring grant

Two leaders of the new Democratic majority in Congress promised the nation's mayors last week that they will try to restore financing for a 1994 federal program that provided grants to help cities hire more police officers. The program has seen most of its money cut in recent years. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., and Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., a senior member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said that growing crime problems in major cities, including New Orleans, shows that the program needs to be restored. "In 1994 we had historically high rates of violent crimes like murders, forcible rapes, and aggravated assaults," Biden said. "Because we put more cops on the streets in more neighborhoods, we were able to reduce these crimes to the lowest levels in a generation. Fewer people were murdered, fewer people became victims, and fewer children will become criminals." No word on where financing for the new Democratic proposal would come from, or whether the Bush administration will go along.

Attorney general's response praised

Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., who has been critical of what she has termed unacceptable delays in getting federal assistance to Katrina-ravaged Louisiana, praised U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales last week for agreeing to help New Orleans address violent crime, after she had sent him a list of critical needs. "I am grateful to Attorney General Gonzales for quickly acting on my requests, and look forward to continuing to work with him, Senate Judiciary Chairman (Patrick) Leahy and local law enforcement authorities to implement the remaining elements of the plan," Landrieu said. "Additional federal resources and technical assistance is only one solution. More reform and coordination on the ground in New Orleans must continue." Sen. David Vitter, R-La., also praised the attorney general's action, which was announced at a New Orleans news conference.

Bush's energy plans get a mixed reaction

While most of the focus on President Bush's State of the Union address last week was on the defense of his decision to increase troop levels in Iraq, he did offer some new domestic initiatives on health care and energy. Louisiana's two senators, Democrat Mary Landrieu and Republican David Vitter, viewed them differently. "I liked that he spoke in bold terms about some key domestic challenges like health care and energy," Vitter said. "We all need to think and act outside the box in a bold way." But Landrieu said she was disappointed Bush's latest energy proposal, combining some new conservation and alternative energy projects with more domestic production, doesn't reflect "the great urgency" her constituents express about making the United States less dependent on foreign oil.

Lobbyist for N.O. has ties to Bush

Arnold Havens, a former acting deputy secretary and general counsel for the Treasury Department, has joined the Washington government affairs shop of New Orleans-based law firm Jones Walker. Havens, who will become a partner at the firm, said he will help the firm lobby for some of its New Orleans area clients, including the city of New Orleans and Tulane University, as they seek continued help with Katrina recovery efforts. Havens, who worked in both Bush administrations, is barred under federal rules from lobbying his former colleagues at the Treasury until August 2007, one year after he left the administration.

Bid for forgiveness of loans renewed

Louisiana is, once again, trying to persuade Congress to forgive its disaster loans. The federal government authorized hundreds of millions of dollars in loans to cities, towns, sheriffs' offices and other governmental entities struggling to recover from Hurricane Katrina. With their tax base wiped out in the storm, some of the money was used to pay city employees and put police on the streets. But the Republican-controlled Congress insisted the money should be paid back. Now with Democrats in charge, Louisiana is asking again. "We were in the minority (in the past) and it wasn't a priority," said Melanie Roussell, spokeswoman for

DOJ_NMG_0123419

Rep. William Jefferson, D-New Orleans. "We're in a different Congress now." The House delegation filed a bill last week seeking to have the loans forgiven, and a similar measure was filed in the Senate earlier this month.

Baker weighing run for U.S. Senate seat

Rep. Richard Baker, R-Baton Rouge, isn't ruling out a run against Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., next year. "Folks in D.C. have talked to him about it. Folks in Louisiana have talked to him about it," Michael DiResto, Baker's spokesman, said. "He's thinking about it." The veteran congressman wasn't well-known outside his district until he proposed a community redevelopment plan for post-Katrina Louisiana that won accolades from state leaders, including Landrieu and Gov. Kathleen Blanco. It died when the Bush administration opposed it, but the effort boosted Baker's profile statewide.

Melancon promises meaningful oversight

The White House is said to be hunkering down for a barrage of investigations from the Democratic-led Congress -- and for good reason. Last week, Rep. Charlie Melancon, D-Napoleonville, had a feisty tone when announcing his appointment to the Energy and Commerce Committee's panel on oversight and investigations. "The Constitution mandates that Congress conduct meaningful oversight of the federal government, yet there have been almost no oversight hearings held or subpoenas issued in the past six years," said Melancon, who will serve as vice chairman of the subcommittee headed by Rep. Bart Stupak, D-Mich. "It's time to change that." A Melancon spokeswoman said the congressman wasn't ready to name his targets yet.

Questions center on mayors' meeting

The head of the World Conference of Mayors says he's mystified why his organization would be of interest to federal investigators looking into Rep. William Jefferson's business dealings. The attorney for Allison Anadi, a Southern University criminal justice professor, said investigators in the probe had asked his client about a 2001 World Conference of Mayors meeting in Nigeria. Johnny Ford, chairman of the World Conference and mayor of Tuskegee, Ala., said that the conference was called to help officials from the Nigerian state of Akwa Ibom deal with serious pollution problems from a U.S.-operated refinery. Jefferson, D-New Orleans, attended the meeting, Ford said, but nothing out of the ordinary occurred. "We were just trying to find a way to help officials deal with some terrible pollution problems," Ford said. The FBI has asked Nigerian officials for bank records for Anadi, along with any money transfers of more than $5,000. Anadi's attorney Glen Woods said he doesn't know why the feds would be interested in his client's banking transactions. Jefferson has not been charged in the investigation, which began in March 2005, and denies wrongdoing. Two of Jefferson's former associates have pleaded guilty to bribery-related charges.

Jeb Bush Rallies Conservatives At Summit (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

At a time when the conservative movement is looking bereft, humbled by midterm-election defeats and hungering for a presidential candidate to rally around, Jeb Bush delivered yesterday in Washington a resounding endorsement of conservative principles, bringing his audience repeatedly to its feet.

In his lunchtime remarks to the Conservative Summit, Bush struck every conservative chord, blaming Republicans' defeat in November on the party's abandonment of tenets including limited government and fiscal restraint.

"Don't take offense personally if I get mad at Congress," the Republican former Florida governor began. "It's important for us to realize we lost, and there are significant reasons that happened, but it isn't because conservatives were rejected. But it's because we rejected the conservative philosophy in this country."

He added, "If the promise of pork and more programs is the way Republicans think they'll regain the majority, then they've got a problem."

Bush's speech prompted three standing ovations from the audience of hundreds at the National Review Institute's conference at the JW Marriott Hotel, reflecting the widespread concern among conservatives that exorbitant government spending led to the loss of majorities in the House and Senate and concern about whether Republicans would again embrace the traditional principles.

DOJ_NMG_0123420

To Ed Gillespie, a prominent lobbyist and former chairman of the Republican National Committee, Bush's two terms in Tallahassee -- where he developed a reputation as a tax-cutter and staunch spending hawk -- exemplified conservative politics at its best, and what makes for a compelling presidential candidate.

"For those who are worried if you can put forward a vigorous conservative policy agenda in a state like Florida and still get elected and still be popular: Our keynote speaker left office with approval ratings above 60 percent," Gillespie said.

"If he were former two-term governor Jeb Smith, he might be in Des Moines today," Gillespie said, alluding to presidential hopefuls' campaigning.

Bush says he will not run for president in 2008, however, and conservatives continue to look for a candidate to excite their interest.

"So far there's definitely a lukewarm feeling about the field, but it's still early, and conservatives want to see how these guys run. And it's still possible that one or the other of the candidates will really inspire conservatives," said Rich Lowry, editor of the National Review.

Two men eyeing the GOP's conservative base as a platform for a presidential candidacy also gave speeches yesterday. In the morning, former House speaker Newt Gingrich (Ga.) addressed the conference, and former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney was scheduled to speak last night. Former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee, mentioned as another presidential possibility, is expected to speak this morning.

Gingrich, the architect of the 1994 "Republican revolution" that saw the GOP win control of Congress for the first time in 40 years, sharply criticized his party.

"You have a Republican Party that resents ideas," he said. "We worked for 16 years to get a majority, which was thrown away."

Gingrich, who received a warm reception, said he will not make a decision on running until much later this year.

Huckabee, meanwhile, might form an exploratory committee as soon as tomorrow. Romney, already exploring a bid, is criticized by some conservatives for the liberal social views he expressed in the 1990s.

With little disagreement at the conference about the prudence of the president's strategy for Iraq, the war appeared not to figure into the thinking of conservatives as an issue that could further cost the GOP.

At a Friday night panel on the state of conservatism, commentator Laura Ingraham argued that Republicans -- if they are to have any chance of winning in 2008 -- must wake up to the fact that Democrats are embracing politicians such as Sen. James Webb (Va.), a gruff military veteran who delivered his party's response to the State of the Union on Tuesday by attacking President Bush's Iraq plan while offering a populist economic message.

"We have to be careful with conservatives not to remain in an echo chamber," Ingraham said. "The party that comes off as the party that represents the American worker best is the party that wins in 2008."

U.S. Missiles In E. Europe Opposed By Locals, Russia (WP)

By Bruce I. Konviser

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

PRAGUE -- A Bush administration plan to deploy a missile defense shield in Eastern Europe is drawing protests from Russia and from residents who oppose hosting foreign military bases and fear the facilities might make their countries targets for attack.

The proposed placement of about 10 interceptor missiles in Poland and a radar tracking station in the Czech Republic would pose a "clear threat" to Russia, Col. Gen. Vladimir Popovkin, chief of Russia's Space Forces, told reporters last week. He spoke after the United States announced it would open formal negotiations with the two former client states of the Soviet Union.

Russian Foreign Ministry spokesman Mikhail Kamynin underlined his government's opposition Friday, saying in an interview with the ITAR-Tass news agency that "the creation of a U.S. European anti-missile base can only be regarded as a substantial reconfiguration of the American military presence in Europe." He called the move "a mistaken step with negative consequences for international security."

DOJ_NMG_0123421

The Bush administration maintains that the missile system is limited and not meant to counter Russia, with its huge nuclear arsenal, but to protect against a "rogue state" such as Iran or North Korea attacking with a small number of intercontinental ballistic missiles. Eastern Europe lies along the flight path such rockets would follow from the Middle East to the United States.

Since the fall of communism, political leaders in Prague and Warsaw have viewed U.S. military prowess as key to their countries' security. They favor the U.S. plans for missile defense, but that may not be enough to carry the day -- there is considerable public opposition to the plans in both countries.

After nearly eight months of political paralysis, a new Czech government finally won a vote of confidence this month -- and the United States issued its request for negotiations shortly afterward. But the government is ruling without a majority in Parliament, which would have to ratify any agreement. It is far from certain that such a vote would win today, political analysts said.

Jitka Pozdenova, who works for a nongovernmental organization that promotes international exchange programs for high school students, said that she opposes the base and that people don't trust U.S. intentions.

"A lot of people are against it because it is an American thing and not a Czech or European operation," she said. "People feel America is doing it for itself."

Ales Janda, a physician, said many Czechs oppose the site being under U.S. control because of the bad memories of the Soviet Union's military presence here. "People are afraid of having a foreign army here, but it is totally different now," he said. "I think if we're a part of NATO, we can't be against it."

Opponents say they will push for a public referendum on the issue, which would intensify the debate.

Some residents here worry that the facilities would make the country a target if there was war. And the Iraq war has cooled public enthusiasm for close military cooperation with the United States, though it remains the most powerful ally of the Czech Republic and Poland.

In addition, emotional scars remain from communist days, when the Soviet Union operated a network of military bases here. Nobody is likening the United States to the country's former master, but the notion of a foreign power controlling a military base on their territory makes many people uncomfortable.

Some analysts are also concerned that bilateral agreements between NATO members will ultimately weaken the alliance. Lubomir Zaoralek, a leading member of the opposition Social Democrats, calls that his chief concern. "There would be no problem if it was a common strategy of NATO," he said.

One other issue is affecting the debate here: visas. At present, citizens of newer European Union member states, most of them from the former Soviet bloc, cannot visit the United States without visas, a fact that rankles many here.

Now, the United States is suddenly moving to change its visa-waiver law to admit people from countries considered good friends and reliable partners, Poland and the Czech Republic among them. All sides insist there is no quid pro quo for accommodation on the missile program.

But in remarks last week, Foreign Minister Karel Schwarzenberg acknowledged the obvious: "These matters, of course, are not in principle interconnected. But the atmosphere in the Congress, when deciding on whether the Czech Republic is to be admitted in the program, can be substantially improved if we show we are a faithful ally of the U.S.A."

Lost in much of the discussion here is that the anti-missile system remains unproved after tens of billions of dollars of development work.

Assuming it worked, it would still be a chicken-and-egg game as to whether the system would enhance U.S. security, said Michael Codner, director of military sciences at the Royal United Services Institute for Defense and Security Studies, a British think tank.

"One could argue that the principle reason for Iran and North Korea having nuclear systems is precisely because they then render themselves much safer from invasion," he said, "bearing in mind that Iraq was invaded and North Korea never has been."

Plan To Revive Trade Talks Is Offered In Davos (NYT)

By Carter Dougherty

DOJ_NMG_0123422

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

DAVOS, Switzerland, Jan. 27 — Leading trade ministers on Saturday embraced an unusual game plan for reviving trade talks, saying they would try to hash out details on technical issues, rather than first agreeing on the broad outlines of an accord.

During a meeting at the World Economic Forum, officials from 30 countries including the United States, the European Union and emerging markets like India and Brazil vowed to move forward in the Doha round of World Trade Organization talks, which began more than five years ago in the Persian Gulf emirate of Qatar but collapsed in July because of disagreements about farm subsidies and tariff cuts. They hope to reach a deal within a year.

To resuscitate the talks, the ministers endorsed a strategy that is highly unusual in these negotiations, but now appears to offer the only chance to conclude the trade round. Instead of creating a framework for agreement and then working out details on technical issues like tariffs and subsidies later, countries will aim to work out most specifics up front. Then, they will decide whether a final push is warranted at a meeting of all World Trade Organization members in Geneva.

Pascal Lamy, the organization's director general, said the process would have to achieve a genuine breakthrough in "months, not quarters," for a meeting of all the group's members to occur. Apart from agriculture, it would also have to address tariff cuts for industrial products and services like finance and telecommunications.

After the Geneva meeting, Mr. Lamy said countries would tackle other, less contentious issues, including simplifying customs procedures, environmental rules and antidumping rules.

The W.T.O. negotiations would dovetail with a bid by the Bush administration to extend the United States trade negotiating authority that expires on June 30. Next week, President Bush will give two major addresses on economic policy calling on Congress to take that step, American officials said.

Blair Says G-8 Should Expand, Disagrees With Merkel (BLOOM)

By John Fraher

Bloomberg, January 28, 2007

Jan. 27 - U.K. Prime Minister Tony Blair said the Group of Eight industrialized nations should eventually expand to include countries such as China and India, putting him at odds with current G-8 head Angela Merkel.

``The G-8 is already well on its way to metamorphosis into G- 8 plus five," said Blair in a speech in Davos, Switzerland. ``At G-8 plus five it can be a forum for agreement between the most powerful nations with a true modern global reach. Sooner or later, the metamorphosis should be complete."

Politicians from the G-8 are debating whether to allow some of the world's fastest growing economies into their club and grant them a top table presence on talks ranging from foreign exchange policy to development aid. While Blair argued for expansion, Merkel rejected the idea in her opening address on Jan. 24.

``These countries have very different priorities" on issues such as carbon emissions and development, she said.

Blair, who said his speech today will be his last in Davos as prime minister, is running out of time to build a foreign policy legacy beyond the war in Iraq before he steps down later this year. He repeated a call made last May to fuse the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank to strengthen the influence of emerging economies.

Merge IMF, World Bank

``There is a powerful case for merging the IMF and the World Bank and for increasing the influence of the developing countries within them," he said. ``A strong transatlantic push" to reform organizations such as the IMF and the World Bank is ``overdue."

Blair also said G-8 countries may be ``on the verge of a breakthrough" on climate change.

``The German G-8 Presidency gives us an opportunity to agree at least the principles of a new binding international agreement to come into effect when the Kyoto Protocol expires in 2001," according to Blair.

U.S. President George W. Bush's State of the Union speech on Jan. 23, in which he pledged to lower gasoline consumption by 20 percent over the next decade, shows the ``mood in the U.S. is in the process of a quantum shift," said Blair.

3 Killed As Hamas And Fatah Fight On (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

DOJ_NMG_0123423

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 27 — At least three more Palestinians were killed Saturday in Gaza in continuing battles between fighters loyal to Fatah and Hamas, which has been celebrating its victory a year ago over Fatah in legislative elections.

At least 14 Palestinians, including a 2-year-old boy, died Friday in daylong clashes and retaliatory attacks. The death toll has reached 20 since Thursday, with more than 65 people wounded, news agencies reported.

Those killed Saturday were identified as Mahmoud Khalil Khatib, 17, who appears to have been a student bystander, and two members of the security forces, Ibrahim al-Khalout, 25, and Mohammad Khattab, 33.

The fighting started near the Hamas Islamic University, the headquarters of the Fatah-dominated preventive security force in Gaza City and the Shifa Hospital a few blocks away.

Hamas, which leads the Palestinian Authority, said Friday that it was suspending new talks with the Fatah movement of the Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, on forming a national unity government because of the violence. Mr. Abbas, who was at a conference in Switzerland and then in Spain, said he expected negotiations on a government to last at least another three weeks.

If the talks fail, Mr. Abbas said he would move to make good on his Dec. 16 call for early presidential and parliamentary elections, despite Hamas's victory a year ago. Hamas has labeled the call an attempted coup, and said it would resist or obstruct any new legislative elections.

Mr. Abbas went to Damascus, Syria, last week to meet with the Hamas political director, Khaled Meshal, who lives there in exile, and the two said they had made progress. But Hamas is insisting that the current prime minister, Ismail Haniya, remain in the job and that Hamas retain effective control of major ministries, including the Interior Ministry.

The latest talks between Hamas and Fatah started Tuesday. On Saturday, Tawfiq Abu Khoussa, a Fatah spokesman in Gaza, blamed Hamas for starting the latest mayhem. "We in Fatah did not stop the dialogue," he said. "Those who stopped the dialogue are required to return."

Hamas blamed Fatah, saying in a statement that the unity talks were close to an agreement "when putschists inside Fatah rushed to blow up the situation to serve their own interests and a foreign agenda."

The point of a new government would be to try to meet international requirements that the Palestinian Authority accept the right of Israel to exist, forswear violence and accept previous Palestinian-Israeli agreements. Hamas has refused to do that, but has negotiated with Mr. Abbas for months over a political program for a government that could meet the standards and thus let Western budgetary aid resume.

The fight for power in Gaza between Fatah and Hamas has been intermittently bloody, with more than 30 people killed between mid-December and early January in urban fighting. Palestinians warned then of a possible civil war, though the factions tend to calm down after a spike in violence, in part because of growing popular disgust with the gunmen.

The United States is continuing to try to support Mr. Abbas and his loyal presidential guard with more than $80 million in what is supposed to be nonlethal aid. Washington, which will sponsor a meeting of Middle East diplomats on Feb. 2 before holding joint talks with Mr. Abbas and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel, is trying to provide a "political horizon" for a peace settlement to the Palestinians, again to try to bolster Fatah, which supports a Palestinian state next to an independent Israel.

But the last year of isolation has not overthrown Hamas, though it is less popular. More important, Hamas is more firmly entrenched, having built a parallel paramilitary force in Gaza of nearly 6,000 men known as the Executive Force, which is loyal to the Hamas interior minister, Said Siam, not to Mr. Abbas.

In addition to the deaths since Thursday, nine members of Hamas and five members of Fatah were kidnapped in tit-for-tat abductions in Gaza and the occupied West Bank on Friday, and nine Hamas members were kidnapped in the northern village of Kafr Qalil by Fatah, security sources said.

Late on Friday, Hamas attacked the Gaza headquarters of the Preventive Security Service, a force dominated by Fatah, with mortars and rocket-propelled grenades. No injuries were reported. Grenades were also fired at the home of Rashid Abu Shbak of Fatah, who is in charge of internal security for the Palestinian Authority. The Gaza home of the Hamas leader Mahmoud Zahar, the foreign minister, was also hit by grenades but no one was injured.

DOJ_NMG_0123424

Mr. Haniya said in an interview published in the London Arabic newspaper Al Hayat that the long effort to negotiate the release of an Israeli soldier captured in June in return for Palestinian prisoners was “complex and difficult” and would require more work.

7 Dead On Day 3 Of Hamas-Fatah Conflict (AP)

By Ibrahim Barzak, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 28, 2007

Gunmen from the rival Hamas and Fatah movements battled in Gaza City for a third straight day Saturday, firing mortars and grenades in clashes that killed seven people in the increasingly bloody power struggle over the Palestinian government.

The deaths brought to 25 the number of Palestinians killed since late Thursday, with at least 68 people wounded and efforts to forge a coalition government at a standstill.

The latest fighting, which started late Thursday after a Hamas activist was killed in a bombing, has been among the deadliest in nearly two months of clashes.

Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, of Hamas, and a spokesman for President Mahmoud Abbas, of Fatah, both appealed for calm. But after a brief lull, fighting flared up again.

In a clear jab at the moderate Abbas, Haniyeh criticized "troublemakers who are trying to veer away from the path of our people" by receiving "dirty American funding and arms." The White House is seeking some $85 million to help bolster Abbas' forces.

The violence has been fueled by Abbas' pledge to call early elections if the talks between Hamas and Fatah fail. Abbas, who is traveling in Europe, said this week he would move forward with his election plan if the coalition talks fail to produce results within three weeks.

Hamas, which defeated Fatah in parliamentary elections last year, opposes a new vote.

Streets in the hardest-hit neighborhoods were deserted Saturday, and only bakeries and grocery stores opened for business. Gaza City's main outdoor market was closed. Al Azhar University called off exams scheduled for Saturday, and the Hamas-controlled Interior Ministry, which oversees several security forces, told its employees to go home.

Late Saturday night, a 12-year-old boy was killed and two people were wounded in the northern Gaza Strip during a shootout between Hamas and Fatah gunmen, witnesses and hospital officials said. One of the Hamas men was killed in the gunbattle, hospital officials said.

The boy's father, Baher Abu El-Karaya, a local Fatah leader, was injured in the battle. From his hospital bed, he told the Associated Press that Hamas gunmen attacked his home.

Two men were also killed in a car explosion north of Gaza City, Palestinian security officials said. The identities of the men were not immediately known.

A gun battle erupted Saturday near the Islamic University, killing one man, according to hospital officials. In a firefight elsewhere in the city, a Palestinian policeman was killed.

Before dawn Saturday, Hamas gunmen fired mortars at the Abbas-allied Preventive Security Service headquarters and at the home of the force's chief, Rashid Abu Shbak, officials said. The rocket fire started anew Saturday night.

In fighting around the compound on Friday, six Hamas gunmen were killed and a seventh died Saturday of wounds sustained in that battle, said Hamas spokesman Ayman Taha.

He accused Fatah loyalists of storming a mosque near the security headquarters and executing a senior Hamas activist inside while he was reading the Quran, the Muslim holy book. On Saturday, blood stains were still visible on the mosque's carpet and the bathroom tiles.

Fatah denied it had stormed the mosque, but said Hamas gunmen had used the mosque as a base for attacking the security headquarters.

At another Gaza City mosque, Hamas activists hung posters with photos of Hamas supporters killed or wounded in the fighting. "These are the criminal activities of the pro-Zionist, American criminals," the caption read, in reference to Fatah.

DOJ_NMG_0123425

Mediators from two small factions, meanwhile, tried to win the release of hostages taken by the two sides. Late Saturday, seven Hamas activists and four Fatah members were freed in the southern town of Khan Younis, officials said.

Kidnappings have become a common tactic during the infighting. In all cases so far, hostages have been released unharmed. As of late Saturday, roughly a dozen people on each side remained in captivity, officials said.

Tensions have been high since Hamas swept parliamentary elections in January 2006, ending four decades of Fatah rule. Those tensions have frequently erupted into violence, killing some 50 people in Gaza since early December.

In its election campaign, Hamas promised to root out corruption and improve social services. But the Hamas-led government has been paralyzed by an international boycott and accomplished little on its agenda.

Israel and Western donors have cut off hundreds of millions of dollars in funding to the Palestinian government, demanding Hamas renounce violence and recognize Israel's right to exist. Hamas has rejected the conditions, despite deepening poverty in the West Bank and Gaza caused by the sanctions.

Seeking a way out of the crisis, Abbas has called on Hamas to join Fatah in a moderate coalition government. Abbas, who was elected separately, hopes a moderate platform will get the sanctions lifted and allow him to restart peace talks with Israel.

Both Fatah and Hamas officials said late Friday that unity talks would be suspended until the fighting ends. Both sides blamed each other for the breakdown.

Death Toll Mounts In Gaza Battles (BBC)

BBC.com, January 27, 2007

Deadly battles between rival Palestinian factions Hamas and Fatah have continued in the Gaza Strip, leaving at least five more dead.

Saturday's deaths raise the toll since Thursday night to at least 22.

However, despite tension, the funerals for those killed on the previous day passed off peacefully on Saturday.

Clashes erupted in Gaza after weeks of relative calm and renewed efforts to form a national unity government. Both sides say they have suspended talks.

Those killed on Saturday included a boy of 11 or 12 who was hit during a shootout late at night between the two factions in the northern Gaza Strip.

Earlier at least one person died in a gun battle near Gaza's Islamic University, while another died in a car explosion - rumoured to be caused when explosives being carried in the vehicle exploded.

Kidnappings

Shops were shut up and the streets of Gaza City were almost empty on Saturday as people hid inside from the gangs of gunmen stalking the streets.

Members of Hamas and Fatah have fired mortars and grenades at each other and mounted tit-for-tat kidnappings.

Friday was one of the worst days of violence between Hamas and Fatah supporters since Hamas took control of the Palestinian administration a year ago, with at least 13 people reported killed.

Signs of spreading

Both sides blamed the other for the outbreak of violence, which followed a period of relative calm, in which both sides were thought to have been near joining a unity government.

"The unity government talks were on the verge of full agreement and the announcement of a unity government when putschists inside Fatah... rushed to blow up the situation to serve their own interests and a foreign agenda," said Hamas.

Funerals for those killed in the fighting were peaceful

Fatah spokesman Tawfiq Abu Khussa said: "It's clear that Hamas doesn't want the dialogue to succeed. The escalation began with Hamas."

Both sides said they were suspending talks.

The discord has been condemned by the Arab League, the Organisation of the Islamic Conference and Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood, which said: "They speak responsible words and yet the fighting continues."

There has been intensive mediation by Egyptian diplomats to try to stop the bloodshed.

DOJ_NMG_0123426

The UN's Middle East envoy Alvaro de Soto called on all the factions "to cease clashes and comply with international humanitarian law by refraining from acts which endanger civilians".

The violence also showed signs of spreading to the West Bank, where Palestinian police clashed with about 200 Hamas supporters.

Israel May Have Violated Arms Pact, U.S. Officials Say (NYT)

By David S. Cloud, Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan 27 — The Bush administration will inform Congress on Monday that Israel may have violated agreements with the United States when it fired American-supplied cluster munitions into southern Lebanon during its fight with Hezbollah last summer, the State Department said Saturday.

The finding, though preliminary, has prompted a contentious debate within the administration over whether the United States should penalize Israel for its use of cluster munitions against towns and villages where Hezbollah had placed its rocket launchers.

Cluster munitions are anti-personnel weapons that scatter tiny but deadly bomblets over a wide area. The grenadelike munitions, tens of thousands of which have been found in southern Lebanon, have caused 30 deaths and 180 injuries among civilians since the end of the war, according to the United Nations Mine Action Service.

Midlevel officials at the Pentagon and the State Department have argued that Israel violated American prohibitions on using cluster munitions against populated areas, according to officials who described the deliberations. But other officials in both departments contend that Israel's use of the weapons was for self-defense and aimed at stopping the Hezbollah rocket attacks that killed 159 Israeli citizens and at worst was only a technical violation.

Any sanctions against Israel would be an extraordinary move by the Bush administration, a strong backer of Israel, and several officials said they expected little further action, if any, on the matter.

But sanctions against Israel for misusing the weapons would not be unprecedented. The Reagan administration imposed a six-year ban on cluster-weapon sales to Israel in 1982, after a Congressional investigation found that Israel had used the weapons in civilian areas during its 1982 invasion of Lebanon. One option under discussion is to bar additional sales of cluster munitions for some period, an official said.

The State Department is required to notify Congress even of preliminary findings of possible violations of the Arms Export Control Act, the statute governing arms sales. It began an investigation in August.

Sean McCormack, the State Department spokesman, said that the notification to Congress would occur Monday but that a final determination about whether Israel violated the agreements on use of cluster bombs was still being debated.

"It is important to remember the kind of war Hezbollah waged," he said. "They used innocent civilians as a way to shield their fighters."

Even if Israel is found to be in violation, the statute gives President Bush discretion about whether to impose sanctions, unless Congress decides to take legislative action. Israel makes its own cluster munitions, so a cutoff of American supplies would have mainly symbolic significance.

Israel gave the State Department a dozen-page report late last year in which it acknowledged firing thousands of American cluster munitions into southern Lebanon but denied violating agreements that prohibit their use in civilian areas, the officials said. The cluster munitions included artillery shells, rockets and bombs dropped from aircraft, many of which had been sold to Israel years ago, one official said.

Before firing at rocket sites in towns and villages, the Israeli report said, the Israeli military dropped leaflets warning civilians of the attacks. The report, which has not previously been disclosed, also noted that many of the villages were deserted because civilians had fled the fighting, the officials said.

David Siegel, a spokesman for the Israeli Embassy in Washington, said Israel "provided a detailed response to the administration's request for information" on its use of cluster munitions "to halt Hezbollah's unprovoked rockets attacks against our civilian populations centers."

DOJ_NMG_0123427

He added, “Israel suffered heavy casualties in these attacks and acted as any government would in exercise of its right to self-defense.”

John Hillen, who was assistant secretary of state in charge of the bureau until he resigned this month, told Bloomberg News in December that Israel had provided “great cooperation” in the investigation. “From their perspective, use of the munitions was clearly done within the agreements,” he said.

Another administration official said the investigation had caused “head-butting” involving the Bureau of Political-Military Affairs and the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs at the State Department, as well as Pentagon arms sales officials. Some officials “are trying to find a way to not have to call this a substantial violation,” the official said.

In particular, the State Department has asked Israel for additional information on reports that commanders and troops violated orders that restricted how cluster bombs could be used, an official said. In November, Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, the chief of staff of the Israeli military until his resignation on Jan. 17, ordered an investigation into whether restrictions on use of the weapons were ignored by some units.

That investigation is still under way, and military officials have refused to divulge any details in public.

Israel’s Channel 2 television reported in December that the military’s judge advocate general was gathering evidence for possible criminal charges against military officers who might have ordered cluster bombs fired into populated areas.

Israel has told the State Department that it originally tried targeted strikes against Hezbollah rocket sites, but those proved ineffective.

Heavy use of cluster bombs was tried instead, to kill or maim Hezbollah fighters manning the launchers. Israeli commanders employed cluster weapons because they suspected that they would flee after firing their rockets. Even those attacks failed to stop the rockets barrages.

The agreements that govern Israel’s use of American cluster munitions go back to the 1970s. But the details, which have been revised several times, are classified.

However, officials said that the agreements specified that cluster weapons could not be used in populated areas, in part because of the risk to civilians after a conflict is over if the bomblets fail to self-destruct, as they are designed to do.

The agreements said the munitions be used only against organized armies and clearly defined military targets under conditions similar to the Arab-Israeli wars of 1967 and 1973, when Israel arguably faced threats to its survival, officials said.

Since the end of last summer’s war, de-mining team have located 800 cluster-bomb strike areas, and they destroyed 95,000 bomblets, said Christopher Clark, program manager for the United Nations Mine Action Service in Lebanon.

“We found them pretty much everywhere — in villages, at road junctions, in olive groves and on banana plantations,” Mr. Clark said.

The casualty rate has come down sharply, he said. Right after the war, there were more than 40 casualties a week; now it is about 3 or 4 a week.

Donatella Rovera, a researcher with Amnesty International in London, said older American cluster weapons used by Israel during the war did not reliably self-destruct, compared with Israel’s own cluster munitions, which are newer and are said to have a much lower dud rate.

“We’ve asked them to release detailed maps on where the cluster bombs were used,” Ms. Rovera said of the Israeli military. “That is the one thing that could help speed up the cleanup process.”

U.S. State Dept. Report To Address Possible Arms Violations By Israel (LAT/AP)

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

WASHINGTON — The State Department has completed a preliminary report on whether Israel misused American-made cluster bombs in civilian areas of Lebanon.

State Department spokesman Kurtis Cooper said Saturday that the report would be forwarded to Congress on Monday but declined to disclose the findings, emphasizing that they were preliminary.

"We take our obligations under the Arms Control Act seriously," Cooper said. "Our forwarding to Congress of a preliminary assessment is an indication of that.

DOJ_NMG_0123428

"The Israeli government is also taking quite seriously their responsibility in providing information. We are not making a final judgment."

The State Department is required to notify Congress of even preliminary findings of possible violations of the arms act.

The New York Times reported online Saturday evening that the report would say Israel might have violated agreements with the United States by its use of American-supplied cluster munitions during last year's conflict.

The paper described disagreement among midlevel officials at the Defense Department and the State Department, with some in both departments arguing that Israel violated U.S. prohibitions on using cluster munitions against population areas. Others in both departments argued that the weapons were used in self-defense to stop Hezbollah rocket attacks and that, at worst, only a technical violation might have occurred.

A congressional investigation found Israel improperly used U.S.-made cluster bombs during its 1982 invasion of Lebanon. The Reagan administration then imposed a six-year ban on further sales of the weapons to Israel.

Such sanctions are largely symbolic, however, since Israel also makes its own cluster munitions.

The United Nations said unexploded cluster bombs — anti-personnel weapons that spray bomblets over a wide area — litter homes, gardens and highways in southern Lebanon.

Relief organizations and the U.N. mine office have reported finding evidence that Israel used three types of U.S.-made cluster bombs during the 34-day battle with Hezbollah militants, during which both sides fired rockets into populated areas.

Saving Lebanon (NYT)

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

It is good that international donors have pledged $7.6 billion to help rebuild Lebanon after last summer's devastating Israeli air strikes. The democratically elected government of Prime Minister Fouad Siniora needs all the help it can get. Clashes between Shiite supporters of Hezbollah and the government's mainly Sunni supporters threaten to overwhelm Mr. Siniora's fragile coalition.

If not contained, they could even reignite Lebanon's catastrophic civil war. Lebanon's fundamental problem is the archaic and unfair political system that divides the country's top offices among rival and distrustful religious communities. Lebanon's large and impoverished Shiite minority, long a major loser in this system, has been increasingly radicalized — straight into the arms of Hezbollah.

Hezbollah has a political party in Parliament, political gangsters on Beirut's streets and a heavily armed militia whose attacks on Israel provoked last summer's destruction. Hezbollah also has close links to Iran, which supplies its weapons and cash, and Syria, which provides safe passage for those weapons and more. Any plan for stabilizing Lebanon has to face up to this dynamic. That's why the Bush administration needs to drop its stubborn resistance to diplomacy with Syria — and try to coax Damascus away from both Iran and Hezbollah.

Washington must make clear that Lebanon's sovereignty is not negotiable. Nor will there be any bargaining over the United Nations investigation into the 2005 assassination of the former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri — and Syria's all but certain complicity. When treated as an important regional actor, Syria has at times responded constructively. It has always responded destructively to isolation. Engaging Syria may not work. But ignoring it all but guarantees that even $7.6 billion in aid will not be enough to stabilize Lebanon.

Saudi Officials Seek To Temper The Price Of Oil (NYT)

By Jad Mouawad

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

Saudi Arabia, which benefited immensely from record oil prices last year, has sent signals in the past two weeks that it is committed to keeping oil at around $50 a barrel — down $27 a barrel from the summer peak that shook consumers across the developed world.

The indications came in typically cryptic fashion for the oil-rich kingdom. In Tokyo last week, Ali al-Naimi, the Saudi oil minister, said Saudi Arabia's policy was to maintain "moderate prices." The previous week, on a stop in New Delhi, he effectively put his veto on an emergency meeting of the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries to prop up prices after oil briefly dropped below $50 a barrel, the lowest level in nearly two years.

DOJ_NMG_0123429

The events that propelled oil prices above $77 a barrel last July, then dragged them down again, were beyond the control of any single producer. Still, Saudi Arabia, which is by far the largest oil producer within OPEC and sets the cartel's agenda, is seeking to avoid a repeat of the dramatic rise in prices while trying to put a floor beneath them.

Nowhere was last summer's spike in oil prices felt more profoundly than in the United States. As gasoline rose above $3 a gallon, consumers cut their spending elsewhere, tamping down profits in retail, travel and other industries. United States automakers were devastated as consumers fled from large vehicles to smaller ones, which have historically been the specialty of the Japanese; on Thursday, Ford said that 2006 had been the worst year in its history.

The recent slide back to $50 a barrel for oil — which translates to about $2 for a gallon of gasoline — has eased the pressure on the domestic economy, quieting talk that oil prices and the declining housing market would lead to a recession.

The Saudis appear to be rediscovering that painfully high energy prices take a profound toll on the global economy, which in turn reduces demand for their oil. But other motives seem to be at work, too, including the Saudis' desire to restrain Iran's ambitions in the region.

How much influence the United States has exerted is an open question. Vice President Dick Cheney met with King Abdullah of Saudi Arabia in Riyadh in November, but his office would not say if oil was discussed. The White House has been supportive of Saudi energy policy, and President Bush and his father are close with Prince Bandar bin Sultan, the Saudi national security minister and former ambassador to Washington.

Although Saudi officials say their oil policy is based on market considerations and not political ones, the meeting in November led to renewed speculation that the kingdom might be tempted to dry out Iran's ambitions by pushing oil prices down. Prices have already been falling because of mild weather and slowing demand.

Prices at $50 to $55 a barrel are just about right for the Saudis, according to Saudi energy officials — not too high to hurt the global economy, not too low to hurt their own economy. Last year's record highs meant that the growth in global oil demand slowed to 1 percent in 2006, compared with a 4 percent increase at its peak in 2004.

But 2006 was not the first reminder for the Saudis that too-high prices can backfire. The oil shocks of the 1970s and 1980s also set off a scramble for gas-sipping cars and a brief push to wean the West from its oil dependency. In recent months, the higher prices have rekindled America's quest for alternatives and propelled energy security to the top of the agenda in the United States and Europe.

Even President Bush, who began his presidency emphasizing the need to increase domestic oil production rather than cutting consumption, called for a reduction in gasoline use over the next decade in last week's State of the Union address.

High prices have also emboldened rivals within OPEC, among them Iran and Venezuela, which have used their oil revenue to prop up their governments and export their more radical agendas. Saudi Arabia has worked cooperatively with Iran since the late 1990s, when oil producers were panicked by the decline of prices to around $10 a barrel. More recently, Iran has favored rising prices over the moderation that Saudi Arabia seeks. Venezuela also tends to favor higher prices but wields less political influence in the cartel.

"High prices are not in the interest of Saudi Arabia," said Sadek Boussena, a former OPEC president from Algeria. "We've all seen what $70 does: it attracts alternatives, it reduces demand. On the other hand, I don't think the Saudis want oil below $50. They need the revenue."

The Bush administration has repeatedly acknowledged Saudi Arabia's efforts in trying to moderate prices. "Buyers and sellers have a common interest in maintaining reasonable prices for oil," Samuel Bodman, the energy secretary, said in October.

There is no set formula for setting oil prices. In the 1980s, the market settled on around $18 a barrel as a fair price. In the 1990s, it was ratcheted up to $22 to $25 a barrel. Recently, oil producers have realized they can charge twice that amount, although consuming nations complain that the price is too high.

Mr. Naimi, the Saudi oil minister, borrowing the manner of a careful central banker, is rarely explicit about his plans. His every word is dissected by legions of analysts for the slightest hint of an inflection in policy.

DOJ_NMG_0123430

Sometimes, the uncertainty gives rise to more conspiratorial theories. Oil traders have been buzzing in recent weeks about whether Saudi Arabia was seeking to depress oil markets in hopes of crippling Iran's economy, as a Saudi analyst — albeit not one from the government — suggested late last year in an opinion article in The Washington Post. The Saudis quickly dismissed the claim, but given the tensions in the Middle East, oil and politics remain closely linked.

"It is difficult to work out what the Saudis really want, since they never say things explicitly," said Leo Drollas, the chief economist at the Center for Global Energy Studies, a London-based research group founded by Sheik Ahmed Zaki Yamani, a former Saudi oil minister. Sometimes, he said, "you have to read between the lines."

The Saudi government does not disclose what oil price it uses when it builds its budget, but analysts at Samba Financial Group, a bank in Saudi Arabia, say they believe the price is $42 a barrel for 2007, with oil production at about 9 million barrels a day. With oil averaging $66 a barrel last year, the kingdom recorded a budget surplus of nearly $71 billion, Samba said, five times more than in 2005.

Saudi officials repeatedly point out that they do not set the price of oil on international commodity markets — they point the finger at hedge funds and other speculative traders for the heightened volatility in recent years. Nor, they say, do they run their oil industry with political considerations in mind.

Mr. Naimi has led the ascent of oil prices since 2000 and managed his various partners within OPEC toward better discipline within the cartel. Last fall, under Saudi stewardship, OPEC members twice agreed to cut their output to prevent prices from falling too steeply.

More than any specific target, the Saudis have always sought stability in oil prices. But stability may prove just as elusive this year as it did last year, given how vulnerable global oil supplies remain to the vagaries of the weather as well as political turmoil in the Middle East and Africa.

Although OPEC's 12 members decide by unanimous votes whether to increase oil production — which lowers prices by making supply more plentiful — consumer pressures ultimately hold sway, and an extremely cold winter followed by a very hot summer could override whatever price goals the Saudis have set.

Not everyone is reading the Saudis' recent public signals — scant as they are — in the same way. "The Saudi policy has not changed," said Roger Diwan, an energy analyst at PFC Energy. The Saudis, he said, have "led the way in managing the market. They showed leadership in OPEC."

But Amy Myers Jaffe, the associate director of Rice University's energy program, said she thought that Saudi policy had shifted, backing away from a defense of higher prices.

"The debate in Saudi Arabia is about what is the right strategy, where demand is headed, and what is the right amount of investments," she said. "And that's a very tough question."

Pelosi, U.S. Congressional Delegation Meets President Musharraf In Pakistan (AP)

AP, January 27, 2007

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan (AP) — House Speaker Nancy Pelosi arrived in Pakistan Saturday for talks with the country's president expected to touch on cooperation against Taliban and al-Qaeda militants and U.S. aid to the South Asian country, officials said.

Neither the U.S. delegation nor President Gen. Pervez Musharraf was scheduled to make any public comment after the meeting, which coincides with concern in Pakistan about a U.S. bill that would link American aid for Pakistan's military with its commitment to combating resurgent Taliban militants.

The bill, introduced this month after Democrats took control of Congress, would require President Bush to certify that Islamabad is doing its utmost to counter Taliban operations in Pakistan and secure its border with Afghanistan.

Failure to do that would cut off some financial aid to Pakistan's military, though the president could waive the provision in the interests of national security.

The Senate has yet to consider it, and U.S. Deputy Assistant Secretary of State John Gastright said Friday in Islamabad that the Bush administration wanted the provision removed.

DOJ_NMG_0123431

Gastright said Pelosi's decision to visit Pakistan with her first congressional delegation showed that she shared the administration's interest in close ties with Pakistan and its military president.

"We'll want to work with her (Pelosi) so that she realizes that that provision is not necessary," Gastright said.

15 Die In Blast Near Pakistani Shiite Mosque (WP/AP)

By Riaz Khan

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

PESHAWAR, Pakistan, Jan. 27 -- A suicide attacker detonated a bomb among police on guard near a Shiite mosque in this northern Pakistani city Saturday, killing at least 15 people and wounding more than 30, police said.

The attack came as House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) led a U.S. congressional delegation to Islamabad, the capital about 90 miles east, where they spoke with Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, about the situation in neighboring Afghanistan, a Pakistani official said.

The meeting took place less than three weeks after the House passed legislation that would link U.S. military aid to Pakistan's commitment to combating Taliban guerrillas -- a measure some feared could strain relations between the two nations, allies in the fight against terrorism.

Musharraf condemned the "terrorist attack" in Peshawar and ordered an immediate inquiry, the state-run Associated Press of Pakistan reported.

The explosion came as Pakistan's minority Shiites started to commemorate their most important religious festival, Ashura, often an impetus for sectarian violence. Paramilitary forces in armored vehicles were deployed to patrol Peshawar after the bombing.

The blast went off in a bazaar area about 200 yards from a mosque that was the starting point for a Shiite procession.

Most of the victims were police and municipal officials who were clearing the route for the procession. The city's police chief, Malik Saab, was among the dead, the provincial police chief said.

There was no immediate assertion of responsibility, but suspicion was likely to fall on Sunni extremists.

Most Shiites and Sunnis in Pakistan coexist peacefully, but militant groups on both sides are blamed for sectarian attacks that claim scores of lives every year.

Some fear the relentless sectarian fighting in Iraq risks igniting Sunni-Shiite tensions in other Muslim countries.

Bombing Kills 14 Pakistanis (NYT)

By Ismail Khan

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

PESHAWAR, Pakistan, Jan. 27 — At least 14 people were killed, most of them policemen, and several others were wounded Saturday in what appeared to be a suicide bombing here shortly before a Shiite religious procession was to come through, the police said.

The police said the incident occurred in the old part of Peshawar, the capital of North-West Frontier Province, late in the evening, as police and city workers were clearing a narrow street near a Shiite mosque to make way for the procession. Among the dead were the city police chief, Malik Muhammad Saad, and several government representatives from the neighborhood, the police said.

The police said they believed the attack was by a lone suicide bomber who detonated his explosives after being stopped by a police cordon at the mouth of the street. The remains of a person the police thought was the bomber had been sent for forensic analysis, and the search for more evidence continued, said Ghulam Muhammad, a police official in the city.

The Edhi Foundation, a charity group that runs ambulance services, said it had taken at least 14 bodies to a local hospital, where people had thronged to give blood donations for the wounded.

The explosion also damaged the local power network, plunging the entire area into darkness as police and local volunteers searched for the dead and wounded.

Security in Peshawar was already on alert after a suicide bombing outside a Marriott hotel in Islamabad on Friday and in preparation for Ashura, one of Shiite Islam's holiest days.

DOJ_NMG_0123432

But the leader of the province's religious government, Akram Khan Durrani, told reporters that precautions would be further increased.

Still, the police said there was little any one could do to head off a determined suicide bomber.

"How do you know who is the suicide bomber among a multitude of people?" a policeman said at the scene.

Pakistan Bombing Kills 14 People (BBC)

BBC.com, January 27, 2007

A bomb blast in Pakistan's north-west city of Peshawar has killed at least 14 people - mostly policemen including two senior officers - officials say.

At least 30 others were injured by the explosion just as a Shia religious procession was about to start.

Initial indications point to a suicide bombing, officials say.

This is the second deadly blast in Pakistan in two days. On Friday, a suicide bomber blew himself up at an Islamabad hotel, also killing a guard.

Peshawar chief of police Malik Saad and the city's deputy superintendent were among the dead.

Security forces have been on high alert ahead of the annual Shia festival of Ashoura, commemorating the 7th Century martyrdom of the Prophet Muhammad's grandson.

In recent years Sunni extremists have targeted Shias during this period, says the BBC's Barbara Plett in Islamabad.

There have also been threats of retaliation following government strikes against militants in the nearby tribal areas.

'In a bad way'

Most of the victims were police and municipal officials clearing the route for a Shia procession, officer Aziz Khan - who was on duty nearby - told AP news agency.

"I was shocked by a big explosion. I thought my eardrums had burst. Then there were flames and the people were in panic.

Troops have been on high alert ahead of a Shia religious festival

"I remembered that there was a police contingent, so I went to see what had happened to my colleagues. Many were wounded in a bad way," he said.

Blood and flesh were splattered over the narrow lane where the blast took place, and there was broken glass from shop fronts underfoot as police scoured the site.

It is not clear whether the attack was aimed at the worshippers or the police.

Power was cut in the city centre shortly after the blast, complicating rescue efforts.

Hundreds of people rushed to hospitals, hoping for news of their loved ones.

President Pervez Musharraf strongly condemned the attack and expressed condolences to the victims' families.

Pakistan Mosque Bombing Kills Police Chief, Officers (LAT)

By Zulfiqar Ali, Laura King

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

PESHAWAR, PAKISTAN — An apparent suicide bombing killed at least 13 people Saturday in this volatile frontier city, a day after a suicide attack killed a bomber and a hotel security guard in the Pakistani capital.

It was not immediately clear whether the attack in Peshawar, which came at an event marking the year's most important Shiite Muslim holiday, was an act of sectarian violence or was aimed at police and paramilitary forces guarding the event. Nearly all the dead were reported to be police officers, including the city's police chief.

Scores of people were wounded in the powerful blast, which took place near one of the city's largest mosques before the start of an evening Shiite procession to commemorate the holy day of Ashura.

Adding to the chaos, a power failure apparently caused by the explosion plunged the area into darkness. Rescuers groped in the dark, guided by the cries and moans of the injured.

Several of the wounded were reported to be in critical condition.

President Pervez Musharraf issued a statement denouncing the blast as a terrorist attack. Provincial authorities convened an emergency meeting to discuss ways to prevent further violence.

DOJ_NMG_0123433

Police said they could not confirm that it had been a suicide attack, but that the dismembered condition of one of the bodies suggested that explosives had been strapped to it.

The explosion came despite extremely tight security in Peshawar's city center in connection with Ashura, which has frequently been a time of violence between Pakistan's majority Sunnis and minority Shiites. Angry Shiites poured into the streets after the attack, calling for revenge.

The attack occurred as a U.S. congressional delegation led by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) was visiting Islamabad, the capital, about 90 miles east of Peshawar. The delegation held discussions with Musharraf centering on Pakistan's role in fighting the insurgency in neighboring Afghanistan.

On Friday, a bomber carried out a rare suicide attack in Islamabad, targeting a luxury hotel frequented by diplomats and foreigners. But the attacker was prevented from entering the Marriott by a security guard, who was killed along with the bomber.

No claim of responsibility was issued for the attack, which took part in a high-security zone of the capital that is the site of many government offices.

Ashura, which is Monday or Tuesday, is the climax of a 10-day mourning period for Shiites that begins the Islamic month of Muharram.

It is a time when devout Shiites engage in fervent and emotional displays of faith, sometimes whipping them-selves with chains or swords, to commemorate the slaying of Imam Hussein, a grandson of the prophet Muhammad.

U.S. Citizens Killed In Kenya (NYT)

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

NAIROBI, Kenya, Jan. 27 — Two Americans, including an elderly woman, were shot to death on Saturday afternoon by carjackers in Nairobi, the capital, according to American and Kenyan officials.

The two victims, relatives of an American Embassy employee, were traveling in an embassy car with three other Americans when a truck cut them off, police officials said. Four men jumped out with Kalashnikov assault rifles and ordered the occupants out of their car.

“Apparently, the driver and an elderly woman sitting in front did not move fast enough,” a police spokesman said. “So the bandits shot them.”

Nairobi has been plagued by violent crime, and American officials said they did not believe the attack was related to terrorism.

Police: Carjackers Fatally Shoot 2 Women In U.S. Embassy Car In Kenya (AP)

AP, January 27, 2007

NAIROBI, Kenya (AP) — Gunmen carjacked a U.S. Embassy vehicle on the outskirts of the Kenyan capital Saturday afternoon and killed two female relatives of an embassy employee, officials said. Police later killed two people involved in the carjacking.

The victims were the wife and mother-in-law of a U.S. Embassy employee, embassy spokesman Robert Kerr said, without providing further details.

"This a horrible event," he said. "These were people who loved Kenya."

The gunmen "ordered the two women out but they hesitated," said Isaiah Osugo, a criminal investigations officer in Nairobi. "Then they were shot."

Kenyan police later killed two people involved in the carjackings, police spokesman Gideon Kibunja said. He could not immediately provide more details.

Officials withheld the women's names.

Francis Munyambu, Nairobi's deputy provisional police officer, said the carjackers escaped with the embassy vehicle and were armed with Kalashnikov assault rifles.

Earlier in the day, the men had carjacked Michael Madine along the same road, according to police and Madine. Madine spoke to The Associated Press at the scene after being interviewed by police.

DOJ_NMG_0123434

"Four men with AK-47s carjacked me," he said in Swahili. He said one of the carjackers stayed in the car with him while the others attacked the embassy vehicle.

"I heard one of the women screaming and then I heard three gunshots," Madine said. The carjackers then fled, he said.

The shooting happened just off a highway in Kinoo, about 20 kilometers (12 miles) outside Nairobi. An Associated Press reporter at the scene saw two pools of blood on the roadside.

Shortly after Munyambu's news conference, two men who identified themselves only as officials from the U.S. Embassy ordered reporters to leave the scene and took journalists' pictures, threatening to ban them from the embassy.

Carjackings are common in and around Nairobi, but Saturday's attack was unusually brazen because it took place during the day. In September, the chief U.S. military attache was shot and seriously wounded in a carjacking in Nairobi. Russia's ambassador was stabbed in a robbery on Aug. 20. A month earlier, a Danish diplomat was attacked and robbed.

Kenya's government spokesman, Alfred Mutua, said officials believe Saturday's violence was "a random attack." He did not provide further details.

Sudan's Peace Deal, Seen As A Bush Success, Is Endangered (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

A peace agreement that two years ago ended Africa's longest-running conflict -- and that the White House considers one of President Bush's signature achievements -- is in danger of unraveling because of inattention by top U.S. officials and growing tensions between Sudan's government and the former rebels who signed the deal, according to experts and congressional officials.

The two-decade civil war, which pitted the Islamic government in the north against rebels based in the mostly animist and Christian south, left 2 million people dead, primarily from famine and disease, and 4 million homeless. Christian evangelical groups -- a key part of Bush's political base -- had pressed hard for a resolution, and the administration made a peace agreement one of its top diplomatic priorities.

Last month, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice cited the peace deal -- under which the southern part of the country would receive religious and political autonomy and a share of Sudan's oil riches -- when she was asked what Bush would be remembered for besides Iraq. "He should be known for having contributed vitally to stopping the civil war between southern and northern Sudan," Rice said.

But now experts warn that the Khartoum government's unwillingness to abide by the terms of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) could lead to a new outbreak of war. "The CPA is eroding," said Roger Winter, a former State Department official who was involved in the negotiations. "It is not dead by any means, but it is eroding and Khartoum wants it to erode." He said he sees signs that the Sudanese government is no longer interested in the peace deal and has taken steps to prepare for another conflict.

Many experts said the administration, distracted by war in the Middle East and an unrelated conflict in Sudan's Darfur region, has failed to recognize the peril lurking in the south. (Similarly, many now believe that the administration let the Darfur conflict spiral out of control in 2003 because it was so focused on reaching a peace accord in the south.)

Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.), a leading force in Congress on Sudan, said, "The bench over at the State Department is very shallow now" -- virtually all the experts on Sudan have left in the past year -- and the administration is "preoccupied with other issues."

Bush in September appointed a special envoy to Sudan, Andrew S. Natsios, but Natsios has mainly focused on Darfur, where as many as 450,000 people have died in what the administration labels a campaign of genocide by the Sudanese government.

"They have Natsios dealing with Darfur, but they have no one dealing with the south," said Rep. Donald M. Payne (D-N.J.), chairman of the Africa subcommittee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee. He said the administration should appoint a special envoy specifically to make sure the north-south peace deal does not collapse.

DOJ_NMG_0123435

A senior administration official involved in Africa affairs, speaking on the condition of anonymity in order to speak freely, said the administration has kept its focus on both Darfur and the situation in south Sudan. But he acknowledged that there are legitimate concerns. "There has been significant movement on the CPA, and you don't want to undersell that," he said. "But we have been disappointed with the pace of progress."

The conflict between the north and the south extends back half a century, since shortly after Sudan's independence in 1956. A 1972 accord helped usher in a decade of peace, but a civil war erupted in 1983 after the Sudanese government abrogated the pact and tried to impose Islamic law, or sharia. The discovery of vast oil reserves, mainly in the south, has exacerbated the struggle.

Under the peace agreement, which was signed in a joyous celebration in a Nairobi stadium two years ago, sharia will apply to the Arab north but not to the African south. The south is to have a six-year interim period of self-rule, after which it will vote in a referendum on whether to remain part of Sudan or secede.

But negotiators hoped that the deal would keep Sudan intact, with the prospect of secession by the south intended to put pressure on the government to uphold its end of the bargain. In a carefully negotiated compromise, an autonomous government is to emerge in the south while new national institutions are created.

But the rebel leader John Garang was killed in a helicopter crash shortly after he became first vice president of Sudan in July 2005. His successor, Salva Kiir Mayardit, lashed out at the Khartoum government this month during a second-anniversary celebration of the accord, accusing it of continuing to bankroll militias in the south, refusing to share oil wealth and stalling on border agreements.

As a visibly angry President Omar Hassan al-Bashir sat on the dais, Kiir pleaded to "give peace a chance." Asking whether the leaders had worked toward making the unity of the government attractive, Kiir declared: "The answer is regrettably no! Problems, serious problems still remain to be resolved."

Bashir then fired back with his own accusations, saying that delays and problems are the fault of the rebels, not the government. The unusually public spat focused renewed attention on the sputtering accord.

Barnaba Benjamin, minister for regional development in the government of south Sudan, told a House Foreign Affairs panel last week that "the country can break up unless the CPA is implemented in spirit and in letter."

Winter said that an area known as Abyei, between the northern and southern parts of Sudan, is a particular source of tension. Under the peace agreement, Abyei, which has a huge oil field, can vote in 2011 on whether to be part of the north or the south. But Bashir has rejected the findings of a boundary commission and has refused to allow the creation of a local government, convincing the local population that war will break out again in the territory. Winter faulted the administration for failing to publicly pressure Khartoum on this critical issue.

Though Garang was long an advocate of Sudanese unity, his death and the Darfur disaster have made it increasingly likely that the south Sudanese will vote overwhelmingly for independence, according to focus group surveys conducted by the National Democratic Institute.

Winter said Khartoum appears ready to break the peace deal before the election takes place, so the administration needs to help the south prepare for independence.

The administration official acknowledged that south Sudan is moving toward independence. "We have to plan for that," he said. "The idea behind the CPA was that there would be a transformation of Sudan, that it would become a responsible player in the international community. Many south Sudanese would say they have not seen that."

A Choice For Darfur (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

DAVOS, Switzerland

Over the next two days, African leaders will convene in Ethiopia and choose a new head of the African Union. Incredibly, that job may go to Sudan's blood-drenched president, Omar al-Bashir, architect of the genocide in Darfur.

DOJ_NMG_0123436

The outcome is still uncertain, with Sudan campaigning furiously for the job, but it's mind-boggling that African countries would even consider selecting as their leader a man who has systematically dispatched militias that pick out babies on the basis of tribe and skin color and throw them into bonfires.

At a time when Africa is enjoying solid economic growth and improved leadership, this self-inflicted wound would sully Africa's image and make it far more difficult for African Union peacekeepers to save lives in Darfur.

Mr. Bashir hasn't confined himself to killing his own people, but has also sent his janjaweed militias to invade Chad and the Central African Republic. The janjaweed have beaten mothers with their own babies, until the infants are dead, and lately they have diversified into gouging out people's eyes with bayonets. For anyone who wants the best for Africa, it is repulsive to think of President Bashir as the duly elected spokesman for the continent.

One reason Mr. Bashir has continued to engage in such behavior is that the world doesn't seriously object. Almost all North African countries are backing his bid to chair the African Union. China, which supplies nearly all the AK-47s that are used to kill children in Darfur, has underwritten the genocide. Lately, it has encouraged Sudan to be more responsible, but President Hu Jintao is visiting Sudan shortly — let's see whether he publicly expresses concern about Chinese-supported atrocities in Africa that far exceed the Rape of Nanjing.

Sudan promised a cease-fire, but instead it has been attacking aid workers. As Newsweek reported, at least four female aid workers have been beaten and sexually abused recently — raped in the case of two French women.

In addition, an aid worker in Sudan tells me that on Jan. 22 the police raided a party in the city of Nyala and arrested 22 employees of aid groups. Several were beaten and one woman was sexually abused but managed to fend off an attempted rape.

Broader security is also collapsing. On a road near Bulbul that used to be safe, gunmen stopped a public bus in the middle of the day and brutally beat the men and gang-raped the women for hours. In the face of all this, aid workers are jittery and some are pulling out.

Yet Europe is oblivious (the Davos conference here has great sessions on Africa but nothing on Darfur). President Bush has been better than most world leaders, but still pathetic: he mustered half a sentence in his State of the Union address. Perhaps this is because Mr. Bush regards the situation as tragic but hopeless, but in fact there is plenty he could do.

He could speak out forcefully about Darfur. He could bring victims to the White House for a photo op. He could help the U.N. send a force to protect Chad and the Central African Republic — while continuing to push for U.N. peacekeepers in Darfur itself. He could visit Darfur or Chad and invite European or Chinese officials to join him. He could invite African leaders to Washington for a summit meeting that would include discussion of Darfur. He could impose a no-fly zone. He could develop targeted sanctions against Sudanese leaders. He could begin forensic accounting to find assets of those leaders in Western countries. He could call on NATO and the Pentagon to prepare contingency plans in case the janjaweed start massacring the hundreds of thousands of Darfuris in camps.

And this weekend he could telephone a few African presidents to tell them what a catastrophe it would be if Africa chose Mr. Bashir as its leader.

Serious negotiations between the government and Darfur's rebels are crucial for a lasting peace deal in Darfur, and new discussions are expected soon (that may be why President Hu dares visit Khartoum). But Mudawi Ibrahim Adam, a Sudanese human rights leader, says the new talks will fail unless the Darfur rebels have a chance to consult first. And when they try to meet, the Sudanese government bombs them.

A Useful Rebuke On Rights (WP)

By Jim Hoagland

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

When Desmond Tutu speaks out about morality in politics and foreign policy, his nation and the rest of the world should listen. By criticizing the government he helped bring into being, the South African Nobel laureate raises in his own distinctive fashion some of the key issues of our time.

DOJ_NMG_0123437

Tutu, along with Nelson Mandela, has been instrumental in guiding South Africa's peaceful and democratic transition from the tyranny of a white minority to black majority rule. Over four decades, Tutu has established a reputation for integrity, wisdom and fairness that has few equals on the world stage.

The retired archbishop of Cape Town also speaks his mind. He did so after his government offered diplomatic comfort to Burma's oppressive military regime on Jan. 12. That was when South Africa cast its first vote as a nonpermanent member of the U.N. Security Council to block a resolution condemning Burma for flagrant human rights abuses. The resolution also drew vetoes from Russia and China, which are determined to avoid scrutiny of their own actions to crush dissent.

"I am deeply disappointed by our vote. It is a betrayal of our own noble past," Tutu said in an e-mail to the Associated Press. "If others had used the arguments we are using today when we asked them for their support against apartheid, we might still have been unfree."

The government claims that it voted on "technical" grounds to give a pass to Burma (also known as Myanmar) because that country does not qualify as "a threat to international peace." In other words: Not our problem, man.

But Tutu rightly suggests that because of its history, post-apartheid South Africa has a special responsibility to pursue a foreign policy that supports international action to help oppressed populations.

South Africa is a rare example where international economic pressure and censure helped to halt gross racial discrimination and human rights violations and to bring positive change. Sanctions and international ostracism of the apartheid government worked in ways they did not on the oil-producing police state of Saddam Hussein's Iraq and in other places. While South Africans deserve primary credit for deciding collectively to transform their country, Tutu is characteristically forthright in pointing to the help they received -- and should now be prepared to extend to others in distant lands.

His plea also underlines the stunning failure of President Thabo Mbeki's government to slow the slide of neighboring Zimbabwe into misery and tyranny under the paranoid rule of Robert Mugabe, or to show compassion to its own citizens suffering with AIDS. Mbeki's African National Congress risks being judged by history as having given back little once in power.

Tutu swings a needed spotlight on the evolving role of moral causes in foreign policy, a subject Americans have been debating episodically since Jimmy Carter ordered his State Department to make human rights a priority, with mixed results. The U.S. debate has taken on new urgency as fresh approaches to Iraq are sought by both President Bush and his critics.

Tutu is obviously not part of that discussion. But his broader point is: Our debate cannot be conducted honestly without reference to the moral responsibility toward Iraqis that past U.S. actions have created for us as a nation. Just as South Africans should be guided by the recent past, Americans must recall their government's history with Iraq.

It is a history of fomenting and then betraying successive uprisings by Kurds and Shiites against the genocidal regime in Baghdad and of offering aid and succor to that regime in its war against Iran. It is a history of more than a decade of limited warfare and economic sanctions that helped grind Iraqi society to dust even before the invasion of 2003.

For better and for worse, President Bush has pursued a values-based foreign policy that is being widely criticized for ignoring U.S. national interests. The disasters of Iraq are driving the pendulum of American opinion back to an interests-based or "realistic" foreign policy that would blank out the heavy responsibilities of history.

But the pursuit of interests to the exclusion of values is no more sustainable in a democratic society than is the pursuit of values to the exclusion of interests. Democratic governments must establish a judicious balance.

Bush has failed to underpin his narrowly American approach to values with a persuasive appeal to international moral standards and conscience. Desmond Tutu's reproach to his own government is a cogent reminder of the perils and ignominy that such failure brings.

Despite Crackdown, Migrants Stream Into South Mexico (NYT)

By James C. McKinley

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

TAPACHULA, Mexico — Four Salvadoran men in jeans and T-shirts trudged along the railroad tracks under a hot sun, their steps carrying them steadily toward a fuzzy but seductive dream.

DOJ_NMG_0123438

They had been in Mexico for only a few hours and already federal police officers had forced them to strip and had taken almost all their cash, they said. They had some 1,500 miles to go to reach the United States border, with no food or water and $9 each.

They intended to walk along the Chiapas coast for the first 250 miles through a dozen towns where migrants are regularly robbed or raped. Then they planned to clamber aboard a freight train with hundreds of other immigrants for the trip north, a dangerous journey that has left hundreds before them maimed after they fell under the wheels.

"It's dangerous, yes, one risks one's life," said one of the men, Noé Hernández. "One risks it if you have a family member in the States to help you. It's not just for fun we go through Mexico."

A month ago, Mexico's new president, Felipe Calderón, announced measures to slow the flow of illegal immigrants across Mexico's southern border and reduce crime in this lush but impoverished region. He stepped up the presence of soldiers and federal police here, told of plans for a guest worker program and promised joint state and federal operations to catch illegal immigrants.

But much remains to be done to stop or deter the migrants, and for now the measures have had little effect. Social workers and volunteers who aid the migrants say they keep coming.

Every three days, 300 to 500 Central Americans swarm the freight train in Arriaga, strapping themselves with ropes or belts to the tops of cars or riding between the wagons, they say.

The migrants still wade across the Suchiate River between Guatemala and Mexico with little hindrance. Corruption is rampant. Soldiers and police officers on the Mexican side extort money from the migrants but seldom turn them around, aid workers and migrants said.

"It's an open border," said Francisco Aceves Verdugo, a supervisor in the government agency, Grupos Beta, that gives food, water and medicine to illegal migrants. "We are confronting a monster so big in the form of corruption that we aren't doing anything."

The federal authorities do catch and deport illegal immigrants from Central America on their trek north — about 170,000 last year, according to Leticia Rodríguez, a spokeswoman for the National Migration Institute.

On the evening of Jan. 19, as part of Mr. Calderón's new get-tough policy, about 400 federal police officers stopped the freight train just after it left Arriaga and arrested more than 100 immigrants who had climbed aboard.

Still, aid workers say a majority gets through. The biggest deterrent, migrants say, is not federal authorities but armed thugs who waylay them along the railroad tracks or on paths through the countryside used to avoid the immigration posts along the main highway.

This month, Misael Mejía, 27, from Comayagua, Honduras, was awaiting the train in Arriaga with nine other young men from his town. They had walked for 11 days after wading across the Suchiate to get to the railhead in Arriaga.

None of them had a dime after being ambushed a week before by three men in ski masks in daylight near Huehuetán. Two of the men carried machetes, the third a machine gun.

"They told us to lay down and take off our clothes," Mr. Mejía said. "I lost my watch, about 500 Honduran lempiras, and 40 Mexican pesos," about $31.

Mr. Mejía said he would press on. He has a brother in Arizona who has promised to pick him up if he can run the gantlet through the United States border patrol. He left a $200-a-month job as a driver behind, along with his wife. His brother makes $700 a week as a carpenter.

"I felt hopeless in Honduras," he said. "Because I could never afford a house, not even a car. There is nothing I could have."

Down the street from the tracks, at the Hearth of Mercy shelter, where illegal immigrants can get a free hot meal and medicine, Juan Antonio Cruz, 16, hunched over a bowl of rice and told how he had left El Salvador after members of the Mara Salvatrucha street gang had threatened to kill him. "They wanted me to join them," he said.

It was his second attempt to reach Arizona, he said. The first time he had endured eight freezing nights and sweltering days aboard the train by strapping his belt to bar atop a tanker car. The border patrol caught him as he crossed into Nogales, Ariz., and sent him back home to Usulután, where the gang members threatened him again.

"When I think about the train, I feel fear and panic, for the thieves who attack you, and also for falling off," he said softly.

DOJ_NMG_0123439

For some, that is how the dream ends, with a fall under the train's heavy, whirring wheels.

At the Shelter of Jesus the Good Pastor in Tapachula, Donar Antonio Ramírez Espinas rubbed the bandaged stumps of his legs, sheared off above the knee, as he recalled the night of March 26, 2004, when he dozed off while riding between cars, lost his grip and fell onto the tracks.

"I fell face down, and at first I didn't think anything had happened," he said. "When I turned over, I saw, I realized, that my feet didn't really exist."

Back in Honduras, he had been working menial jobs in a parking lot and at a medical warehouse, making about $120 a month. Then he and a few buddies decided to try their luck in the States.

"You make the decision to look for a better life, not to continue with the life your father led, and for this you risk your life, without knowing that you could end up like this," he said. "An amputee."

After the accident, he spent two years at the shelter in Tapachula, wrestling with depression and thoughts of suicide. When those black days finally passed, he returned home for five months, only to find his parents, his former wife and even his three children had trouble accepting his disability. "My 9-year-old said, 'Papa, why did you come back like this?' " he remembered. "I didn't dare answer him."

Mr. Ramírez has returned to the shelter here, where he hopes to learn a trade — fashioning prosthetic legs and arms for other victims of the train. Others at the shelter told similar stories. Some doubted they would be able to make a living in their home countries, where even getting a wheelchair is hard.

But some of those with lesser injuries insisted their accident was just a temporary setback. Minor Estuardo Cortez, 33, from Guatemala, lost his left foot under a train wheel while climbing aboard in Oaxaca State. At the shelter, he has healed and learned to walk with a prosthetic foot. He intends to continue his journey. If he reaches Houston, he says, he has relatives who can get him a construction job.

"If something happens to me, I don't scare easy," he said. "I'll do it again to see who wins, the train or me. Only thing is I can't run, so I'll have to wait until it's stopped to get on."

Uzbek Leader Shows No Signs Of Vacating (AP)

By Bagila Bukharbayeva, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 28, 2007

Nearly a week after his term elapsed, the former Communist strongman who has kept a tight grip on Uzbekistan for more than 15 years shows no sign of vacating the presidential office.

The clock ran out on Islam Karimov's second term on Sunday, but there has been no official recognition of the fact — a sign his hold on power remains strong and that he has no intention of leaving, analysts say.

They say Karimov, who has eradicated opposition and silenced dissent in the Central Asian nation, appears to be exploiting a legal ambiguity.

While the Uzbek constitution limits terms to seven years, the country also has a law that says a presidential election must be held in December of the year in which the term expires — in this case December 2007.

"There is no sign that Karimov is preparing to leave and he is apparently going to stand for and get another term in December," said Michael Hall, Central Asia project director of the International Crisis Group think-tank.

Karimov, who will turn 69 on Tuesday, became the top Communist boss in this former Soviet republic in 1989. He has won two presidential elections since the Soviet collapse — in 1991 and 1999 — and had his term extended twice, once through parliament and another time in a referendum.

Both election victories were landslides with more than 90 percent of the votes, but neither was recognized by international observers as free or fair.

Many observers fear that the Karimov government's oppressive control of the country could radicalize Islamic fundamentalists and lead to an explosion of violence in an already troubled part of the world.

Uzbekistan borders Afghanistan and hosted a U.S. air base supporting the Afghan military campaign. But Uzbekistan closed the base in the wake of Western criticism over the government suppression of an uprising in the eastern city of Andijan in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0123440

Human rights activists say some 700 people were killed, including unarmed civilians, but the government says fewer than 200 people died. Karimov rejected criticism and calls for an independent investigation from the United States, the European Union and others.

Experts had predicted that the country — Central Asia's most populous with 27 million people — would become an engine for regional development because of comparatively well-developed industries and energy self-sufficiency.

But Karimov, seeing the economic chaos that swept other ex-Soviet republics when they started market reforms, maintained a centralized economy and imposed restrictive trade rules.

In recent years, after pro-democracy uprisings in Georgia, Ukraine and neighboring Kyrgyzstan, Karimov has shown increasing suspicion of the West. Along with evicting the U.S. base, he has evicted most Western media, aid agencies and non-governmental organizations.

"The atmosphere is stifling. There are no international organizations, no journalists to turn to," said Elena Urlayeva, one of a small number of rights activists who remain in the country despite harassment.

"Karimov is going to stay for an extra year, but he is a former president now. It's totally illegal, it's usurpation of power," Urlayeva said by telephone from Tashkent.

"But there is nothing we can do," she said. "To stage public protests would be the same as facing a firing squad."

U.S. A "Pariah" From Bush Policies, Kerry Says (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, January 28, 2007

DAVOS, Switzerland (AP) - Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, slammed the foreign policy of the Bush administration yesterday, saying it has caused the United States to become "a sort of international pariah."

Mr. Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential nominee, made the comment as he responded to a question about whether the U.S. government had failed to adequately engage Iran's government before the election of hard-liner Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in 2005. He said the Bush administration has failed to adequately address a number of foreign-policy issues.

"When we walk away from global warming, Kyoto, when we are irresponsibly slow in moving toward AIDS in Africa, when we don't advance and live up to our own rhetoric and standards, we set a terrible message of duplicity and hypocrisy," he said.

"So we have a crisis of confidence in the Middle East -- in the world, really. I've never seen our country as isolated, as much as a sort of international pariah for a number of reasons, as it is today."

Mr. Kerry said the government needs to use diplomacy to improve national security.

"We need to do a better job of protecting our interests because, after all, that's what diplomacy is about," he said. "But you have to do it in a context of the reality; not your lens, but the reality of those other cultures and histories."

DOJ_NMG_0123441

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: SUNDAY, JANUARY 28, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:
Was 9/11 Really That Bad? (LAT) ... 3
Editorial: Bush's Mysterious Surveillance Moves (SAEN) ... 4

Homeland Response:
Bin Laden, The Left And Me (WP) ... 4
As Aid Lags, Volunteers Shoulder Rebuilding On Gulf Coast (WP) ... 6

War News:
Fonda Reprises A Famous Role At Peace Rally (WP) ... 8
Thousands Protest Bush Policy (WP) ... 9
Iraq War Foes Mass On Mall (WT) ... 11
Crowds On Both Coasts Protest Iraq War (AP) ... 12
Protest Focuses On Iraq Troop Increase (NYT) ... 13
Celebrities Pack D.C. War Protest (AP) ... 15
Mass US Protest Against Iraq War (BBC) ... 16
Student Protesters, Fighting Image Of Apathy, Call For A Cohesive Movement (WP) ... 17
Grand Delusion (WP) ... 18
It Has Unraveled So Quickly (NYT) ... 19
Parting Ways In Iraq (NYT) ... 20
On Iran, Bush Faces Haunting Echoes Of Iraq (NYT) ... 21
Iran Condemns U.S. Raids Against Its Operatives (AP) ... 23
Whose Iran? (NYT) ... 23
Report: Iran Denies Centrifuge Work (AP) ... 28
Cracks In Iran (WP) ... 29
20 Killed In Baghdad On Eve Of Holiday (NYT) ... 29
U.S. Troop Deaths Cap Iraq's Bloody Week (AP) ... 31
Seven U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq (WT/AP) ... 31
Seven U.S. Soldiers Killed In Iraq Over Three Days (WP) ... 32
60 Civilians, 7 U.S. Troops Killed In Iraq (LAT) ... 33
Bombs At Baghdad Market Kill 15; 7 U.S. Troops Die (CNN) ... 34
Contractor Deaths In Iraq Nearing 800 (HC) ... 35
A Conversation Wtih Adel Abdul Mahdi (WP) ... 37
Pentagon Seeks New Ways To Recruit (MCT) ... 39
Gates Aims To Lessen Forced Extensions (BSH/AP) ... 41
Iraqi Soldiers Still Rely Heavily On U.S. (LAT) ... 41
Iraq Cultivates Ties To Democrats (LAT) ... 43
Army Probes War Contractor Fraud (AP) ... 44
Vietnam Shades Warner's Iraq Stand (WP) ... 45
How Iraq Affects D.C. Reputations (LAT) ... 47
After The Fall (WP) ... 48
Taliban Vows Summer Wave Of Suicide Bombers (WT) ... 52

Corporate Scandals:
Qwest May Face Fight For Money (DENP) ... 53
Is The Fix Worse Than The Problem? (NYT) ... 54

Criminal Law:
Libby Trial Shows Unsealed Lips In CIA (LAT) ... 55
For Hevesi Prosecutor, 'One Standard Of Justice' (NYT) ... 57
In The Penalty Phase, All One's Secrets Revealed (NYT) ... 59
It Only Looks Like The Girls Have Gone Wild (PPG) ... 60
EDITORIAL: The Cavalry Is Coming (NOTP) ... 62

Civil Rights:
Noxubee Clerk: No Inquiry Into Invalid Ballots (JCL) ... 63
Rental Housing Under Scrutiny (BRCN) ... 64
Matching The Police To The Populace (NYT) ... 65
Church-state "Wall" Coming Back Down? (WT) ... 66

Antitrust:
Microsoft Faces New Antitrust Clash With Vista (AFP) ... 68

Environment/Indian Affairs:
Dearborn Waste Treatment Company Execs Face Myriad Of Dumping Charges (DEARPG) ... 69
The Long Road To Energy Independence (NYT) ... 70
Top Democrats Still Divided? (POL) ... 71
Worry Over Expiration Of U.S. Law That Helped Rural Areas (NYT/AP) ... 71
2 Wolf Groups To Lose Endangered Status (NYT/AP) ... 72
Tribes In Texas, Elsewhere, Oppose Bid To Change Gaming (AP) ... 72

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:
Drug War Victories (SDUT) ... 74
Gun-safety Center Targets 'corrupt Dealers' (WILNJ) ... 75

Immigration:
A Family Apart, A Child In Pain. For What? (STPPP) ... 76
Minnesota's Guard: Eyes On The Border (MINNST) ... 77
Study Of Immigrants Links Lighter Skin And Higher Income (NYT/AP) ... 79

Tax:
Communities Quiet On Bond Probes (BLOOM) ... 80
The Budget Illusion (NYT) ... 80

Congress-Administration:

Lawyer Suited For Tough Inquiries To Replace Harriet Miers (AAS) ... 81
Experts See Peril In Bush Health Proposal (NYT) ... 82
Rangel And Others Condemn Bush Medicaid Plan (NYT) ... 83
A Deal In The Desert For Sen. Reid? (LAT) ... 84
You Listening To Me? (NYT) ... 86
At Roll Call, An Uneasy Silence (WP) ... 87
Ginsburg Feels Isolated On Court (WP/AP) ... 90
Supreme Court TV (WP) ... 90
Search Ends For 3 In Calif. Copter Crash (AP) ... 92
Voting Rights Chicanery (WP) ... 92
The George W. Bush Library: Scholarly Mecca Or $500 Million Oxymoron? (NYT) ... 93

Other News:

Looking For The Angry Populists In Suburbia (NYT) ... 94
Clinton Begins Her Run In Earnest (WP) ... 95
In Iowa, Hillary Off And Running (WT) ... 97
Clinton Hits Campaign Trail In Iowa (USAT) ... 98
Sen. Clinton Woos Voters In Iowa (LAT) ... 99
Clinton Begins Journey To White House (CHIT) ... 100
Clinton Explains Role In Authorizing War (AP) ... 101
In First Iowa Foray, Clinton Vows To Be Tough (NSDY) ... 102
Clinton In DM: "No Do-overs" On Iraq (DMR) ... 103
Pool Report 1: Sen. Clinton At Iowa Democratic Party Central Committee Meeting (POL) ... 104
Dour McCain (NOVAK) ... 105
Hillary Pushes Personality, Ducks Iraq (POL) ... 106
Clinton's Presidential Posturing (WP) ... 107
Hillary Clinton's Mission Unaccomplished (NYT) ... 108
You've Come A Long Way, Maybe (WP) ... 110
Giuliani Is Sounding More Like A Candidate (NYT) ... 112
Giuliani Plays It Close To The Vest (LAT) ... 113
In N.H., Activists Embrace Giuliani (WT) ... 114
Giuliani Inches His Way To The White House (POL) ... 114
Building A Serious Staff (WP) ... 116
In Law School, Obama Found Political Voice (NYT) ... 116
At Harvard Law, A Unifying Voice (BOS) ... 118
Secrets Of Obama Family Unlocked (LONT) ... 120
Sticks, Stones And Mr. Obama (WP) ... 122
In A Sea Of Political Endorsements, Six That Could Make Waves (WP) ... 122
The Faint Hoofbeats? That's The Dark Horse (NYT) ... 123
Cullen Elected State GOP Chairman (NHUL) ... 124
Move Up The California Primary (LAT) ... 125
How Dems Can Use California To Win In '08 (LAT) ... 125
How California Can Spoil The '08 Election (LAT) ... 127
Dems Aim To Lift State's Stature In Presidential Race (DENP) 128
Bill Clinton In '08! (LAT) ... 128
On The Hill (NOTP) ... 129
Jeb Bush Rallies Conservatives At Summit (WP) ... 131
U.S. Missiles In E. Europe Opposed By Locals, Russia (WP) .. 132
Plan To Revive Trade Talks Is Offered In Davos (NYT) ... 133
Blair Says G-8 Should Expand, Disagrees With Merkel (BLOOM) ... 133
3 Killed As Hamas And Fatah Fight On (NYT) ... 134
7 Dead On Day 3 Of Hamas-Fatah Conflict (AP) ... 135
Death Toll Mounts In Gaza Battles (BBC) ... 136
Israel May Have Violated Arms Pact, U.S. Officials Say (NYT) 136
U.S. State Dept. Report To Address Possible Arms Violations By Israel (LAT/AP) ... 138
Saving Lebanon (NYT) ... 138
Saudi Officials Seek To Temper The Price Of Oil (NYT) ... 139
Pelosi, U.S. Congressional Delegation Meets President Musharraf In Pakistan (AP) ... 140
15 Die In Blast Near Pakistani Shiite Mosque (WP/AP) ... 141
Bombing Kills 14 Pakistanis (NYT) ... 141
Pakistan Bombing Kills 14 People (BBC) ... 142
Pakistan Mosque Bombing Kills Police Chief, Officers (LAT) ... 142
U.S. Citizens Killed In Kenya (NYT) ... 143
Police: Carjackers Fatally Shoot 2 Women In U.S. Embassy Car In Kenya (AP) ... 143
Sudan's Peace Deal, Seen As A Bush Success, Is Endangered (WP) ... 143
A Choice For Darfur (NYT) ... 145
A Useful Rebuke On Rights (WP) ... 146
Despite Crackdown, Migrants Stream Into South Mexico (NYT) 147
Uzbek Leader Shows No Signs Of Vacating (AP) ... 148
U.S. A "Pariah" From Bush Policies, Kerry Says (WT/AP) ... 149

DOJ_NMG_0123443

TERRORISM NEWS:

Was 9/11 Really That Bad? (LAT)

By David A. Bell

The Los Angeles Times, January 28, 2007

IMAGINE THAT on 9/11, six hours after the assault on the twin towers and the Pentagon, terrorists had carried out a second wave of attacks on the United States, taking an additional 3,000 lives. Imagine that six hours after that, there had been yet another wave. Now imagine that the attacks had continued, every six hours, for another four years, until nearly 20 million Americans were dead. This is roughly what the Soviet Union suffered during World War II, and contemplating these numbers may help put in perspective what the United States has so far experienced during the war against terrorism.

It also raises several questions. Has the American reaction to the attacks in fact been a massive overreaction? Is the widespread belief that 9/11 plunged us into one of the deadliest struggles of our time simply wrong? If we did overreact, why did we do so? Does history provide any insight?

Certainly, if we look at nothing but our enemies' objectives, it is hard to see any indication of an overreaction. The people who attacked us in 2001 are indeed hate-filled fanatics who would like nothing better than to destroy this country. But desire is not the same thing as capacity, and although Islamist extremists can certainly do huge amounts of harm around the world, it is quite different to suggest that they can threaten the existence of the United States.

Yet a great many Americans, particularly on the right, have failed to make this distinction. For them, the "Islamo-fascist" enemy has inherited not just Adolf Hitler's implacable hatreds but his capacity to destroy. The conservative author Norman Podhoretz has gone so far as to say that we are fighting World War IV (No. III being the Cold War).

But it is no disrespect to the victims of 9/11, or to the men and women of our armed forces, to say that, by the standards of past wars, the war against terrorism has so far inflicted a very small human cost on the United States. As an instance of mass murder, the attacks were unspeakable, but they still pale in comparison with any number of military assaults on civilian targets of the recent past, from Hiroshima on down.

Even if one counts our dead in Iraq and Afghanistan as casualties of the war against terrorism, which brings us to about 6,500, we should remember that roughly the same number of Americans die every two months in automobile accidents.

Of course, the 9/11 attacks also conjured up the possibility of far deadlier attacks to come. But then, we were hardly ignorant of these threats before, as a glance at just about any thriller from the 1990s will testify. And despite the even more nightmarish fantasies of the post-9/11 era (e.g. the TV show "24's" nuclear attack on Los Angeles), Islamist terrorists have not come close to deploying weapons other than knives, guns and conventional explosives. A war it may be, but does it really deserve comparison to World War II and its 50 million dead? Not every adversary is an apocalyptic threat.

So why has there been such an overreaction? Unfortunately, the commentators who detect one have generally explained it in a tired, predictably ideological way: calling the United States a uniquely paranoid aggressor that always overreacts to provocation.

In a recent book, for instance, political scientist John Mueller evaluated the threat that terrorists pose to the United States and convincingly concluded that it has been, to quote his title, "Overblown." But he undercut his own argument by adding that the United States has overreacted to every threat in its recent history, including even Pearl Harbor (rather than trying to defeat Japan, he argued, we should have tried containment!).

Seeing international conflict in apocalyptic terms — viewing every threat as existential — is hardly a uniquely American habit. To a certain degree, it is a universal human one. But it is also, more specifically, a Western one, which paradoxically has its origins in one of the most optimistic periods of human history: the 18th century Enlightenment.

Until this period, most people in the West took warfare for granted as an utterly unavoidable part of the social order. Western states fought constantly and devoted most of their disposable resources to this purpose; during the 1700s, no more than six or seven years passed without at least one major European power at war.

The Enlightenment, however, popularized the notion that war was a barbaric relic of mankind's infancy, an anachronism that should soon vanish from the Earth. Human societies, wrote the influential thinkers of the time, followed a common path of historical evolution from savage beginnings toward ever-greater levels of peaceful civilization, politeness and commercial exchange.

DOJ_NMG_0123444

The unexpected consequence of this change was that those who considered themselves "enlightened," but who still thought they needed to go to war, found it hard to justify war as anything other than an apocalyptic struggle for survival against an irredeemably evil enemy. In such struggles, of course, there could be no reason to practice restraint or to treat the enemy as an honorable opponent.

Ever since, the enlightened dream of perpetual peace and the nightmare of modern total war have been bound closely to each other in the West. Precisely when the Enlightenment hopes glowed most brightly, wars often took on an especially hideous character.

The Enlightenment was followed by the French Revolution and the Napoleonic wars, which touched every European state, sparked vicious guerrilla conflicts across the Continent and killed millions (including, probably, a higher proportion of young Frenchmen than died from 1914 to 1918).

During the hopeful early years of the 20th century, journalist Norman Angell's huge bestseller, "The Great Illusion," argued that wars had become too expensive to fight. Then came the unspeakable horrors of World War I. And the end of the Cold War, which seemed to promise the worldwide triumph of peace and democracy in a more stable unipolar world, has been followed by the wars in the Balkans, the Persian Gulf War and the present global upheaval. In each of these conflicts, the United States has justified the use of force by labeling its foe a new Hitler, not only in evil intentions but in potential capacity.

Yet as the comparison with the Soviet experience should remind us, the war against terrorism has not yet been much of a war at all, let alone a war to end all wars. It is a messy, difficult, long-term struggle against exceptionally dangerous criminals who actually like nothing better than being put on the same level of historical importance as Hitler — can you imagine a better recruiting tool? To fight them effectively, we need coolness, resolve and stamina. But we also need to overcome long habit and remind ourselves that not every enemy is in fact a threat to our existence.

David A. Bell Is A Professor Of History At Johns Hopkins University

Editorial: Bush's Mysterious Surveillance Moves (SAEN)

San Antonio Express-News, January 28, 2007

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the nation will be "no less safe" now that the Bush administration has agreed to bring its warrantless surveillance program into line with provisions of the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act.

The effort to monitor international calls to or from terrorist suspects will now come under some sort of scrutiny from the secretive FISA court, specially created to review intelligence matters.

It is a curious reversal for the administration that raises an important question: If judicial review of the program doesn't impair national security, why didn't the White House adhere to this legal process from the beginning?

President Bush had maintained that as commander in chief, he is empowered in time of war to carry out such surveillance beyond the purview of the FISA court. Since the surveillance effort became known publicly in late 2005, he has strenuously argued that any changes to the program would imperil national security.

The new White House position still asserts this executive power — what Gonzales calls "inherent authority." But it accepts some sort of formal review process under FISA rules.

Other than a new majority in Congress, what has changed? No one really knows, because Gonzales' description of the process is as nebulous as the surveillance program itself.

Unfortunately, we don't know whether the program has changed or if the administration's interpretation of the law has changed. Bush's penchant for executive signing statements — Oval Office appendages to new laws that carve out exemptions for executive power — doesn't inspire confidence in the former.

Bush added one of those statements to a postal reform bill on Dec. 20. Civil liberties watchdogs contend the signing would allow officials to circumvent FISA warrants to open mail in emergency and foreign intelligence cases. The White House says the statement is, legally speaking, nothing new.

When the FISA controversy broke one year ago, this editorial page argued that if FISA requirements placed unreasonable restraints on efforts to defend the nation against terrorist attack, the Bush administration should work with Congress to amend the law, not ignore the law. That's still the case today.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bin Laden, The Left And Me (WP)

By Dinesh D'Souza

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0123445

As a conservative author, I'm used to a little controversy. Even so, the reaction to my new book, "The Enemy at Home," has felt, well, a little hysterical.

"Ratfink writes new book," James Wolcott, cultural critic for Vanity Fair, declares in his blog. He goes on to call my book a "sleazy, shameless, ignorant, ahistorical, tendentious, meretricious lie."

In the pages of Esquire, Mark Warren charges that I "hate America" and have "taken to heart" Osama bin Laden's view of the United States. (Warren also challenged me to a fight and threatened to put me in the hospital.) In his New York Times review of my book last week, Alan Wolfe calls my work "a national disgrace . . . either self-delusional or dishonest." I am "a childish thinker" with "no sense of shame," he argues. "D'Souza writes like a lover spurned; despite all his efforts to reach out to Bin Laden, the man insists on joining forces with the Satanists."

It goes on. The Washington Post's Warren Bass writes that I think Jerry Falwell was "on to something" when he blamed the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, on pagans, gays and the ACLU. Slate's Timothy Noah diagnoses "Mullah envy," while the Nation's Katha Pollitt calls me a "surrender monkey" and the headline to her article brands me "Ayatollah D'Souza." And in my recent appearance on Comedy Central's "The Colbert Report," I had to fend off the insistent host. "But you agree with the Islamic radicals, don't you?" Stephen Colbert asked again and again.

Why the onslaught? Just this: In my book, published this month, I argue that the American left bears a measure of responsibility for the volcano of anger from the Muslim world that produced the 9/11 attacks. President Jimmy Carter's withdrawal of support for the shah of Iran, for example, helped Ayatollah Khomeini's regime come to power in Iran, thus giving radical Islamists control of a major state; and President Bill Clinton's failure to respond to Islamic attacks confirmed bin Laden's perceptions of U.S. weakness and emboldened him to strike on 9/11. I also argue that the policies that U.S. "progressives" promote around the world -- including abortion rights, contraception for teenagers and gay rights -- are viewed as an assault on traditional values by many cultures, and have contributed to the blowback of Islamic rage.

The reaction I'm eliciting is not entirely new to me. As a college student in the early 1980s, I edited the politically incorrect Dartmouth Review and was frequently accosted by left-wing students and faculty. They called me names back then, too. And at the time I didn't care. I often informed them that taking on our iconoclastic paper was like wrestling a pig: Not only does it get everyone dirty but the pig likes it.

One of my earlier books, "The End of Racism," explored why nonwhite immigrants to the United States (like me) tend to succeed academically and economically compared with African Americans who are born here. I received lots of abuse for playing down racism -- as a "person of color," no less -- and taking sides with the white man. Some of my fellow immigrants from India advised me to "decolonize" my mind.

But the personal attacks have reached new heights with "The Enemy at Home." So much so, in fact, that I feel compelled to explain why I wrote this book, what it does and doesn't say and why I think it prompts people to threaten me with hospitalization.

First, and I feel silly having to say it: I don't hate America. My last book was called "What's So Great About America," and there is no question mark in the title. If I hated this country, why would I have left my family and friends in India and moved to the United States, married an American and become a U.S. citizen? I came here because the United States gives me the freedom to make the life that I could not have made in India. And just last week a Midwestern chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution offered to award me its annual "Patriot of the Year" prize -- an honor that I presume is not typically bestowed upon people who hate America.

If I am a patriot, however, I am a rational patriot. I don't believe in "my country right or wrong." Mine is not the patriotism of David Warren, who says he tasted the dust of 9/11 and places my criticism of the American left in the same category as those who say "Death to America." Rather, I uphold Edmund Burke's view: "To make us love our country, our country ought to be lovely."

Immediately following 9/11, there was a wondrous moment of national unity in which the American tribe came together. "Why do they hate us?" some wondered, but no one wanted to comprehend the enemy -- only to annihilate him. And I shared this view.

But five years later, that unity has dissolved amid a furious national debate over the war in Iraq and the war on terrorism. I thought it was time to go back and reconsider 9/11; in so doing, I concluded that the prevailing conservative and liberal theories explaining Muslim rage were wrong.

Contrary to the common liberal view, I don't believe that the 9/11 attacks were payback for U.S. foreign policy. Bin Laden isn't upset because there are U.S. troops in Mecca, as liberals are fond of saying. (There are no U.S. troops in Mecca.) He isn't upset because Washington is allied with despotic regimes in the region. Israel aside, what other regimes are there in the Middle East? It isn't all about Israel. (Why hasn't al-Qaeda launched a single attack against Israel?) The thrust of the radical Muslim critique of America is that Islam is under attack from the global forces of atheism and immorality -- and that the United States is leading that attack.

DOJ_NMG_0123446

Contrary to President Bush's view, they don't hate us for our freedom, either. Rather, they hate us for how we use our freedom. When Planned Parenthood International opens clinics in non-Western countries and dispenses contraceptives to unmarried girls, many see it as an assault on prevailing religious and traditional values. When human rights groups use their interpretation of international law to pressure non-Western countries to overturn laws against abortion or to liberalize laws regarding homosexuality, the traditional sensibilities of many of the world's people are violated.

This argument has nothing to do with Falwell's suggestion that 9/11 was God's judgment on the ACLU and the feminists for their sins. I pose a simple question: Why did the terrorists do it? In a 2003 statement, bin Laden said that to him, the World Trade Center resembled the idols that the prophet Muhammad removed from Mecca. In other words, bin Laden believes that the United States represents the pagan depravity that Muslims have a duty to resist. The literature of radical Islam, such as the works of Egyptian writer Sayyid Qutb, resonates with these themes. One radical sheik even told a European television station a few years ago that although Europe is more decadent than America, the United States is the more vital target because it is U.S. culture -- not Swedish culture or French culture -- that is spreading throughout the world.

What would motivate Muslims in faraway countries to volunteer for martyrdom? The fact that Palestinians don't have a state? I don't think so. It's more likely that they would do it if they feared their values and way of life were threatened. Even as the cultural left accuses Bush of imperialism in invading Iraq, it deflects attention from its own cultural imperialism aimed at secularizing Muslim society and undermining its patriarchal and traditional values. The liberal "solution" to Islamic fundamentalism is itself a source of Islamic hostility to America.

Contrary to the accusations of Alan Wolfe and others, I have no sympathy for bin Laden or the Islamic radicals. But I do respect the concerns of traditional Muslims, the majority in the Muslim world. In fact, the United States cannot defeat terrorism without driving a wedge between radical Islam and traditional Islam, because the latter has been the main recruiting pool for the former.

All my arguments can be disputed, but they are neither extreme nor absurd. So why has "The Enemy at Home" been so intemperately excoriated? I can imagine only two reasons. The first is given by James Wolcott himself. I am not, as he says, an unqualified right-wing hack. Rather, I am a scholar at the Hoover Institution at Stanford University, so Wolcott fears that I will be taken seriously.

The second reason can be gleaned from the common theme in the reviews: that mine is a dangerous book. But if a book says things that are obviously untrue and can be disproved, then it is not dangerous -- it is merely fiction and should be ignored. A book is dangerous only if it exposes something in the culture that some people are eager to keep hidden.

And what is that? It is that the far left seems to hate Bush nearly as much as it hates bin Laden. Bin Laden may want sharia, or Islamic law, in Baghdad, they reason, but Bush wants sharia in Boston. Indeed, leftists routinely portray Bush's war on terrorism as a battle of competing fundamentalisms, Islamic vs. Christian. It is Bush, more than bin Laden, they say, who threatens abortion rights and same-sex marriage and the entire social liberal agenda in the United States. So leftist activists such as Michael Moore and Howard Zinn and Cindy Sheehan seem willing to let the enemy win in Iraq so they can use that defeat in 2008 to rout Bush -- their enemy at home.

When I began writing my new book, this concern was largely theoretical, because the left was outside the corridors of power. Now I fear that the extreme cultural left is whispering into the ears of the Democratic Congress. Cut off the funding. Block the increase in troops. Shut down Guantanamo Bay. Lose the war on terrorism -- and blame Bush.

Pointing this out is what makes me dangerous.

Dinesh D'Souza, a fellow at the Hoover Institution, is author of "The Enemy at Home" (Doubleday).

As Aid Lags, Volunteers Shoulder Rebuilding On Gulf Coast (WP)

By Peter Whoriskey

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

PEARLINGTON, Miss. -- The two-by-fours inside the walls of George and Margaret Ladner's new home are inscribed with biblical verses, each written by one of the Alabama schoolchildren who raised money to buy the lumber.

The framing work on the house was done by a Christian from Pennsylvania, the exterior planking was put up by people from Texarkana, Tex., and a group from Destin, Fla., worked on other details.

"This home was built by the hands of God," Margaret Ladner, 75, said from the couch of her new living room last week.

In this small rural community, as in much of the hurricane-ravaged Mississippi Gulf Coast, this kind of motley charity effort accounts for the vast bulk of what halting progress has been made in the immense task of rebuilding.

DOJ_NMG_0123447

While the national debate over the recovery has focused on the billions expected in federal aid and insurance, those sources have so far provided little for places such as Pearlington, and charity efforts have constituted more than 80 percent of the home rebuilding completed so far, local and charity officials said.

Fewer than one in five families here are back in their homes, but nearly all of them have relied to some extent on charity groups. The waves of volunteers typically come down for a week or two, work during the day and at night sleep on cots and bunks set up in places such as the old school library and huts on the community's football field.

"Without the volunteers and the donations, we'd still be in the mud," said Rocky Pullman, a tugboat captain who represents the Pearlington area on the Hancock County Commission.

In a county where nearly 11,000 homes were destroyed by the storm, the largest single home rebuilder is the local Habitat for Humanity project, which is undertaking the construction of 19 homes in the area, according to an official with the governor's commission on recovery. Other groups are aiming at similar numbers.

The reason for the charity's dominant role in the rebuilding is that little, if any, of the $3.2 billion in federal aid for Mississippi homeowners has reached anyone here -- it is tied up for now at the state level. As for insurance, most residents of this rural community lacked any form of flood policy. People say there just hadn't been a flood in recent memory, and of those who did have coverage, most had too little.

"If it wasn't for the good American citizens coming here, we'd be in a world of hurt," said Chuck Benvenutti, Hancock County representative on the Governor's Commission on Recovery, Rebuilding, Renewal.

The fact that now, 17 months after Hurricane Katrina, only a small fraction of the home rebuilding has been completed and that most of it has been done by charity groups is viewed here as both wonderful and disappointing -- wonderful that so many strangers have arrived to help, but disappointing that the federal aid and insurance payouts have proved, for now, so unavailable.

The charitable groups and residents also say they sometimes worry that as the rest of the country forgets about their plight, the flow of volunteers that they have relied upon could shrink.

Several expressed outrage that there was no mention of the hurricane recovery in President Bush's State of the Union address on Tuesday.

"We still look like a bomb hit us, and then the president in his national address doesn't even mention us?" said Larry Randall, a retired boat captain and a coordinator of relief efforts at the Pearlington Recovery Center. "That really hurt."

Katrina made a nearly direct hit on this modest community, which once had about 1,700 people, about 77 percent of them white, about 20 percent black, census figures show. Most maintained houses -- a typical one sold for about $50,000 before the storm -- and the rest had mobile homes.

Katrina pushed ashore a surge of water that simply washed many homes away and filled others with as much as 10 feet of water, according to recovery officials. Eight local people died. Several rode out the storm by climbing tall trees and resting in their branches; others jumped from rooftops into boats.

Now the vast majority of the residents who have returned live in FEMA trailers, the skinny, 27-foot-long homes on wheels provided by the Federal Emergency Management Agency that house families in cramped quarters. Along the woodsy roadsides, hand-painted plywood signs offer community encouragement -- "Keep Hope Alive" and "Katrina Was Big, God Was Bigger." Stray dogs roam.

Every week, scores of volunteers descend on this community to fill the cots at the school library or the parsonage at the local Baptist Church or a camp run by Presbyterians. Last week there were more than 80 here, but at other times there have been as many as 200.

By day, they go out in work crews, framing houses, putting up drywall, installing doors. At night, some have prayer meetings.

This past week, at various sites one could run into Amish from Pennsylvania, Catholics from Massachusetts, Methodists from Illinois, Baptists from Mississippi and a Florida church group. The Amish crews, clad in their distinctive suspenders and wide-brimmed hats, have a non-Amish driver who takes them to work sites.

"Many of us were born with a hammer in our hands," said Sam Stoltzfus, 41, part of an Amish crew from the Williamsport, Pa., area. "This is fun. Yes, we're supposed to help people, but it's not like a chain around our necks."

Russell Geeraerts, 38, a general contractor from Helena, Mont., said he came down after the hurricane "for all the wrong reasons." He was going to volunteer for a couple of weeks and then come back with his own work crew to make some money.

"But then I asked myself, 'How could you?' " he said last week after lunch at a local kitchen, which like the various camps was set up to serve volunteers. "Just look at this place."

The $3.2 billion in federal aid disbursed by the Mississippi program has largely been untouchable by people in Pearlington.

DOJ_NMG_0123448

The program's first phase doles out money to people who were flooded but did not live in the federally designated flood zone.

Most people in Pearlington live in the flood zone and must wait for the second phase to begin. Under its guidelines, families of low and moderate income will be eligible for as much as $100,000, less any insurance and FEMA rebuilding payments they have received.

In the meantime, not knowing whether they will receive aid, many families here say they have accepted, sometimes reluctantly, the help of the charity groups in the rebuilding.

Many put what they have into building a foundation, getting the home started. Then the charitable groups, which provide materials and work crews, do the rest.

Even so, many feel uncomfortable about receiving the help.

Frank Bello and his wife, for example, are raising five children. He worked in maintenance at the local elementary school. She is a nurse.

Last week, an Amish crew was putting together the frame on a new house for the family.

Just before Christmas, when Bello was hauling three loads of dirt to his home site, it began to rain. He told the volunteer work crew that he was sorry that they had to work in such conditions.

"They said, 'Don't worry, we're glad to do it,' and that made me feel better," Bello said. "But I still feel bad about it. Personally, myself, I like to be doing that sort of thing for other people, not having them do it for me. But now that's the way it is."

WAR NEWS:

Fonda Reprises A Famous Role At Peace Rally (WP)

By Linton Weeks

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

For her next act, Jane Fonda has entered the war against the Iraq war. At the tail-end of yesterday's on-the-Mall rally, organized by United for Peace and Justice, Fonda stood onstage with the Capitol behind her and addressed the sun-drenched thousands. "I haven't spoken at an antiwar rally in 34 years," she said. But, "Silence is no longer an option."

The first time Fonda, 69, spoke out for peace, the country was soul-deep in the Vietnam War. In the ensuing decades, as the nation has gone through a slew of changes, so has Fonda.

As a young woman, the daughter of actor Henry Fonda was an actress, a feminist and anti-Vietnam War activist. She morphed into a workout maven, post-feminist arm candy for billionaire media magnate Ted Turner, a vocal Christian and an autobiographer. With 2005's "Monster-in-Law," she defibrillated her movie career.

Yesterday, with her daughter, Vanessa Vadim, and two grandchildren nearby, she was again front and center as actress, feminist and opponent of war.

Her life has come full circle.

She thanked the tens of thousands of protesters for standing up to a "mean-spirited, vengeful administration" and she said she was glad to discover that the soul of America "is alive and well." One huge difference between protests then and now, she told the crowd, is military families and active service people in the present-day movement.

Children in tie-dyed shirts, grandmothers in flowered hats, kids with frizzy hair and muddy jeans danced and hoisted signs and chanted against the war and for impeachment. Despite her showbiz elegance -- blond hair, sunglasses, camel's hair coat and dark over-the-knee boots -- Fonda seemed to fit right in.

She was first known for campy movies such as "Barbarella," which was directed by first husband Roger Vadim, then for higher-shelf films such as "Klute" and "Coming Home," for which she won Best Actress Oscars. She became involved in the political world in the late 1960s, an involvement that continued with her second husband, activist Tom Hayden.

As a vocal opponent of the Vietnam War, she cut a controversial figure. She spoke at protest rallies and, in 1972, posed for a photograph with a North Vietnamese antiaircraft gun. The act was viewed by many as unpatriotic, even treasonous, and some called her "Hanoi Jane."

She has since apologized.

"Those people who would try to undermine her credibility will fail. We welcome her back to the peace community," said Rep. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.), chairman of the Out of Iraq congressional caucus.

"She's a high-profile, outspoken American," said actor Sean Penn, while smoking a cigarette before the rally. What she means to the antiwar movement "is the same thing any of the rest of us mean to it. She's one more voting American with a conscience who is against this war."

DOJ_NMG_0123449

Getting her to speak at the massive rally was a breeze, organizers said. Leslie Cagan, who works for United for Peace and Justice and is a longtime friend, e-mailed an invitation. Fonda said yes. Fonda has spoken out against the Iraq war at smaller events such as a Canadian lecture series, book signings and the recent National Conference for Media Reform in Memphis. United for Peace spokesman Hany Khalil said yesterday's rally was "one of the first times she has appeared on the national stage."

Kathy Engel, another United for Peace and Justice spokeswoman, said Fonda is important to the cause because through the years, she has been on the wave-crest of women's rights "and a myriad of issues concerning the health of our country. She's a long-distance runner."

Before the march, Fonda spoke briefly to a few hundred people at the Navy Memorial. The event was sponsored by Code Pink, an antiwar group started by women. On the other side of Pennsylvania Avenue, three dozen protesters organized by the conservative Web site Free Republic held up signs calling protesters traitors and terrorist sympathizers.

"Jaaaaannnneeeee Fonda has blood on her hands!" chanted one man with a megaphone.

"Thank you so much for being here," Fonda told the Code Pink folks over the noise. "We're going to get it done." Afterward, she hugged civil-rights activist Dick Gregory.

Asked whether she believed her presence might cause more harm than good to this antiwar movement, she snapped, "No." Then laughed. And was spirited away by handlers to the rally on the Mall.

She was one of the last people to speak at the midday rally. As she waited for her cue, she chatted with Rep. Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio). She shook hands with the Raging Grannies, a group of senior citizens who sang onstage, while the Rev. Jesse Jackson, Sean Penn and actor-couple Susan Sarandon and Tim Robbins milled about nearby.

Vietnam War veteran Orin "Spike" Tyson, 56, motored through the crowd on a Golden Companion Scooter with a U.S. flag flapping on the back. Tyson, a Lansing, Mich., resident who was wounded by shrapnel and a land mine, said he hasn't always agreed with Fonda, "but she has the right to say whatever she wants to say."

It's that freedom, he said, that he fought for.

Thousands Protest Bush Policy (WP)

By Michael Ruane, Fredrick Kunkle

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

A raucous and colorful multitude of protesters, led by some of the aging activists of the past, staged a series of rallies and a march on the Capitol yesterday to demand that the United States end its war in Iraq.

Under a blue sky with a pale midday moon, tens of thousands of people angry about the war and other policies of the Bush administration danced, sang, shouted and chanted their opposition.

They came from across the country and across the activist spectrum, with a wide array of grievances. Many seemed to be under 30, but there were others who said they had been at the famed war protests of the 1960s and '70s.

They came to Washington at what they said was a moment of opportunity to push the new Congress to take action against the war, even as the Bush administration is accelerating plans to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq. This week, the Senate will begin debating a resolution of disapproval of the president's Iraq policy, setting up a dramatic confrontation with the White House.

Some protesters plan to stay and lobby their representatives in Congress. Other antiwar activists intend to barnstorm states this week urging senators to oppose the troop escalation.

Yesterday's crowd was large and vociferous, but its size was unclear because there was no official crowd estimate. It was filled with longtime opponents of the conflict and of the administration.

"Its primary value is that it keeps up the pressure," said former Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota. "There is a sense that by summer, a march like this will be two or three times as large."

The demonstrators were garbed in many colors and T-shirts and buttons of many sentiments. "Think," read one shirt. "It's not illegal yet." A button read: "Kill your lawn." Read another: "Trees Hate You."

But the overriding complaint was the U.S. prosecution of the war in Iraq.

"Peace is controversial," civil rights and community activist Jesse Jackson, 65, said in a rousing address to the crowd gathered at the east end of the Mall. "But so is war. The fruit of peace is so much sweeter."

Some came for relatives in the service. A New York woman came on behalf of her younger brother, who she said was about to be deployed to Iraq. She had a framed picture of him in a knapsack. An Akron, Ohio, woman came with her infant son, saying his father, in the Navy in Kuwait, had yet to see him.

Oriana Futrell, 21, of Spokane, Wash., came with a sign that said: "Bring my husband home now." She said her husband, Dan, an Army lieutenant, was in Baghdad. They were married in April. She said she was weary of attending military funerals.

DOJ_NMG_0123450

Among the celebrities who appeared was Jane Fonda, the 69-year-old actress and activist who was criticized for sympathizing with the North Vietnamese during the Vietnam War. She told the crowd that this was the first time she had spoken at an antiwar rally in 34 years.

"I've been afraid that because of the lies that have been and continue to be spread about me and that war, that they would be used to hurt this new antiwar movement," she told the crowd. "But silence is no longer an option."

Fonda said she was attending with her daughter and two grandchildren. "I'm very proud that they're here, but I'm so sad that we still have to do this, that we did not learn the lessons from the Vietnam War," she said.

She concluded by saying, "God bless." And someone in the crowd yelled: "All right, Janey!"

But Fonda's presence drew counter protesters. Members of the Free Republic group picketed an antiwar rally at the Navy Memorial where Fonda spoke earlier in the day. "Hanoi Jane," one of the conservative group's signs read. "Wrong then, wrong now."

The day's events unfolded peacefully. And after a cold morning with temperatures in the mid-20s, the day quickly warmed, and protesters were unzipping jackets as the mercury topped 50 degrees.

The crowd, while exuberant, seemed significantly smaller than the half-million people organizers said were present and may not have matched similar protests in September 2005 and January 2003. The throng filled much of the Mall between Third and Fourth streets NW but thinned toward Seventh Street.

It was big enough, though, that the march that followed the rallies stretched the length of the route from the Mall, up Constitution Avenue to the east front of the Capitol and back to the Mall.

The day's events were organized chiefly by United for Peace and Justice, which describes itself as a coalition of 1,400 local and national organizations. Among them are the National Organization for Women, United Church of Christ, the American Friends Service Committee, True Majority, Military Families Speak Out, Iraq Veterans Against the War, Farms Not Arms, CODEPINK, MoveOn.org and September 11th Families for Peaceful Tomorrows.

The day began with a 10 a.m. rally at the Navy Memorial sponsored by the peace group CODEPINK. There, several thousand activists heard speeches by actor Sean Penn, presidential candidate and U.S. Rep. Dennis J. Kucinich (D-Ohio), and Reps. Maxine Waters (D-Calif.) and Lynne Woolsey (D-Calif.), and a brief greeting from Fonda.

But the most moving words were Futrell's.

"My husband deployed last June to Iraq," she said. "He is an Army infantry officer currently patrolling the streets of Baghdad. And I just have to say I'm sick of attending the funerals of my friends. I have seen the weeping majors. I have seen the weeping colonels. I am sick of the death."

"I don't know what else to say, other than: 'Bring them home,' " she said. "It is time. We need to bring them home where they can be safe."

The main rally began at 11 a.m. on the Mall and featured more speeches and a crowd that seemed to grow as the weather warmed.

In addition to Fonda and Jackson, actors Susan Sarandon and Tim Robbins addressed the protesters.

Robbins mocked President Bush, urging Congress to impeach him.

"Let's get him out of office before he's ruling from a bunker," Robbins said.

"Impeach Bush!" the crowd began to chant, interspersed with a few shouts of "And Cheney!"

"Richard Nixon talked to the walls," Robbins continued. "But George Bush is talking to God. But it is not a God I recognize. This God seems to be giving Bush a pass" on some commandments.

Colin Fallon, who works at the Government Accountability Office, and his wife, Melinda, a history professor at George Mason University, came to the demonstration from Fairfax with their three children.

Melinda Fallon guided her son through the crowd, talking about Americans. "They can say when they don't agree with what's going on," she told him.

"We're looking at more or less a 30-years-war here," Colin Fallon said. "All the indications are bad. I think about these kids. If they were asked to fight, would I think they would be able to help the situation as soldiers? I don't think so. I think it has become something of a war of attrition."

Laura Sinderbrand, 79, and her husband, Alvin, 84, of New York, said they attended dozens of Washington protests against the Vietnam War during the 1960s and early '70s.

"The biggest difference back then, of course, was the draft," said Alvin Sinderbrand, a retired patent lawyer. "That made everything much more emotional. There was a sense that everybody was vulnerable."

The Sinderbrands were opposed to involvement in Iraq from the beginning, they said, and attended a 2003 protest here. Yesterday, the couple rode down on the train and planned to return home in the evening.

DOJ_NMG_0123451

"We're doing it with the hope that it's going to be the last time we need to protest this," said Laura Sinderbrand, a retired museum director.

Kim Brenegar, 46, of the Capitol Hill neighborhood attended with her son Julian, 12.

"Of late, I've become very numb to the front-page reporting of deaths," she said. "And that's kind of problem for me. We've all become so used to it, it's the norm. I hope today's event will wake up a lot of people and demonstrate that this doesn't have to go on, we can stop this."

Julian added: "I don't like the war. I just think it's so stupid that we're there and it's pointless."

As the events went on, Johnny "Satchmo" T., of Northeast Washington, sat on a plastic bucket at Seventh Street and Constitution Avenue -- his regular spot -- and played a haunting version of "When Johnny Comes Marching Home" on his bent trumpet.

"They're lucky that they can do stuff" like that, he said of the protesters. "Some countries don't even let people do stuff like that."

Iraq War Foes Mass On Mall (WT)

By Tarron Lively

The Washington Times, January 28, 2007

Tens of thousands of anti-war protesters led by several Hollywood celebrities converged on Capitol Hill yesterday and railed against President Bush and his plan to send thousands of additional troops to Iraq.

The demonstrators descended on the Mall for one of the largest demonstrations since the Iraq war began in March 2003.

Organizers said they exceeded their goal of 100,000 attendees. Police do not give official crowd estimates, but some officers said privately that the crowd appeared smaller.

Dozens of politicians, civil rights leaders, military family members and celebrities spoke in opposition to the Bush administration's policy in Iraq and the president's recent decision to deploy 21,500 additional troops to Iraq.

Among the speakers was Jane Fonda, the actress and Vietnam-era protester, who participated in her first anti-war demonstration in 34 years.

"Thank you so much for the courage to stand up against this mean-spirited, vengeful administration," Miss Fonda said. "Your ongoing commitment to ending this war allows people in other parts of the world to remain hopeful that America has the stuff to become again a country that they can love and respect."

In addition to Miss Fonda, Hollywood liberals at the forefront of the event included Sean Penn, Tim Robbins, Susan Sarandon and Rhea Perlman.

"I'm so sad that we still have to do this, that we did not learn the lessons from the Vietnam War," said Miss Fonda, whose public protest of the Vietnam War included a trip to Hanoi in 1972, during which she was photographed seated on an anti-aircraft battery.

Miss Fonda, 69, said she had been silent on the subject of the Iraq war because she thought she would be a distraction to the anti-war cause.

"Silence is no longer an option," she said to cheers.

Her presence at an earlier demonstration at Seventh Street and Pennsylvania Avenue NW prompted jeers from a few dozen counterdemonstrators, some of whom held signs that expressed support for the troops in Iraq and disparaged Miss Fonda personally. Some objected to her presence at the site of the Navy Memorial. The sides exchanged hostile and obscenity-laced taunts, but police kept the groups separate.

Among the participants were soldiers being treated at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

Army Cpl. Joshua Sparling, who lost a leg to a roadside bomb in November 2005 in Ramadi, Iraq, said the anti-war protesters, especially those who are veterans or who are currently on active duty, "need to remember the sacrifice we have made and what our fallen comrades would say if they were alive."

Cpl. Sparling, 25, is based at Fort Bragg, N.C.

Meanwhile at the White House, spokesman Gordon Johndroe gave Mr. Bush's reaction to the protest: "The president ... understands that Americans want to see a conclusion to the war in Iraq and the new strategy is designed to do just that."

Yesterday's protest preceded an upcoming vote in the Senate on a nonbinding resolution condemning the new Iraq strategy.

The main rally, sponsored by the umbrella group United for Peace and Justice, began at 11 a.m. with a rally on the Mall. Protesters chanted and banged drums as they peacefully marched halfway around the Capitol and back.

Police said they recorded no arrests during the demonstration.

"Everything went fine. We had a large turnout, but no problems," said U.S. Park Police spokesman Lt. Scott Fear.

DOJ_NMG_0123452

About 300 protesters attempted to rush the front steps of the Capitol, but they were rebuffed by police without injury or arrest.

U.S. Capitol Police spokeswoman Sgt. Kimberly Schneider also said the event was incident-free.

"I think everything went pretty peacefully," she said.

Rep. John Conyers Jr., Michigan Democrat, was one of several legislators who spoke at the rally.

"George Bush has a habit of firing military leaders who tell him the Iraq war is failing," Mr. Conyers said. "He can't fire you. He can't fire us. But we can fire him."

Rep. Lynn Woolsey, California Democrat, said Mr. Bush's request for additional troops is a waste of taxpayers' money for his own personal cause.

"We all know it's not about winning or losing," she said. "It's about doing the right thing. Everybody knows this except the president .... They say the definition of insanity is doing the same thing and expecting different results."

Dennis Rosser, 50, a speechwriter from the District, called Mr. Bush a "despot who won't follow the desires of the American people."

"He's doomed for failure," Mr. Rosser said. "[White House spokesman] Tony Snow said the other day, 'The president doesn't always listen to the people.' Now as president, would you have said that?"

Mike Sherkin, 29, software engineer from the District, said that yesterday was his birthday, but he decided to come out in support of the rally.

"This war has been going on too long. It needs to end," Mr. Sherkin said. "Innocent people are dying."

Ilonka Wloch, 36, an editor from Ithaca, N.Y., said it was "very profound" to see so many protesters.

"I wholeheartedly believe in change, and I believe that at heart we as humans all want the same things -- safety, love and cooperation," she said.

Crowds On Both Coasts Protest Iraq War (AP)

By Calvin Woodward And Larry Margasak,

AP, January 28, 2007

Convinced this is their moment, tens of thousands marched Saturday in an anti-war demonstration linking military families, ordinary people and an icon of the Vietnam protest movement in a spirited call to get out of Iraq.

Celebrities, a half-dozen lawmakers and protesters from distant states rallied in the capital under a sunny sky, seizing an opportunity to press their cause with a Congress restive on the war and a country that has turned against the conflict.

Marching with them was Jane Fonda, in what she said was her first anti-war demonstration in 34 years.

"Silence is no longer an option," Fonda said to cheers from the stage on the National Mall. The actress once derided as "Hanoi Jane" by conservatives for her stance on Vietnam said she had held back from activism so as not to be a distraction for the Iraq anti-war movement, but needed to speak out now.

The rally on the Mall unfolded peacefully, although about 300 protesters tried to rush the Capitol, running up the grassy lawn to the front of the building. Police on motorcycles tried to stop them, scuffling with some and barricading entrances.

Protesters chanted "Our Congress" as their numbers grew and police faced off against them. Demonstrators later joined the masses marching from the Mall, around Capitol Hill and back.

About 50 demonstrators blocked a street near the Capitol for about 30 minutes, but they were dispersed without arrests.

United for Peace and Justice, a coalition group sponsoring the protest, had hoped 100,000 would come. They claimed even more afterward, but police, who no longer give official estimates, said privately the crowd was smaller than 100,000.

In California, smaller rallies were held in San Francisco, Los Angeles and Sacramento.

At the rally, 12-year-old Moriah Arnold stood on her toes to reach the microphone and tell the crowd: "Now we know our leaders either lied to us or hid the truth. Because of our actions, the rest of the world sees us as a bully and a liar."

The sixth-grader from Harvard, Mass., organized a petition drive at her school against the war that has killed more than 3,000 U.S. service-members, including seven whose deaths were reported Saturday.

More Hollywood celebrities showed up at the demonstration than buttoned-down Washington typically sees in a month.

Actor Sean Penn said lawmakers will pay a price in the 2008 elections if they do not take firmer action than to pass a nonbinding resolution against the war, the course Congress is now taking.

"If they don't stand up and make a resolution as binding as the death toll, we're not going to be behind those politicians," he said. Actors Susan Sarandon and Tim Robbins also spoke.

Fonda was a lightning rod in the Vietnam era for her outspoken opposition to that war and her advocacy from Hanoi at the height of that conflict. Sensitive to the old wounds, she made it a point to thank the active-duty service-members, veterans and Gold Star mothers who attended the rally.

DOJ_NMG_0123453

She drew parallels to the Vietnam War, citing "blindness to realities on the ground, hubris ... thoughtlessness in our approach to rebuilding a country we've destroyed." But she noted that this time, veterans, soldiers and their families increasingly and vocally are against the Iraq war.

The House Judiciary Committee chairman, Rep. John Conyers, threatened to use congressional spending power to try to stop the war. "George Bush has a habit of firing military leaders who tell him the Iraq war is failing," he said, looking out at the masses. "He can't fire you." Referring to Congress, the Michigan Democrat added: "He can't fire us.

"The founders of our country gave our Congress the power of the purse because they envisioned a scenario exactly like we find ourselves in today. Not only is it in our power, it is our obligation to stop Bush."

White House spokesman Trey Bohn responded that Conyers "needs to learn the difference between fact and fable, between a soundbite and a slur." He said Conyers' "assertion that the president fires generals with whom he disagrees is flat wrong."

On the stage rested a coffin covered with a U.S. flag and a pair of military boots, symbolizing American war dead. On the Mall stood a large bin filled with tags bearing the names of Iraqis who have died.

A small contingent of active-duty service members attended the rally, wearing civilian clothes because military rules forbid them from protesting in uniform.

Air Force Staff Sgt. Tassi McKee, 26, an intelligence specialist at Fort Meade, Md., said she joined the Air Force because of patriotism, travel and money for college. "After we went to Iraq, I began to see through the lies," she said.

In the crowd, signs recalled the November elections that defeated the Republican congressional majority in part because of President Bush's Iraq policy. "I voted for peace," one said.

"I've just gotten tired of seeing widows, tired of seeing dead Marines," said Vincent DiMezza, 32, wearing a dress Marine uniform from his years as a sergeant. A Marine aircraft mechanic from 1997 to 2002, he did not serve in Iraq or Afghanistan.

About 40 people staged a counter-protest, including Army Cpl. Joshua Sparling, 25, who lost his leg to a bomb in Iraq.

He said the anti-war protesters, especially those who are veterans or who are on active duty, "need to remember the sacrifice we have made and what our fallen comrades would say if they were alive."

Bush reaffirmed his commitment to his planned troop increase in a phone conversation Saturday with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. The president was in Washington for the weekend. He is often is out of town during big protest days.

"He understands that Americans want to see a conclusion to the war in Iraq and the new strategy is designed to do just that," said Gordon Johndroe, a spokesman for the National Security Council.

Protest organizers said the crowd included people who came on 300 buses from 40 states.

___

Associated Press writers Stephen Manning and Kasie Hunt contributed to this report.

___

On the Net:

United for Peace and Justice: http://www.unitedforpeace.org/

Protest Focuses On Iraq Troop Increase (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 27 — Tens of thousands of protesters converged on the National Mall on Saturday to oppose President Bush's plan for a troop increase in Iraq in what organizers hoped would be one of the largest shows of antiwar sentiment in the nation's capital since the war began.

The event drew demonstrators from across the country, and many said that in addition to taking their discontent to the streets they planned to press members of Congress to oppose the war.

"When we voted it was a directive to bring our troops home now," said the Rev. Graylan S. Hagler of Plymouth Congregational United Church of Christ in Washington, referring to the November elections when Democrats won control of Congress.

Demonstrators listened to speeches from a roster of politicians and entertainment figures including the Rev. Jesse Jackson; Representative Dennis J. Kucinich, Democrat of Ohio and a candidate for the presidency in 2008; and Representative Maxine Waters, Democrat of California. The actors Jane Fonda, Susan Sarandon and Tim Robbins also addressed the crowd.

"We need to be talking not just about defunding the war but also about funding the vets," Ms. Sarandon said, adding that more than 50,000 had sought treatment through the Department of Veterans Affairs while benefits for them continue to be cut.

DOJ_NMG_0123454

With Mr. Bush facing low approval ratings and Congress continuing to debate the terms of a nonbinding resolution opposing the troop increase, elderly people in wheelchairs, housewives pushing strollers, seasoned dissenters in tie-dye and veterans in uniform turned out to protest.

"I grew up during the Vietnam War, but I never protested it and never had my lottery number called to go fight," said David Quinly, a 54-year-old carpenter from Prairie Village, Kan., who arrived here Friday night with about 50 others after a 23-hour bus ride.

"In my view, this one is a war of choice and a war for profit against a culture and people we don't understand," Mr. Quinly said. "I knew I had to speak up this time."

Along the north side of the Mall, teenagers in T-shirts featuring sinister depictions of Mr. Bush chanted, "End the lunacy; end it now." A man wearing prison stripes carried a sign with the likeness of Vice President Dick Cheney. A man on 30-inch stilts, dressed as Abraham Lincoln, carried a sign quoting him: "But you can't fool all of the people all of the time." A tall, clear plastic column stood overflowing with thousands of shoes symbolizing the civilians killed in the war.

"I've got a son who just got out of the military and another still in," said Jackie Smith, 65, from Sunapee, N.H., whose sign read "Bush Bin Lyin." "And I'm here because this is all I can do to try to help them."

Tassi McKee, from Bastrop, La., who said she was a staff sergeant in the Air Force, was among a small contingent of about 20 active-duty service members who turned out. "I believe this has become a civil war, and we are being hurt and making matters worse by staying in the middle of it," Sergeant McKee said.

She said that it was not illegal for active-duty members to attend protests but that it was strongly discouraged.

Veterans were more numerous among the crowd.

Dressed in the olive green, military-issued flight jacket that he said he wore during the invasion of Iraq while serving as a Marine sergeant, Jack Teller, 26, said he joined a caravan from Greenville, N.C., because he felt that it was his duty.

"I don't like wearing the jacket because it reminds me that I participated in an immoral and illegal war," said Mr. Teller, who had "Iraq Veterans Against the War" stenciled on the back of his jacket. "But it's important to make a political statement."

Fernando Braga, a 24-year-old Bronx native who is a member of the Army National Guard, said that he was skeptical of the war before it started. Mr. Braga said his views hardened into opposition while he served in Iraq from March 2004 through January 2005.

"My own commander told us when we arrived that if we thought we were there for any reason other than oil then we had another think coming," he said. "I realized even commanding officers were against it but following orders."

Michael McPhearson, executive director of Veterans for Peace, said more than 100 veterans from the Iraq war participated in the march, and several hundred veterans from previous wars attended as well.

Robert Watada, 67, of Honolulu, a retired executive with the State of Hawaii who said his son, First Lt. Ehren K. Watada, was to be court-martialed next month for refusing to deploy to Iraq, said: "So many thousands of our own have died and hundreds of thousands of Iraqis and for what? And still we are having to push Congress to block the president."

At least 3,065 American military personnel have been killed and at least 22,834 have been wounded since the start of the war in March 2003, according to Iraq Coalition Casualty Count, a Web site that tracks Department of Defense numbers. The United Nations has estimated that at least 35,000 Iraqis have been killed each year since the war started.

President Bush, who often spends weekends at Camp David, was in Washington on Saturday but had no public events scheduled. He spent part of the morning on his weekly bicycle ride at a Secret Service training facility in Beltsville, Md.

The White House issued a statement in response to the demonstration. "The president believes that the right to free speech is one of the greatest freedoms in our country," said Gordon D. Johndroe, a White House spokesman. "He understands that Americans want to see a conclusion to the war in Iraq, and the new strategy is designed to do just that," referring to Mr. Bush's plan to increase troop levels in Iraq.

The protest was largely organized by the group United for Peace and Justice, a coalition of 1,400 local and national organizations.

"This war has been going on longer than she has been alive, and Cheney says it will be a 50-year war," said Annie Yanowitz, a housewife from Amherst, Mass., pointing to her 2-year-old daughter, Amira.

"I find that totally inappropriate that our children may grow up with this war continuing," Ms. Yanowitz said.

Police officials declined to provide crowd estimates, but Hany Khalil, a spokesman for United for Peace and Justice, said the protesters numbered about 400,000. Smaller antiwar protests took place on Saturday in other cities, including San Francisco, Los Angeles and Sacramento.

In Washington, counterprotesters also converged on the mall in smaller numbers, but the antiwar demonstration was largely peaceful.

DOJ_NMG_0123455

There were a few tense moments, however, including an encounter involving Joshua Sparling, 25, who was on crutches and who said he was a corporal with the 82nd Airborne Division and lost his right leg below the knee in Ramadi, Iraq. Mr. Sparling spoke at a smaller rally held earlier in the day at the United States Navy Memorial, and voiced his support for the administration's policies in Iraq.

Later, as antiwar protesters passed where he and his group were standing, words were exchanged and one of the antiwar protestors spit at the ground near Mr. Sparling; he spit back.

Capitol police made the antiwar protestors walk farther away from the counterprotesters.

"These are not Americans as far as I'm concerned," Mr. Sparling said.

Another counterprotester, Larry Stark, 71, a retired Navy officer who fought in Vietnam for five years and was a prisoner of war, said, "We never lost a battle in Vietnam but we lost the war, and the same is going to be true in Iraq if these protesters have their way."

The protesters on Saturday were undermining troop morale, Mr. Stark said, and increasing the likelihood of a premature withdrawal.

"It's like we never learn from the past," he said.

Celebrities Pack D.C. War Protest (AP)

AP, January 28, 2007

More Hollywood celebrities sparkled the dais than button-down Washington typically sees in a month.

Oscar-award winner Sean Penn had a warning for politicians on the ballot in 2008. "If they don't stand up and make a resolution as binding as the death toll, we are not going to be behind those politicians," he said.

With a reporter's credential, Penn visited Iraq in November 2003 and recently traveled to Iran.

The husband and wife anti-war duo, Susan Sarandon and Tim Robbins, also spoke.

"This past November the American people sent a resounding signal to Washington, D.C., and the world. We want change. We want this war to end. And how did Bush respond? Twenty-one thousand, five hundred more will risk their lives for his misguided war. Is impeachment still off the table? Let's get him out of office," Robbins said.

The crowd responded, "Impeach Bush, impeach Bush, impeach Bush!"

Jane Fonda, who recently wrapped a film with Lindsay Lohan, brought along her daughter and grandchildren. Fonda said she used to take her daughter to anti-war protests in the 1970s. "I'm proud they're here but I'm so sad we still have to do this," she said. Fonda was married to anti-war activist Tom Hayden during the Vietnam war.

___

There were a few tense moments outside the Capitol when several hundred protesters tried to rush the building. Police scuffled and wrestled with some and eventually set up barricades and a police line to keep them at bay. The protesters shouted "Our Congress!" and some carried riot shields with the slogan "U.S. out of everywhere."

Many of the protesters belonged to Students for a Democratic Society, an activist group founded in the 1960s by Tom Hayden (once married to Fonda) and others.

John Cronan, 23, from the Pace University chapter, said they were trying to send a different message than the main march. "These peace rallies really don't get anything done. With Congress historically, you have to force them to do something," he said.

The crowd eventually drifted away and many joined the larger march.

_By Steve Manning

___

Dressed in civilian clothing, a few active-duty members of the military quietly lodged their opposition against a war that has cost the lives of more than 3,000 of their comrades.

Jeffrey Fitting, 24, a senior airman from Camp Hill, Pa., is a chaplain's assistant at Dover Air Force Base in Delaware, where he helps families waiting to receive the bodies of their loved ones. The bodies of dead soldiers are prepared at a mortuary on the base before they are returned to the families.

"When we have military members, their families and civilians for the same cause, we're united" against the war in Iraq, Fitting said. He asked his commander if he could attend the rally and was told he had the right to do so.

Marc Train, 19, an Army private stationed at Fort Stewart, Ga., asked not to be sent with his 3rd Infantry Division unit to Iraq. He said the Army has initiated proceedings to have him discharged.

Train said his specialty is intelligence analysis and believes that was a factor in the Army's decision to seek his discharge.

"When I joined, I was indifferent. I talked to people in my unit who have been there three or four times. They didn't feel like they were accomplishing anything," Train said.

DOJ_NMG_0123456

Air Force Staff Sgt. Tassi McKee, stationed at Fort Meade and a specialist in intelligence, said, "I don't believe the war is being managed correctly."

McKee, 26, originally from Bastrop, La., said she joined the Air Force because of patriotism, travel and to save money for college.

_By Larry Margasak

___

About 40 counterprotesters lofted "Support our troops" signs in front of the Navy Memorial, a few blocks from the main demonstration. Among the participants were soldiers being treated at Walter Reed Army Medical Center.

Army Cpl. Joshua Sparling, who lost his leg to a roadside bomb in November 2005 in Ramadi, said the anti-war protesters, especially those who are veterans or who are currently on active duty, "need to remember the sacrifice we have made and what our fallen comrades would say if they are alive." Sparling, 25, is based at Fort Bragg, N.C.

The counterdemonstration vilified Fonda's appearance at the rally. They set up a fake Fonda doll hanging from a noose and taped a sign to it that read "Jane Fonda American Traitor."

_By Kasie Hunt.

___

Mothers of soldiers made a poignant presence at the march. One woman held a sign with a picture of her son as a young boy, reading "Cpl. Nicholas Ziolkowski, born April 21, 1982, Baltimore, KIA Nov. 14, 2004, Falluja." Ziolkowski, a Marine, was killed by a sniper's bullet.

Peggy Gray, 51, of West Hartford, Conn., said her son Shane recently returned from Iraq after an 18-month tour. Gray, a grandmother and state employee for the Connecticut comptroller's office, said she has protested wars since Vietnam. The difference between then and now is that people support the troops even if they oppose the war, she said.

"In Vietnam, we blamed the troops. Now, we see a lot of support for the troops from those opposed to the Iraq war," she said. She held one end of a banner that said, "Military Families Speak Out," a Boston-based organization of people opposed to the war.

_By Larry Margasak.

___

WASHINGTON (AP) — He stood out in the crowd because of his Air Force flight jacket.

Holding a sign that said, "Mad cowboy disease," Theodore Seman said he was a former Air Force captain and retired FBI agent.

"I was 100 percent behind our government up until we invaded Iraq. I never thought as a former military officer in command of nuclear weapons that I would see the United States of American make a pre-emptive strike on another nation."

Seman said he was not only protesting the war, but also President Bush's warrantless surveillance policies. Seman said he swore out many warrants as an FBI agent and finds it hard to believe the government would conduct surveillance without first going to a court.

"If voices are not heard, nothing will be done," he said.

Seman said he was a radar control officer in an interceptor that had nuclear weapons and was an FBI agent in Tampa, Fla.

_By Larry Margasak.

Mass US Protest Against Iraq War (BBC)

BBC.com, January 27, 2007

Tens of thousands of protesters have demonstrated in Washington to demand the withdrawal of US troops from Iraq.

The rally comes days before Congress is to discuss President George W Bush's new strategy for Iraq - including the despatch of 21,500 additional troops.

The protesters, chanting "Bring the troops home", were joined by Vietnam War-era protester, actress Jane Fonda.

Violence continued in Iraq on Saturday, with at least 15 killed in a suicide bomb attack in a Baghdad market.

The BBC's James Coomarasamy in Washington says this anti-war rally at the foot of the US Capitol was a marked shift away from the White House and on to Congress.

The protesters want Congress, now run by the Democrats, to block funding for the president's new strategy, our correspondent says.

Resolution

Jane Fonda, the Hollywood actress who angered many Americans by visiting Hanoi in 1972 during the Vietnam War, told the crowd: "I haven't spoken at an anti-war rally for 34 years. But silence is no longer an option."

She added: "I'm so sad that we still have to do this, that we did not learn the lessons from the Vietnam War."

Fonda was joined by fellow actors Sean Penn and Tim Robbins.

Robbins said: "What we need is courage, courage and conviction and we need people to represent the voice of the American people, a very clear voice last November, a voice that said: 'We're done with this war'."

The Democrats took control of both Houses in November's mid-term election, sparking Mr Bush's decision to form a new strategy for Iraq.

But our correspondent says Congress has so far balked at using the power of funding and only a handful of staunch anti-war Congressmen were present at the rally.

A man brings a child to hospital after Saturday's Baghdad bombing

Although nearly all Democrats and a growing numbers of Republicans oppose the president's plans, he says, senators have not been able to agree yet on a single non-binding resolution expressing their concerns.

At the rally a coffin covered with a US flag and a pair of military boots was put on display.

Organisers also filled a large bin with tags bearing the names of Iraqis who have died.

More than a dozen veterans, anti-war activists, religious heads and actors addressed the crowd.

A small counter-protest held up a Fonda doll with the sign "Jane Fonda American Traitor".

Mr Bush reportedly reaffirmed his commitment to the troop increase in a phone call with Iraqi PM Nouri Maliki on Saturday.

White House national security adviser spokesman Gordon Johndroe said: "Americans want to see a conclusion to the war in Iraq and the new strategy is designed to do just that."

Student Protesters, Fighting Image Of Apathy, Call For A Cohesive Movement (WP)

By Megan Greenwell

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

As the bulk of war protesters chanted "this is what democracy looks like" on the Mall yesterday, a few hundred gathered separately on the south edge of the Mall.

Members of the College Democrats of America mingled with the more radical Students for a Democratic Society and the Communist Youth Movement. Many held signs proclaiming themselves "another future leader against the war." Some danced. Some clapped. Others passed around a joint. Disparate in their affiliations, they were united in their chants: "College, not combat."

Since the war began nearly four years ago, many Vietnam-era antiwar activists have publicly lamented what they see as apathy among today's college students. They wonder whether the absence of a draft and a culture of pop music and reality television have distracted young people from civic responsibilities.

But among the hundreds of students on the Mall yesterday, dozens of whom drove all night to get to Washington for the protest, the prevailing sentiment was that their generation had been unfairly maligned and that the antiwar movement is growing stronger every day.

"I do think we're misrepresented as being lazy, ignorant and unaware of current events," said Sarah Searle, 19, a sophomore at the University of Virginia. "There's no huge movement going on like during Vietnam, but that doesn't mean we're apathetic."

The students at yesterday's protest noted that their efforts have not had the iconic touchstones of the late 1960s and early 1970s, when shootings at Kent State and the student takeover at Columbia University stirred U.S. consciousness. Still, there are signs, they said, of a building resistance to the war in Iraq and other U.S. foreign policy initiatives.

"Whenever you have inequality dragging on the way it is now, that's always resulted at some point in a rise in mass resistance," said David Judd, a Columbia junior who celebrated his 21st birthday yesterday by traveling with 150 classmates to Washington for the protest. "Obviously, that's not going to happen tomorrow, but there's good reason to believe that at some point it will, and the work that we do beforehand in preparing for that and getting people involved in activism is important."

Many students mentioned the case of Ehren Watada -- the U.S. Army lieutenant facing a court martial for refusing to deploy to Iraq -- as an important step in building a cohesive antiwar movement. Watada's father spoke from the main stage at the protest while student speakers at a side rally organized by the Campus Antiwar Network hailed the young man as a hero and said the war will not end until other soldiers make the same decision.

Mark Rudd, the 1960s radical who gained notoriety as the leader of the Columbia protests and as a member of the revolutionary group the Weathermen, said he has noticed increased antiwar activity among college students over the past year, which he attributed in part to Watada's public refusal to deploy in June. Students for a Democratic Society, the largest student activist group during Vietnam, has reemerged, holding its first convention since 1969 last year and gaining a presence on a growing number of college campuses.

DOJ_NMG_0123458

"There's been a 35-year break where there hasn't been a mass movement, so students haven't had a natural model for how to do it," Rudd said, laying some of the blame on the Weathermen for breaking apart the larger student movement in the push to be more radical. "I hope they'll learn from our shameful history and learn how not to screw things up like we did."

Students agreed that ending the war will require building a coalition across political lines. University of Maryland senior Alan Wright, 21, said political moderates have been alienated from the antiwar movement by radicals.

"We might all be against the war, but there's no consensus about what we should do now," Wright said. "If we can all come together, we will be able to have more of an impact."

Grand Delusion (WP)

By Robert Kagan

The Washington Post, January 28, 2007

It's quite a juxtaposition. In Iraq, American soldiers are finally beginning the hard job of establishing a measure of peace, security and order in critical sections of Baghdad -- the essential prerequisite for the lasting political solution everyone claims to want. They've launched attacks on Sunni insurgent strongholds and begun reining in Moqtada al-Sadr's militia. And they've embarked on these operations with the expectation that reinforcements will soon be on the way: the more than 20,000 troops President Bush has ordered to Iraq and the new commander he has appointed to fight the insurgency as it has not been fought since the war began.

Back in Washington, however, Democratic and Republican members of Congress are looking for a different kind of political solution: the solution to their problems in presidential primaries and elections almost two years off. Resolutions disapproving the troop increase have proliferated on both sides of the aisle. Many of their proponents frankly, even proudly, admit they are responding to the current public mood, as if that is what they were put in office to do. Those who think they were elected sometimes to lead rather than follow seem to be in a minority.

The most popular resolutions simply oppose the troop increase without offering much useful guidance on what to do instead, other than perhaps go back to the Baker-Hamilton commission's vague plan for a gradual withdrawal. Sen. Hillary Clinton wants to cap the number of troops in Iraq at 137,500. No one explains why this is the right number, why it shouldn't be 20,000 troops lower or higher. But that's not really the point, is it?

Other critics claim that these are political cop-outs, which they are. These supposedly braver critics demand a cutoff of funds for the war and the start of a withdrawal within months. But they're not honest either, since they refuse to answer the most obvious and necessary questions: What do they propose the United States do when, as a result of withdrawal, Iraq explodes and ethnic cleansing on a truly horrific scale begins? What do they propose our response should be when the entire region becomes a war zone, when al-Qaeda and other terrorist organizations establish bases in Iraq from which to attack neighboring states as well as the United States? Even the Iraq Study Group acknowledged that these are likely consequences of precipitate withdrawal.

Those who call for an "end to the war" don't want to talk about the fact that the war in Iraq and in the region will not end but will only grow more dangerous. Do they recommend that we then do nothing, regardless of the consequences? Or are they willing to say publicly, right now, that they would favor sending U.S. troops back into Iraq to confront those new dangers? Answering those questions really would be honest and brave.

Of course, most of the discussion of Iraq isn't about Iraq at all. The war has become a political abstraction, a means of positioning oneself at home.

To the extent that people think about Iraq, many seem to believe it is a problem that can be made to go away. Once American forces depart, Iraq will no longer be our problem. Joseph Biden, one of the smartest foreign policy hands in the Senate, recently accused President Bush of sending more troops so that he could pass the Iraq war on to his successor. Biden must assume that if the president took his advice and canceled the troop increase, then somehow Iraq would no longer be a serious crisis when President Biden entered the White House in 2009.

This is a delusion, but it is by no means only a Democratic delusion. Many conservatives and Republicans, including erstwhile supporters of the war, have thrown up their hands in anger at the Iraqi people or the Iraqi government. They, too, seem to believe that if American troops leave, because Iraqis don't "deserve" our help, then somehow the whole mess will solve itself or simply fade away. Talk about a fantasy. The fact is, the United States cannot escape the Iraq crisis, or the Middle East crisis of which it is a part, and will not be able to escape it for years. And if Iraq does collapse, it will not be the end of our problems but the beginning of a new and much bigger set of problems.

I would think that anyone wanting to be president in January 2009 would be hoping and praying that the troop increase works. The United States will be dealing with Iraq one way or another in 2009, no matter what anyone says or does today. The only question is whether it is an Iraq that is salvageable or an Iraq sinking further into chaos and destruction and dragging America along with it.

DOJ_NMG_0123459

A big part of the answer will come soon in the battle for Baghdad. Politicians in both parties should realize that success in this mission is in their interest, as well as the nation's. Here's a wild idea: Forget the political posturing, be responsible, and provide the moral and material support our forces need and expect. The next president will thank you.

Robert Kagan, a senior associate at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and transatlantic fellow at the German Marshall Fund, writes a monthly column for The Post. His latest book is "Dangerous Nation," a history of American foreign policy.

It Has Unraveled So Quickly (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

A PAINFUL measure of just how much Iraq has changed in the four years since I started coming here is contained in my cellphone. Many numbers in the address book are for Iraqis who have either fled the country or been killed. One of the first Sunni politicians: gunned down. A Shiite baker: missing. A Sunni family: moved to Syria.

I first came to Iraq in April 2003, at the end of the looting several weeks after the American invasion. In all, I have spent 22 months here, time enough for the place, its people and their ever-evolving tragedy to fix itself firmly in my heart.

Now, as I am leaving Iraq, a new American plan is unfolding in the capital. It feels as if we have come back to the beginning. Boots are on the ground again. Boxy Humvees move in the streets. Baghdad fell in 2003 and we are still trying to pick it back up. But Iraq is a different country now.

The moderates are mostly gone. My phone includes at least a dozen entries for middle-class families who have given up and moved away. They were supposed to build democracy here. Instead they work odd jobs in Syria and Jordan. Even the moderate political leaders have left. I have three numbers for Adnan Pachachi, the distinguished Iraqi statesman; none have Iraqi country codes.

Neighborhoods I used to visit a year ago with my armed guards and my black abaya are off limits. Most were Sunni and had been merely dangerous. Now they are dead. A neighborhood that used to be Baghdad's Upper East Side has the dilapidated, broken feel of a city just hit by a hurricane.

The Iraqi government and the political process, which seemed to have great promise a year ago, have soured. Deeply damaged from years of abuse under Saddam Hussein, the Shiites who run the government have themselves turned into abusers.

Never having covered a civil war before, I learned about it together with my Iraqi friends. It is a bit like watching a slow-motion train wreck. Broken bodies fly past. Faces freeze in one's memory in the moments before impact. Passengers grab handles and doorframes that simply tear off or uselessly collapse.

I learned how much violence changes people, and how trust is chipped away, leaving society a thin layer of moth-eaten fabric that tears easily. It has unraveled so quickly. A year ago, my interviews were peppered with phrases like "Iraqis are all brothers." The subjects would get angry when you asked their sect. Now some of them introduce themselves that way.

I met Raad Jassim, a 38-year-old Shiite refugee, in a largely empty house, recently owned by Sunnis, where he now lives in western Baghdad. He moved there in the fall, after Sunni militants killed his brother and his nephew and confiscated his large chicken farm north of Baghdad. He had lived with Sunnis his whole life, but after what happened, a hatred spread through him like a disease.

"The word Sunni, it hurts me," he said, sitting on the floor in a bare room, his 7-year-old boy on his lap. "All that I have lost came from this word. I try to avoid mixing with them."

"A volcano of revenge" has built up inside him, he said. "I want to rip them up with my teeth."

In another measure of just how much things have changed, Mr. Jassim's Shiite neighborhood is relatively safe. The area is now largely free of Sunnis, after Shiite militias swept it last year, and it runs smoothly on a complex network of relationships among the local militias, the police and a powerful local council. His street is dotted with fruit stands. Boys in uniforms roughhouse. Men sit in teahouses sipping from tiny glass cups.

Just to the south, the Sunni neighborhood of Dawoodi is ghostly at almost any time of day. Wide boulevards trimmed with palm trees used to connect luxury homes. Now giant piles of trash go uncollected in the median.

A serious problem is dead bodies. They began to appear several times a week last summer on the railroad tracks that run through the neighborhood. But when residents call the police to pick up the bodies, they do not come. The police are Shiite and afraid of the area.

"Entering a Sunni area for them is a risk," said Yasir, a 40-year-old Sunni whose house is close to the dumping ground.

DOJ_NMG_0123460

A few weeks ago, a woman's body appeared. It was raining. Yasir said he covered her with blankets and called the police. A day later the police arrived. They peeked under the waterlogged blanket and drove away. It was another day before they collected the body. They took it at night, turning off their headlights and inching toward the area like thieves.

For those eager to write off Iraq as lost, one fact bears remembering. A great many Shiites and Kurds, who together make up 80 percent of the population, will tell you that in spite of all the mistakes the Americans have made here, the single act of removing Saddam Hussein was worth it. And the new American plan, despite all the obstacles, may have a chance to work. With an Iraqi colleague, I have been studying a neighborhood in northern Baghdad that has become a dumping ground for bodies. There, after American troops conducted sweeps, the number of corpses dropped by a third in September. The new plan is built around that kind of tactic. But the odds are stacked against the corps of bright young officers charged with making the plan work, particularly because their Iraqi partner — the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki — seems to be on an entirely different page. When American officials were debating whether to send more troops in December, I went to see an Iraqi government official. The prospect of more troops infuriated him. More Americans would simply prolong the war, he said.

"If you don't allow the minority to lose, you will carry on forever," he said.

The remarks struck me as a powerful insight into the Shiites' thinking. Abused under Mr. Hussein, they still act like an oppressed class. That means Iraqis are looking into a future of war, at least in the near term. As one young Shiite in Sadr City said to me: "This just has to burn itself out."

Hazim al-Aaraji, a disciple of the renegade Shiite cleric Moktada al-Sadr, understands this. A cleric himself, he is looking for foot soldiers for the war. On a warm October afternoon, as he bustled around his mosque in western Baghdad, he said the ideal disciples would have "an empty mind," and a weapon. Surprised by the word choice, an Iraqi friend I was with stopped him, to clarify his intent. Once again, he used the word "empty."

The frank remark spoke of a new power balance, in which radicals rule and moderates have no voice. For many families I have become attached to here, the country is no longer recognizable.

I met Haifa and her husband, Hassan, both teachers, in a driveway in western Baghdad. They had just found the body of their 12-year-old son, who had been kidnapped and brutally killed, and were frantic with grief. They finally decided to leave Iraq, but its violence tormented them to the end. They paid a man to drive them to Jordan, but he was working with Sunni militants in western Iraq, and pointed out Hassan, a Shiite, to a Sunni gang that stopped the car. Over the next several hours, Haifa waved a tiny Koran at men in masks, pleading for her husband's release, her two remaining children in tow.

Hassan, meanwhile, knelt in a small room, his hands behind his back. His captors shot a man next to him in the neck. Haifa, a Sunni, eventually prevailed on them to let him go. The family returned to Baghdad, then borrowed money to fly to Jordan.

Now they live there, in a tiny basement apartment without windows in a white stone housing project on the side of a hill. Like many Iraqis there, they live in hiding. Residency permits cost $100,000, far beyond their means. Hassan cannot work, nor even risk leaving the house during the day for fear the Jordanian police will deport him.

He tries not to talk to people, afraid someone will recognize his Iraqi accent. He doesn't bargain in the vegetable market. He accepts mean remarks by Jordanian cabdrivers wordlessly.

Most of all, he wants to go home. "But death is waiting for us there," he tells me. "We are homeless. Please help us."

Parting Ways In Iraq (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

During the summer of 1995, Edward Joseph was serving as a U.N. peacekeeper in Bosnia. He was asked to help Muslim women and children flee from an area near Srebrenica, where 7,000 Muslims had already been slaughtered by Serb forces.

It was a controversial mission. The U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees refused to participate, believing the evacuation would just complete the ethnic cleansing. But the high commissioner didn't see the crowds of Muslim women shrieking in terror as Serb jeeps rolled by. Joseph did. It might seem high-minded to preach ethnic reconciliation from afar, Joseph now says, but in a civil war, when you can't protect people, it's immoral to leave them to be killed.

Gradually, leaders on all sides of the Bosnian fight came to see it was in their interest to separate their peoples. And once the ethnic groups were given sanctuary, it became possible to negotiate a peace that was imperfect, but which was better than the reverberating splashes of blood.

Today, many of the people active in Bosnia believe they have a model that could help stabilize Iraq. They acknowledge the many differences between the two places, but Iraq, they note, is a disintegrating nation. Ethnic cleansing is dividing Baghdad, millions are moving, thousands are dying and the future looks horrific.

DOJ_NMG_0123461

The best answer, then, is soft partition: create a central government with a few key powers; reinforce strong regional governments; separate the sectarian groups as much as possible.

In practice, that means, first, modifying the Iraqi Constitution.

As Joe Biden points out, the Constitution already goes a long way toward decentralizing power. It gives the provinces the power to have their own security services, to send ambassadors to foreign countries, to join together to form regions. Decentralization is not an American imposition, it's an Iraqi idea.

But, he adds, so far the Constitution doesn't yet have legislation that would do things like equitably share oil and gas revenue. The Sunnis will never be content with a strip of sand unless they're constitutionally guaranteed 20 percent of the nation's wealth.

The second step is getting implicit consent from all sects that separation and federalism are in their interest. The Shiites would have to accept that there never will be a stable Iraq if the Sunnis are reduced to helot status. The Kurds would have to accept that peace and stability are worth territorial compromise in Kirkuk. The Sunnis would have to accept that they're never going to run Iraq again, and having a strong Sunni region is better than living under a Shiite jackboot.

As Les Gelb says, unless the thirst for vengeance has driven the leaders in Iraq beyond the realm of reason, it should be possible to persuade them to see where their best interests lie.

The third step in a soft partition would be the relocation of peoples. This would mean using U.S. or Iraqi troops to shepherd people who want to flee toward areas where they feel safe. It would mean providing humanitarian assistance so they can get back on their feet.

As Edward Joseph and Michael O'Hanlon note, in this kind of operation, timing is everything. Move people in a certain neighborhood too early, and militias could perceive a vacuum and accelerate the violence. Move too late and you could be moving corpses.

The fourth step is getting Iraq's neighbors to buy into the arrangement. Presumably neither Iran nor Saudi Arabia really relishes complete chaos in Iraq and a proxy war with each other after the U.S. withdraws. The Turks would have to be reassured that this plan means no independent Kurdistan will ever come into being.

The most serious objection to soft partition is that the Sunni and Shiite populations are too intermingled in Baghdad and elsewhere to really separate. This objection, sadly, becomes less of a problem every day. But it would still be necessary to maintain peacekeepers in the mixed neighborhoods, be open to creative sovereignty structures, and hope that the detoxification of the situation nationally might reduce violence where diverse groups touch.

In short, logic, circumstances and politics are leading inexorably toward soft partition. The Bush administration has been slow to recognize its virtues because it is too dependent on the Green Zone Iraqis. The Iraqis talk about national unity but their behavior suggests they want decentralization. Sooner or later, everybody will settle on this sensible policy, having exhausted all the alternatives.

On Iran, Bush Faces Haunting Echoes Of Iraq (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, January 28, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 27 — As President Bush and his aides calibrate how directly to confront Iran, they are discovering that both their words and their strategy are haunted by the echoes of four years ago — when their warnings of terrorist activity and nuclear ambitions were clearly a prelude to war.

This time, they insist, it is different.

"We're not looking for a fight with Iran," R. Nicholas Burns, the under secretary of state for policy and the chief negotiator on Iranian issues, said in an interview on Friday evening, just a few hours after Mr. Bush had repeated his warnings to Iran to halt "killing our soldiers" and to stop its drive for nuclear fuel.

Mr. Burns, citing the president's words, insisted that Washington was committed to "a diplomatic path" — even as it executed a far more aggressive strategy, seizing Iranians in Iraq and attempting to starve Iran of the money it needs to revitalize a precious asset, its oil industry.

